Oblivion the Cancard Enemie

to fame and renoune, the Suckyng Serpent of auncient memorie; the deadly darte to the glory of princes, and the defacer of all con: quests and notable actes; So much bare rule in the first and second age of the world, that nothing was set out to Mennes knowledge either how the world was made, either how Man and beastes were created, or how the world was destroyed by water till ffather Moses hac by divine Inspiracion, in the third age, Invented letters, the treasure of Memorie and set furth five notable bookes, to the greate comfort of all people Lyving al this day. Likewise Mercurie in Egipte invented letters and writyng, which Cadmus after brought unto Greece. So every Nation was desirous to enhaunce Lady Fame, and to suppresse that deedly beast Oblivion. for what diversitie is betweene a noble prince and a poore Begger: Yea a reasonable man and a brute Beast, if after their death there be left of theim no Remembrance or token. So that evidently it appereth that fame is the triumphe of Glory, and Memory by litterature is the very dilator and setter furth of fame. How much therefore are princes, Governours and noblemenne bound to them whiche have so lively set furth the lives and acts of their parents, that although thei be ded by Morlall death, yet thei by writyng and fame live and bee continually present. If no Man had written the Goodnesse of Noble Augustus or the pitie of Mercefull Trajan, how should their Successors have followed their Steppes in vertue and princely qualities: On the contrarie part, if the Cruellie of Nero, the Ungracious life of Caligula hac not been put in remembrance, young Princes and fraile Governours might likewise have fallen in a like pitt, but by redyng their vices and seyng their Mischeevous end, thei be com: :pelled to leave their evill ways and embrace the good qualities of notable princes and pru: :dent Governours: Thus writyng is the keye to enduce vertue and represse vice. Thus memorie maketh Menne ded many a Thousand yere, Stull to live as though thei were present: Thus fame Triumpheth upon death, and Renoune upon Oblivion & all by reason of writyng and Historie.

The Preface

Alas my Soveraigne Lord, my Herte lamenteth to know and Remembre what rule this Tyrante Oblivion bare in this Realme, in the tyme of the Britons. For from the first Habitacion of this, no Man of the Britons either Sett furth Historie of their begynnyng, or wrote the hole lives of their Princes and Kynges, excepte Gildas, which Inveighed against the evill doynges of a fewe Tyrantes & evill Governours. Insomuch that Cesar wryteth, that when he was in this Realme, the People could not tell their Linage, nor their begynnyng. But one Geffrey of Monmothe a Thousand yere and more after Julius Cesar, Translated a certain Britishe or Welshe boke, Conteinyng the commyng of Brute with the Sequell of his Linage, till the time of Cadwalader, which Britishe boke if it had Kept a litle lenger, Brute with all his posteritie had been buried in the boke of Oblivion, for lacke of Writyng.

The Strong Saxons after thei had gained this Lande, Set up the Banner of ffame, and had their lives notably written by diverse and sundery ffamous Clerks even from their first entry into this lande, till the first Monarchy, and so Successively. In the Normans tyme, many notable, works hath been Sett furthe some of one Prince perticularly, & some of Mo: So that in fine, all the Stories of Kynges, from Kyng Willyam the first, to Kyng Edward the third, be Sett furthe at length, by diverse authors in the Latine Tongue, as by Mathew of Paris, sometime Religious in Saynt Albons and other, after whome Sir Froissard wrote the lives of Kyng Edward the third, and Kyng Richard the Seconde, So Compendeously and so largely, that if there were not so many thinges Spoken of in his long woorkes, I might believe all written in his great Volumes to be as trewe as the Gospell. But I have redde an olde proverbe, which Saithe, that in many woordes, a lye or twaine Some maie Scape. Sithe the end of Froissarte which endeth at the Beginnyng of Kyng Henry the fourthe, no man in the Englishe tongue, hath either Set furthe their honours according to their deserts, nor yet declared many notable Acts worthy of Memory doen in the tyme of Seven Kynges which after Kyng Richarde Succeeded: Excepte Robert ffabian and one without Name, whiche wrote the common Englishe Chronicle, Men worthy to be praysed for their diligence; but farre Stodying wide from the Butt of an history.

Wherefore most dread and benigne Soveraigne Lord, lest Cancarde Oblivione Should Deface the Glory of these Seven Princes to whom you be of all Sides lineall heire and very enheritour, I have compiled and gathered (and not made) out of diverse writers, as well Straung as Englishe, this Simple treatise whiche I have named the union of the noble houses of Lancaster and Yorke, Conjoyned together by the Godly Mariage of your most noble Graundfather, and your Vertuous Grandmother: For as Kyng Henry the fourth was the Begynnyng and rote of the great discord & division: So was the Godly Matrimony, the finall end of all dissensions, Stryfes and debates.

The Preface

I Beseechyng your Highe Majestie, to take this my simple and rude worke, accordyng to your accustomed Goodnesse in good part, not regardyng the thyng, but my good will to my native Countree, whose fame for lacke of wrytyng may much be darkened and defaced, And thus I pray to the Celestiall Lorde to send you Victorie over your Ene: mies peace with your Confederates, Love of your Subjectes: And in con: clusion perpetuall joye and Eternall felicitie to the Reader

Must crave of the most gentle reader, charitably to judge of me the imprinter of this werk, if ought herein shall be sene unto the of purpose to bee Omitted either not Sufficiently oilated and Set furth, or elles Somethyng to playnly Spoken, in the which might be noted affeccion, that thou will excuse me therein, for I professe that I have as nere as in me lay, neither altered nor added any thyng of my Self in the whole werke otherwise then the author writt the Same. But this is to be noted, that the auether thereof, who though not to all men, yet to many very well known, was a man in the latter tyme of his lyfe not so paynfull and Studious as before he had ben: wherefore he perfited and writt this Historie no farther then to then to the four and twentie yere of kyng Henry the eight: the rest he left noted in diverse and many pamphletes and papers, which so diligently and truly as I could I gathered the Same together, and have Suchwise compiled them, as may after the Said yeres appere in this woorke: but utterly without any addicion of myne. Therefore my request and desyre as aforesaid, is, that thou will truly and Charitably Iudge me: And So Soone as my leasure will Serve, for thine Ease, and ready fyndyng of any thyng herein con:teyned I purpose to gather an exact table of the whole woorke.

Finis

What mischiefe hath insurged in realmes by intestine deuision, what depopulacion hath ensued in countries by ciuil discencion, what detestable murder hath bene cõmitted in cities by seperate factions, and what calamitee hath ensued in famous regiõs by domesticall discord & vnnatural controuersy: Rome hath felt, Italy can testifie, Fraunce can bere witnes, Beame can tell, Scotlande may write, Denmarke can shewe, and especially thys noble realme of Englande can apparauntly declare and make demonstracion. For who abhorreth not to expresse the heynous factes comitted in Rome, by the ciuill warre betwene Julius Cesar and hardy Pompey by whose discord the bright glory of the triumphant Rome was eclipsed & shadowed? Who can reherse what xx mischiefes and what plages the pleasaunt countrey of Italy hath tasted and suffered by the seditious faccions of the Guelphes and Gebelynes? Who can reporte the misery that dayly hath ensued in Fraunce, by the discorde of the houses of Burgoyne and Orliens: Or in Scotlande betwene the brother and brother, the vncle and the nephew? Who can curiously endite the manifolde battailes that were fought in the realme of Beame, betwene the catholikes and the pestiferous sectes of the Adamites and others? What damage discencion hath done in Germany and Denmarke, all christians at this daie can well declare. And the Turke can bere good testimony, whiche by the discorde of christen princes hath xxx amplified greatly his seigniorie and dominion. But what miserie, what murder, and what execrable plagues this famous region hath suffered by the deuision and discenciõ of the renoumed houses of Lancastre and Yorke, my witte cannot comprehende, nor my toung declare, neither yet my penne fully set furth.

FOR what noble man liueth at this daie, or what gentleman of any auncient stocke or progeny is there, whose linage hath not bene infested and plaged with this vnnaturall deuision. All the other discordes, sectes and faccions all moste lyuely florysshe and continue at this presente tyme, to the greate displeasure and preiudice of all the christian publike xl wealth. But the olde deuided controuersie betwene the foxnamed families of Lancastre and Yorke, by the vnion of Matrimony celebrate and consummate betwene the high and mighty Prynce kyng Henry the seuenth and the Lady Elyzabeth his mooste worthy Quene, the one beyng indubitate heire of the house of Lancastre, and the other of Yorke was suspended and appalled in the persone of their moste noble, puissant and myghty heyre kyng henry the eight, and by hym clerely buried and perpetually extinct, So that al men (more clerer then the sonne) may apparantly perceiue, that as by discorde great thynges decaie and fail to ruyne, so thesame by concorde be reuiued and erected. In likewise also all regions whiche by deuision and discencion be vexed, molested and troubled, bee by vnion and agrement releued, pacified, and enriched.

BY vnion of the Godhed to the manhod, manne was ioyned to God whiche before by the temptacion of the subtle serpente, was from hym segregate and deuided. By the vnion of the catholike churche and the outsworne sinagoge, not onely the hard ceremonies and dedly penies of the Mosaicall law were clerely abholyshed and made frustrate, but also christian libertie is inferred and Christes religiō stablished and erected. By the vnion of man and woman in the holy sacrament of Matrimony the generacion is blessed, and the synne of the body clene extincte and put away. By the vnion of mariage, peace betwene realme and realme is exalted, and loue betwene countre and countre is norysshed. By coniunction of matrimony, malice is extinct, amitie is embraced, and indissoluble aliaunce and consanguinite is procured. What profite, what comfort, what ioy succeded in the realme of England by the vnion of the forenamed two noble familes, you shall apparauntly perceiue by the sequele of this rude and vnlearned history. And because there can be no vnion or agrement but in respect of a deuision, it is consequent to reson that I manifest to you not onely the orygynall cause and fountain of thesame, but also declare the calamities, troubles and miseries whiche happened and chaunced duryng the tyme of thesaid contencious discencion.

FOR the whiche you shall vnderstande (according as it is an acte of Parliament made in the furste yere of the reigne of kyng Edwarde the fourthe specified and declared.) That the high and mightie Prince king Henry the third of that name, had issue Edwarde his furste begotten sonne borne at Westmister the eleuenth Kalendes of July in ỹ vigile of Saincte Marke and Marcilian in the yere of our Lorde a thousande two hundred nyne and twenty. And Edmonde his seconde begotten sonne borne on the date of sainct Marcell in the yere of our Lord a thousande two hundred fourty and fyue. Whiche Edwarde after the death of kyng Henry his father, was entytled and called kyng Edwarde the first, and had issue his first begotten sonne entitled and called after the death of kyng Edward his father, kyng Edward the second, whiche had issue the right noble & honorable prince kyng Edward the third whiche kyng Edward had issue Edwad his first begotten sonne prince of Wales, Willyam of Hatfeld the second begottē sonne, Lionell duke of Clarence the third begotten sonne, Jhon of Gaunt duke of Lancaster the fourth begotten sonne, Edmond of Langley duke of Yorke the fift begotten sonne, Thomas of Woodstocke duke of Glocester the syxt begotten sonne, and Willyam of Wynsor the. vii. begotten sonne. The saied prince Edward died in the lyfe of his father kyng Edward the. iii. and had issue Rychard borne at Burdeaux, whiche after the death of kyng Edward the. iii. as cosin and heire to him, that is to saie sonne to thesaid

The lyne of kyng Henry the third.

Edward

Edwarde prince of Wales sonne to the saied kyng Edward the thirde succeded hym in royall estate and dignitee, lawfully entitled and called Kynge Richarde the seconde and died without issue, Lionell Duke of Clarence the third begotten sonne of the saied kyng Edward the third had issue Philippe his only doughter whiche was maried to Edmond Mortymer earle of Marche and had issue Roger Mortymer earle of Marche: which Roger had issue Edmond Mortimer erle of Marche, Anne and Elienor, whiche Edmond and Elianor died without issue. And the saied Anne was maried to Richard erle of Cambrige sonne to Edmond of Langley duke of Yorke the fifth begotten sonne of the said kyng Edward the thirde, which Rychарde had issue the famous prince Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke which had issue that noble prince kyng Edward the fourth father to Quene Elizabeth united in matrymonye to the high and sage prince kyng Henry the. vii.

¶ This aforenamed Henry earle of Darby beeynge created alitle before duke of Herforde, aprudente and politike persone, but not more politike then welbeloued, and yet not so welbeloued of all, as of some highly disdayned, began to consider with hymselfe how that kynge Richarde his cosyn germaine was nowe brought to that trade of liuynge that he litle or nothynge regarded the counsaill of his uncles, nor of other graue and sadde persones, but did all thynge at his pleasure, settyng his will and appetite in stede of lawe and reason. Wherefore on a daie beeynge in the compaigny of Thomas Mowbrey firste Duke of Norffolke and earle Marshall, beganne to breake hys mynde to hym more for dolour and lamentacion, then for malice or displeasure, reherfyng howe that kyng Richarde litle estemed and lesse regarded the nobles and Princes of his realme, and as muche as laye in hym soughte occasions, inuented causes and practised priuely howe to destroye the more parte of them: to some thretenyng death, to other manacing exile and banishment, forgettyng and not remembrynge what blotte it was to his honor, and what detrimente and damage it was to the publike wealthe, to suffre his realme to lese the auncient fame and pristinate renoune by his slouth and negligence, and that all thynges bothe in the tyme of peace, and also of warre, aswell in the realme as without, waxed worse and worse, and had neuer prosperous successe nor fortunate conclusion. And because noble menne murmured, and the comon people grudged, and all menne wondered at his vnprincely doynges, he desired the duke of Norffolke, whithe was one of the kynges priuy counsaill and well heard wyth hym, to aduise the kyng to turne the lefe and to take a better lesson. When the Duke of Norffolke had hearde fully hys deuise, he toke it not in good parte, but rekened that he had gotten a praye by the whyche he shoulde obtayne greater fauor of the kynge then euer he had, & so he at that tyme dissimuled the matter (as he was in deede bothe a depe dissimuler & a pleasaunt flaterer.) And after whē he had oportunite and sawe his tyme, was very glad (as tell tales and scicophantes bee, when they haue anye thynge to instill in to the eares and heddes of Princes) to declare to the kynge what he had heard, & to agrauate and make the offence the greater, he muche more added but nothyng diminished. x

¶ This matter some what quickened and more tikeled the wauerynge mynd of kyng Richard, and brought hym into a great fury. But when the water of fumitory was well disgested in his stomacke, he determined to here bothe the parties indifferently, and called to him the duke of Lancastre and hys counsayll, and also the Dukes of Herforde and Norffolk, & caused the accusor to report opēly the wordes to him declared, which rehersed theim agayn as he had before related to the kyng. When Duke Henry hearde the tale otherwyse reported then he ether thought or sayed, somwhat vnquieted for the nouelitie of the thyng, or troubled with anger for the vntruth of the matter, stode still & paused a good while lokyng stedfastly vpō the kyng. And after ỹ takyng a good corage to hym, makyng low obeisāce, besought his highnes to cōceyue no mistrust in hym till he had seen & herd more. Then turnyng hymself to hys accuser, declard worde by worde what he had sayd showyng the cause & occasion why he so spake, denyng fiersly al the other new inuēcions alleged & proponed to his charge: affirmyng ỹ if the kyng would permit & suffre hym he would proue his accusor vntrue, vniust & a false forger of lies & sedicious tales by the stroke of a spere & dēt of a swerd. The duke of Norffolke affirmed constantly his saiynge to be true & refused not the cōbate. The kyng demaunded of them if they would agre betwene themselfes, whyche they both denied and threw doune theyr gages, by my truth qꝺ ỹ kyng, if you of your selfes will not agre I wyll not study how to agre you: and then he graunted thē the battayll & assigned the place to be at the citie of Couentree in the moneth of Auguste next ensuyng, where he cauled a sūpteous theatre and listes royall gorgeously to be prepared. At the day apointed the .ij. valiant dukes cā to Couentre, accōpanied with the nobles & gētiles of their linages which theim encoraged and hertened to the vtmoste. At the day of the cōbate and fight, the duke of Aumarle that daie high counstable, and the duke of Surrey that daie high Marshall of Englande entred into the listes

with a great cõpany of men apareled in silke sendall embrodered with siluer both richely and curiously, euery man hauyng a tipped staffe to kepe the feld in order. About the tyme of prime came to the barriers of the listes, the duke of Herfford mounted on a white corser barbed with blewe and grene beluet embrodered sumpteously with Swannes and Antelopes of goldsmithes worke, armed at all poinctes. The Constable and Marshall came to the barriers, demaundynge of hym what he was, he aulwered: I am Henry of Lancastre duke of Herfford, whyche am come hether to dooe my deuoyre against Thomas Mowbrey duke x of Norffolke as a traytor vntrew to God, the kynge, his realme & me. Then incontinent he sware vpõ the holy Euangelistes that his quarell was trewe and iust, and vpon that poyncte he desired to entre into the listes. Then he put vp his swearde whiche before he helde naked in his hande, and put doune his viser, made a crosse on his forhed, and wyth spere in hand entered into the listes, and discended from his horsse and set hym doune in a chayer of grene beluet whiche was set in a trauers of grene and blewe beluet at the one ende of the listes, and there reposed hym selfe expectyng and abydynge the cõmyng of hys aduersarye.
Sone after hym entered into the felde wyth greate pompe kynge xi Richard accompaignied wyth all the peeres of hys realme, and in hys compaignie was therle of sent Paule, whiche was come out of Fraunce in post to se this chalenge performed. The kynge had aboue ten thousand persones in harnesse, leaste some fraie or tumulte might sprynge emongest hys nobles by partakynge or quarellynge. When the kynge was set on his stage whiche was richely hanged and pleasantly adorned. A kynge at Armes made open proclamacion, prohibitynge all menne in the name of the kynge and the high Constable and Marshall to enterprise or attempte to approche or touche any parte of the listes xii vpon payne of death, except such as were apoyncted to ordre and marshall the felde. The proclamacion ended, another Herald cried: behold here Henry of Lancastre duke of Herfford appellant, which is entered into the listes royall to dooe his deuoyre against Thomas Mowbray duke of Norffolke defendante, vpon payne to bee proued false and recreant. The duke of Norffolke houered on horsebacke at the entery of the listes, his horse beyng barbed with crimosen beluet embrodered richely with Lions of siluer and Mulbery trees, and when he had made his othe before the Constable and Marshall that his quarell was iuste and trewe, he entered the felde manfully saiynge aloude, God aide him that hath the righte, and then he departed from his horse & sate doune xi in his chayer whiche was Crimosen Ueluet, curtened aboute wyth white and redde Damaske. The lorde Marshal vewed their speres to see that thei were of egall length, and deliuered the one spere hym selfe to the duke of Herfforde, and sente the other spere to the duke of Norffolke by a knighte. Then the Heraulte proclaymed that the trauerses and chayers of the Champions shoulde bee remoued, commaundynge theim on the kynges behalfe to mounte on horssebacke and adreſſe themſelfes to the battaill and combate. The duke of Herſforde was quickely horſſed and cloſed his bauier and caſte hys ſpere into the reſt & when the trũpet ſoũded, ſet forward coragiouſly toward his enemy. vj. or. vij. paces. The duke of Norffolke was not full ſet forwarde whẽ the kynge caſt doune his warder & the heraultes cried ho, ho. Thẽ the kyng cauſed their ſperes to be taken from them, and commaunded them to repaire again to their chayers, where thei remained two long houres, while the kynge and his counſaill deliberatly conſulted what waie was beſt to bee taken in ſo waighty a cauſe. Then the Heraultes cried ſilence and ſir Jhon Boxey ſecretary to the kyng red the ſentence and determinacion of the kynge and his counſaill in a longe rolle, pronounſyng it after this maner. My lordes and maiſters I intimate and notify to you by the kyng & his counſaill', that Hẽry of Lancaſtre duke of Herſforde appellante: and Thomas duke of Norffolke defendante, haue honorably and valiantly apered here within the liſtes royall this daie, & haue been redy to darraine the battaill lyke two valiant knightes and hardy chãpions, but becaſe the matter is greate and weyghty betwene theſe two greate princes, this is the ordre of the kyng and his counſaill, that Henry duke of Herſford for diuerſe conſiderations and becauſe he hath diſpleaſed the kinge, ſhal within. xv. daies departe out of the realme for terme of ten yeres, without returnyng excepte by the kyng he be repealed again and that vpon pain of death. When the people whiche pertely loued the duke of Herſford heard this crie, they wer not a litle amaſed, & marueled muche that he which had doen his deuor to the perfourmance of his chalenge ſhould be thus baniſhed and exiled. Then the herault cried again oyes, & the ſecretary declared that Thomas Mowbrey duke of Norffolke by the ordinãce of the kyng and hys counſaill becauſe that he had ſowen ſedicion in this realme by his wordes wherof he can make no proffe, ſhall auoide the realme of Englande and dwel in Hũgery, Beame, Pruce or where he liſt, & neuer to returne again into Englande nor approche the cõfines nor borders of theſame, vpon pain of death, and that the kynge would ſtaie the profites and reuenewes of his landes in his handes till he had receiued ſuche ſommes of money as the duke had taken vp of the kynges treaſorer for the wages of the garriſon of Caleis which wer ſtill vnpaied. When theſe iudgemẽtes wer thus deuulged, the kyng called before him the two exiles & made thẽ ſwere that the one ſhoulde neuer come into the place wher the other was (willyngly) nor kepe company together in any forreine region, which othe thei receiued humbly and departed from the liſtes. It was ſuppoſed that the kyng miſtruſted that yf thei two ſhould ioyne in one again, and conſpire to be reuenged againſt him, that they and their frendes might worke hym greate trouble and calamitee, and for that cauſe to haue deuiſed this othe. The duke of Norffolke whiche ſuppoſed to haue been borne out by the kyng, was ſore repentãt of his enterpriſe, and departed ſorowfully out of the realme into Almaine, and at the laſte came to Uenice where he for thoughte and Melancolye deceaſſed.

ceassed. The duke of Herssord toke his leaue of the king at Eltha, which there released foure yeres of his banishmente. And so he tooke his iorney & came to Caleyes, & so into Fraunce, wher he continued a whyle.

Wondreful it is to wryte, and more straũge to hear, what nombre of people ran in euery towne & strete, lamentyng and bewaylyng his departure. As who say, ỹ when he departed, the only shelde, defence and comfort of the cõmon people was vadid and gone, as though the sunne had fallẽ out of the spere, or the mone had lapsid frõ her proper epicicle.

When he was arriued in Fraunce, kyng Charles hearing the cause of his banishment, which he estemed very smal and lyght, receyued him gently, & him honorably entreteyned. In so muche that he had by fauour obteyned the mariage of the only doughter of Jhõ Duke of Berry vncle to the Frenche kyng, yf kyng Richarde had not cast a stoppe in his waye: For he well considered how the comminaltie loued the duke and how desirous they were of his returne into England, and thẽ forseyng that if he should be ioyned wyth so great an affinitie as the bloud of the house of Berry was in Fraunce, & afterward sodeinly to returne into Englande, it myght fortune to redounde to his more displeasure then pleasure, wherfore he letted the mariage to his owne distruction.

xx During ỹ first yere of this dukes exile, his father Jhõ of Gaũt duke of Lancaster deseassed, & is buryed on ỹ northsyde of the high aulter of the cathedral churche of S. Paule in London. The death of this duke abbreuiated ỹ life of king Richard, for he notwithstandyng ỹ the duchy of Lãcastre was to this duke Hẽry lawfully dissended, not only ceazed without ryght or title all the goodes of duke Jhon his parent, but also defrauded his heire of his lawful inheritaunce, receyuynge the rentes and reuenues of al his patrimony, & geuyng to other that whych was not his, & distributed the dukes landes to hys paresites and flatteryng folowers. This facte was adiudged of all the nobilitie to be vnlawful, xxx vniust and vngodly, to depriue a man beyng banished out of the realme without deserte, without culpe, and wythout cause, of his inheritaunce and patrimony. But Edmond duke of Yorke vncle to Henry now lawfully duke of Lancastre, was sore moued with thys chaunce, to see the kynge breake and violate all lawes, all iustice and equitie, and after the murther of his brother the duke of Glocestre, to spoyle and robbe the sonne of his other brother. For he before thys tyme asmuche as his pacience could beare, did tollerate and suffre the death of his brother, the exile of hys nephiew, and an hundred mo iniuries, which for the leuitie and youth of the kyng, he remitted and buryed in obliuion. And therfore considerynge that the glory of the publique wealthe of hys natyue xl countrey was lyke to decay by reason that the kyng was not moste ingenious, & had no man nere him that would boldely admonishe him of his office & dutie, thought it the acte of a wyse man in tyme to get hym to a resting place, and to leaue ỹ folowyng of such a doubtfull captayne which with a leaden swerd would cut his owne throte bolle. Wherfore he with the duke of Aumarle his soonne went to his house at Langley reioysyng that there was nothyng in the common wealthe mishappened either by his deuice or consent, and he lamentably desyred daielye aide of almighty God to diuerte from kyng Richarde the darkecloud whiche he saw hangyng ouer his head.

In this ceason kyng Richard sailed into Irelande as diuers authores testifie, but what he did there is no parte of my processe, whiche dependeth on the sequele of this deuisiō. While king Richard was in Ireland, the graue persones of the nobilitee, the sage prelates of the clergy & sad magestrates & rulers of the citees, tounes & comminaltie perceauyng daily more & more the realme to fall into ruyne and desolacion (in maner irrecuperable as long as king Richard either lined or reigned,) after long deliberacion, wrote into Fraunce to duke Henry, whom thei nowe called (as he was in deede) duke of Lancastre & Herfforde, solicityng and requiryng hym with all diligente celeritee to conueighe hym selfe into Englande, promisynge hym all their aide power and assistence, if he expellyng kyng Richard as a manne not mete nor conueniente for so princely an offyce and degree, would take vpon hym the sceptre rule and diademe of his natiue countree and firste nutritiue soyle. And for that cause they sente the reuerent father Thomas Arundell archebis- x shop of Cauntorbury with certein lordes and citezens of diuerse cityes and borroghes in habite pallyate and dissimuled, into the citee of Paris, some goyng one waie and some another, but all assemblyng together at the house of Clugny where the duke thē soiourned. When he sawe the archebishop his especiall frend and looked on other his fautoures and louers, yf he thanked God no manne oughte to maruell, yf he welcommed these ambassadors no creature can wondre: but if he reioyced and applauded not at their accesse and commyng, wise menne maie thynke folie & fooles maie laugh hym to skorne. When he was of them saluted, and thei of hym not onely resaluted but heartely welcommed & frendly xxx enterteined. The archebishop desiryng the duke to absent al other persons then such as wer his cōpanions, saied these or like wordes to him.

An oracyon made by thomas Arūdel archebyshop of Cauntorbury to Hēry duke of Lancastre.

When your louyng and natural kynsmen and countrymen most noble and mightie prince, had muche aud long tyme considred & debated with thē selues of their affaires and busines in this tempesteous world and ceason (in the whiche no manne of our nacion is sure of his life, nor enioyeth his landes and seigniories without dreade nor possedeth his mouables without terrour or feare, whiche outragious dooinges many yeres occupied hath brought the publique wealth of our aboundāt countree almoste to wrecke and vtter exterminiō) their last ankerholde xl refuge and confort was to studye and deuyse howe to haue a gouernoure and ruler whiche shoulde excell and florishe in wisedome, polycye and iustice aboue all other. By whiche reason a greate nombre of ỹ nobilitee and in maner al the comminaltie, being led and perswaded (whē thei had well cast their iyes and marked all the peres and nobles of the realme of England (they could fynde no duke, nor marques, no erle nor other potentate within all the realme, to whose empire and authoritie thei would be subiect and vassals so gladly as to youres. For this I assure you (and you knowe it aswell as I) that wee miserable subiectes haue so long borne the yoke of wãton vnwitty kyng Richard, and haue paciẽtly tollerate the pernicious persecucion of his gredy and auaricious councellers, and haue wynked at the pollyng and extorcion of hys vnmeasurable officiers, that oure backes bee so galde that we can no more suffre, and our chynne bones so weake that we can no lẽger cary. And therfore necessitie and not wyll, reason and not affeccion, cõstancy and not leuitie enforceth vs to lamente and desyre youre ayde and cõforte, to whom we be sent by the moste part of the nobilitie and also of the more parte of the vniuersal comminaltie, to desire and requyre you x to take vpon you the high power, gouernaunce and sceptre of your natiue countreye and ryghte inheritaunce, and thesame to gouerne, rule and defend according to your approued wisedom and longe experimẽted pollecie, whome we haue euer knowen to be of that iustice, of that prudence & of that integritie that you wyl not commaund, admonish or attempt any thyng which shall not be iust, honest and laudable. Whiche request yf you well consider and diligently ponder prouely wyth your self, you shal easely perceyue that nothinge more profitable, more honest or more glorious can by any waies happen or chaunce to you then to accept and conforme your self to thesame. For what can you more exx pect and wish, then to commaũd and do al thynges according to ryght, reason & honestie: We offre not to you golde, siluer, perle, or precious stone, but our countrey, oure bodies, goodes and vs al to vse as youres and not as oures, desiring you to geue to vs in recompẽce, indifferẽcy quietnes and peace, and to restore to her seate and trone agayn, ỹ lady iustice, which hath so long bene banished out of oure nacion, to thentent that wyse, sage and good persons (whose desire and appetite is euer to liue wel) may honour, loue and embrace you as a gouernour and kinge sent from God, and that malicious and obstinate persons (whose cõscyxx ence is grudged with dayly offences, and whom the feare of iustice and punyshmente doth continuallye vexe and trouble, fearynge you as the skourge and plague of their naughtye doynges and mischeuous actes, maye eyther sone amende, or shortly auoide your countrey and region. Now occacion is offred, refuse it not, by the which your wisedom pollecie and valiãtnes shall appere to the vniuersal world, by the which you shal not onely bryng vs into an vnitie and monacorde, but also represse all sedicion and cancarde dissimulacyon: then the noble men shall triumphe, the ryche menne shall lyue wythoute feare, the poore & nedy persones shal not be oppressed nor confounded, and you for your so doyng, shall obtein thankes of your creatour, loue of your people, fauourxl of your neyghboures, fame end honoure for euer. When the byshoppe had ended, the duke pawsed a while, and then put of his hood and said.

MY lorde of Cauntorbury and you my other frendes and louers, your commyng to vs is very pleasaunt, but more ioyous is youre message, for we of our owne naturall disposicion for the good wyll and singuler affeccion that you haue euer borne to vs, haue loued, embraced, and highly estemed you and all your doynges. Surely we woulde you knewe with what sorowe and agony of mynde we haue borne your vexacions, calamities and oppressions (as for the manifeste iniuries and opprobrious offences done and committed agaynste vs as you knowe well ynough, we wolle not speake at this tyme) of the whiche we estemed oure selfe a partener, as a thyng common betwene vs. For as it is heard that the hed shal not feele, when the hãd or any other membre is greued or sicke, so it is vnlike that anye displeasure or discommoditie shoulde happen to you wyth whiche we shoulde not tast in parte, suche agremẽt is emong membres, and suche communitie is emong frendes. Wherfore neither for ambicion of worldly honour, nor for desire of Empire or rule, or for affeccion of worldly ryches, and mucke of the worlde, we wolle agre to your peticiõ, but onely to releue your miserable calamitie, to restore iustice to her auncient rome & preheminẽce, & to defend the pore innocent people frõ the extort power of the gredy coxmerãtes & rauenous oppressours, requiring you to ioine with vs & we with you in aduaũcing forward this our incepted purpose, & pretẽced entrepryce

When the duke was condiscended to the bishoppes requeste, the bisshop and his complices departed into Englande, makynge relacion to their cõfederates of the dukes agremẽt and pleasure exhorting euery manne to be prest and ready at his arryual.

After their departure, the duke fayned to the French kynge, that he would go into Bryteyn to visite his frende duke Jhon of Bryteyn. The French kyng thynkyng him to meane inwardly as he outwardely dissymuled, sent to the duke of Bryteyn letters of commendacion in fauor of the duke of Lancastre. But yf he had knowen that his entent was to transfret into England and depose his sonne in lawe kynge Richarde, he woulde surely haue stopped him a tyde, and let his purpose and passage. What should I saye, that which shalbe, shalbe. The Duke passed into Bryteyn and there conducted and waged certeyne men of warre and shippes, and wyth good winde and better spede sailed into Englãd and landed at Rauenspurre in holdzenes as most writers affirme. But some saye that he landed at Plimmoth, and other at Portesmouth, but where soeuer he arryued, sure it is that he tooke lande peaceably wyth out any agaynsay or interrupcion. I wyll not be tedyous to you in rehersyng how the Erles of Northumbrelande and Westmerlande, the lordes Percy, Rose, Wylloughby and other resorted to him & takynge an othe of him that he should not dooe to kyng Rycharde anye bodelye harme, & made to hym homage and became his liege men. I omit howe chyldren reioysed, how wemen clapped their handes, & how men cried oute for ioy in euery toune & village where he passed. I relinquish farther ther the concourse of people, the number of horses, whiche occurred to hym as he iourneyed toward London, reioysynge at his repaire and commyng to the Citie. I will not speake of the procession and singyng of the Cleargie, nor of the pleasant salutacions nor eloquent oracions made to hym by the Prelacie, nor of the presentes, welcomynges, laudes, gratificacions made to hym by the citesens and comminaltie of the citie of London, but I wyll go to the purpose. When he was come to Londō he consulted with his frendes diuers dayes, to whome came x Thomas Earle of Arundell sonne to Richarde of Arundell, by kynge Richard a littell afore put to death, which had lately escaped out of prison. When the Duke hadde perceaued the fauour of the Nobilitie, the affection of the Cleargie and the sincere loue of the comminalte towarde hym and hys procedynges, he marched forward with a greate company toward the West countrey, and in passynge by the waie, the people assembled in great and houge multitudes (as the nature of the common people is, euer desirous of newe changes) callynge hym their kyng, deprauynge and railyng on kyng Richarde, as an innocent a dastarde, a meicocke and not worthy to beare the name of a kynge. When he had assembled together a conuenient nomber of people for hys pur-xx pose and was clerely determyned to depose kynge Rycharde from his rule and dignitie, he proclaimed open warre agaynste hym and all hys partakers fautours and frendes. Kynge Richarde beyng in Irelande was certified of the Dukes arriuall, from whence (when he had pacified the sauage and wilde people) he retourned agayne into England, entendinge to reliste & defend the eminent perill & apparant ieopardy, and for the more tuicion and safegard entred into the stronge castell of Flinte in North Wales. x. myles distaunt from Chester. When kynge Richard perceued that the people by plumpes fled from hym to Duke Henry, he was amased and doubted what councell sodeynlye to take, xxx for on the one parte he sawe his title iust, trewe, and vnfallible, and beside that he had no small truste in the Welshemen, hys conscience to be cleane, pure, immaculate, wythout spot or enuye: on the otherside, he sawe the puissaunce of his aduersaries, the sodaine departyng of them that he mooste trusted, and all thynges turned vpsydoune, with these thinges he beynge more abashed then encouraged, compelled by necessitie, determined to kepe hym selfe in that castell tyll he myghte see the worlde stable and in more suretie. For nowe he euidentely espied and manifestly perceaued that he was lefte, lowted and forsaken of theym by whom in tyme he myght haue beue ayded and relieued, and whiche xl nowe was to late and to farre ouerpassed: and this thinge is worthy to be noted with a whitestone, of all princes rulers & men set in auctoritee and rule, that this Duke Henry of Lancastre shoulde be thus called to the kyngdome and haue the healpe and assistence all moste of all the whole realme, whiche perchaunce neuer thereof once thoughte or yet dreamed: and that kyng Richard should thus be lefte desolate void and desperate of all hope and comforte, in whom yf there were any offence, it ought more to be imputed to the frailtee of his wanton youth then to the malice of his heart or cankerdnesse of his stomacke, but such is the frayle iudgement of mortall men whiche vilependynge and not regardyng thynges present before their eies, do euer thincke all thynges that are to come to haue a prosperous succesſe and a delectable sequele. When the Duke of Lancastre knewe that kynge Richarde was come to the Castel of Flint, which a man maye call the dolorous Castel, because there kynge Richarde declined from his dignitie & lost the tipe of his glorye and pre heminence, he assembled together a great armye in small space lest he myght geue his enemies tyme to preuent his purpose and so to lose the good occasion of victory to him genē, came to the towne of Bristowe where he apprehended Willyam lorde Scrope the kynges treasurer sir Jhon Bussche and sir Henry Grene knyghtes, and caused their heddes to be striken of, and from thence toke hys iourney directly to Chester. When Thomas Percy Earle of Worceter a great Maister or lord Stuard of the kynges houshold beynge brother to the Earle of Northumberland hard tell of the dukes approch, beringe displeasure to the kynge because he had proclaimed his brother a traiter, brake before all the kynges houshold his white staffe, whiche is the ensigne and token of his office and without delay went to Duke Henry. When the kynges familier seruitours perceiued this, they dispersed them selfes some into one countrey and some into another.

The Duke came toward the castell of Flinte wherof kyng Richarde beynge aduertised by councell of Jhon Pallet and Richarde Seimer his assured seruauntes departed out of the castell and toke the sandes by the ryuer of Dee trustyng to escape to Chester and there to haue refuge and succoure, but or he hadde farre passed he was forelayed and taken and brought to the Duke, which sent hym secretly to the Towre of London. When the Duke had thus possessed hys longe desyred praye, he came to London in solempne estate and there called a Parliament in the kynges name, to the whiche many of the kynges frendes, but more of his there appeared. There was declared howe vnprofitable kynge Richarde had bene to the realme duryng his reigne, howe he subuerted the lawes, polled the people and ministred Justice to no man but to suche as pleased hym. And to the entent that the commons should bee perswaded that he was an vniuste and vnprofitable Prince and a tiraunte ouer his subiectes, and worthy to bee deposed. There were set forthe. xxxb. solempne articles verye heynous to the eares of men, and to some almost vncredible: The very effecte of which articles I will truely reporte hereafter accordyng to my copie.

Fyrste that kyng Richard wastfully spent the treasure of the realme and had geuen the possessions of the Croune to men vnworthy, by reason wherof daily newe charges more and more were layd in the neckes of the poore comminaltie. And where diuerse lordes as well spirituall as temporall, were appointed by the highe court of Parliament to cōmon and treate of diuers matters concernynge the common wealth of ment pleaded his charter of pardon, he could not be heard, but was in most vile and shamefull maner sodainly put to death.

15 ¶Itẽ he taxed men at the wil of him & his vnhappy councel, & thesame treasure spent in folie, not paiyng pore men for their vitaill & viande.

16 ¶Item he saied that the lawes of the realme were in his head, & somtime in his breste, by reason of whiche fantasticall opinion, he destroyed noble men and empouerished the pore commons.

17 ¶Item the parliament settyng and enacting diuers notable statutes for the profite and aduauncement of the common welth, he by his priuie frendes and soliciters, caused to be enacted that no acte thẽ enacted shoulde be more preiudiciall to him then it was to any of hys predecessors, through which Prouiso he did often as he liste and not as the lawe ment.

18 ¶Itẽ for to serue his purpose he would suffer the Shrefes of the shire to remaine aboue one yere or two.

19 ¶Item at the sommons of the Parliament when knightes and burgesses should be electe that the election had bene full proceded, he put out diuers persones elected, & put in other in their places to serue his wyll and appetite.

20 ¶Item he had priuie espialles in euery shire, to here who had of hym anye communicacion, and if he commoned of his lasciuious liuynge or outragious doyng, he streighte waies was apprehended and made a greuous fine.

21 ¶Item the spiritualtie alledged againste hym that he at his goynge into Ireland exacted many notable sõmes of money, beside plate & iuels, without lawe or custome, cõtrary to his othe takẽ at his coronacio.

22 ¶Item when diuers lordes & Justices were sworne to saie the truthe of diuers thinges to them committed in charge both for the honor of ỹ realme and profite of the kyng, the said kynge so menaced theym wyth sore threteninges, that no man would or durste saye the ryght.

23 ¶Item that with out the assent of the nobilitee, he caried the iewels and plate and treasure ouer the see into Irelande, to the great empouerishyng of the realme. And all the good recordes for ỹ cõmon welthe and against his extorcions, he caused priuely to be embesiled and conueied away.

24 ¶Item in all leagues and letters to bee concluded or sent to the see of Rome or other regions: His writyng was so subtill and so darke, that no other prince durst once beleue him, nor yet his owne subiectes.

25 ¶Item he mooste tirannously and vnprincely sayd that the liues and goodes of al his subiectes were in the princes hãdes & at his disposicio.

26 ¶Item that he contrary to the great Charter of England caused dyuers lustie men to appele diuers olde men, vpon matters determinable at the common law, in the court marciall, because that in that court is no triall but onely by battaile: Where vpon the said aged persones fearyng the sequele of the matter submitted theimselfes to his mercy whom he fined and raunsomed vnreasonably at his pleasure.

¶ Item he craftely deuised certain priuie othes contrary to the lawe, & caused diuers of his subiectes first to be sworne to obserue the same and after bound them in bondes for former kepyng of thesame, to the great vndoyng of many honest men. xvi

¶ Item where the Chauncellour accordyng to the lawe woulde in no wise graunt a prohibicion to a certain person: the kyng graunted it vnto thesame persone vnder his priuie seale with great threateninges if it should be disobeied. xvii

¶ Item he banyshed the byshop of Canterbury without cause or iudgement and kept hym in the parliament chamber with men of armes. xviii

¶ Item the byshops goodes he graunted to his successour vpon condicion that he shoulo mainteine all his statutes made at Shrewsburie, Anno. xxi. and the statutes made. Anno. xxii. at Couentree. xix

¶ Item vpon the accusacion of the Archebyshop, the kyng craftely perswaded thesaied byshop to make no aunswere, for he would be his warrant, and aduised hym not to come to the parliamēt. And so without aūswere he was condempned and exiled, and his goodes seazed. xx

These bee the articles of any effecte which were laied against hym sauyng foure concerning the byshoppe of Caunterbury, which onely touched hym, but his working vnwrought kyng Rychard from his croune.

AND for as muche as these arcicles, and other heinous and detestable accusaciōs were laied against hym in the open parliament, it was thought by the mooste parte that kyng Rychard was worthy to be deposed of all honour, rule and Princely gouernaunce. And instrumentes autentike and solempne to depose, and other instrumentes were made to certain persons for them, and all homagers of the realme to resigne, to him all the homages & fealties dewe to him as kyng and souereigne.

But or this deposicion was executed in tyme, he came to Westminster and called a great counsaill of all the nobilitie and commons to the entent to conclude and make expedicion of all thinges whiche before were purposed and set forward. xxx

In the meane season diuerse of kyng Rychardes seruauntes whiche by licence had accesse to his persone, comforted, animated and encouraged hym beyng for sorowe withered, broken and in manet halfe deade, aduertising and exhortyng hym to regard his welthe and to saue hys lyfe. And first they aduised him willyngly to suffer him selfe to be deposed bothe of his dignitie, and depriued of his ryches: so that the duke of Lancastre might without murdre or battayll obteine the scepter and Diademe, after the whiche they well perceiued he gaped and thrusted by the mene wherof they thought he should be in perfit assuraunce of his life long to continue, and therfore might commit hym selfe to good hope, whiche is the best felowe & companion that a man in aduersitie can associat or ioyne hym selfe withall. Surely this counsaill was both good & honeste in so greate an extremitie, but yet the full effecte folowed not as xl the ſequele of the thyng ſhewed and apparauntly declared. What pro-fite, what honoure, what ſuretie had it bene to kyng Rychard, if he when he might, whiche profeſſed the name and title of a kyng, whiche is as muche to ſaie, the ruler or keper of people, had excogitate or remembred to haue bene a keper of his owne hedde and lyfe, which nowe beyng for-ſaken retect and abandoned of all ſuche as he, beyng an euel ſhepehard or herdman, before tyme did not plie, kepe and diligently ouerſe was eaſely reduced and brought into the handes of his enemies. Nowe it was no maſtery to perſwade a man beyng deſperate penſife and full of do-lour, to abdicate him ſelfe from his empire and imperiall preheminence: x So that in only hope of his life and ſauegarde, he agreed to all thynges that of hym were demaunded, and deſired his kepers to ſhewe and declare to the Duke, that if he would voucheſafe to accorde and come to hym, he woulde declare ſecretely thynges to hym bothe profitable and pleaſaunt. His kepers ſent worde of all his ſaiynges to the duke, which incontinent repaired to his chamber. There kyng Richarde commoned with hym of many thynges, and amongeſt all other affirmed thoſe accuſacions to be to muche trewe whiche the comminaltie of the realme alledged againſt hym: that is to ſay, that he had euell gouerned his dominion and kyngdō, and therfore he deſired to be diſburdened of ſo great xx a charge and ſo heauy a burdein, beſechyng the duke to graunt to hym the ſafegarde of his life, and to haue compaſſion of hym, nowe as he before that tyme had bene to hym bountifull and magnificent.

¶ The duke biddyng hym to be of good comfort and out of feare warranted him his life, ſo that he would reſigne to hym his ſcepter croune & dignitie: alſo nether to procure nor conſent to any thyng or acte whiche might be hurtfull or preiudiciall to his perſon or ſucceſſion, to the which demaundes he graunted and frely condiſcended and agreed.

THE Duke of Lancaſtre the nexte daie declared all kyng Rychardes hole mind to the counſaill, but eſpecially to his vncle Edmunde duke of xxx Yorke (whoſe helpe he muche vſed) whiche hearyng all thinges to be in a broyle, a fewe daies before was come to London. The nobles and commons were wel pleaſed that kyng Richard ſhould frankely and frely of his owne mere mocion (which they muche deſired, leaſt it ſhould be noy-ſed and reported that he therunto were inforced and by violence cōſtrai-ned) reſigne his croune and departe from his regalite.

Not long after he cauſed a great aſſēble to be apointed at the towre of London, where kyng Richard appareled in veſture and robe royall the diademe on his head, and the ſcepter in his hand, came perſonally before the congregacion and ſaid theſe wordes in effecte. I Rychard kyng xl of England Duke of Fraunce, Aquitaine, and Lorde of Irelande, confeſſe and say before you my lordes and other oure ſubiectes, that by the hole ſpace of. xxii. yere in the whiche I haue obteined and poſſeſſed the rule and regiment of this famous realme of Englande, partely ruled and miſauiſed by the euell and ſiniſter counſaill of peruerſe & flattering perſones: and partely led by the frailtie of young wauering and wan-

ton youth, and with delectacion of worldly and volupteous appetites haue omitted and not executed my royall office and bounden dutie according as I oughte to haue done, in ministering iustice and preferment of the common wealth, whiche negligence I more then any of you I thynke my selfe, do sore repente and bewayle, and specially because I am brought to this poynete, that I knowledge and confesse my selfe, not worthy longer to reigne nor to haue any farther rule. So that now I can nother amende my misdedes, nor correcte my offences whiche surely I entended to do, and especially in my olde age, in the whiche euell thinges be accustomed to be amended, and the fautes and offences of youth, to be corrected and reformed. For what young man comonly can be founde indued with so muche vertue and so good qualities, whiche agitate and pricked with the heate of youth, shall not turne and decline from the right pathe and directe waye, and yet when he cometh to the more typenes of yeres and greate grauitie, doth not amend and change into better his old errates & wanton actes, for experiẽce teacheth, that of a rugged colte, commeth a good horse, and of a shrewde boye, proueth a good man. But sithe fortune doth not permit and suffre me so to do, to thentent that the publike welth of this realme may be holpen and reuansed by my meane, and after this not lyke agayn to declyne and decaye. And to the intent that it shall bee lefull to you, to electe and chose my cosyn germayne, Henry Duke of Lancastre, a man mete for a realme, and a prince apt for a kyngdome, to your kyng and souereigne lorde: I of my owne mere motion and frewyll, do putte and depose my selfe out of all royall dignitie, prehemynence & souereignite, and resygne the possession, title and vse of this realme, with all rightes thereunto appertaignyng, into his handes and possession. And then with a lamentable voyce and a sorowfull countenaunce, delyuered his scepter and croune to the duke of Lancastre, requiryng euery persone seuerally to graunt and assent that he might lyue a priuate and a solitary lyfe, with the swetnesse whereof, he would be so well pleased, that it should be a paine and punishement to hym to go abrode, and deliuered all the goodes that he had, to the some of three hundred thousand pounde in coyne, beside plate and iuels, as a pledge and satisfaccion, for the iniuries and wronges by hym committed and done. But whatsoeuer was promised, he was disceiued: For shortly after his resignacion he was conueighed to the Castell of Ledes in Kent, and from thence to Pomffret where he departed out of this miserable life, as you shall heare hereafter.

HEN the fame was diſperſed abrode that kyng Rycharde had putte hym ſelfe from his dygnitee royall, and reſigned his Scepter and Diademe imperiall, Henry Plantagenet borne at Bolyngbroke in the Countie of Lyncolne, duke of Lancaſtre and Herffordr etle of Derby, Leceſter and Lyncolne ſonne to Jhon of Gaunt duke of Lancaſtre, with one voice bothe of the nobles and comons, was publiſhed proclayned & declared kyng of England and of Fraunce, and lord of Ireland, and on the daie of ſaincte Edwarde the confeſſor, was at Weſtminſter with great ſolempnite and royall pompe, ſacred, enoynted and crouned kyng by the name of kyng Henry the fourth. But whoſoeuer reioyſed at this coronacion, or whoſoeuer delighted at his high promocion, ſure it is that Edmond Mortimer etle of Marche whiche was heire to Lionell duke of Clarence, the third begotten ſonne of kyng Edwarde the.iii as you before haue heard, and Richard erle of Cambryge ſonne to Edmond duke of Yorke, which had maried Anne ſiſter to theſame Edmõd, were with theſe doinges neither pleaſed nor contente. In ſo muche that nowe the deuiſion once beyng begonne, the one linage perſecuted the other, and neuer ceaſed tyll the heires males of bothe the lines were by battaill murdered or by ſedicion clerely extinct and deſtroyed.

At the daie of the coronation, to thentent that he ſhould not ſeme to take vpon hym the croune and ſcepter royall without title or lawfull clayme but by extorte power and iniurious intruſion, he was aduiſed to make his title as heire to Edmonde, ſurnamed or vntruely fayned Crouchebacke, ſonne to kyng Henry the third, and to ſaie that theſayed Edmond was elder brother to kyng Edwarde the firſte, and for his deformite repudiat and put by from the croune royall, to whome by hys mother Blanche daughter and ſole heire to Henry duke of Lancaſtre, he was next of bloud and vndoubtfull heyre. But becauſe not onely his frendes but alſo his preuy enemies knewe, that was but a title and that this title was by inuentours of miſchife fayned, imagened & publiſhed and were ſurely enformed not only that theſaid Edmond was younger ſonne to kyng Henry the third accordyng as it is declared in the acte of parliamẽt before recited: but alſo hauing true knowledge that Edmõd was nether Crokebacked nor a deformed perſone, but a goodly gentyll man and a valiaunt Capitayn, and ſo muche fauored of his louyng father, that he to preferre hym to the mariage of the Quene Dowager of

Nauerne hauynge a great liuelode, gaue to him the countie Palãtine of Lancaster with many notable honors, hyghe seignioryes and large priuileges. Therefore they aduysed him to make some other claime to the newe obteyned regiment, and so caused it to be proclaymed and published that he chalenged the realme, not onely by conquest, but also because he was by kyng Richard adopted as heire, & declared successor & of hym by resignacion had accepted the croune and sceptre, & also that he was the next heire male of the bloud royall to kyng Rychard.

After that he was crouned, he created hys eldest sonne lord Henry, x & Prynce of Wales, Duke of Cornewale, & Erle of Chester, then beynge of the age of.xij.yeres. This solẽnitie finished, he called his high court of parliament, in the which it was demaunded by the kynges frendes what should be done with kyng Richard. The bishop of Carleile which was a man bothe wel learned & wel stomacked rose vp and sayde. My lordes I require you take hede what answer you make to this questyon. For thyncke there is none of you worthye or mete to geue iudgemente on so noble a Prince as kyng Rychard is, whom we haue taken for our souereigne and liege lorde by the space of.xxij.yeres, and I assure you, there is not so ranke a traytor, nor so arrant a thiefe, nor so xx cruel a murderer, which is apprehended and deteigned in prisone for his offence, but he shalbe brought before the iustice to heare hys iudgegemente, and yet you wil proceade to the iudgemente of an annoynted king, & heare neyther hys answere nor excuse. And I say that the duke of Lãcaster, whom you cal kyng, hath more offended aud more tresplased to king Richard & thys realme, then the kyng hathe other done to hym or to vs. For it is manifestly knowen that the duke was banished the realme by kinge Richard and his counsayl; and by the iudgemente of hys owne father, for the space of tenne yeres, for what cause all you know, and yet wythout lycence of kynge Rychарde he is returned axx gaine into the realme, yea and that is worse, hathe taken vpon hym the name, title & preheminence of a kyng. And therfore I saye and affirme ỹ you do apparantly wrong, & manyfest iniury to procede in any thinge agaynst kyng Richard, without callynge hym openly to hys answere and defence. When the bishop had ended, he was incontinent by therle Marshal attached & committed to ward in the Abbey of S. Albones.

And then it was concluded, that kyng Richard should continew in a large prisone, and shoulde be plentifully serued of all thinges necessarye bothe for viande and apparell, and that yf anye persones woulde presume to rere warre or congregate a multitude to releue or delyuerxl him out of prysone, that then he should be the firste that shoulde dye for that seditious commocyon. In this Parliamente the lorde Fitzwater appeled the duke of Aumarle of high treason, and offered to fight with him in listes royall. Likewyse the lorde Morley appeled therle of Salisbury, and there were more then.xx. appellantes whiche waged battaill in this Parliamente. But the kyng pardoned al their offences sa-uyng the fautes of the lorde Mozley and therle of Salisbury, whome he committed toward, & after at the request of their frendes, their offẽces were remitted & thei deliuered. He punished also extremely al such as were priuie and dooers of the homicide of Thomas hys vncle late duke of Glouceſter, whiche was shamefully murdered before the toune of Caleys. Besides this, he auanſed his frendes, and called out of exile Richard erle of Warwycke, and restored the erle of Arũdelles sonne to his owne possession and dignitie, and many other. He toke into his speciall fauor Jhon Hollande duke of Exceter and Earle of Huntingdone halfe brother to kyng Richard, which had espoused the lady Elizabeth x his owne sister. And beynge before captain of Caleys, greately moued and inwardlye greued that kynge Richarde hys brother was amoued out of the seate royall, began to reyse and stirre vp newe mocyons and sedicious faccions wythin the realme. Wherfore to aduoyde suche pestiferus dangers, the newe king reconciled him to his fauor, and made hym as he surely coniectured his perfite frende, where in dede he was inwardly hys dedly enemy. In this Parliamente wer adnichilate al ỹ actes passed in the parliament holden by kyng Richard in the. xxj. yere of his reygne, which was called the euyll parliamente for the nobilitie, the worse for the menaltie, but worste of all for the commonaltie. For in xx that parliament, will ruled for reason, men alyue wer cõdemned wyth out examinacion, men dedde and put in execuciõ by priuy murder were adiudged openly to dye, the hye prelate of the realme wythout answer was banished: An erle arraigned could not be suffered to plede his pardon, and consequently one counsayler did al thyng, and all counsaylers did nothyng, affirmyng the saying of Esope, which hearyng his felow to say that he could do al thyngs, sayed that he could do nothing. Whẽ he had thus reconciled his nobilitie, and gat the fauor of the spiritualtie and wonderfully pleased the commonaltie, but not so muche plealynge them, as the possession of the croune pleased hym self, and his frendes, xxx he of them and by the fauor of them both, for the auoydance of all claymes, titles and ambiguitees to be made vnto the croune and diademe of the realme had hys dignitie lygne and succession enacted, confirmed and entayled by thassente of the hygh Courte of Parliamente as foloweth worde by worde.

At the request and petition alwell of the nobilitie as of the cõmons » in this parliament assembled, it is ordeigned and establyshed that the » enheritaunce of the crounes and realmes of Englande and of Fraũce, » and of al other lordshyppes to the kyng our soueraygne lord, alwell on » this syde the seas, as beyond apperteynyng, with their appurtenãces, xl » shalbe vnited and remayn in the persone of our souereygne Lorde the » kyng, and in the heyres of his bodye lawfully begotten. And especially » at the request and assent aforsayd, it is ordeygned, established, pronoun» ced, enacted, wryten and declared, that my lorde Prynce, Henry eldest » sonne to our soueraygne lord the kynge, shal bee heyre apparante and successor

succeſſor to our ſayed ſouereygne lord in the ſaid croune, realmes & ſeignioryes, to haue & enioy them with al their appurtenaunces after the diſceaſe of our ſayed ſoueraigne to him and the heires of his bodye begotten. And yf he die without heires of his body begotteu, that then ỹ ſayd crounes, realmes and ſeignioryes with their appurtenances ſhall remain to the lord Thomas, ſecond ſonne to our ſaid ſoueraigne lorde and to the heires of hys body begotten, and yf he depart wythout iſſue of his bodye begotten, al the premiſſes to remaygne to lorde Jhon hys third ſonne and to the heires of hys body begottē. And yf he dye withxout iſſue, then the crounes, realmes, & ſeignioryes aforſayde with their appurtenances ſhal remain to the lorde Humfrey the.iiij. ſonne to our ſaid ſoueraygne lorde, and to the heires of his body lawfully begotten.

After which acte paſſed, he thought neuer to be by any of hys ſubie-ctes moleſted or troubled. But O Lord, what is the mutabilitie of fortune? O God what is the chaunge of worldely ſafetye? O Chriſt what ſtablenes conſiſteth in mannes prouiſion? Or what ferme ſtely hath a Prynce in his throne and degree? Conſidering this kynge hauynge the poſſeſſion and croune of the realme, and that in open parliament, agreed to by the Princes, condiſcended to by the Clerckes, ratefied by ỹ xx commons, and enacted by the thre eſtates of the realme, was when he thought him ſelfe ſurely mortiſed in a ferme rocke & immouable foūda-cyon, ſodaynely wyth a trimbelyng quickeſande & vnſtedfaſte ground like to haue ſonken or ben ouerthrowen. For diuerſe lordes which wer kyng Rychardes frendes, outwardly diſſimuled that whyche they inwardly conſpired and determined, to confounde this kynge Henry to whom they had both ſworn allegeance, and done homage, and ſo erect agayn and ſet vp their old lord and frend kyng Richard the ſeconde.

In thys caſe there lacked only an orgaine and conueyghance bothe how ſecretly to ſearch and knowe the myndes of the nobilitie, as allſo xxx to bryng them to an aſſemble and counſayl, where they myght conſult and comen together, how to bryng to efficacytie and effect, their long deſired purpoſe and ſecrete interpryſe. Se how the deuyll is as redy to ſet furth miſchief, as the good angel is to auāce vertue. At this time was an Abbot in Weſtminſter, a man of apparant vertues, profeſſynge openly Chriſt, Chriſtian Charitie, and due ſubiection and obeyſance to hys pryncc: whych Abbot hearyng kyng Henry ounce ſay when he was but erle of Darby and of no mature age or growen grauitie, that princes had to litle, and religions had to muche, imagined in hym ſelfe that he now obteynyng the croune of the realme, yf he wer therin a long cō-xl tinuer, woulde remoue the great beame that then greued his iyes and pricked hys conſcience. For you muſt vnderſtaude that theſe monaſticall perſones, lerned and vnliterate, better fed thē taught, toke on thē to wryte & regeſter in the boke of fame, the noble actes, the wyſe doyn-ges, and politike gouernaunces of kynges and prynces, in whiche cronographye, yf a kinge gaue to them poſſeſſions or graunted them liberties or exalted them to honor & worldly dignitie, he was called a sayncte he was praised without any desert aboue the Moone, hys genealogie was writtē, and not one iote that might exalt his fame, was ether forgotten or omitted. But if a christian prince had touched their liberties or claimed any part iustly of their possessions, or woulde haue intermitted in their holy francheses, or desired ayde of them against his, & their comon enemies. Then tonges talked and pennes wrote, that he was a tirant, a depresser of holy regyon, an enemy to Christes Churche and his holy flocke, and a dampned and accursed persone with Dathan and Abiron to the depe pitte of hel. Whereof the prouerbe began, geue and be blessed, take away and be accursed. Thus the feare of lesynge their possessions, made them pay yerely annates to the Romish byshop: thus the feare of correccion and honest restraint of libertie, made them from their ordinaries, yea almoste from obedience of their Princes to sue dispensacions, exempcions and immunities.

This Abbot that I spake of which could not well forget the saiyng of kynge Henry, and beyng before in great fauor and highe estymacyon wyth king Richard called to his hous on a day in the terme season all such lordes & other persones whiche he ether knewe or thought to bee as effeccionate to kynge Richarde, and enuious to the estate and auã- xx cement of kynge Henry, whose names were, Jhon Hollande Duke of Exceter, and erle of Huntingdon, Thomas Hollande duke of Surrey and erle of Kent, Edward duke of Aumerle and erle of Rutland sonne to the duke of Yorke, Jhõ Montagew erle of Salisbury, Hughe Spẽser erle of Glocester, Jhon the bishop of Carleyll, sir Thomas Blount and Magdalene one of kinge Richardes chapell, a man as lyke to hym in stature and proporcion in all liniamentes of his body, as vnlyke in birth dignitie or condicions. Thys Abbot highlye feested these greate lordes and hys speciall frendes, and when they had well dyned, they al withdrew them selfes into a secret chamber and sat doune to counsayll xxx when they were set, Jhon Holland Duke of Exceter whose rage of reuengyng the iniury done to kyng Richard was nothing mitigate nor mollified, but rather encreassed and blossomed, declared to them their allegeance promised, and by othe cõfirmed to king Richard his brother forgettyng not the high promocions and notable dignities whiche he and all other there present had obteygned by the high fauor and munificent liberalitie of his sayed brother, by the which they were not onely by othe and allegeance bounde, and also by kyndnes and bybanitie insensed & moued to take part wyth him and his frendes, but also bound to be reuenged for him and his cause, on his mortall enemies and ded- xl ly foes, in whiche doynge he thought polecie more meter to be vsed thẽ force, and some wittie practise rather to be experymented then manyfest hostilitie or open warre. And for the expedicion of this enterprise he deuised a solempne iustes to be enterprysed betwene him and .xx. on his part, and the erle of Salisbury and .xx. on his part at Oxforde: to the whiche triumphe, Kynge Henry should be inuited and desired, and when he were moste busely regardynge the marciall playe and warlye dispoꝛte, he sodainly shoulde be slaine and destroyed. And by this meanes kyng Richard which was yet alyue, shoulde be restoꝛed to hys lyberty and repossessed of this croune and kyngedome, and appoynctedfarther who should assemble the people, the nõbꝛe and persones, which should accomplyshe and perfoꝛme this inuented assaye and policie.

This deuyse so much pleased the sedicious congregacion, that they not onely made an indenture sextipartite sealed wyth their seales and x signed with their handes in the whiche eche bounde him selfe to other to endeuoure theim selfes bothe foꝛ the destruccion of Kynge Henry and the creacion of king Richard, but also sware on the holy Euangelistes the one to be true and secrete to the other, euen to the houre and point of death. When al thinges were thus appoynted and concluded the duke of Exceter came to the kyng to Windsoꝛe, requiringe him foꝛ the loue that he bare to the noble actes of chiualrie, that he woulde vouchsafe not onely to repaire to Oxfoꝛd to se and behold their manly feates, and warlike pastime: but also to be the discouerer and indifferente iudge (yf anye ambyguitie should aryse) of their coꝛagious actes xx and royall triumphe. The kynge seing himselfe so effectuously desyred, and that of hys bꝛother in lawe, and nothinge lesse imagenynge them that which was pꝛetended, gentelly graunted and frendly condiscended to his request. Which thing obteyned, al the loꝛdes of this conspyracie departed to their houses (as thei noised) to set armoꝛers on woꝛk foꝛ trimming of their harneys agaynst the solemne iustes. Some had the helme the bisere, the two bauiers & the two plackardes of the same curiously grauen & conningly costed: Some had their collers fretted and other had them set wyth gylt bullions: one company had the plackard, the rest, the poꝛt, the burley, the tasses, the lamboys, the backpece xxx the tapull, and the boꝛder of the curace all gylte. And another bande had them all enameled Azure. One soꝛte had the vambꝛases, the pacegardes, che grandgardes, the poldꝛen, the pollettes, parted wyth gold and azure: And another flocke had theim siluer and sable: Some had the mainferres, the close gantlettes, the guissettes, the flancardes dꝛoped & gutted with red, and other had thẽ spekeled with grene: one soꝛt had the quisches, the greues, the surlettes, ẏ ſockettes on the ryght side and on the left side syluer. Some had the spere, the burre, the cronet al yelowe, and other had them of diuerse colours. One band had the scafferon, the cranet, the bard of the hoꝛsse al whyt, and other had them all xl gylt. Some had their armynge swoꝛdes freshly burnished and some had thẽ conningly vernyshed. Some spurres wer whit, some gylt, and some cole blacke. One part had their Plumes al whyt, another hadde them al redde, and the thyꝛde had them of seuerall colours. One ware on his head pece his Ladies sleue, and another bare on hys helme the gloue of his dearlynge: But to declare the costlye Bases, the ryche bar-des the pleasaunt trappers both of goldesmithes worke, and embrawdery, no lesse sumptuously then curiously brought, it woulde aske a lõge time to declare, for euery man after his appetite deuised hys fantasye verifynge the olde Prouerbe, so many heades, so many wittes.

The duke of Exceter came to his house & raysed men on euery side and prepared horse and harneis, mete and apte for his compassed purpose. When the Duches his wyfe which was sister to king Henry perceiued this, she no lesse trouble coniectured to be prepared againste her brother, then was in dede eminẽt & at hand, wherfore she wept & made great lamentaciõ. When the duke perceiued her dolour, he said, what & Besse, how chaunseth this, when my brother king Richard was deposed of his dignitie, and committed to harde and sharpe prison, whyche had bene kyng and ruled this realme noblie by the space of. xxii. yeres, and youre brother was exalted to the throne and dignitie imperiall of the same, then my harte was heauye, my lyfe stoode in ieopardie, and my combe was clerely cut, but you then reioysed laughed and triumphed, wherefore I pray you be contente that I may aswel reioyce and haue pleasure at the deliueryng and restoring of my brother iustlye to his dignitie, as you were iocond and pleasant, when your brother vniustly and vntrulye depriued and disseazed my brother of the same. For xx of this I am sure, that yf my brother prosper, you and I shal not fal nor declyne: but yf your brother continew in his estate and magnificence I doubte not your decay nor ruine, but I suspecte the losse of my lyfe, besyde the forfeytnre of my landes and goodes. When he had sayde, he kissed his Lady which was sorowfull and pensife, and he departed toward Oxford with a great companye both of Archers and horsemen, and when he came there, he founde ready al his mates and confederates wel apoynted for their purpose, except the Duke of Aumerle Erle of Rutland, for whom they sent messengers in great hast. Thys Duke of Aumerle went before from Westminster to se his father the Duke of xxx Yorke, and sittynge at dyner had his counterpaine of the endenture of the confederacye wherof I spake before in his bosome.

The father espyed it and demaunded what it was, his sonne lowly and beningly answered that it mighte not bee sene, and that it touched not him. By sainct George quod the father I wyll see it, and so by force toke it out of hys bosome, when he perceyued the content and the fyre signes and seales sette and fyxed to the same, whereof the seale of hys sonne was one, he sodainly rose from the table, cõmaunding his horses to be sadeled, and in a greate furye saied to his sonne, thou traytour thefe, thou hast bene a traytour to kyng Richard, and wylte thou nowe xl be false to thy cosen kynge Henry? thou knowest well ynough ỹ I am thy pledge borowe and mayneperner, body for body, and land for goodes in open Parliament, and goest thou aboute to seke my death & destruccion? by the holy rode I had leauer se the strangeled on a gybbet. And so the duke of Yorke moũted on horsebacke to ride toward Windsor for to the king, and to declare the hole effecte of his sonne and his adherentes & partakers. The duke of Aumerle seyng in what case he stode toke his horse and rode another way to Windsor, riding in post thither (whiche his father being an olde man could not do.) And when he was alighted at the castel gate, he caused the gates to be shut, sayinge, that he must nedes delyuer the keies to the kyng. When he came before the kynges presence, he kneled doune on his knees, besechyng hym of mercy and forgeuenes: The kyng demaũded the cause: then he declared to him playnely the whole confederacie and entier conjuracyon in maner x and forme as you haue heard: Wel sayde the kynge, yf this be true we pardon you, yf it bee sayned at youre extreme peryll bee it. Whyle the kyng and the duke talked together, the duke of Yorke knocked at the castel gate, whom the kynge caused to be let in, and there he delyuered the endenture which before was taken from hys sonne, into the kynges handes. Whyche writinge when he had redde and sene, perceiuynge the signes and seales of the confederates, he chaunged his former purpose. For the day before he heard say that the chalengers were all ready, and that the defenders were come to do their deuoire, purposed to haue departed towarde the tryumph the next day, but by hys prudent xx and forecastyng councell, somwhat stayed till he might se the ayre clere and no darcke cloude nere to the place wher the listes were. And now beyng aduertysed of the truthe and veritie, howe his destruccyon and deathe was compassed, was not a litle vexed, but wyth a greate and meruelous agony perturbed and vnquieted, and therfore determined there to make his abode not hauinge tyme to loke and gase on Justes and tourneys, but to take hede how to kepe and conserue his lyfe and dignitie, and in that place taryed tyl he knewe what way his enemyes would set forward. And shortly wrote to the Earle of Northumberlãd his high Cõstable, and to the erle of Westmerland his hygh Marshall, xxx and to other his assured frendes of all the doubtfull daunger and perelous ieopardy. The conjuratoures perceyuinge by the lacke of the duke of Aumerles cõmyng, and also seyng no preparacion made there for the kynges comming, imagined wyth them selfes that their enterpryse was intimate and published to the kyng: wherefore that thynge whiche they attempted priuily to do, nowe openly with speare & shylde they determined with al diligente celeritie to set forth and aduaunce. And so they adorned Magdalene, a man resemblyng much kyng Richard in royal and pryncely vesture, callyng him kinge Richarde, affirming that he by fauor of hys kepers was deliuered oute of pryson and xl set at libertie, and they followed in a quadrat array to the entent to destroy kyng Hry, as the most pernicious & venemous enemy to thẽ and his owne naturall countrey. While the confederates wyth thys newe publyshed Idole accompanyed wyth a puyssant armye of men, toke the directe way and passage toward Windsor: Kynge Henry beyng admonished of their approchyng, wyth a fewe horse in the nyght, came to the

Tower

Towre of London about.xij.of the clocke, where he in the mornynge caused the Mayre of the citie to apparell in armure the beste and most corragious persones of the citie:whiche brought to him.iij.M.archers and.iij.M.bil men, besyde them that were deputed to defend the citie.
The Lordes of the confederacie entered the castel of Windsor,where they findinge not their praye, determined with al spede to passe forthe to London:But in the way, changyng their purpose they returned to the towne of Colbroke and there taryed. These lordes had much people folowyng them, what for feare and what for entreatie,surelye beleuyng that king Richard was there present and in company. King Hē- r ry issued out of London with twentye.M.men and came to Hounsloe Heath,where he pitched his campe,abidyng the comming of hys enemies:but when they were aduertysed of the kynges puissance, or elles amased wyth feare,or forthinking and repentynge their begonne busines,or mistrustyng their owne compauye and felowes, departed from thence to Barckamstede and so to Aucester, and ther the Lordes toke their lodgynge:The duke of Surrey erle of Kent,and the erle of Salisbury in one ynne, and the duke of Exceter and the earle of Glocester in another,& all the hostilitie lay in the feldes. The Baily of the towne with foure score archers set on the house, where the duke of Surrey & xp other lay:the house was mannely assaulted and strongely defended a great space:The Duke of Exceter beyng in another inne with ỹ Erle of Gloucester set fier on diuerse howses in the towne, thinkinge that ỹ assailantes would leaue their assault & rescue their goodes,which thing they nothing regarded. The host lyng wythout hearyng noise and seyng fyre in the towne,beleuyng that the kyng was come thyther with his puyssance,fledde wythout measure to saue them selfes. The Duke of Exceter and his company seyng the force of the tounes men more & more encreace,fled out of the backsyde entendynge to repayre to ỹ armie,which they found dispersed and retired. Then the duke seynge no xxs hope of cõfort, fled into Esser,and ỹ erle of Gloucester goyng towarde Wales was taken and behedded at Bristow. Magdalene flynge into Scotlande was apprehended & brought to the Tower. The Lordes whych fought styl in the toune of Chichester wer wounded to death & taken and their heades striken of and sent to London: and there were taken sir Bellet Shelley or Cell, & sir Barnard Brokas, &.xxix.other Lordes, Knyghtes and Esquiers, & sent to Oxford, where the kynge then sotourned, where sir Thomas Blont and all the other prysoners were executed.When the duke of Exceter hearde, ỹ his complices wer taken,& hys counceilers apprehended,and his frendes and alies putte xl in execucion, he lamented hys owne chaunce,and bewepte the mysfortune of hys frendes,but moste of al bewailed the fatal ende of hys brother kyng Richard, whose death he saw as in a mirrour by his vnhap-py sedicion and malicious attempte to approche, and so wanderynge lurkyng and hidyng him selfe in priuye places, was attached in Esser, and in the Lordshippe of Plaschey a towne of the Duches of Glocester and there made shorter by the hed, and in that place especially because that he in theselame Lordshippe seduced and falsely betrayed Thomas Duke of Glocester, and was the very inwarde auctour and open dissimuler of his death and destruction. So the common prouerbe was verified, as you haue done, so shall you fele. Oh Lord I would wisshe that this example of many hyghly promoted to rule, might be had in memorie, the whiche mete and measure their awne iniquitie and ill doynges, with force auctoritie and power, to the entent that they by these exam-x ples shoulde auerte their myndes from yll doynges, and suche vngodly and execrable offences. After this Magdalene that representeth the persone of kyng Rychard amongest the rebels, and diuerse other were put in execution, and al the heades of the chiefe conspiratoures sette on poles on London brydge, to the feare of other whiche were disposed to cō-mit like offence. The Abbot of Westminster in whose house this traiterous confederacy was conspired, hearyng that the chefetains of his felowshippe, were espied, taken and executed, goyng betwene hys monastery and mancion, for thoughte fell in a sodayne palsey, and shortely after without any speche ended his lyfe: After whome the Byshop of xx Carlile more for feare then syckenes, rendered his spirite to God, as one rather desyrying to dye by deathes darte, then temporall swearde. But nowe was come the tyme when all the confederates and compaignions of this vnhappye sedicion, had tasted accordyng to their desertes, the painfull penaunce of their plesaunt pastime, or rather pestiferous obstinacy, that an innocent with a nocent, a man vngylty with a gylty, was pondered in an egall balaunce. For poore kyng Rychard ignorant of all this conturacion kepte in myserable captiuitie, knowyng nothyng but that he sawe in his chamber, was by kyng Henry adiudged to dye, because that he beyng synged and tickeled with the last craftie policie of xxx his enemies, would deliuer hymselfe out of all inwarde feare and discorde, and cleane put away the very grounde whereof suche frutes of displeasure might by anie waie bee attempted againste hym, so that no man hereafter shoulde either fayne or resemble to represente the persone of kyng Rychardde: Wherefore some saye he commaunded, other talke that he condiscended, many wryte that he knewe not tyll it was done, and then it confirmed. But howe so euer it was, kyng Rychard dyed of a violent death, without any infeccion or naturall disease of the body.

The common fame is that he was euery daye serued at the table wyth costely meate lyke a kyng, to the entent that no creature should suspecte xl any thyng done contrary to the order taken in the parliament, and when the meate was set before hym, he was forbidden that he should not once touche it, ye not to smell to it, and so died of fampyn: which kynd of death is the moost miserable, most vnnaturall, ye and most detestable that can be, for it is ten tymes more painefull then death (whiche of all extremities is the moost terrible) to die for thirst standyng in the riuer, or statue

for hunger, beſette wyth twentie deintie diſhes. One writer whyche ſemed to haue muche knowledge of kyng Rychardes affayres, ſayeth that kyng Henry ſyttyng at his table ſore ſyghyng ſaied, haue I no faithefull frende whiche wil deliuer me of hym whoſe life will be my death, and whoſe death will be the preſeruacion of my lyfe. This ſaiyng was muche noted of them whiche were preſent and eſpecially of one called Sir Piers of Exton. This knight incõtinently departed from the court with eight ſtronge perſones and came to Pomfret, comaundyng that the eſquier whiche was acuſtomed to ſewe and take the aſſaye before kyng Richard, ſhould no more vſe that maner of ſeruice, ſaiyng, let hym eate well nowe, for he ſhall not long eate. Kyng Richard ſate downe to dyner and was ſerued without cuttelie or aſſaye, he muche meruaylyng at the ſodayne mutacion of the thyng, demaunded of the Eſquier why he dyd not his duety: ſir ſaied he, I am otherwiſe commaunded by Sir Pyers of Exton, whiche is newely come from kyng Henry. When he heard that worde, he toke the caruyng knife in his hande and ſtroke the Eſquier on the head ſaiyng, the deuell take Henry of Lancaſtre and the together: And with that worde Sir Piers entered into the chamber wel armed with eight tall men in harneis, euery man hauing a byll in hys hande. Kyng Richarde perceiuyng them armed, knewe well that they came to his confuſion, and puttyng the table from hym, valiauntly toke the byll out of the firſte mannes hande, and manly defended hymſelfe, and ſlewe foure of them in a ſhort ſpace. Sir Piers being ſomwhat diſmaied with his reſiſtyng, lepte into the chaire where kyng Richard was wonte to ſitte, while the other foure perſones aſſailed and chaſed hym aboute the chamber, whiche being vnarmed defended him againſt his enemies beyng armed, (whiche was a valiaunt acte) but in concluſion chaſyng and trauerſyng from the one ſyde to the other, he came to the chaire where ſir Pyers ſtode, whiche with a ſtroke of his Pollax felled hym to the grounde, and then ſhortly he was rid out of the worlde, without ether confeſſion or receit of ſacrament. When this knight perceiued that he was deade, he ſobbed, wept, and rent his heare criyng, Oh Lord, what haue we done, we haue murthered hym whome by the ſpace of two and twenty yeres we haue obeied as kyng, and honoured as our ſouereigne lorde, now all noble men will abhorre vs, all honeſt perſons will diſdaine vs, and all poore people will raile and crie out vpon vs, ſo that duryng our naturall liues, we ſhalbe pointed with the fynger, and our poſterite ſhalbe reproued as childzen of Homecides, ye of Regicides and prince queilers. Thus haue I declared to you the diuerſities of opinions conterning the deathe of this infortunate prince, remittyng to your iudgement whiche you thynke moſt trewe, but the very truthe is that he died of a violent death, and not by the darte of naturall infirmitie. When Atropos had cut the lyne of his lyfe, his body was embaulmed and ſeated and couered with lead all ſaue his face (to the entent that all men myght perceiue that he was departed out of this mortall lyfe) and was conueyghed to London, where in the cathedrall churche of saincte Paule he had a solempne obsequie, and from thence conueyghed to Lãgley in Buckyngham shire, where he was enterred, and after by kyng Henry the.v. remoued to Westminster, and there entombed honorably with quene Anne his wyfe, although the Scottes vntreuly write that he escaped out of prisone, and led a verteous and solitary lyfe in Scotlande, and there dyed and is buryed in the blacke Friers at Sterlyng. What trust is in this worlde, what suretie man hath of his life, & what constancie is in the mutable comonalte, all men maye apparantly perceyue by the ruyne of this noble prince, whiche beeyng an vndubitate x kyng, crouned and anoynted by the spiritualtie, honored and exalted by the nobilitie, obeyed and worshipped of the comon people, was so danuly discepued by theim whiche he moste trusted, betrayed by theim whom he had preferred, & slayn by theim whom he had brought vp and norished: so that all menne maye perceyue and see, that fortune wayeth princes and pore men all in one balance.

VVHEN newes of kyng Richardes deposyng were reported into Fraunce, kyng Charles and all his court wondered, detested & abhorred suche an iniurye to bee doen to an anoynted kyng, to acrouned prince, & xx to the hed of a realme: but in especiall Waletam erle of sent Paule whiche had maried kyng Richardes halfe sister, moued with high disdayn agaynst kyng Henry, ceased not to stirre and prouoke the Frēche kyng and his counsayll to make sharpe warre in Englande, to reuenge the iniurie and dishonor comitted and doen to his sonne in lawe kyng Richard, & he hym self sent letters of defiance to England. Whiche thyng was sone agreed to, and an armye royall appoyncted with all spede, to inuade England. But the Frenche kyng so stomaked this high displesure, & so inwardly conceiued this infortunate chance in his mynde, that he fell into his old disease of the frensy, that he had nede accordyng to xxx the old prouerbe, to sayle into the Isle of * Anticyra, to purge his melãcolie humor, but by the meanes of his phisicions, he was somwhat releued & brought to knowledge of hym self. This armye was come doune into Picardy, redy to be trãsported into Englãd, but when it was certainly certified that kyng Richard was ded, & that their enterprise of hys deliuerãce was frustrate & voyd, tharmie scattred & departed a sonder.

* Anticyra is an Isle in Asia, wherein growth an Herbe þ purgeth Melãcoly, & thei of cã the prouerbe, go saile to Anticira, as who saieth, goo purge youre Melancoly.

BVT when the certaintie of kyng Richardes death was declared to the Aquitaynes and Gascons, the moste parte of the wisest men of the countree, fell into a greate bodely feare, and into a dedly dreade. For some lamentyng the instabilitee of the Englishe people, iudged theim xl to be spotted with perpetuall infamie, and brought to dishonor & losse of their auncient fame and glory, for committyng so heynous a crymne and detestable an offence agaynst their kyng & souereigne lord. The memorie wherof they thought would neuer be buried or extincted. Other fered the losse of their goodes and liberties, because they imagined that by this ciuill discencion and intestine deuison, the realme of England shoulde so bee vexed and troubled, that their countree (yf the Frenchemenne shoulde inuade it) shoulde bee destitute and lefte voyde of all aide and succor of the Englishe nacion. But the citezens of Burdeaux toke this matter very sore at the stomacke, because kyng Richard was borne and brought vp in their citee, lamentyng, and cryng out that sithe the beginnyng of the worlde, there was neuer a more detestable, a more villanous nor a more heynous acte committed: whiche beyng sad with sorowe and enflamed with malencolie, saied that vntrue, vnnaturall and vnmercifull people had betrayed and slayn, contrary to all lawe and iustice and honestie, a good man a iuste prince and poletike gouernor. Besechyng God deuoutly on their knees, to be the reuenger and punisher of that detestable offence and notorius crime.

WHEN the Frenchmen, which haue eyes of the wakyng serpent, perceiued the dolor and agony that the Aquitaynes and Gascons wer in for the death of their prince, duke and contrymanne, they reioyced and applauded in maruelous maners thynkyng with themselfes that (the Gascons nowe abhorryng and detestyng the Englishe men more then a Dogge or an Adder) they verie easely mighte obtayn the whole countree and douchie of Aquitaine, with the members and territories there to apperteynyng, yf they would ether by entreatie or by inuasion moue the people beyng now amased and comfortles, as shepe without a shepeherd, or beastes without an herdman. Wherfore in greate haste and lowe spede, Lewes duke of Burbon was sent to Angiers, & wrote to diuerse citees and tounes on the confynes of Aquitain and Gascon, exhortyng theim with large promises and flateryng wordes, to reuolte and turne from the Englishe subiection, and become vassals to the croune of Fraunce. But all his glosyng wordes serued litle, and all his faire promyses profited muche lesse. For the people knewe that the Englishe yoke was but a fether, and the yoke of Fraũce, was more ponderus then lede, seyng daily how the Frenchmen vexed and molested ther miserable people with extreme exactions and intollerable tallages, rasyng their skinne to the very bone, and their purses to the very botome wherfore they determined rather to abide in their old subiection and obedience, then for a displeasure irrecuperable to auenture theimselfes on a newe chance and a doubtfull parell.

KING Henry beeyng aduertised of all the Frenche attemptes and couert conueighances, sent the lorde Thomas Percy erle of Worcester with a goodly crewe of souldiours into Aquitayn to ayde and assist sir Robert Knolles his leiuetenante ther, and to perswade and exhorte the people to continewe in their auncient libertie and dewe obeysance. The erle arriued there, and so wysely entreated the noble men, so gratiously perswaded the magestrates of the citees and tounes, and so gently and familiarly vsed and tracted the vulgare people, that he not onely appeased their furye and malyce, but brought theim to a louyng and vniforme obeysance, receiuyng of them othes of obedience and loyall fealtie tie whiche done he retourned agayne into England with great thankes. When kyng Charles of Fraunce perceyued that his purpose and attempte was frustrate and came to no good conclusion in Aquitayne and that kyng Richard beyng deade, his enterpryse into England was of no value and to small purpose, he determined with hym selfe to inuent some way howe to haue the Lady Isabell his doughter, somtyme espoused to kyng Richard restored to hym agayn: and for that purpose sent a solempne ambassade into England to kyng Henry, whiche gentelly receyued them, and gaue in answere that he wold send his commissix oners shortely to Caleys, whiche shoulde farther common and conclude with them, not onely that request, but diuers other matters of gret effecte and efficacie. And shortley after their departyng he sent Edward duke of Yorke, before called duke of Aumerle, whiche succeded in the sayd duchie his father Edmond duke of Yorke, a littell before disseased and Henry erle of Northumberland into the countrey of Guisnes. The commissioners assembled at diuers places at sondry tymes. The duke of Borbon aboue all thynges requyred in the name of the French king his master, to haue quene Isabell to hym deliuered. The Englishmen that to do continually did deny requiryng to haue her maried to Hen-xx ry Prince of Wales, a man bothe in blud and age to her in all thynges equall. But the Frenche kyng that mariage vtterly refused, saiyng he wolde neuer ioyne affinytie after with the Englishe nacion, because that the aliance had so vnfortunate successe.

Then they began to entreate a continuall peace, whiche request the Frenchemen refused, and in conclusion they agreed that the truce whiche was taken betwene them and kyng Richarde, for the terme of.xxx. yeres was renouate and confirmed. Some authors affirm that there was a newe leage concluded and confirmed betwene both the realmes duryng the lyues of bothe the princes, whiche semeth to haue a certeyn xxi colour of verite. For the kyng sent shortely after the forsayed Lady Isabell vnder the conduycte of the Lord Thomas Percy erle of Worcester, associate with many noble and honourable personages, as well of women, as men, hauyng with her all the Jewelles ornamentes & plate (with a gret surplusage geuen to hir by the kyng whiche she brought into England) was sente in solempne estate to Caleys, and there deliuered to Waleram erle of sainct Paule Lieutenant for the French kyng in Picardie, and so conueyghed to her father, whiche gaue her in ma-riage to Charles sonne to Lewes duke of Orleaunce. The Frenchmen often tymes required kyng Henry to assigne to her a dower, but al was xi in vayne, for the Englishemen aunswered that the mattimony was neuer consummate, by reason wherof she was not dowable, by the very treatie of the mariage concluded, and so this matter seased and was no more moued. As the old prouerbe saith, after wynde commeth rayn. & after one euyll comōly ensueth another, so duryng the tyme that kyng Henry was vexed and vnquieted, bothe within the realme and without.

OVVEN Glendoz a squire of Wales, perceiuyng the realme to be vnquieted, and the kyng not yet to be placed in a sure and vnmouable seate, entẽdyng to vsurpe and take vpon hym the principalitie of Wales, and the name and preheminence of thesame, what with faire flatterying wordes and with large promyses, so enueygled entised and allured the wilde and vndiscrete Welshmen, that they toke hym as their prince and made to hym an othe of allegeance and subiection. By whose supportacion, he beyng elated and set vp in aucthozite, to the intent to bee out of all doubte of his neyghbozs, made sharpe warre on Reignolde lozde Grey of Rithen and toke hym prysoner, promyling hym libertee and dischargyng his raunsome, yf he would espouse and marie his doughter, thinkyng by that affinitye, to haue greate ayde and muche power in Wales. The lozde Grey beeyng not very riche nether of substance noz of frendes, considerying this offer to be the onely waye of hys releffe and deliuerance, assented to his pleasure and maried the damosell. But this false father in lawe, this vntrew, vnhoneſt and periured persone, kept hym with his wyfe still in captiuitee till he dyed. And not content with this heynous offence, made warre on lozde Edmond Moztimer erle of Marche, and in his owne lozdship of Wigmoze, where in a conflict he slewe many of therles men and toke hym pryloner, and feteryng hym in chaynes, cast hym in a depe and miserable dongeon. The kyng was requyzed to purchase his delyuerance by dyuerse of the nobilitie, but he could not heare on that syde, rather he would and wished al his linage in heuen. Foz then his title had been out of all doubt & question, and so vpon this cause as you heare, after ensued great sedicion.

THVS Owen Glendoz glozifyng hym selt in thele twoo victozies, inuaded the Marches of Wales on the West side of Seuerne, robbed vilages, bzent tounes, and slewe the people, and laden with prayes and bloudy handes returned agayn into Wales, neuer desistyng to do euill till the next yere, that the kyng reised a greate armye and puyssance to resist and defende his malicions attemptes and sedicious inuasions, as after shall be declared. It was not sufficiẽt in this first yere of kyng Henry, this realme to be troubled with domesticall sedicion, vexed with the craftie practices and inuencions of the Frenche men, and inuaded and infested with the frantike wauerying Welshemen, but also foztune hauyng enuy at the glozy and foztunate procedyng of this man, muste in his sayed firste yere also, arme the Scottes with spere and shelde agaynst hym and his realme, wherof the occasion shall bee to you declared accozdyng to the Scotticall histozies. Alitle befoze this tyme, Geozge of Dunbar Erle of the Marches of the realme, made meanes to kyng Robert of Scotlande, that Dauyd his eldest sonne might marie and espouse the erles doughter called Elizabeth, and deliuered foz the perfozmance of thesame mariage into the kynges handes a greate some of money. When Archebaulde erle Douglas heard of this conclusion, disdainyng therle of the Marches blud to be auaunced befoze his his stocke, wherfore ether by faire wordes, or els by disbursyng a greter some of money, he so enueygled Kyng Roberte of Scotlande, that Dauid his heyre refusyng the first damosell, espoused Mariell the erle Douglas doughter. Therle of Marche desired restitucion of his money, to whom the kyng gaue many friuolus and trifelyng aunsweres, wherfore he disdainyng so to bee mocked & deluded of his money, with his wyfe and family, fled into England, to Henry erle of Northumber-lande, entendyng with dent of swerd to reuenge the iniury & displesure to hym by the kyng comitted & doen, & so with the help of the borderers x brent diuerse tounes, & slew many persons in the realme of Scotland.

KING Robert beeyng thereof aduertised, tyrste deprined the Erle George of all his dignitees and possessions, and caused his goodes to to bee confiscate, and after wrote to the kyng of Englande, instantly requiryng hym, yf he would the truce any longer to contynew, ether to deliuer into his possession the Erle of Marche, and other traitors and rebelles to his persone and realme, or els to banysshe and exile theim out of his realme, territories and dominions. Kyng Henry discretly aun-swered the herault of Scotland, that the worde of a prince ought to bee kepte and his wryting and seale ought to bee inuiolate, and considering xx that he had graunted a sauecondupte to the erle and his company, he would nether without cause resonable breake his promyse, nor yet dea-ce his honor. Whiche aunswer declared to the kyng of Scottes, he incōtinent dyd proclayme and intimate open warre, agaynst the kyng of England, with blud fire and sweard. Kyng Henry perceiuyng, that policye preuenteth chance, gathred and assembled together a greate armye, and entred into Scotlande, burnyng townes villages and castels, sparyng nothyng but religious houses and churches, and brent a greate parte of the tounes of Edenborough and Lithe and beseged the castle of Waydens in Edenborough, in thende of September, whereof was xxx capitayn, Dauid duke of Rothsay and prince of the realme, and Archi-balde erle Douglas, with many hardy men. Roberte duke of Albanye, beyng appoynted gouernor of the realme, because the kyng was sycke and vnapt to rule, sent vnto kyng Henry an harrold, assuryng hym on his honour that yf he would abyde and tary his comyng and repaire, whiche should be within sixe daies at the most, he would geue hym battayll, and remoue the siege, or els die for it.

The kyng beeyng glad of these ioyous good newes, rewarded the herault with a goune of silke and a chayne of gold, promysing hym in the worde of a prince, not to depart thence but abide there, the comyng xl of the gouernor. The sixte daye passed, ye sixe and sixtene to, the gouernor nether appered nor sent worde, the winter waxed cold, vitayle failed, men died of the flixe, it rained euery daye so habundantly, that hunger and colde caused the kyng to breke vp his siege, and to departe out of Scotland, without battayll or skirmish offered. Duryng whiche tyme bothe the Wardens of the Marches beyng with the kyng, the Scottes made a rode into Northumberlande, and burned diuerſe tounes in Bamborough ſhere, and ſhortly returned agayn, or els they had been trapped & come to late home. When the kyng of England had diſmiſſed his ſouldiers, and diſcharged his army, the Scottes entendyng to bee reuenged of their greate domages to theim by the Engliſhe nacion doen and committed by therle Douglas, appoynted twoo armyes to inuade Englande. Of the firſt was cheiefstayn, ſir Thomas Halibarton of Dirlton, and Patrike Hebburne of Hales, whiche made a rode into Englande, and returned with litle loſſe and no greate gayn. After this the foreſaid ſir Patrike Hebburne, encoraged & boldened with the proſ- r perous ſucceſſe of this firſt iorney, with a greate armye of the people of Lowdian inuaded Northumberlande, robbyng and ſpoylyng the coũtree and departed homeward, not without greate gayn of beaſtes and captiues. But in the returne he was encountred with therle of Northumberlandes vicewarden, & other gentelmen of the borders at a toune in Northumberlande called Nelbit, and there the Engliſhmen ſore aſſayled, and the Scottes valiantly reſiſted, but after a long fight, the victory fell on the Engliſhe parte, and as Jhon Mayer the Scot writeth, there were ſlain the flower of all Loughdean, and eſpecially ſir Patricke Hebburne with many of his linage. There wer apprehended ſyr xx Jhon and William Cockeburne, ſir Robert of Bas, Jhon and Thomas Hablincton eſquiers, and a greate nomber of the comon people. The erle Douglas ſore beyng greued with the loſſe of his nacion and frendes, entendyng a requitement yf it were poſſible of theſame, by the conſente of the gouernour of Scotlande, dyd gather a houge armye of twentie thouſande talle menne and more.

In the whiche armye was Lord Hordake earle of Fife ſonne to the gouernour of Scotland, the erle of Angus, and many other earles and barons of the nobilitie of Scotland. Theſe valiaunte capitayns and couragious ſouldioures entered into Northumberlande with ban- xxx ners diſplayed lyke menne ether apte or thynkyng theim ſelfes able to deſtroy the townes and ſpoyle the countrey and Marches of Northumberlande. When they were entered into England thinkyng no puiſſaunce able to encountre with their force, out of a valey beſide a toune called Homeldon iſſued ſodainly the Lorde Henry Pierce whom the Scottes for his haut and valiant corage called ſir Henry hotſpur, and in his company the Lorde George of Dunbar erle of Marche before baniſhed Scotlande, as you haue heard, with all the gentyll menne of Northumberland, and eyght thouſande men on horſebacke and on fote. The encounter was ſharpe, the fyght was daungerous, the long xl continuaunce was doubtfull, for ſome were felled and reſcued, ſome in reſcuyng other were ſlayne, other gredy of pray more then of ſtrokes fled to ſe what baggages were kept emongeſt the Pages. Thus with pure fightyng of the Engliſhemen, and fainte hertes of the braggyng Scottes, the brighte beame of victory ſhone on ſainct Georges croſſe, and there were slayne of men of great renoune and estimacion sir Jhon Swinton, sir Adam Gordon, sir Jhon Leutston, sir Alexander Ransey of Dalehowse, and.xxiii. knightes moo, whose names ether for ignorance or for feare of reproche, Hector Boece the Scottish arche chronocler kepeth in silence & dothe omitte, beside.x.M.cõmons. But there wer taken prisoners, Mordake erle of Fife, Archebald erle Douglas, whiche in the combat loste one of his eyes, Thomas erle of Murrey, Robert erle of Angus, and as other writers affirme, the erles of Athell and Mentethe with.v.C.other.

When the Lord Percey had thus obtained this glorious victory, he sent his prisoners into diuerse fortresses, and determined to subdue or destroy all the countreys of Lowdene and Marche, whose heades and Gouernours ether he had slayn or by force taken captiues. And so with a gret power entered into Tiuedale wasting and destroiyng the hole countrey, and they beseged the castell of Cokelaues, wherof was capitayn sir Jhon Grenlowe, which seyng that his castell was not long able to be defended cõpounded with the Englishmen that yf the castell wer not suckered within.iii.mouthes, that then he would deliuer it into the Englishe mennes handes. The capitane thereof wrote vnto the Gouernour, whiche callyng a greate councell, the moste parte aduysed hym rather frankely and frely to yelde the castell, than to put in leopardie and caste in hasard the remnaunt of the florishyng nobilitie of the realme. So muche was their courages abated and their fumishe crakes refrigerat with the remembraunce of the last conflicte and bataill. But the gouernour rebukyng their timerous heartes, and Feminine audacitie (whether he thought so or no was a question) sware that if no man wold folowe of the nobilitie he woulde do his deuoire to reskewe the castell at the day. But his othe was nether kept nor broken, for he litell preparyng and lesse entendyng the othe whiche he solemply made neuer set fote forward duryng the first.ii.monethes, for the reisyng of the siege or reskewe of the castell. But the Englishe men beyng sent for to go with the kyng into Wales, raised their siege and depatted leauyng the noble men prisoners styll with the earle of Northumberland and the Lord Percie his sonne, whiche by the kyng were commaunded to kepe theim to his vse, and not to delyuer them without his assent.

KING Henry forgat not his enterprise into Wales, but made prouision for menne, municions and artyllary mete and conuenient for so great abusinesse, whereof the Frenche kyng beyng aduertised, sente priuilie Lorde James of Burbone erle of Marche and his two brethren Jhon and Lewes, with.xii.C.knightes and esquiers to aide Owen Glendor agaynst the inuasions of kyng Henry, he toke shippyng with.xxx.sayle at the mouthe of Seine, and the wynd was not fauourable to his purpose for he coulde neuer approche the coaste of Wales but came before the towne of Plimmouthe in Deuonshire, and there leauyng his great shippes lyng at ancre, in the nyghte toke land and

Wherof when the erle was aduertiſed, and perceiuyng by the firyng of the beacons that the people began to aſſemble in plumpes to encounter with hym, and alſo ſeyng his purpoſe ſore diminiſhed as well by the ſlaughter of ſuche as ranged abrode in hope of ſpoyle and praye, as by the furious rage of the vnmercifull ſee and hydeous tempeſt, with muche payne and great labour toke his ſhippes agayne, and was not without ieopardie of hys lyfe driuen on the coaſt of Britayne and landed at ſainct Malos. The French kyng perceiuyng that this chãce had il ſucceſſe appointed one of his Marſhals called Reinorancie, and the maſter of his Croſbowes with.xii.M.men, to ſayle in to Wales, which toke ſhippyng at Breſt and had the wynde to theim ſo proſperous that they landed at Milford hauen, and leauyng the caſtell of penbroke vnaſſaulted, becauſe it was well fortified, manned, and vitayled, beſieged the towne of Harforde Weſt whiche was ſo well defended by the erle of Arundell and his power that they much more loſt then gayned. And from thence they departed towarde Owen Glendor whome they nomnated prince of Wales, and founde hym at the towne of Denbigh abidyng their commyng with ten thouſand men. They wer of hym louyngly receyued, and gentelly interteyned, and when all thynges were prepared, they paſſed by Glamorgan ſhire toward Worceſter and there brent the ſuburbes, but hearyng of the kynges approchyng ſodaynly returned into Wales. The kyng with a great puyſſaunce folowed and founde them embattayled on a highe mountayne, and a gret valey betwene bothe the armyes, ſo that eche armye playnely perceyued other, and euery hoſte loked to be aſſauted of his aduerſary, and of the ground to take the moſt aduaũtage: thus they cõtinued eight dayes frõ mornyng to nyght ready to abyde but not to geue battayle. There wer many fearce ſkirmyſhes and many prorre feates of armes daily done, whiche the French Cronicters more then the Engliſhe writers can reporte. For there were ſlayne the Lorde Patrioles of Cries, brother to the Marſhall of France, the Lord Mattelone and the Lord Vale and the baſtarde of Burbon, with.v.hundred gentelmen.

The Frenche men and Welſhe men were ſore troubled and afflicted with famine, that their hertes were appalled and their corages ſore abated, for the kyng had ſo ſtopped the paſſages that nether victayll nor ſuccour could by any way be conueighed to thẽ. Wherfore of very neceſſitie they were compelled eyther to fyghte or flee: And ſo by the aduiſement and counceil of the Marſhall of Fraunce, whiche put not to muche confidence in the waueryng Welſhemen, the hole hoſte departed ted theight day at midnight in the moſt ſecreteſt maner that they could deuyſe. The Frenche men with littell rewardes and no gayne returned into Bzytayne makyng ſmall boaſt of their paynfull iourney.

THE kyng ſeyng them departed, folowed thē into Wales, and chaſing them from hilles to dales, from dales to woddes, from woddes to mariſhes, and yet could neuer haue them at any aduauntage. A woꝛld it was to ſee his quotidiane remouyng, his paynfull and buſy wanderyng, his troubleſome and vncertayne abidyng, his continuall motion, his daily peregrinacion in the deſert, felles and craggy mountains of x that bareine vnfertile and depopulate countrey. And thus beyng toſſed from countrey to countrey, from hyll to baley from mariſhe to wod, from noughte to woꝛſſe, without gayne oꝛ pꝛofite withoute vitayle oꝛ ſuccour he was of neceſſitie compelled to retire his armye and retourne agayne to Woꝛceſter, in whiche retoutnyng the Welſhemen knowyng the paſſages of the countrey, toke certayne cariages of his laden with vitayle to his great diſpleaſure, and their great comfoꝛte. When he came to Woꝛceſter perceiuyng winter to appꝛoche whiche ſeaſon of the yere is not conuenient and pꝛoper foꝛ men of warre to lie in the feldes, and ſpecially in ſuche a barrayne and hyll countrey as Wales is, diſ-

In the meane time while the kyng was thus occupied in Wales, certayn malicious and cruell perſons enuyng and malignyng in their heartes that kyng Henry contrary to the opinion of many, but agaynſt the will of no had ſo ſhoꝛtely obteyned and poſſeſſed the tealme and regalitie, blaſed abꝛode & noyſed daily amongeſt the vulgare people that kyng Richard (whiche was openly ſene dead) was yet liuyng and deſired ayde of the common people to repoſeſſe his realme and roiall dignitie. And to the furtheraunce of this fantaſticall inuencion, partly moued with indignacion, partely incenſed with furious malencolie, ſet vpon poſtes and

I may not here foꝛget to ſhewe you howe that kyng Henry ſekyng nowe affiuntie and frendſhippe in Germanie ſent this yere his eldeſt doughter Blaunche accompanied with the Erle of Sommerſet, the Biſhop of Woꝛceſter, and the Lorde Cliffoꝛde, and other noble perſonages into Almanye, whiche bꝛought her

In theſame yere kyng Henry maried Jane

Duches of Bzttayne late wyfe to Jhon duke of Bzttaine at the citie of Wynchester and with triumphall pompe conueighed her thozow the citie of London to Westmynster, and there she was crowned Quene.

While these thinges were thus doyng in England Waleram Erle of saunct Paule whiche had maried the halfe sister of Richard hauyng a malicious heart and a deadly hatred to kyng Henry, assembled a great company of men of warre to the number of xvi.oz.xviii.C. whereof the greatest parte were noble men, and made great prouysion of all thynges necessary foz his feate and enterpzise. And on saunct Nicholas day entred into his shippes at Harflete and landed in the Isle of Wight, x and when he sawe no apperaunce of defence, he burned two pooze vyllages and.iiii.simple cottages, and foz great triumphe of thys noble acte he made.iiii.knightes: but sodainly when he was aduertysed by his espials that the people of the Isle wer assembled and appzoched to fight with hym. He with all haste possible toke his shippes and retourned home agayne, wher with the noble men of his company were muche discontente and displeased considerynge that his pzouysion was great and his gayne small oz none. And in thesame very season Jhon Erle of Cleremond sonne to the Duke of Burbone, wonne in Gascoigne the castelles of saunct Peter, saincte Marie and the newe castell, and the xx Lozd Delabzethe wonne the castell of Carlaffin, whiche was no small losse to the Englishe nacion: Duryng which tyme dyed Philippe duke of Burgon, and duke Albert of Bauier Erle of Henault.

The thirde yere.

The.iii.yere. IN thys yere appered a comete oz blasyng Starre of a hõuge quantitie by a long season whiche as the Astronomers affirmed, signified great effusion of mannes blud, whiche iudgement was not frustrate as you shall perceiue. Foz Henry erle of Nozthumberland and Thomas erle of Wozcester his bzother, and his sonne Lozd Henry Percy called hotspur, which were to kyng Henxxx ry in the beginnyng of his reigne bothe fautours frendes and ayders, perceiuyng nowe that he had pacified all domesticall sedicion and repzessed his enemyes, and reduced his realme to a conuenient quietnes, began somwhat to enuye the glozy of hym, and grudged agaynste hys welthe and felicitie. And specially greued, because the kyng demaunded of the Erle and his sonne suche Scottishe pzisoners as they had taken at the conflictes fought at Hameldon and Nesbit as you befoze haue heard. Foz of all the captiues whiche were there taken, ther was deliuered to the kynges possession onely Wozdake earle of Fife sonne to the duke of Albanie Gouezнour of Scotland, foz the kyng them diuers and sondzy tymes of therle and his sonne required. But the Percies affirmyng them to be their owne pzopze pzisoners and their peculiar praies, and to deliuer theym vtterly denayed, in so muche that the kyng openly sayed that yf they wolde not deliuer theim, he would take them without deliuerance. Wherwith they beyng soze discõtent, by the

councell of Lord Thomas Percy erle of Worcester, whose study was euer to procure malice, and to set all thinges in broile and vncertentie, fainyng a cause to proue and tempte the kyng, came to hym to Wyndsor, requiryng hym by raunsome or otherwise to cause to bee deliuered out of prison Edmond Mortimer erle of Marche their cosyn germayn whome (as they reported) Owen Glendor kepte in filthy prison shakeled with yrons, onely for that cause that he toke his parte, and was to hym faithfull and trewe. The kyng began not a litell to muse on this request, and not without a cause, for in dede it touched him as nere as his sherte, as you well may perceiue by the Genealogy rehersed in the beginnyng of this story. For this Edmond was sonne to Erle Roger whiche was sonne to Lady Philip doughter to Lionell Duke of Clarence, the third sonne to kyng Edward the third, whiche Edmonde at kyng Richardes goyng into Ireland was proclaimed heire apparant to the croune and realme, whose Aunt called Elinor this Lord Henry Percy had Maried. And therfore the kyng litell forced although that that lignage were clerely subuerted and vtterly extincte.

WHEN the kyng had long digested and studied on this matter, he made aunswere and sayed that the Erle of Marche was not taken prisoner neither for his cause nor in his seruice, but willyngly suffered hym selfe to be taken, because he woulde take no parte agaynste Owen Glendor and his complices, and therfore he would nether raunsome nor releue hym, whiche fraude the kyng caused openly to be published and diuulged, with whiche aunswere yf the parties were angry doubt you not. But with the publysshyng of the cautell, that the Erle of Marche was willyngly taken, they ten tymes more fumed and raged in so muche that sir Henry hotspur sayd openly: Behold the heire of the realme is robbed of his righte, and yet the robber, with his owne, wyll not redeme hym. So in this fury the Percies departed, nothyng more myndyng then to depose kyng Henry from the high tipe of his regalitie, and to deliuer and set in his trone their cosyn frende & confederate Edmonde Erle of Marche, whome they not onely deliuered oute of the captiuitie of Owen Glendor, but also entered into a leage and amitie with the sayd Owen agaynst kyng Henry and all his frendes and fautours, to the great displeasure and long vnquietyng of kyng Henry and his partakers. Here I passe ouer to declare howe a certayne writer writeth that this earle of Marche, the Lorde Percy and Owen Glendor wer vnwyselye made beleue by a Welsh Prophecier, that king Henry was the Wold warpe, cursed of Goddes owne mouth, and that they three were the Dragon, the Lion and the Wolffe, whiche shoulde deuide this realme betwene them, by the deuiacion and not deuinacion of that vnlawfull Merlyn. I wyll not reherse howe they by their deputies in the howse of the Archdeacon of Bangor, seduced with that falce fayned Prophesie deuided the realme amongest thē, nor yet writehowe by a tripartite endenture sealed with their seales, all Englande from Seuerne and Trent South and Eastward, was assigned to the erle of Marche: Nor how all Wales and the landes beyond Seuerne Westward, were appoynted to Owen Glendor, and all the remnaunt from Trente Northwarde to the lorde Percie. But I will declare to you that whiche was not prophesied, that is the confusion destruccion and perdicion of these persones, not onely geuyng credite to suche a vain fable, but also settyng it forwarde and hoppyng to attayne to the effect of thesame whiche was especiall of the lorde Percey and Owen Glendor. For the erle of Marche was euer kepte in the courte vnder suche a keper that he could nether doo or attempte any thyng agaynste the kyng without his knowledge, and dyed without issue, leuyng his right title and interest to Anne his sister and heyre, maried to Richard erle of Cambrige father to the duke of Yorke, whose offspryng in continuaunce of tyme, obteygned the game and gat the garland. O ye wauerying Welshmen, call you these prophesies? nay call theim vnprofitable practises. Name you theim diuinacions? nay name theim diabolicall deuises, say you they be prognosticacions? nay they be pestiferous publyshynges. For by declaryng & credite geuing to their subtyl & obscure meanynges, princes haue been deceyued, many a noble manne hath suffred, and many an honest man hath been begyled & destroyed.

KYNG Henry knowyng of this newe confederacy, and nothyng lesse myndyng then that, that happened after, gathered a greate armye too goo agayne into Wales: whereof the Erle of Northumberlande and his sonne wer aduertised, by lorde Thomas erle of Worcester, and with all diligence raysed all the power that they could make and sent to the Scottes whiche before wer taken prisoners at Hamaldon for ayde and men, promysing the Erle Douglas the toune of Barwicke and a parte of Northumberlande: and to other Scotishe lordes greate lordshippes and seignories, yf they obteygned the vpper hande and superiorite. The Scottes allured with desyre of gayn, and for no malice that they bare to kyng Henry, but some what desirous to be reuenged of their olde greues, came to the erle with greate compaygnie, and to make their cause seme good and iuste, they deuysed certayn articles by the aduyse of Richard Scrope Archebishop of Yorke, brother to the lorde Scrope, whom kyng Henry caused to bee beheded at Bristow as you haue heard before. Whiche articles they shewed to diuerse noble men and prelates of the realme, whiche fauorying and consentyng to their purpose, not onely promysed theim ayde and succor by wordes, but by their writyng and seales confirmed thesame. Howbeit, whether it wer for feare, either for that thei would be lokers on and no deede doers, neyther promyse by worde or by writyng was performed. For all the confederates theim abandoned, and at the daye of the conflict left alone, the erle of Stafford only excepte, whiche beyng of a haute corage and hye stomacke, kept his promise & ioyned with the Percyes to his destrucciō with a greate armie, departed out of the Northparties, leuing his father sicke (whiche promised vpon his amendement and recouery without delay to folowe) and came to Stafford where his vncle the erle of Worcester and he met, and there began to consult vpō their great affaires and high attempted enterprice, there they exhorted their souldiers and compaignions to refuse no paine for the auauncement of the cōmon wealth, nor to spare no trauell for the libertie of their countrey: Protestyng opēly that they made warre onely, to restore the noble realme of Englande to his accustomed glory and fredom, which was gouerned by a tirant & not by his lawful and ryght kyng. The capitaines sware & the souldiers promised to fyght, ye and to die for libertie of their countrey. When all thynges was prepared, they set forwarde towarde Wales, lokyng euery houre for new ayde and succours, noysyng abrode that they came to aide the kyng agaynst Owen Glendor. The kyng hearyng of the earles approching, thought it pollicie to encoūter with them before that the Welshemen should ioyne with their armie, and so include hym on bothe partes, and therfore returned sodaynly to the toune of Shrewelbury. He was skantely entered into the toune, but he was by his postes aduertysed that the erles with baners displaied and battailes ranged, were comyng toward hym, and were so hote and corragious, that they with light horses began to skirmishe with hys hoste. The kyng perceiuing their doynges, issued out and encamped hymselfe without the Estgate of the toune. The erles nothyng abashed although their succours them deceiued, embattailed themselfes not farre from the kynges armie. And the same night thei sent the articles wherof I spake before, by Thomas Katton and Thomas Saluaine esquiers to kyng Henry, signed with their handes and sealed with their seales, whiche articles (because no Chronicler saue one, maketh mencion what was the very cause and occasion of this greate bloudy battaile, in the whiche on bothe partes were aboue fourty thousande men assembled) I worde for worde according to my copie do here rehearce.

VVE Henry Perce erle of Northumberland, hygh Constable of England, and Warden of the West Marches of Englande toward Scotlande, Henry Percy our eldest sonne Warden of the Easte Marches of Englande towarde Scotlande, and thomas Percy earle of Worcester beynge procetours and protectours of the comon wealth, before our Lorde Jesu Christe oure supreme iudge doo allege, saye and entende too proue with our handes personally this instante daie, against the Henry duke of Lancastre thy complices and fauourers, vntustly presuming and named kyng of Englande without title of right, but onely of thy guyle and by force of thy fautours: that when thou after thyne exile diddest entre Englande, thou madest an othe to vs vpon the holy Gospeles bodely touched and kissed by thee at Dancastre that thou wouldest neuer claime the croune, kyngdome or state royall but onely thyne awne propre inheritaunce, and the inheritaunce of thy wife in Englande, and that Rycharde oure souereigne lorde the kyng and thyne, shoulde reigne durying the terme of his lyfe, gouerned by the good counsaill of the lorddes spirituall and temporall. Thou hast imprisoned thesame thy souereigne lorde and our kyng within the Toure of London, vntyll he had for feare of death, resigned his kyngdomes of Englande and Fraunce, and had renounced all his right in thefore saied kyngdomes, and others his dominions and landes of beyonde the sea. Under colour of whiche resignacion and renunciacion by the counsaill of thy frendes and complices, and by the open noysyng of the rascall people by the and thy adherentes assembled at Westminster, thou hast crouned thy selfe kyng of the realmes afore saied, and hast seazed and entered into all the castles & lordshippes pertenyng to the kynges croune, contrary to thyne othe. Wherfore thou art forsworne and false.

ALSO we do alledge, saie and entende to proue, that where thou swoorest vpon thesame Gospelles in thesame place and tyme to vs, that thou wouldest not suffre any dismes to be leuied of the Clergie, nor fiftenes on the people, nor any other tallegies and taxes to be leuied in the realme of Englande to the behoffe of the realme durying thy lyfe, but by the consideracion of the three estates of the realme, except for great nede in causes of importaunce or for the resistaunce of oure enemies, onely and none otherwyle. Thou contrary to thyne othe so made, hast done to be leuied right many dismes and fiftenes, and other impositions and tallagies, aswel of the Clergie as of the comonalte of the realme of England, and of the Marchauntes, for feare of thy maiestie royall. Wherefore thou art periured and false.

ALSO we do all, saie and entende to proue, that where thou swoorest to vs vpon thesame Gospelles in the forsaied place and tyme, that oure souereigne lorde and thyne, kyng Rycharde, shoulde reigne durying the terme of his lyfe in his royall prerogatiue and dignitie, thou hast caused thesame our souereigne lorde and thyne, trayterously within the castell of Pountfret, without the consent or iudgement of the lordes of the realme, by the space of fiftene daies and so many nightes (whiche is horrible emong christian people to be heard) with honger, thirst and colde to perishe, to be murdered. Wherfore thou art periured and false.

ALSO we do alledge, saye and entend to proue, that thou at that tyme when our souereigne lorde and thyne, kyng Rycharde, was so by that horrible murder ded as abouesaied, thou by extorte power, diddest vsurpe and take the kyngdome of Englande, and the name and the honoure of the kyngdome of Fraunce, vntrustly and wrongfully, contrary to thine othe, from Edmonde Mortymer Earle of Marche and of Vlster, then next and direct heire of Englande and of Fraunce immediatly by due course of inheritaunce after the decease of thefore saied Richard. Wherfore thou art periured and false.

ALSO we do alledge, saie & entend to proue as afore saied, that where thou madest an othe in thesame place and tyme, to supporte and maintein tcme the lawes and good customes of the realme of Englande, and also afterwarde at the tyme of thy coronacion thou madest an othe, thelayed lawes and good customes to kepe and conserue inuiolate. Thou fraudulently and contrary to the lawe of Englande and thy fautours, haue written almooste throughe euery shyre in England to chose suche knightes for to holde a parliament as shalbe for thy pleasure and purpose, so that in thy parliamentes no iustice should bee ministred againste thy mynde in these oure complaintes nowe moued and shewed by vs, whereby at any tyme we myght haue any perfight redresse, notwithstanding x that wee according to oure constience (as we truste ruled by God) haue often tymes thereof complayned, as well can testifie and bere witnes the right reuerend fathers in God Thomas Arundel archebishop of Cauntorbury, and Richard Scrope, archebyshop of Yorke. Wherfore nowe by force and strength of hande before oure Lorde Jesu Christ we muste aske our remedy and helpe.

ALSO we do alledge, saie and intende to proue, that where Edmond Mortimer earle of Marche and Ulster, was taken prysoner by Owen Glendor in a pitched and foughten feeld, and cast into prison and laden with yron fetters, for thy matter and caule, whom falsely thou hast proxx clayined willyngly to yelde hymselfe prisoner to thesaied Owen Glendor and neither wouldest deliuer hym thy self, nor yet suffre vs his kinsmen to raunsome and deliuer hym: Yet notwithstandyng, we haue not onely concluded and agreed with thesame Owen for his raunsome at oure proper charges and expences, but also for a peace betwene the and thesaied Owen. Why hast thou then not onely publyshed and declared vs as traytours, but also craftely and deceitfully imagened, purposed and conspired the vtter destruction and confusion of our persones. For the whiche cause we defy thee, thy fautoures and complices as commen traytoures and destroyers of the realme, and the inuadours, oppressoures and confounders of the verie true and right heyres to the croune of Englande, whiche thing we entende with our handes to proue this daie, almyghty God helpyng vs.

WHEN Kyng Henry had ouersene their articles and defiaunce, hee aunswered the elquiers that he was redy with dent of swerde and fierce battayll to proue their quarell false and fayned, and not with wrytyng nor slaunderous wordes, and so in his righteous cause and iust quarell he doubted not but God woulde bothe ayde and assiste hym, against vntrue persones and false forsworne traytours: with whiche aunlwere the messengers departed. The next daie in the mornyng early, whiche was xl the vigile of Mary Magdalene, the kyng perceiuyng that the battayll was neuer then he either thoughte or loked for, leaste that long tarryinge might be a minishyng of his strength, set his battayles in good ordre likewyse did his enemies, whiche bothe in puissaunce and courage were nothyng to hym inferior. Then sodaynly the trumpettes blewe, the kynges parte cried sainct George vpon them: The aduersaries cried Esperawnce Percie, and so furiously the armies ioyned. The Scottes whiche had the forwarde on the lordes side, entending to bee reuenged of their olde displeasures done to them by the Englishe nacion, set so fiersely on the kynges forward, that they made them drawe backe, and had almoste broken their arraie. The Welshemen also whiche sithe the kynges departure out of Wales, had lurked and lien in woodddes mountaignes & marishes, hering of this battaill towarde, came to the aide of the earles, and refreshed the wery people with new succours. When a feat ful messenger had declared to the kyng, that his people were beaten doune on euery side, it was no nede to bid him stirre, for lodainly he approched with his freshe battaill, and comforted, hartened and encouraged his part so, that they toke their hartes to theim, and manly fought with their enemies. The prince Henry that daie holpe muche his father, for although he were sore wounded in the face with an arowe, yet he neuer ceased ether to fyght where the battaill was moste strongest, or to courage his men where tyeir hartes was moste danted. This greate battaill continued tyze long houres with indifferent fortune on bothe partes. That at the last the kyng crying sainct Gorge, victory, brake the arraie and entered into the battaill of his enemies and fought fiersely, and auentured so farre into the battaill, that the earle Douglas strake hym doune xx and slewe sir Water Blonter, and three other appareled in the kynges suite and clothyng saiyng: I maruaill to see so many kynges so sodainly arise again, the kyng was reised and did that daie many a noble feate of armes. For as the Scottes write and Frenchemen affirme, all though that Englishemen kepe silence, that he hymselfe slewe with his handes that daie. xxvi. persones of his enemies, the other of his parte encouraged by his coynges, fought valiauntly and slewe the lord Percie called sir Henry hotspurre, the best capitain on the parte aduerse. When his death was knowen, the Scottes fled, the Welshemen ranne, the traitours were ouercome, then neither woodddes letted, nor hilles stopped the fear- xxx full hartes of theim that were banquished to flie, and in that flighte the erle Douglas, whiche for hast fallyng from the cragge of a mountaigne brake one of his genitals and was taken, and for his valiantnes of the kyng frely and frankely deliuered. There was taken also sir Thomas Percie erle of Worcester & diuerse other, on the kynges parte were slain sir Water Blount and. xvi. C. other persones. but on the parte of the rebelles were slaine the earle of Staffordе, the lorde Percie and aboue. v. thousand other, and as for the Scottes few or none escaped aliue.

AFTER this glorious victory by the kyng obteigned, he rendered to almightie God his humble and hartie thankes, and caused the erle of Worcester tye morowe after Mary Magdalene, at Shrewesbury to be drawen hanged and quartered, and his hed to be sent to London, at whiche place many mo capitaines were executed. After this greate battaill, he lyke a triumphant conqueror returned with greate pompe too London, where he was by the senate and magestrates solemply receyued.

ued not a litle reioysyng of his good fortune and fortunate victorie. But before his departure from Shrewesbury, he not forgettyng his enterpryse againste Owen Glendor, sent into Wales with a greate armie prynce Henry his eldest sonne against thesaied Owen and his seditious fautours, whiche being dismaied and in maner desperate of all comfort by the reason of the kynges late victory, fled in desert places and solitary caues, where he receiued a small rewarde mete and prepared by Godes prouidence for suche a rebell and seditious seducer. For beyng destitute of all comforte, dreadyng to shewe his face to any creature, lacxkyng meate to sustaine nature, for pure honger and lacke of foode miserably ended his wretched lyfe. This ende was prouided for suche as gaue credence to false prophelies. This ende had they that by diabolicall deuinacions were promised great possessions and seignories. This ende happeneth to suche as beleuing suche fantasticall folies, aspire and gape for honoure and high promocions. When the prince with lytle labour and lesse losse, had tamed and brideled the furious rage of the wyld and sauage Welshemen, and lefte gouernours to rule and gouerne the countrey, he returned to his father with great honour & no small prayse.

The erle of Northumberland hearing of the ouerthrowe of his brother xx and sonne, came of his owne fre wil to the kyng, excusyng himself as one neither partie nor knowing of their doing nor enterprice: the kyng neyther accused hym nor held hym excused, but dissimuled the matter for .ii. causes, one was he had Berwike in his possession, which the kyng rather desired to haue by policie then by force: the other was that therle had his castelles of Alnewicke, Warkeworth and other fortified with Scottes, so that if the erle were apprehended, al Northumberland were in ieoperdy to become Scottysh. For these causes the kyng gaue hym faire wordes and let hym departe home, where he continued in peace a while, but after he rebelled as you shall perceiue by the sequele of this story.

xxx ¶ The fourth yere.

THis yere Waleram erle of sainct Pole, considring that he had defied kyng Henry, and also that he had made diuerse voyages, and done litle damage to the Englyshenacion, and susteigned muche losse, continuyng in his olde malice against the kyng of England, by the assent of the Frenche kyng assembled a greate numbre of men of warre, as. v. C. men of armes. v. C. Genewaies with Crosebowes, and a. M. Flemynges on fote, and laied siege to the Castell of Warke thre leages from Caleis, within the territory of the kyng of Englande the syxten daye of July, wherof was Capitayne Philip Halle xl esquier, with. lxxx. archers and. xxiii. other souldiers. The erle raised against the Castle diuerse engines but they preuayled not, for they within shot so fersly, and cast out stones so incessaunly, and toke suche payne that to the hearers it is almooste incredyble. The earle perceiuing that his feate had suche successe as he loked for, retyred with hys men lodged in the towne, fortifyng thesame for feare of rescous that might issue from Caleis, the next daye he gaue a soze assaute againe, and with great soyce entered the vtter court of the Castle, and toke therein a great number of hoyse, kyen and catell, at the whiche assaut sir Robert Barenguile cosin to therle was slayn. Thesame daie a hundzed archers on hoyseback comyng out of Caleys, sawe and perceiued the doinges and demeanure of the erle and his compaignie, and towarb night they sent an Heraulte certefiyng hym that they would dine with him the next daye: to whome he proudly aunswered, that he would gladly receiue them, and their dinnar should at their comyn be ready pzepared. The nexte daye ensuyng issued out of Caleis two hũdzed men of armes two hundzed archers. iii. x hundzed men on fote with. x. oz. xii. Chariottes laden with vitail and artillery, conducted by sir Richard Alstone knight, leuetenant of the En-glyshe pale foz the erle of Somerset capitain generall of those marches: whiche in good ozdze of batail marched toward their enemies, which be-foze by their espials were aduertised of their coming, but that notwith-standyng they issued not out of their lodginges to encounter with them, but kept them selfe within their closure. The Englishmen shote so sharpely and so closly together, that the Flemynges and fotemen began too flie, the men of armes feryng the slaughter of their hoyses ran away with a light gallop the Genowais which had spent the most part of their shot xx at thassaut made litle defence and small resistence and so all were slayn and put to flight. The hasty and rashe erle of saint Paull and diuerse other without any stroke geuen to their enemies fled to sent Omers, and there were taken of the best of the armie, as the Frenche & Duche Chzonicle repozteth thze oz foure scoze persones, emongest whom the capitain of Bullayne was one, and many lozdes and knightes slayn. After that the Englishemen had taken all the cartes, munitions and vitailes that their enemies had bzought thither, they returned to Caleis in great trimphe, and within fiue daies after ther issued out of the English pale, about the numbze of. v. C. men toward Arde by nyght tyme, thynkyng to haue xxx founde the towne vnpzouided, but Sir Wanlard de Boys and the lozd Lygnie defended it and let the Englishemen of their purpose, and so with losse of fourty men they returned to Caleis: Whiche dedde persones were brent in an old hous, because their enemies shoulo be ignorãt of the damage that the Englishemen had by them sustained. The erle of saint Paule beyng at Terwin, imaginyng how to recouer somewhat of his losse but moze of his honoure sent foz a greate compaignie of noble men and valiant personages, and concluded to inuade the Marches of his enemies. But the Frenche kyng considering the erles cuyll foztune and vnfoztunate chance, commaũded him to leue of his enterpzise, with xl whiche he was soze displeased. Yet to auoide perelles, the Frenche kyng laid in garrison at Bullein and other places, the Marques of Pownt sonne to the duke of Barr, and the erle of Dampnay, and sir Jhon Har-padane a knight of greate renoune and hygh estimacion. The kyng of England circumspectly fozseing thinges to come, and imagenyng that

the Frenchemen attempted some new enterprice, against hym or his dominions beyond the sea, sent. iiii. M. men to Caleis and to the sea whereof. iii. M. landed at Sluce, whiche besieged a castle standing at the mouthe of the hauen, and made diuerse assautes and lost diuerse of their compaignie, but newes were brought to theim, that the duke of Burgoyne had required licence of the Frenche kyng to besiege the toune of Caleis, for which cause they tailed their siege, and returned to the defence of that fortresse and desired praie of the Frenche nacion.

The. v. yere.

ABoute this season Loys Duke of Orliaunce brother to the Frenche Kynge, a man of no lesse pryde then haute courage, wrote letters to Kynge Henry aduertysyng hym, that he for the perfighte loue whiche he bare to the noble feates of chyualrie and martiall actes, in auoidyng the slowe worme and deadely Dormouse called Idlenes, the ruine of realmes and confounder of nobilitie, and for the obteignyng of laude and renoune by deades of armes and manly enterprises, coulde imagine or inuente nothyng eyther more honourable or laudable to them bothe, then to mete in the fielde eche parte with an hundred knightes and Esquiers, all beyng Gentlexx men bothe of name and armes armed at all pointes and furnyshed with speares, axes, swerdes and daggers, and there to fyghte and combate to the yeldyng, and euery persone to whome God shall sende victory too haue his prisoner, and hym to raunsome at his pleasure, offeryng hym selfe with his company to come to his cytie of Angulesme, so that the kyng of Englande woulde come to the laundes of Burdeaux and there defende this chalenge. The kyng of Englande whiche was as graue and wittie as the duke was lyght and courageous, wrote to hym agayn that he not a littell mused but muche more meruailed that the Duke beyng sworne aswell to hym as to kyng Richarde to mainteyne the peace xxx betwene his brother the Frenche kyng and theim concluded, and to that had set his signe and greate seale, woulde nowe for vainglory vnder coloure of doyng dedes of Armes not onely violate the peace and breake the amitie betwene them before concluded, but also geue an occasion of displeasure and ingratitude, by the whiche in conclusion myght rise mortall warre and deadely enemitie, affirmyng farther that no kyng anointed of very dutie was either bound or oblyged to answere any chalenge but to his pere of egall estate and equiuolent dignitie, and that no christian Prince either ought or shoulde consent to warre or effusion of christen bloud but onely for the defence of his realme, or for conquest xl of his right, or for amplifiyng of Christes faithe and Christian religion, and not for pryde, worldly fame and vaynglory, declaryng also that when opportunitie of tyme and conuenient leisure serued, he would transfret and passe the sea himselfe with suche company as he thought moost conuenient into his countrey of Gascoigne, at whiche tyme the Duke myght set forward with his hand for the attaynyng of honoure and ac-

complishyng of his courageous desire and haute enterprise, promisyng in the worde of a Prince not thence to departe til the duke either by fulfyllyng his awne desyre, or by singuler combate betwene them two, onely for auoidyng the effusion of Chrysten bloud, shoulde thynke hymselfe satisfied and fully aunswered. Howbeit, at that tyme he beyng enbusied with weighty affaires and vrgent causes cõcerning the publike wealth of his realme could neither appointe tyme nor place, protestyng that the deferryng of tyme was neither for disdayne nor yet for cowardnes, but onely to abate the pride of hym whiche knowyng not hymself, nor fering reprothe regarded not his othe wrytyng nor seale. To this aunswere the x duke of Orleaunce replied and kyng Henry reioyned, whiche doynges what for the vnprincely tauntes and vncharitable checkes in them conteigned, and what for reherslyng agayne thynges to you herebefore declared I omitte and put in oblivion. The duke of Orleaunce not content with the kyng of England, assembled an armie of. vi. thousand men and entered into Guien and besieged the towne of Uergy, whereof was Capitain Sir Robart Antelfelde a valiaunt knight and an hardy Capitayn, hauyng with hym onely thre hundred Englyshemen. The duke almost euery day assaulted the towne fiersely, but they within the towne couragiously defended thesame: In so much that when he had lien there xx thre monethes and had lost many of his men and nothyng gotten, without honoure of spoile returned into Fraunce. After this the Admirall of Britayne whiche beyng highly elated and muche encouraged because the laste yere he had taken certaine Englyshe shippes laden with wyne accompanied with the Lorde Castyl! a valiaunt baron of Britaine, and twelue hundred men of armes, and thirty shippes, sayled frõ sainct Malowes and came before the towne of Darthmouth and would haue landed, but by the puissaunce of the townsmen and aide of the countrey, thei were repulsed and put backe in whiche conflicte the Lorde of Castell with his two brethren wyth foure hundred other were slayn, and aboue xxx twoo hundred prysoners taken and raunsomed, whereof the Lorde of Baqueuile high Marshall of Britayne was one, whiche was brought to the kyng and after redemed. The Admirall sory of this infortunate enterprise with muche losse and no gaine returned hastely into his coũtrey. Kyng Henry beyng aduertysed of this attempt, sent the Lord Thomas his sonne which after was duke of Clarence to the sea with a great naule of shippes to the entent either with battayll or depopulacion of the sea coastes bothe of Britayne and of Fraunce to reuenge this iniurie and inuasion: He saylyng by the sea coastes landed diuerse tymes & fiered shyppes & brent townes and destroied people without fauoure or xl mercie, and when he thoughte his quarell well reuenged he sayled toward Englande, and in hys retournyng he encountred with two greate Carickes of Jeane laden with ryche marchaundise and substanciall stuf betwene whome was a greate conflicte and a blouddy battaill, but after long fyghtyng, the Englyshemen preuailed and brought bothe the Carickes tickes into Camber before Rye, where one of them by misauenture of fier perished to the losse and no game of bothe the parties. About this tyme Jhon duke of Burgoyne whiche had long laboured and nowe obteined licence to besiege the towne of Caleis, prepatyng engynnes, ladders, cartes, and all other instrumentes necessary and conuenient for so greate a feate and notorious siege, and assembled at saint Omers sixe thousand men of armes. xv. hundred Crosbowes, beside. xii. thouland fotemen, hauyng vitayll Bumbardes and other munitions of warre sufficient and conuenient for his abrode blowen enterprise. But when al thinges were prepared and the hole army assembled he was by the Frenche kyng and his counsaill (whiche put diffidence in the exploite of his glorious buli-nes) countermaunded and prohibited farther to procede in that weighty purpose: For the whiche cause he conceiued so great an hatred and deadely malice against the duke of Orleaunce (as the onely stop and let of his glory and renoune) that he euer after not onely maligned and grudged against hym and his procedinges, but also (as you shall shortly heare) brought hym to death and finall destruccion.

xx IN this yere the Earle of Northumberland whiche bare styll a venemous scorpion in his cankered harte, and coulde not desist to inuent and deuise waies and meanes howe to be reuenged of kyng Henry and his fautours, began secretely to communicate his interior imaginacions and priuie thoughtes with Richard Scrope Archebyshop of Yorke brother to Willyam lord Scrop treasourer of England, whom kyng Henry (as you haue heard) beheaded at the towne of Bristow, and with Thomas Woubrey erle Marshall sonne to Thomas duke of Norffolke, for kyng Henries cause before banished the realme of England, and with the lordes Hastinges, Fau-xxi conbridge, Bardolfe and diuerse other whiche he knew to beare deadely hate and inward grudge toward the kyng. After long consultacion had, it was finally concluded and determined amongest them, that all they, their frendes and alies with al their power should mete at Yorkes wold at a day appointed and that therle of Northumberland should be chefetaine & supreme gouernour of the armie, which promised to bring with hym a great nombet of Scottes.

THis seditious conspiracie was not so secretely kepte nor so closely cloked but that the kyng thereof had knowledge, and was fully aduertised. Wherfore to preuent the tyme of their assembly, he with suche xi power as he could sodainly gather together with all diligence marched toward the North parties and vsed suche a celeritie in his iourney that he was thither come with all his hoste and power before the confederates heard any inkelyng of his marchyng forwarde, and sodainly there were apprehended the Archebyshop, the earle Marshal, sir Jhon Lampley, and sir Robart Plumpton. These personnes were arraigned, attein-

ted and adiudged to die, and so on the Monday in Whitson weke all they without the Citie of Yorke were headded. Here of necessitie I oughte not nor will not forgeate howe some folyshe and fantasticall persounes haue written, howe erronious Ipocrites and sedicious Asses haue endited, howe superstitious Frers and malicious Monkes haue declared and diuulged bothe contrary to Goddes doctrine the ho-noure of their Prince and common knowen veritie that at the howre of the execution of thys Byshop (which of the Executioner desyred to haue fyue strokes in remembraunce of the fyue woundes of Christ) the kyng at thesame tyme syttyng at dyner had fyue strokes in his necke vpon a per sone inuisible, and was incontinently striken with a lepzey: whiche is a manifestelyt as you shall after playnely perceiue. What shall a man saye of suche writers whiche take vpon them too knowe the secretes of Goddes iudgement: What shall men thinke of suche beastly persones whiche regarding not their bounden dutie and obeisaunce to their prince and souereigne lord enuied the punishment of traitors and torment of offenders: But what shal all men coniecture of suche whiche fauouring their awne worldly dignitie, their owne priuate authoritie, their owne peculiar profite, wyll thus iuggle tayle and imagine fantasies agaynste their souereigne Lorde and Pryncc, and put theim in memorie as a mys-tacle to his dishonoure and perpetuall infamy: Well let wyse men iudge what I haue saied. Beside these persones, diuers other of thesaid cōspiracye and faction, the Lorde Hastynges, the Lorde Fauconbrydge, Sir Jhon Coluile of the dale, Sir Jhon Griffith were beheadded at Durham. The erle of Northumberlande hearyng his counsayll to be reueled and his confederates to be put to execucion and shameful death. fled into Scotland to his olde frende George of Dumbarre earle of the Marche, whiche the yere before was reuoked out of exile and restored to his possessions name and dignitie, where he taried till the next Somme and then sayled into Fraunce and after into Flaunders desiryng aide & assistence against kyng Henry, but when he sawe litteil hope of comfort and that fewe willyngly were ententike to his request, he accompanied with the Lorde Bardolffe muche dismaied and more desperate returned agayne to his trewe frendes into Scotlande and there made his abode the hole yere abidyng the fauoure of fortune and chaunge of his vnfor-tunate chaunce, duryng whiche tyme the kyng without any difficultie toke into his possession the towne of Barwicke, the castelles of Alnewy-ke and all other Fortresses appertaining to the Erle: And liyng at Bar-wicke he caused to be put to death the Barons sonne of Greystocke, Sir Henry Beynton, and Jhon Blenkensoppe and fiue other as fautoures and workers of this newe inuented conspiracy. When the kyng had thus appeased and asswaged that late begonne commocion, he sente his sonne the prince of Wales accompanied with Edwarde duke of Yorke and a great puissaunce, to encounter with the Scottes which by promise were bound to aide & assiste the confederates and rebelles. But they heatyng

ryng that the founders of the warre were apprehended and put to deathe, made no haste forwarde but taried peaceably at home So that the prince entering into Scotlande and fynding no resistence, brent tounes spoyled Villages and wasted the Countrey euery where as he passed, whiche thyng so muche amased the kyng of Scottes and his counsayll, that notwithstandyng that he had gathered and appoynted a greate hoste vnder the conducte of the Earles of Douglas and Bowgham to resiste the prince and his inuasions, yet they sent Ambassadours to hym requiryng hym of peace and finall concorde, whiche requeste he vtterly x denaied, but at their humble petition he graunted them a truce for certaine monethes, of the whiche they were bothe glad and ioyouse, and so the prince laden with pray and spoyle returned with great game to hys father. While the prince thus infected the countrey of Scotland on the land, sir Robart Umfreuile vice Admirall of Englande vexed the countreys of Fyffe and Loghdian on the sea coast, for he liyng in the Scottishe sea fourten daies and euery daie landed on the one syde or the other and toke praies spoyles and prisoners maugre the great powers of the duke of Albanie and the Earle Douglas, insomuche that he brent and toke the toune of Peples on their faire day and caused his men to mete xi Clothe with their bowes: And with greate gaine returnyng to his shyppes brent the Galiet of Scotlande with many other vessels, and sente Clothe vitaill and diuerse Marchandises to euery towne in Northumberlande, settyng thereon no great price: Wherfore the Scottes called hym Robyn mendmarket. The kyng about this tyme was newely vnquieted and perturbed, for notwithstandyng this fortunate successe that he had obteigned in all his outward warres and interiour affayres, yet some of his people bare suche a cankered harte toward hym that to expel hym from his rule and dignitie they left no occasion vnsought nor deuice vnattempted. For sodainly sprang out a fame of an vncertain auc-xii tour that kyng Rychard was yet liuing in Scotlande, to whiche fable suche credite was geuen, that if prudente policie had not forsene the sequele, it had kendeled a greatter flame then within short space myght haue well bene quenched or extincte.

IN this sommer, the Pestilenciall plage so infected the Citie of London and the coūtrey round about, that the kyng durst not repaire thither nor yet nere to the confines of thesame, wherfore he departyng from the castell of Ledes, determined xi to take shyp at Quinborough in the Isle of Shepey, and to sayll ouer to Lye in Essex and so to Plasshey, there to passe his tyme till the plage were seased: And because certaine pyrates of Fraunce wete lurkyng at the Temmes mouthe waytyng for their pray, Thomas Lorde Camois with certaine shippes of warre was appointed to wafte ouer the kyng. When the kyng was on the sea, in the middest of his iourney, whether the winde turned, or that the Lorde Camois kept not a directe course, or that his shippe was but a slugge. The Frenchemen whiche by all symilitude had knowledge of the kynges passage entered amongest the kynges naule and toke fowre vesselles nexte to the kynges shippe and in one of them Sir Thomas Rampston knight the kynges vicechamberlain with all his chamber stuffe and apparell, and folowed the kyng so nere that if his shyppe had not bene swift he had landed soner in Fraūce then in Esser, but by Goddes prouision and fortunate chaunce he escaped the daunger and arriued as his appointcted porte. The kyng beyng sore moued with the lorde Camois, caused hym to be attached and endited that he condiscended and agreed with the Frenchemen that the kyng in his iourney should be intercepted and taken. On this poinct he was arraigned in the last day of October before Edmond earle of Kent that day high stuard of the realme, on which day were he giltie or giltles, fautie or clere, culpable or innocent of that fact and doing, he was by his pees founde not giltie and dismissed at the barre, hauing restitucion bothe of his landes gooddes and offices. In this yere kyng Henry not onely destryng newe affinitie with forein princes but also the prefermēt of his line and progeny, sent the Lady Philyp his younger daughter to Ericke kyng of Denmarke, Norwey and Swethen whiche was conueighed thither with great pompe and there with muche triumphe maried to the saied kyng, where she tasted bothe welthe, and wo, ioye and pain. About this season died Sir Robert Knolles knight a man of greate policie, wysdome and experience in warre, whiche had bene a Capitayn from the tyme of kyng Edward the fourth till his latter dayes, in the whiche he beyng gouernour of aquitaine encombred with age, resygned hys office to Sir Thomas Belfforde a valiaunt Capitayne and returned to London, where he diseased and was honourably buried in the Churche of the White Fryers.

¶ The eight yere.

The. viij. yere

YOu haue heard before how kyng Robert of Scotlande beyng very aged and impotent, was not able to rule and gouerne his realme, and howe Walter his brother beyng by hym created duke of Albanie, (whiche was the firste duke that euer was in Scotlande) was made gouernour of hys brothers countrey and dominion. After whiche office and preheminence by hym obteigned, he so sore thirsted after the croune and scepter royall that he cared litle though the kyng his brother, and his two sonnes had bene at Christes fote in heauen. And somwhat to further his purpose, it vnfortunatly chaūsed that Dauy of Rothesay prince of the realme and eldest sonne to the kyng, was accused to his father of diuerse heynous crymes, and in especiall of lasciuious & dissolute lyuyng, as raupshyng of wiues, deflouryng of virgins, and defilyng of maidens, wherefore the kyng deliuered hym to his brother the gouernour, trusting that by his good counsail and discrete aduertisement he would not onely amend his life, but also to fal to wisdome prudence & grauitie. When the duke had possessed part of his desired pray, he sent his nephewe from castle to castle, from prisone to prisone, from place to place, and in conclusion lodged hym in a toure within the castle of Franckeland, where with sampne he caused hym miserably to ende his life, puttyng a poze woman to painfull death, whiche gaue to the Prince the mylke of her brestes by a rede into the prisone. His death was long hidden from the kyng his father, but in conclusion, the gouernour shewed to the kyng how diuerse persones trayterously had murdred hym, whiche were aprehended and iudged to die, and yet in their liues they neuer knew noz yet saw hym. The kyng notwithstandyng his brothers excuse, doubted much thend of his other sonne named James, wherfoze he priuely prouided a ship, in the whiche he put the chyld beyng then of the age of.ix.yeres, vnder the tuicio of the lozde Henry Sencliere erle of Orkeney, willing hym to conuey the prince into the Realme of Fraunce if by any possibilitie he could thether attain. And if foztune should driue hym on the cost of England, he wrote letters to the kyng of England, the tenoz wherof insueth.

A letter sente by the kyng of Scottes.

ROBERT kyng of Scottes, sendeth gretyng to kyng Henry of England, althoug by relacion of other persones I haue knowen before this tyme, what magnanimitie, what clemencie, and other infinitie vertues be planted and roted in your royall persone, yet in the voyage that you your self personally last made into Scotland, I haue had manifest and open experience of thesame. Foz when you like our enemy inuaded our countrey, brent our tounes, and destroied our people, yet by the fauour that you shewed to suche places and people whiche receyued and fostered your noble father when he fled out of England (foz feare of rebelles whiche then soze afflicted his lande) we haue receyued almoste as muche profit and aduauntage as we did hurte and damage, by your terrible warres and bloudy inuasions. Wherefoze I cannot but laude and praise your highnes & iudge your noble hart mete foz a kyngdome, but also I doo loue and will not cease to loue you duryng my naturall lyfe. And notwithstandyng that Realmes and nacions daily contende and make warre foz glozy rule and empire, yet to vs bothe beyng kynges, no suche occasion is geuen to do as they do, oz to folowe their stepes oz progression, but we (whiche is the dutie of a kyng) oughte to striue who shall prosecute other with moste humaine fauour and contynuall clemencie, and as muche as we may to be felowes, compaignions and alies, in synguler loue and perpetuall amitie. And as foz suche causes as now be different and in discencion betwene vs and our Realmes foz my part I shall endeuour my self to bryng all thynges to a good conclusion and mutual confozmitie. And because that I now am in thesame trouble and perplexitie foz my chyldren, that your father was with the rebelles of Englande, I am compelled of very necessitie to desyre ayde and seke comfozte of fozain princes and strang nacions. And although that by the helpe of God and power of my people, I am able inough to

,, kepe thesame against all outwarde powers and forain attemptes. Yet ,, from the secrete malice of suche as lurke and bee dayly norished in my ,, very bosome, I cannot kepe theim in suertie within myne owne domi,, nion. And yet in no other place they can bee from that pestiferous con,, spiracy put in any sure defence or perfight sauegarde, except thei be pre,, serued by the faith and fidelitie of good and iuste men. The worlde this ,, tyme is so full of malice, so replenyshed with rancor, that whereseuer ,, that golde or syluer (whiche bee instrumentes of mischief) maie entre or ,, penetrate, there shalbe founde ministers prone and redy to do and per,, petrate all detestable crimes and mischeuous inuencions: But because x
,, I knowe and perceiue your persone to be endued with so many notable ,, vertues, and to be adorned with suche Magnanimitie, fidelitie, iustice, ,, clemencie, and finally, not onely to be replenished with the whole com-
,, paignie and felowship of the vertues Horall, but also to be of that po,, wer, riches & puissaunce that no prince in our tyme, maie to your hygh-
,, nes be either compared or assimuled, I beyng by your noble and nota,, ble qualities allected and encouraged, moste hertely require your helpe
,, and humbly desire your ayde, relefe and comfort. For myne eldest sonne ,, Dauid, (as I suspecte and as the fame runneth, although I cannot yet ,, thereof make a perfight proofe) is murthered by no cõmon murtherer, by xx
,, no open theefe, by no notorious malefactour nor by no furious persone,
,, but by my brother his vncle whiche ought to haue protected and saued
,, him, to whom I committed the gouernance of me, my children, my whole
,, realme and all that I had, whiche vnnaturall kynseman hath not onely ,, killed my child, but hath shamefully slayn and murdered hym with the ,, moste cruell and miserable kynd of death, whiche is famyne. And so he,
,, whiche ought & whose duetie was to haue auoyded and put frõ me the ,, iniuries of all other persones, hath afflicted me with the moste contu-
,, melie, the greatest iniury and manyfest damage, that euer subiecte dyd
,, attempt against his Prince, or brother against brother, or enemy against xxx ,, kynseman. For he whom I made gouernour to withstande the power ,, and malice of myne outward enemies, compasseth and imagineth howe
,, to destroy myne issue, and consequently myne owne persone. Wherfore
,, for the fauor that you beare to iustice sent by God to mankynde, and for ,, the naturall loue and fatherly affeccion that you bere to your children ,, and posteritie; I humbly require and hertely desire your magnificence,
,, that this myne onely child, not onely may safely and surely liue vnder
,, your defence and protection, but also that you of your accustomed good ,, nes will vouchesaue to preserue and defende this the onely heire of my ,, posteritie from the malicious attemptes of his cruell kynred and am- xl
,, bicious consanguinitie. And this the rather, for the remembraunce bothe
,, of your fathers chaunce, whiche in his necessitie found muche humanite
,, in our nacion, and also of the fraultie of worldly suertie, whiche assone ,, chaungeth from good to euill, and from euill to worse, as the fayre and ,, redolent flower this daie florisheth, and to morow widred and sodainly ,, vadeth. Requiryng you to haue in remembraunce, that if Princes put their whole confidence only in their cõmon people, which be moze variable then the Wethercocke oz Wynd, and haue no outward ftendes noz foꝛain amitie, their empire is falling and their regiment very vnitel. But if pꝛinces be coupled in the chaines of indiſſoluble amite, and wyll mutually and faithfully defend their cõmen enemies, and auoide their manifeſt iniuries, there is no power oz ſtrength of the cõmen people, that either can hurte oz caſt theim from the thꝛone: in ſuche a ſuertie is a king that ſo is garniſhed with the loue, fauoꝛ and amitie of outward pꝛinces and louyng neighbours. Wherfoꝛe, if it may ſeme expediẽt to your high wiſedom, to here this my lowly requeſte and louyng ſute (which I thinke your clemencie will not reiect noꝛ refell) my deſire is, that accoꝛdyng to the laſt truce concluded betwene you and vs, in the whiche is conteigned that all men conueighyng letters from the one of vs to the other, ſhould ſurely and ſauely paſſe and repaſſe without any contradiccion: That it would pleaſe you not to bꝛeake noꝛ deny theſated libertie to this beter our only ſonne, but foꝛ your honoute to kepe your pꝛomiſe ſincerly inuiolated and faithfully obſerued. And thus the gracious God pꝛeſerue your noble perſon in your royall eſtate long to continue.

xx VVHEN all thynges neceſſary were pꝛepared, the mariners halſed vp their ankers and departed from Bas caſtell with this young pꝛince and Henry Percie ſonne to the Loꝛde Percie ſlayn beforе at Shꝛewesbury, and by vigoꝛ of tempeſt were dꝛyuen on the coſt of Holdernes called Flamboꝛough hed the.xxx. date of Marche, where the young pꝛince foꝛ to refreſhe hymſelf toke lande. He wꝛoughte not ſo pꝛiuely, but he was knowen and taken with all his company, and conueighed to the kyng beyng at Wyndſoꝛe where he with dew reuerence deliuered hys fathers letter. When the letter was redde and vnderſtand, the kyng aſſembled his counſaill to knowe what ſhould be done with this noble enfant. Some to whom the continuall warres and daily battail was both xxi diſpleſant and odious, affirmed that there could not happen a better oz a moze ſurer occaſion of peace and amitie betwene bothe the realmes, whiche being ſo offred, they would in no wiſe ſhould be reiected but take, conſideryng that this pꝛince was ſent thither, in truſt of ſauegarde, in hope of refuge, and in requeſt of aide and comfoꝛt againſt his cuill willers and malicious enemies: other (whoſe opinion toke place) affirmed hym to be a pꝛiſoner and ſo to bee oꝛdeꝛed, foꝛ almuche as he was taken the warre beyng open, and that hys father dyd not onely maintayne therle of Noꝛthumberland and other rebelles within his countrey and gaue them great honours, but alſo ſent a greate nomber of hys nobilite xxi againſt the kyng at the battaill of Shꝛewesbury. Wherfoꝛe it was agreed that he ſhould be deteined as a pꝛiſoner, lawfully taken and duely appꝛehended. When tidinges of this diſinitiue ſentence was ſhewed to his father, he tooke ſuche an inwarde conceit and ſo ſoꝛe a pencifenes, that he ended his naturall lyfe within a fewe monethes after. Although the takyng of this young pꝛince, was at the firſt tyme diſpleaſant to the realme of Scotlande: yet ſurely, after he and all his region had greate cause to reioyse and thanke God of their fortunate chaunce and good lucke that insued. For where before that tyme the people of Scotlande were rude, rustical, without any vrbanitie, hauyng litle lernyng and lesse good maners, & good qualities least of all. This prynce being. xviii. yeres prisoner within this realme, was so instructed & taught by his scholemasters and pedagoges appointed to hym by the onely clemencie of the kyng, that he not onely florysshed in good learnyng & fresh litterature (as the tyme then serued) but also excelled in all poinctes of Marciall feates, Musicall instrumentes, Poeticall artes and lyberall sciences. In so muche that at his returne from captiuite, he furnished his realme bothe with good learnyng and ciuill policie, whiche before was barbarous, sauage, rude and without all good nurtur.

THerle of Northumberlande, whiche had bene in Fraunce and other regions to obteigne aide against kyng Henry, and had missed of his purpose, now putte his whole confidence in the Scottes, and in especiall in his olde frende George Earle of Marche, and so assembled a greate power of the Scottishe nacion to inuade Northumberland, and recouered diuerse of his owne castels and seigniories, to whom the people without nombre dayly resorted. Wherfore he entendyng to be reuenged of his olde greues, accõpaignied with the lorde Bardolffe and diuerse other Scottes and Englysshmen entred into Yorke shire and there began to destroy and depopulate the countrey. Wherof the kyng beyng aduertysed, caused a great army to be assembled and marched toward his enemies, but or the kyng came to Notyngham Raufe Rekesbie shryfe of Yorke shire, in ỹ middest of Februarye with the power of the countrey, sodainly set on therle and his compaignie, at a place called Bramham Moore, where after long fightyng, the erle and the lorde Bardolffe and many other were taken and brought to Yorke and there executed, and their heddes sent to London.

AFTER this the kyng hauyng knowledge that diuerse pirates were wanderyng on the cost of Englande, prepared a greate armie furnished with men, vitaile and munitions of warre mete and conuenient for such an enterprice, and in the beginnyng of Marche sent to the sea, lorde Edmond Hollande erle of Kent, chieftain of that crewe and armie. When the erle had searched all the coaste of Fraunce, and had founde not one pirate or sea robber, he was aduertysed by his espials that they hearyng of his armie, were diuerted to the partes of Britayn. Wherfore thesaied erle entendyng to be reuenged on them whiche he sought for, made hys course thether, before his arriuall they had conueighed their shyppes in to the hauens, so that he could not fight with them on the sea, wherefore he launched out his botes and with his fierce souldiers tooke lande and fiercely assaulted the towne of Briake standyng on the Sea syde. The cytezens thrẽwe out dartes, cast stones, shotte quarelles and manfully defended their walles. In whiche conflicte the Earle receiued suche a wound in his head that he departed out of this worlde the. v. day after.

The

The assailantes not dismayed but set a fire with the death of their captaine like men desperate styll assaulted the towne and by fine force entered into the same and set it a fiet and slewe all that would make any resistence,and for lacke of a capitayn,the men of warre laden with prayes and prisoners returned againe into Englande.

THIS Edmond erle of Kent was in suche fauout with kyng Henry that he not alonely aduaunced and promoted him to highe offices and great preheminences,but also by his meane and no small coste obteigned for him the eldest doughter and one of the heires of the Lord Bar-x nabo of Millaine brother to Lord Galeace whose sõne also called Galiace murderyng his vncle Barnabo made himselfe first duke of Millaine,for which mariage Lord Barnabo paied to him an hundred M. Duccattes at the churche of saint Marie Dueryes in Southwarke at the day of the solempnite, by doen Alphõs de Caniola. This Lucie after the death of her husband by whom she had no issue, was moued by the kyng to mary with his bastard brother the Earle of Dorcet a man very aged and il visaged,whose person nether satisfied her fantasy nor whose face pleased her appetite,wherfore she preferryng her own mind more then the kynges desire, delityng in hym the whiche shoulde more xx satisfie her wanton pleasure then gayne her any profite, for very loue toke to husband Henry Mortimer a goodly youg Esquyer and a bewtifull Bacheler. For which cause the kyng was not onely with her displeased but also for mariyng withoute his licence he seassed and tined her at a great some of money, whiche fine kyng Henry the.v,bothe released and pardoned and also made him knight and promited hym to great offices both in England and Normandye, whiche sir Henry had issue by this Lady,Anne maried to sir Jhon Awbemond mother to Elizabeth Chandos mother to Phillis maried to sir Daute Halle captayne of Caen,she had also issue Mary maried to Jhon Cheddur and xxx Luce espoused to sir Jhon Cressy. This yere by reason of Frost,shepe and birdes died without nomber,whiche continued fiftene weekes,

The.x.yere.

ABoute this time Jhon duke of Burgoine a man of a quicke witte,desirous of rule,& of an haute courage,being of great auctorite amongest the Frenche nacion to whome ctuill discorde was more pleasure then fraternall amitie and mutuall concorde,began sore to grudge and maligne against Lewes Duke of Orleance brother to the French kyng,because that he was chefe of the kynges councell and ordered al thinges by his discrecion, because the xl king his brother was(as you haue heard)fallen into a frensy and therfore medled in nothyng. The duke of Orleance on the other side beyng highly set vp in pride, began to disdain and froune at the duke of Burgoin,because he perceiued that he aspired & gaped to haue the supreme regimente in the publike affaires and weighty causes, thus the one would haue no superior, and the other would haue no pere. This cancard disdain in shorte space grewe to suche a hate,that all the realme of

Fraunce was deuyded into two factiõs, thone parte fauozyng the duke of Dzleance, and the other enclinyng to the duke of Burgoyne, whiche deuysion had almoste bzought the realme of Fraunce to vttet ruyne and perpetuall confusion. The Frenche kyng beyng somwhat amended of his disease, heryng of this controuersie betwene these two pzinces, sent foz theim bothe to Paris, where he repzoued their pzide, rebuked their malice, and taunted their vngodly dooynges, in so muche that all the nobilitie beyng pzesent, iudged the displeasure to haue been bothe foz-gotten and fozgeuen. But high cozages are not so sone abated, noz ro-ted malice is not in hast plucked vp, foz the duke of Burgoyne still cõ- p passyng the destruccion of the duke of Dzleance, appoynted a secrete frende called Raufe of Actouile to bzyng his purpose to passe. This Raufe fozgettyng not his enterpzise, assembled together a compaignie of suche persons as he moste trusted, & as a Wolffe gredy of his pzay, when the duke of Dzleance was comnyng from the court in the nyght season, he fiersly set vpon hym and shamefully slewe hym. When this murder was published, the king lamẽted, the nobles grudged, and the comon people cried to God foz vengeance. The duke of Burgoyne iu-stified this act by the mouth of Master Jhon Petit doctoz in deuinite, whiche wzested scripture and doctozs so fat out of course, that his iusti- pp fication within fewe yeres after was adiudged heresy by the whole v-niuersite of Paris. The French kyng, lest that greater mischief should ensue, was compelled to hide and cloke his inward affeccion and dolo-rous herte and to dissimule the matter, doubtyng lest the duke of Bur-goyne whose herte and haute cozage he had well knowen befoze, (if he should pzoceade agaynst hym foz this euill acte) would ioyne and take part with the Englishe nacion agaynst the realme of Fraunce. Where-foze after long consultacion had by the entreatie of the kyng and other Pzinces of the bloud royall, Charles duke of Dzleance sonne to duke Lewes lately murdzed, and Jhon duke of Burgoyne were reconsiled ppp and bzought to a fained concozd and a fainte agremente, eche of theim takyng a cozpozall othe vpon the holy Euangelistes, neuer after to di-sagre oz renewe any displeasure foz any thyng befoze passed. But what pzeuaileth an othe where hertes still burne & malice continually smo-keth, who careth foz periury whẽ apetite of reuẽgyng daily encreaseth.

IN this case was the duke of Dzleance whiche perceiuyng the kyng his vncle to beare with the duke of Burgoyne, and to let the detestable murder of his father so lightly passe without pain oz punishment, alied and confederated hymself with the dukes of Berry and Burbon, & the erles of Alaunson and Arminacke, whiche reised a greate puissance of q people, and defied the duke of Burgoyn and his cõplices as their moz-tall foo and dedly enemy. The duke of Burgoine feryng the sequel of the matter (because ther was a mociõ of mariage to be had betwene the pzince of Wales and his doughter) was somwhat the bolder to send to the kyng of England foz aide and succozs against his enemies. Kyng Henry no lesse fozseyng then that whiche after ensued, whiche was that the discord of these two great prynces might turne his realme to profit and honor, sent to the duke of Burgoine, Thomas erle of Arundell, sir Gilbert Umfreuile lorde of Kyne, sir Robert Umfreuile, and sir Jhon Grey with.xii.C.archers, whiche toke shippyng at Douer and landed at Sluce. When thenglishmen wer arriued in Flaunders, the duke of Burgoyn with thenglishmen and all his power, rode daie and night til he came nere to Paris, and ther the next daie after with hard fightyng and corragious shotyng, the Englishmen gat the bridge of saint Clow, whiche passed ouer the riuer of Saine, and toke and slewe all the soul-x diers whiche the duke of Orleance had left there in garrison to defend the bridge. Emongest whom sir Hanlard de Boys a valiant capitain was taken prisoner by the Englishemen & highly raunsomed. But the duke of Orleãce and his compainy whiche wer like to haue been com-passed with their enemyes, so that almost al their wayes of refuge were stopped and enclosed, in the nyght tyme made a bridge ouer the riuer on the part of saint Denys strete, & so escaped & fled into the highe coũ-tries. And after this conflicte the duke of Burgoyn beyng now in hys ruffe thinkyng no man ether in aucthorite or bloud equiuolente to hys person, and blinded with a kall of vainglory before his yes, toke vpõ xi him the hole rule and gouernance of the realme and ordered the kyng as pleased him, and not to the kynges wil, and thinkyng that in so tro-belous a season he had vnknit the knot of all ambiguities & doubtes perceiuyng all thynges to haue better succeded for his purpose then he before imagined, dimissed Thenglishemen into their countrey geuyng to them hartty thankes and great rewardes. Which doyng king Henry much disalowed, consideryng that he had sent away his defence before the great brunt of the war wer ouerpassed, & shuld haue taken hede be-fore what policie his enemyes had practised or what puissance they had assembled. For he well remẽbred that one faire day assureth not a good and enuied the duke of Orliãce & his fautors that he caused the Frẽch kyng in person to arme himself against them and their adherentes, as trautors to hym and aparant enemies to the comon welth, & sent diuerse capitaines to inuade their landes and territories in the countrees of Poytiers and Angulesme, & other seigniories aperteignyng and belongyng to the homage and obeisance of the duchie of Aquitain & Guien. Wherfore the dukes of Orleance, Berrie, and Burbon with their frẽdes and alies, seyng that now their onely hope consisted in the kyng of England, sent to hym Alberte Aubemound a man of no lesse lernyng then audacite, & yet of no lesse audacitie, then wit and policie whiche in the name of the confederates offred certain cõdicions as you shall here after accordyng to myne author truly reported, whiche wer made & cõcluded in the yere of our Lorde. M.CCCC.xii. the. viii. daie of Maie.

FIRST, the said lordes offred that frõ thẽce furth thei should expose and set furth their owne persons, finances and landes to serue the kyng of England his heires and successors, when soeuer thei wer required or called in all iust quarelles: whiche iust quarelles the kyng of Englãde shall take to aperteigne to the duchie of Guyen with the appurtenances, affirmyng how the said duchie perteigneth and ought to apertain to hym of righte by lineall heritage and lawfull succession, manifestyng from thence furthe, that they should not blemishe nor spotte their truthe nor fidelite to assist and aide hym in recoueryng the same duchy.

ALSO the saied Lordes offered their sonnes, doughters, nephewes and neces, parentes and all their subiectes, to contract mariage accordyng to the discrecion of the kyng of Englande.

ALSO thei offred tounes, castles, tresures, & generally al their goodes to ayde the kyng his heires and successors for the defence of their rightes and quarels, so that the bonde of their allegiance might be saued, the which in another secrete apointment they before had declared.

ALSO thei offred to the kyng of Englãd generally al their frẽdes adherentes alies and well willers to serue him in his quarel for the recouery of the hole Duchie of Guien.

ALSO to cease al fraude, the sayd lordes recognised that they were ready, to affirme the sated Duchie of Guien to belong to the kyng of England in like and semblable wise in liberty and franchises, as euer any of the said kynges predecessors held or possessed the same.

ALSO the said lordes knowledged that al the townes, castels, and fortresses that they had within the Duchie of Guien, to holde them of the kyng of England as the very trewe duke of Guien, promisyng all seruice and homages after the best maner that in suche case myght be,

ALSO they promysed to deliuer to the kyng as much as laie in thẽ all townes and castelles apperteinyng to the roialtie and seignorie of England, whiche are in nomber. xx. what townes and castels, and as to the regarde of other townes and fortresses whiche were not in their puissaunce and seignory, they would helpe the kyng of England his heires and deputies to winne them with men in sufficiente number at their propre charges and expences.

ALSO the kyng of Englande was agreed that the duke of Berry his trewe Uncle and * vassalle and the duke of Orleaunce his subiecte and vassalle and the Earle of Armynacke shoulde holde of hym by homage and fealtie the landes and seignioryes hereafter folowyng, that is to say the Duke of Berry to holde the Countie of Pontiew duryng his lyfe, and the duke of Orleaunce to hold the Countie of Augulesme duryng his lyfe onely, and the Countie of Perrigot for euer, and the Erle of Armynacke to holde. iiii. castels vpon certayn sureties and condicions as by indenture should be appointed.

* Vassal, is one that holdeth landes or preheminences by fealtie or homage.

FOR the whiche offers couenauntes and agrementes they affirmed that the kyng of England as Duke of Guien, ought to defend and succour them against all men as their very Lorde and soueregne, and not to conclude any treatie of leage with the Duke of Bourgoyne, his brethren, children, frendes or alies.

FVRTHERMORE, the kyng of England ought to aide the said Lordes as his trewe vassals in all their iuste quarels for recouerynge of damages for iniuries to them wrongfully done.

ALSO they required the kyng of England to send them. viii. thousand men to aide them against the Duke of Bourgoyne, whiche daily prouoked the Frenche kyng to make open warre on them, their landes and seignioryes, promisyng farther to disbourse and paye all the costes and charges whiche the said armie of Englishemen should expend duryng their warre, whiche letter was written the. viii. day of May.

KYNG Henry louingly receiued and gently entertayned this messenger Alberte. and when he had well debated and consydered the case, he fyrste detestyng the abhominable murder of the late Duke of Orleaunce and seyng no Justice ministred nor no Punishement done for so shamefull an acte, hauyng also approued experience that the Duke of Bourgoyne would kepe no longer promyse then he hym self lysted. And secondarily consideryng what large offers these Princes had made to hym bothe greatly to his honour and to the hygh profyt and commoditie of his realme and subiectes, though that he was bounde by the office of a kyng to ayde and succoure theym whiche cried for Justice and could haue none, and in especiall because they in that point beyng hys subiectes and vassalles ought to be defended in maintenaunce of hys superiorite and seignioryie: Wherfore he louyngly promised them ayde and relefe. This returne of the messenger was to them as pleasaunt as is the deliueraunce of a captiue from his sore imprisonment, or of a marchaunt passyng by the way beset about by Theues, beyng reskewed by his frendes or companions. And not without cause, for the French kyng not of his owne courage animated, but maliciously encensed by the duke of Bourgoyn, persecuted the faction of the Orleaunces from citie to citie from towne to towne, with suche power and extremitie that they were bothe of force and necessitie compelled to repaire to the Citie of Bourges in Berry, and there to appoynte theym selfes either to render or

For this feate was not so secretly wrought in England but it was apparauntly espied in Fraunce, wherefore the Frenche kynges counsail sent the Erle of saint Paule the olde cankered enemy to the Englishmen into the parties of Picardy with fiften hundred horsemen and a great nombet of fotemen, he ordeined certain of his men to geue assaulte to the toune of Guisnes while he stode in a stale to lie in waite for the relefe that might come from Caleis. The furious Frenchmen brake a fewe old pales about poore mens gardens of Guisnes, but the men of warre of the Castell shotte so fiercely at them with arrowes and caste out wyldefier in suche abundaunce that the assailantes were fayne to retire. And so the Erle of sainct Paule which neuer wonne gain but lost honour at the Englishe mens handes, returned not onely wyth losse of his people but defrauded of his desyred pray, returned to the toune of saint Quintins.

The Frenche kyng in the meane season by the enticement of the duke of Burgoine laid sege to the cite of Bourges in Berry where the duke of Orleance and his confederates had included and fortified themselfes. When the kyng of Englande was thereof aduertysed, he with all diligence sent forthe his sonne Thomas duke of Clarence, and Edward duke of Yorke with. viii. C. horsemen and nine thousand Archers whiche toke land in the bay of Hogges in Normandy by sainct Waste in the territory of Constantine. Thenglishemen swarmed lyke Bees rounde aboute the Countrey, robbyng Marchauntes, spoilyng husbandmen and brennyng tounes, and were ioyously receiued of the Erles of Alaunson and Richemond fautors of the Orlienctall part. The counsaill of Fraunce not willyng that the Englishemen should ioyne or concurre with the Dukes of Orleaunce and Berry or their complices, caused a common fame (although it were not trewe) to be diuulged abrode that there was a finall peace and a perfit amitte concluded betwene the Frenche kyng and his lordes whiche lately were to hym aduersaries. When this fable was notified to the Englyshemen whiche were by hasty iourneis passed the ryuer of Leire, they spoyled the toune and Monastery of Beaulieu, and wasted with fyre and swerde the countreis of Touraine and Maine. Against whome the duke of Burgoyne sent the lorde of Rambures with a great armie, whyche in short time was before vanquished. The Dolphyn of Fraunce fearyng the doynges of the Englyshemen concluded a fayned peace betwene the dukes of Orleaunce and Burgoyne and their adherentes, so that the duke of Orleaunce should without delay dispatche out of the dominions of Fraunce all the Englishe armie. The duke was not ryche to paie, and the Englishemen were gredy to haue, in so muche that they marchyng toward Guien in good order what by sackyng of tounes and what with raunsomyng of ryche persones, gat greate treasure and many good prayes. Beside this to the aide of the duke of Orleaunce kyng

Henry sent to Calcis therles of Kent and Warwicke with. ij. thousande fightyng men whiche spoiled and defaced the countie of Bullenois, and brent the towne of Samer de Boys and toke with assaulte the fortresse of Russalte with diuers other. The duke of Orleaunce which was daily called on to dispatche the Englishemen out of Fraunce, came to the duke of Clarence and his army rendryng to them a. M. grameries and disbursed to them as muche money as either he or his frendes myght easely spare: And for two hundred and. ix. M. Frankes whiche remayned vnpaide he deliuered in gage his second brother Jhon erle of Angulesme wiche was Grandfather to Fraunces afterward French kyng and sir Marcell of Bourge, sir Jhon of Samoures, sir Archebault of Uilliers and diuers other, whiche earle long continued in Englande as you shall perceiue hereafter. When this agrement was taken, the dukes of Clarence and Yorke with greate pray (ryche prisoners, and welthy hostages) came to Burdeaux makyng warre on the frontiers of Fraũce, to their greate gayne and profitable lucre. So by the onely commyng of the Englyshemen into Fraunce the duke of Orleaunce was restored not onely to peace and quietnes with al persones saue the duke of Bourgoyne: But also fell in suche fauour with the kyng and the realme, that he was of all men welbeloued, muche honoured and highly esteemed, and so continued tyll wauering Fortune turned her variable whele. For after this he beyng enemy to the Englyshe nation was vanquished and taken prysoner and so remayned in England aboue. xxiiii. yeres, tyll the flower of his age was passed or sore blemyshed.

After these greate and fortunate chaunces happened to kyng Henry, he perfightly remembryng that there could be no more prayse geuen to a Prince then to execute his office in administryng Justice whiche aboue all thyng is the very necessary minister to all people, entendyng to lyue in quietnes, beyng now deliuered of al Ciuill deuision and intestine discencion, with the whiche almoste all Christendom was infected and disturbed, not onely to the gret decay of Christes religion and Christian creatures but to the greate exaltacion of Painym princes, by the dilating of the pestiferous sect of the false counterfait prophet vaingloryous Mahumet: called a great counsaill of the thre estates of his realme, in the whiche he deliberately consulted and concluded aswell for the politique gouernaunce of his realme as also for the warre to be made against the Infidels, and especially for the recouery of the holy Citie of Jerusalem, in whiche Christian warres he entended to ende his transitory life, and for that cause he prepared a great army, and gathered muche treasure, entendyng to set forward in thesame spryng tyme. But se the chaunce, whatsoeuer man intendeth God sodainly reuerseth, what princes will, God wil not, what we thynke stable, God sodaynly maketh mutable, to the entent that Salomons saiyng might be found trewe, whiche wrote that the wysdome of men is but folishnes before God. When this Prince was thus furnyshed with treasure sufficient, with valiaunt capitaines and hardy souldiers, with tall shippes furnished with vitayles munitions and all thynges necessary for suche a iourney royall, he was taken with a sore sodayn disease and laied in his bed: whiche diseases was not Lepry stryken by the handes of God as folysh Friers before declared, for then he neither would for shame, nor for debilitie was able to enterprise so great a iourney as into Jewrie in his own person, but he was taken with a sore * Apoplexie of the whiche he languished tyll his appointed howre, and had none other grefe nor malady. During which sekenes as Auctors write he caused his crowne to be set on the pillowe at his beddes heade and sodainly x his pange so sore troubled hym that he lay as though all his vital spirites had bene from hym departed: suche chamberleins as had the cure charge of his body thinkyng hym to be departed and deade couered his face with a lynnen cloth. The prince his sonne being therof aduertised, entered into the chamber and toke away the crowne and departed: the father beyng sodaynly reuiued out of his traunce quickly perceyued the lacke of his crowne, and haupng knowledge that the prince his sonne had possessed it, caused hym to repaire to his presence, requiryng of hym for what cause he had so misused hymselfe. The prince with a good audacitie aunswered, sir to myne and all mennes iudgementes you semed xx deade in this worlde, wherefore I as your next and aparant heyre toke that as mine owne and not as yours: well fayre son saied the kyng (with a great sigh) what right I had to it and how I enioyed it God knoweth, well ye the prince if you die kyng I will haue the garland and trust too kepe it with the swerde against all mine enemies as you haue done: well said the kyng I comit al to God & remēber you to do well, and with that turned hymself in his bed & shortly after departed to God, in a chamber of the Abbottes of Westminster called Jerusalē the. xx. day of Marche in the yere of our lorde. M. iiii. C. xiii. and in the yere of his age. xl vi. whē he had reigned. xiii. yeres. v. monethes & odde daies in muche perplexitie xxx and littell pleasure, whose body with all funeral pompe was conueighed to Canterbury, and there solemply buried, leuyng behind hym by the lady Mary daughter to lord Humfrey erle of Herford & Northampton, Henry prince of Wales, Thomas duke of Clarence, Jhon duke of Bedford, Humfrey duke of Glocester, Blanche duches of Bauier, & Philip Quene of Denmarke, for by his last wyfe Quene Jane he had no children. This kyng was of a meane stature wel proporcioned and formally compact, quicke and deliuer & of a stout courage. After that he had apeased all ciuile discensions he shewed hym self so gently to all men that he gat hym more loue of the nobles in the latter daies then he had malice & yll will of them in the begynnyng. When tidynges of his death was related to the duke of Clarence beyng in Aquitayn, he with all diligent celeritie toke ship with therle of Angulesme, and other his hostages & returned into Englande to the great comfort of his brethren.

of Kyng Henry the fifth

HENRY Prince of wales, sonne and heire to kyng Hēry the.iiij. borne at Monmouth on the Riuer of Wye, after the obsequies of his noble parēt solēply celebrate and sūpteously finished, toke vpon him the high power & regiment of this realme of Englande the.xx.daye of Marche in the yere after that Christ our sauior had entered into the immaculate wōbe of the holy Virgin hys naturall mother a thousande foure hundred and.xii.and was crouned the.ix.daye of Aprill then next ensuyng, and proclaimed kyng by the name of kyng Henry the fifth. Before whiche royall possession so by hym obteyned, diuerse noble men and honorable personages did to hym homage, liege and swore dewe obeisance (whiche thyng had not been before experimēted) as to hym in whom they conceiued a good expectacion bothe of his verteous begynnynges and also of hys fortunat successe in all thynges whiche should be attempted or begonne duryng the tyme of his prosperous reigne and fortunate Empire.

THIS kyng, this man was he, whiche (accordyng to the olde Prouerbe) declared and shewed that honors ought to change maners, for incontinent after that he was stalled in the siege royall, and had receyued the croune and scepter of the famous and fortunate region, determined with hymselfe to put on the shape of a new man, and to vse another sorte of liuyng, turnyng insolencie and wyldnes into grauitie and sobernes, and wauerynge vice into constant vertue. And to thentent that he would so continue without goyng backe, & not therunto bee alluted by his familiar compaignions, with whom he had passed his young age and wanton pastime & riotous misorder (in so muche that for imprisonmente of one of his wanton mates and vnthriftie plaifaiers he strake the chiefe Justice with his fiste on the face. For whiche offence he was not onely committed to streyght prison, but also of his father put out of the preuy counsaill and banished the courte, and his brother Thomas duke of Clarence elected president of the kynges counsayll to hys great displeasure and open reproche) he therfore banished and seperated from hym all his old flatterers and familiar compaignions, (not vntewarded nor yet vnpreferred) inhibityng them vpon a greate payn not once to approche ether to his speche or presence, nor yet to lodge or soiourne within ten miles of hys courte or mansion. And in their places he elected and chose men of grauitiee, men of witte, and men of high policy, by whose wise counsayll and prudente instruccion he mighte at all tymes rule to his honor and gouerne to his profite. This prince was almost the Arabicall Phenix, and emongest his predecessors a very Paragon: For that he emongest all gouernors, chiefly did remembre that a kyng ought to bee a ruler with wit, grauitie, circumspeccion, diligence and constancie, and for that cause to haue a rule to hym comitted, not for an honor, but for an onorarius charge and daily burden, and not to looke so muche on other mennes liuynges, as to consider and remembre his owne doynges and propre actes. For whiche cause, he not to muche trusting to the readinesse of his owne witte, nor to the iudgementes of his owne wauering will, called to his counsayll suche prudent and politique personages, the whiche should not onely help to ease his charge & payn in supporting the burden of his realme and Empire, but also incense and instruct hym with suche good reasons and fruitefull persuasions, that he might shewe hymselfe a synguler mirror and manifest example of morall vertues and good qualities to his comen people and louing subiectes. For it is daily seen, that a vicious prince doth muche more hurte with his pernicious exãple to other, then to hymself by his owne peculier offence. For it is not so muche euill as Cicero sayeth (although it bee euill in it self) a prince to do euill, as he by his euyll doynges to corrupt other, because it is daily seen, that as princes change, the people altereth, and as kynges go, the subiectes folowe. For certainly he that is preferred to high authoritee, is therefore muche exalted and had in honor, that he should rule, ouersee and correct the maners and condicions of the people, and vigilantly to foresee and dayly study how to assure to hymself laude and glory, and to other profite and comodite, and not to delight in worldly pleasures whiche are commen emongest the lowest sorte of the vile and rusticall people. And he that wyll do nothyng nor can do nothyng is more worthy to be called a seruant then a ruler, & a subiect rather then a gouernor. For what can be more shame or reproche to a prince, then he whiche ought to gouerne and rule other, shall by cowardnes, slouth and ignorance as a pupille not of .viii. or .x. yeres of age, but beyng of .xx. or .xxx. yeres and more, shalbe compelled to obey and folowe the willes of other, and be ruled and beare no rule, like a ward and not lyke a gardein, like a seruant and not like a Master. Suche a gouernor was kyng Richarde the seconde, whiche of hymself beeyng not of the moste euyll disposicion, was not of so symple a mynde, nor of suche debilitie of witte, nor yet of so litle herte and corage, but he might haue demaunded and learned good and profitable counsayll, and after adupse taken, kept retayned and folowed the same: But howsoeuer it was, vnprofitable counsaylers wer his confusion and finall perdicion. Suche another ruler was kyng Edwarde the seconde, whiche two before named kynges fell from the high glory of fortunes whele two extreme misery and miserable calamitee. By whose infortunate chance (as I thynke this kyng Henry beyng admonyshed, expulsed

sed from hym his old plate felowes, his preuye Sycophantes and vngracious gard as authors and procurers of al mischiefes and riot, and assigned into their places men of grauitee, persones of actiuitee, and counsayllers of greate witte and pollicie.

AFTER that he had laied this prudent and pollctique foundacio, he entendyng in his mynd to do many noble and notable actes, and remembryng that all goodnes cometh of God, and that all worldly thynges and humayn Actes bee more weaker and poorer then the celestiall powers & heuenly rewardes, determined to begyn with some thyng pleasaunt and acceptable to God. Wherefore he fyrst commaunded the Clergie sincerley and truly to preache the worde of God and to lyue after thesame, so that they to the temporaltye might be the Lanternes of light and mirrors of vertue. The laye men he willed to serue God and obey their prince, prohibityng to them aboue all thynges breche of matrimony vse of swerying & wilfull periury, exhortyng bothe to loue together as man with wyfe or brother with brother. Besyde this he elected the best learned men in the lawes of the realme to the offices of iustice, and men of good liuyng he preferred to high degrees and aucthorite.

THE madnes of the Welshemen and Scottes (whose often incursions and robberyes he wel had in his fathers daies experimented and assated) he studied to assuage and represse, to the intent that he beeyng quiet in his owne regions, might ether make outward warre without doubte or dangier, or els for the commen wealth of his realme to study how to encreace the glory of his seignory, & so both kepe & conserue it.

VVHEN all thinges were thus settled and framed to his purpose, he caused the body of kyng Richard the second to be remoued with all funerall pompes conueniente for his estate, from Langeley to Westminster, where he was honorably enterred with Quene Anne his firste wife in a solempne toumbe erected and set vp at the costes and charges of this noble prince kyng Henry.

ALTHOVGH this prudente prince & this pollitique gouernor had set and established all thinges beyng in difference and variaunce within his owne peculier realmes, countrees and territories and confines of thesame: yet he nothyng lesse forgetting nor no one thyng more myndyng or desiryng, then the ceassyng of the long scisme and deuision sprong & continued in the catholyke church of Christian religion by the moste ambicious desire and auaricious appetite of certayn persones callyng themselfes spirituall fathers, but in deede carnall coueteours and gredy glottons aspiryng for honor and not for vertue to the proud see of Rome, desiryng more to pylle then to profite Christes flocke or Christian religion, hauyng knowledge that a generall counsayll was somoned to bee celebrate and kept at the faire citee of Constance vpon the riuer of Reyne, thought that it was not his honor nor yet his duetie, beyng thereof warned by the Emperor Sigismond to bee as a hearer and no partaker in so high a cause, and in especiall in so high an assemble. Wherefore he sent thether Richard erle of Warwike and thre bishoppes with other famous prelates and doctors, besides knightes and esquires to the numbre of eight hundred horses. They wer men so well apparcled and their horses so richely trapped, and all the compaignie so well furnished, that the Almaines wondred, the Italians gased, and all other nacions were astonned to se suche an honorable compaignie come from a countree so farre distant. At this Sinody were assembled (as one author writeth) CCC.xlvi. bishoppes, Abbotes and doctors v.C.lxiii. noble men, knightes and esquires. xvi.M. beside seruauntes whiche (not accomptyng the townes men) wer numbred. lxv.M. persones. These Ambassadours were highly receiued of the Emperor Sy- E gismond and of the Romishe bishop called Jhon the. xxiii. whiche in 24 Bee thesame counsayll for greate and abhominable crimes and detestable hunc. 29 offences by hym perpetrated and comitted (of the whiche he could not pourge hymselt nor make any defence) was by thesame Sinody accor-dyng to his demerites put doune, and of his estate depriued. Gregory the. xii. was one of the Scismatical numbre, fearyng shame more then regardyng his worldly affeccion did putte doune hymselt of his owne propre mocion from his foolishe vsurped name and Popishe dignitee.

But Benedict the. xiii. still and stifly affirmyng hym selt to be the very Viker of God, so muche desired honor, and so muche was wrapped in xx his owne folishe and fantasticall opinion, that no frend could perswade hym, nor argumēt entice hym, nor no reason refrayn hym from thesame, and so accordyng to his desert by open iudgement, agaynst his wil, lost bothe name and honestie. And thre yeres after Otho Columbe a noble Romaine borne was elected to the bishopricke of Rome and named Martyne the fift.

IN this coūsaill Jhon Wicliffe borne in England, and Jhon Husse and Jherom of Prage wer condēpned to death. During this firste yere, sir Jhon Old Castle, whiche by his wyfe was called lorde Cobham, a valiaunt capitain and an hardy gentelman, was accused to the Archbi- xxx shop of Caunturbury of certayn poynctes of heresy. Whiche bishoppe knowyng hym to be highly in the kynges fauor, declared to his highnes the whole accusacion. The kyng first hauing compassion of the noble man, required the prelates that if he were a strayed shepe, rather by gentelnes then by rigoure to reduce hym to his olde flocke. After that he sendyng for hym, godly exhorted and louyngly admonished hym to reconcile hymselt to God and his lawes. The lorde Cobham not onely thanked the kyng of his moste fauorable clemencye, but also declared firste to hym by mouthe and afterwarde by writyng the foundacion of his faith, the ground of his belefe and the botome of his stomacke, af- xl firmyng his grace to be his supreme hed and competent iudge & none other persone, offeryng an hundred knyghtes and esquyres to come to his purgaciō, or els to fight in open listes with his accusors. The kyng not onely knowyng the lawes of the realme, but also perswaded by his counsaill

counsayll,that hereticall accusations ought to be tried by the spirituall pzelates,sente hym to the tower of London there to abide the determi= nacion of the clergie accozdyng to the statutes in and foz that cace pzo= uyded. After whiche tyme the.xxiii.daye of Septembze, a solempne ses= sion was appoyncted in the Cathedzall churche of saincte Paule,and a= nother the.xxv.daye of the said moneth in the hal of the Frierꝭ pzechers in London,in whiche places thesayed lozde was examined,apposed and fully heard,& in conclusion by the Archbyschop denounced an hereticke and so remitted agayn to the toure of London: Frō whiche place,either x by help of frendes oz coztupcion of kepers, he pzeuely escaped and cam into Wales,where he remayned by the space of thze yeres and moze.

AFTER this tyme in a certayn vnlawfull assemble was taken sir Robert Acton knight,a man of greate wit & possessions, Jhon Bzoune Esquire, Jhon Beuerley clerke and a greate numbze of other whiche were bzought to the kynges pzesence, and to hym declared the cause of their commocion and risyng: and accused a greate numbze of their sozt good conclusion. The effect of whiche supplicacion was, that the temporall landes deuoutely geué, and disordinatly spent by religious and other spirituall persones, might suffise to mayntayn to the honor of the kyng and defence of the realme, xv. erles, xv. C. knightes. vi. M. ii. C. esquires, and. C. almose houses for relief onely of the poore impotente and nedy persones, and the kyng to haue clerely to his cofers twentie thousande pounds, with many other prouisions and valewes of religious houses whiche I ouerpasse.

THIS before remembred bill was muche noted and feared emõgest the religious sort whom in effect it muche touched, in so muche that the fat Abbotes swet, the proude Priors frouned, the poore Friers cursted the sely Nonnes wept, and al together wer nothyng pleased nor yet cõtent. Now to finde a remedy for a mischief and a tent to stop a wounde, the Clergy mynding rather to bowe then breake, a greed to offre to the kyng a greate some of money to staye this newe moued demaund. The cause of this offre semed to some of the wise prelates nether decente nor conuenient; for they well forsawe and perfightly knewe that yf the commõs perceiued that they by reward or offre of money would resist their request & petició, that thei stirred & moued with a fury would not onely cayle and despise theim as corruptours of Princes and enemyes of the publique wealthe, but would so crye and call on the kyng and his temporall lordes that they were lyke to lese bothe worke and oyle, cost and liuyng: Wherfore they determined to cast all chaunces whiche might serue their purpose, & in especiall to replenishe the kynges brayne with some pleasante study that he should nether phantasy nor regard the serious petition of the importunate commons.

VVHERFORE on a daie whẽ the king was present in the parliament, Henry Chicheley Archebishop of Caũturbury therto newly preferred, whiche beforetime had been a Monke of the Carthusians, a man whiche had professed wilfull pouertie in religion, and yet commyng abrode muche desired honor, & a man muche regardyng Godes law, but more louyng his owne lucre. After lowe obeysaunce made to the kyng he sayd after this maner in effect. Whẽ I consider our most entierly beloued and no lesse drad souereygne lorde & naturall Prince, the louyng mynd, the daily labor and continuall study whiche you incessantly imploye bothe for thaduancemẽt of the honor of your realme and also profite of your people: I cannot nor ought not, except I would bee noted not onely ingrate to your royall person beyng my patrone & preferrer, but also a neglecter of my dutye, a secrete mummer of suche thynges whiche touche both the inheritance of your croune & the honor of your realme ether holde my peace or kepe silence. For all authors agree that the glory of kynges consisteth not onely in high bloud and haute progeny, not in habundant riches and superfluous substaunce, nor in plesant pastyme & ioyous solace: But the very tipe of the magnificence of a prince resteth in populous riche regiõs, wealthy subiectes & beautiful

In whiche realme, to reherse what noble persons, what beautifull cities, what fertile regions, what substancial marchantes, and what plentifull riuers are conteigned and included, I assure you that tyme should rather fayle then matter shoulde wax skant. The fraudulent Frenchmen to defraude and take away your tyght and title to the realme of Fraunce, in the tyme of your noble progenitor kyng Edward the thirde, alledged a lawe, vntruly fayned, falcely glosed and Sophistically expounded, wherof the very wordes are these, In terram salicam mulieres ne succedant, which is to say, let not womē succede in the xi land *Salicque. This land Salicque the deceitful glosers name to be the realme of Fraunce. This lawe the Logicall interpretouts assigne to directe the croune and regalitie of thesame region, as who would say that to that preheminente no woman were hable to aspire, nor no heire Female was worthy to inherite. The French writers affirm that Pharamond kyng of the Frenche Gaules, first instituted this lawe which neuer was, should or might be broken. See nowe howe an euell glose confoundeth the text, and a perciall interpretour marreth the sentence, for first it is apparantly knowen and by an hundred writers confirmed that Pharamond whom they alledge to be aucthour of this lawe was xxx duke of Francouia in Germany, and elected to be kyng of the Sicambres, whiche callyng them selfes Frenchmen had gotten a parte of the Gaule Celtike betwene the riuers of Marne and Seyn. This Pharamond diseased in the yere of our Lord. iiii. C. and, xxvi. long after whose death, Charles the great beyng Emperoure and many yeres makyng warre on the Saxons dyd in bludy battaile disperse and confounde the whole puissaunce of that nation in the yere of our Lord. viii. C. and fiue, and broughte them to the catholique faith and christian conformitie. After whiche victory certayne souldiers as the Frenche Cronographiers affirm, passed ouer the water of Sala and there inhabited, xl betwene the riuers of Elue and Sala, and wer commonly called Salt Frenchemen or saly Gaules, whiche countrey nowe is the lande of Misnie. This people had suche displeasure at the vnhoneft fashions of the Germain women, that they made a law that the Females shuld not succede to any inheritaunce within that land.

you shall easily perceyue that the lawe Salicque was only fayned and inuented to put yout noble progenitours and you from your lawfull ryght and true inheritaunce. For they saye that Pharamond made the lawe for the land Salicque, whiche the glose calleth Fraunce. Then I demaunde of master Gloser or rather master Doctor commenter, yf I may call a commenter an open lyer, whether Pharamond whiche died iiii.C.xxi.yeres before the Frenchemen possessed the Gaule Salicque and neuer sawe or knewe it, made a lawe of that thyng whiche at that tyme was not his nor inhabited by his people. Beside this, the realme of Fraunce whiche is your patrimony is compact of.iii. Gaules, Belgique, Celtique and Aquitayn, and no part of Salicque: then may the gloser expounde aswell that Gaule Belgique is the countrey of Bryttayn, as to glose that the lande Salicque is the whole realme and dominion of the croune of Fraunce. Wonder it is to see how the Frenchmen Juggle with this phantasticall lawe, folowyng the crafty hasarders which vse a play called seest thou me or seest thou me not. For whē kyng Pepyn whiche was Duke of Brabante by his mother Begga, and Master of the palayce of Fraunce coueted the croune and scepter of the realme, the Frenche nacion not remembryng this infringible lawe, deposed Chylderyck the.iii. the very heyre male and vndoubted chylde of the line of Pharamond and Clouis kynges of Fraunce by the counsayll of Zachary then Bishop of Rome, and set vp in trone thys Pepyn as nexte heyre generall discended of lady Blithyld doughter to kyng Clothayre the first. Hugh Capet also whiche vsurped the croune without ryght or reason on Charles duke of Lorayne the sole heyre male of the lyne and stocke of Charles the greate, after that he had shamefully murthered and in pitifull prison by the procurement of the Bysshop of Orleaunce destroied the sayd Charles, to make hys title seme true and apere good, where in dede it was bothe euell and vntrue, to blynd the opinions of the common people and to set a glasse before their éies, conueyghed hym selfe as heyre to the lady Lyngard doughter to the kyng Charlemayne sonne to Lewes the Emperor whiche was sonne to Charles the great kyng of Fraunce. Kyng Lewes also the ninth whome the Frenchmen call Sainct Lewes beyng very heyre to thesayed vsurper Hugh Capet, coulde neuer be satisfied in hys conscience howe he might iustely kepe and possesse the croune & regalitye of the realme of Fraunce tyll he was perswaded and fully instructed that Quene Isabell hys graundmother was lineally descended of Lady Ermengard daughter & heyre to the aboue named Charles duke of Lorayn, by the foresayed Hugh Capet of lyfe and realme wrongfully deprsyued: by the which mariage the bludde and line of kyng Charles the great was agayne vnited and restored to the Croune and Scepter of Fraunce, so that it more clearer then the sonne, openly appeareth the title of Kyng Pepyn, the clayme of Hugh Capet, the possession of kyng Lewes, ye and of all the French kynges to this day, are deriued, claymed and conueighed from

the heyre Female, and yet they would barre you as though your great graundmother had bene no woman nor heyre female, but a painted Image or fained shadowe. If so many examples, yf suche copie of preydentes collected out of your owne historyes and gathered oute of your owne writers suffice not to confounde your symple Salicque lawe inuented by false fablers and crafty ymaginers of you fablyng French menne, then here what God sayeth in the boke of Numeri. When a man dieth withoute a sonne, let the inheritance discend to the daughter: If your princes call theim selfes most Christian kynges, let theim folowe the lawe of God before the lawe of the Paynym Pharamond.

Are not all lawes discrepant from Goddes lawes euell, and to al Christen eares odious and noysome? Are Frenche women dyscended of the blud royall no Christians, and not worthye to inherite in the realme of Fraunce? Is the realme of Fraunce more noble then the kyngdome of Juda of whom Christ discended by a woman? When God sayed to Abrahaam that in one of his sede all nacions shuld be blessed, how came Christ of the seede of Abrahaam but onely by that immaculate Virgin his glorious mother? Likewyse, when the Prophet Michee sayd, thou tribe of Juda art not the leaste of estimacion emongest the Princes of xx Juda, for oute of the shall come a capitayne whiche shall rule and direct my people of Israell. Howe discended Christ from the rote of Jesse, and howe was he duke and capitayn of the Israelites, and how discended he of the line of Dauid: But onely by his mother a pure virgin and a maried wyfe. Beholde, by goddes lawe, women shall inherite Behold in Fraunce, Frenchemen haue inherited by the onely lyne of the women, and yet Englishmen be prohibited to claime by the heyre Female contrary to the lawe of God and man. Wherfore regarde well my souereygne Lord your iust and true title to the realme of Fraunce, by Goddes lawe and mannes lawe to you lawfully dyuoluted as very xxx heire to Quene Isabell your great graundmother daughter to kyng Philip the faire and suster and heir to.iii. kynges diseasyng without any issue. Whiche inheritaunce of the woman is declared to be iuste by the Mosaicall lawe and vsed and approued by the Gallican discent as I haue before declared. Therfore for Goddes sake leese not youre patrimony, disherite not your heires, dishonour not your selfe, diminische not your title, whiche your noble progenitors so highly haue esteemed, Wherfore auaunce forth your banner, fight for your ryghte, conquere your inheritaunce, spare not swerde, blud, or fire, your warre is iuste, your cause is good, and your claim true: and therfore couragiously set xl forward your warre agaynst your enemyes. And to the entent that we your louyng chapleins and obedient subiectes of the spiritualtie would shewe our selfes willyng and desiryng to ayde you for the recouery of your auncient right and true title to the croune of Fraunce, we haue in our spirituall conuocacion graunted to your highnes suche a some of money as neuer by no spirituall persons was to any prince before your daies geuen or aduaunced, beside our daily praiers and continual precacions to God and his saintes for prosperus successe to ensue in your mercial exployte and royall passage. When the Archebishop had finished his prepared purpose, Raufe Erle of Westmerland, a man of no lesse grauitie then experience, and of no more experience then stomack, whiche was then high Warden of the marches toward Scotland, and therfore thinkyng that yf the kyng shuld passe ouer into Fraunce with his whole puissaunce, that his power should be to weake to withstand the strength of Scotland if they shuld inuade durying the kynges absence. Wherfore he rose vp, & making hys obeysance to the kyng sayd.

SVRELY sir, as my lord of Canterbury hath clerkely declared, the conquest of Fraunce is very honorable, and when it is gotten and obteigned very profitable and pleasant: But sauyng your graces reformacion, I say and affirme, that to conquere Scotland is more necessary, more apparante easie, and more profitable to this realme then is the gayne of Fraunce. For althoughe I am not so well learned as my lord Archbishop is, nor haue not proceded to degre in the Vniuersitie, yet I haue red, and heard great clarckes say, that strengthe knitte and combined together is of more force and efficacye then when it is seuered and dispersed. As for an example, sprinkle a vessell of water and it moisteth not, but cast it out wholy together and it bothe washeth and norisheth. This notable saiyng before this tyme hath encoraged Emperors, animated kynges and allured princes to conquere realmes to them adioynyng, to vanquyshe nacions to their dominions adiacent, and to subdewe people either necessary for their purpose, or beyng to thē daily enemyes or continuall aduersaries. For proofe whereof, beholde what was the chefe cause and occasion why rulers and gouernours so fore laboured, thirsted and coueted to bryng all regions to theim adioynyng into one rule or Monarchy? Was it not done to this entent that the conquerors might haue the onely power & entier gubernacion of all the landes and people within their climate, and gouerne thē in tyme of peace and also haue their aide in tyme of war? Whiche monarchie was of that mateistie and estimacion in the world, that no other forein prince or exterior potentate ether had audacitie or was able to attempte any thyng within the territory or region of the monarchiall prince and adourned kyng. Let the kyngdome of the assiriens be your example, and yf that suffise not, then loke on the Persians, after on the Grekes and lastly on the Romaines, whiche euer desired and coueted more to haue the littel Isle of Scicile, the territory of the Numidians and the mean Citie of the Samnites beyng daiely within their kennyng and smell, rather then to obteyn populous Gaule, plenteous Pannony, or manly Macedony lying farre from sight and out of their circle or compasse. This desire semeth to rise of a great prudent and vigilante policy, for as a prince is of more puissaunce when his countreis ioyne, so is he of more strength when his power is at hande. And as men lackyng com-

foyte be moze releued by frendes whiche be preſente, then by kinſfolke dwelling in forein coũtreys & regiõs farre of. So pꝛinces haue cõmonly coueted and euer deſired to ſe and beholde their dominions lyng nere about them, rather then to here by repoꝛte from the countreis farre diſtant from them. If this hathe bene the pollicy of conquerours, thappetite of purchaſers and the ſtudy of gouerners, why doth your grace deſire Fraunce before Scotlande, oꝛ couet a countrey farre from your ſight, before a realme vnder your noſe? Do you not remember how the hole Iſle of Britayn was one entier Monarchi in the time of your noble auncetoꝛ kyng Brute firſt kyng and rulet of your famous Empire and glorious region: whiche deuidyng his realme to his thꝛe ſonnes gaue to Lothꝛyne his eldeſt ſonne that part of Britayn that your highnes now enioyeth, and to Albanact his ſecond ſonne he gaue the countrey of Albany nowe called Scotland, and to Camber his third ſonne he gaue the countrey of Cambꝛia nowe called Wales: reſeruyng alwaies to him & his heyꝛes homage, lege and feaultie totall foꝛ the ſame countreis and dominions. By this deuiſiõ, the glozy of the monarchie of Britayne was clerely defaced, by this ſeperacion the ſtrength of the Britiſhe kynges was foꝛe diminiſhed, by this diſperſion inteſtine war began, and Ciuill rebellion ſpꝛange firſt within this region. Foꝛ while all was vnder one, no nation durſte either once inuade oꝛ attempte warre agaynſt the Britons: but when the land was once deuided and the monarchie vndone, outward enemitie oꝛ foꝛeyn hoſtilitie not halfe ſo muche infeſted, greued oꝛ troubled the valiaunt Brittons as their owne neighboures diſcended of one parent, and come of one pꝛogeny. Foꝛ the Albanactes otherwiſe called the falſe fraudulent Scottes, and the Cambers otherwyſe called the vnſtable Welſhemen, did not a lonly withdꝛawe their fealtie, denie their homage, and refuſe their allegiance due to the kynges of this realme, but alſo made continuall warre and deſtroied their tounes and ſlewe the people of their neyghboures and Britons. Foꝛ whiche cauſe, diuerſe of your noble pꝛogenitoures haue not onely made warre and ſubdewed the Scottes foꝛ the denying of their homage and ſtirryng of rebellion, but alſo haue depoſed their kynges & pꝛinces and erected and ſet vp other in their eſtates and dignities. Seater kyng of Scottes, foꝛ his rebellion was by Dunwallo Molumeius your noble pꝛedeceſſoꝛ ſlayn and extincted. Kyng Arthure alſo the Glozy of the Brittons erected Angoſile to the ſcepter of Scotland and receaued of hym homage and fealtie. Yf I ſhuld reherſe how many kynges of Scotland haue done homage to your auncient pꝛedeceſſoꝛs, oꝛ reherſe howe many Scottiſhe kynges they haue coꝛrected and puniſhed foꝛ their diſobedience and denying of homage, oꝛ declare what kynges they as ſuperioꝛ loꝛdes and high Emperoures ouer the vnderkinges of Scotland, haue elected & made rulers to thentent that all people might manifeſtly perceiue that it was moꝛe glorious, moꝛe honourable and moꝛe famous to a kyng to make a kyng then to be a kyng by natural discent, I assure you, your eares woulde be more wery of hearyng, then my tounge would be fatigate with open truth tellyng. Your noble progenitour kyng Edward the firste couetyng to be superior and to surmount in honour, or at the least to be equiuolent in fame with his noble ancestours and famous progenitors, daily studied and hourely compassed howe to bryng the whole Isle of Britteygne whiche by Brute was deuided into thre partes into one monarchy and one dominion. After longe studie and greate consultacion had, he subdewed Wales, and tamed the wylde people and broughte that vnruly parte to hys olde home and auncient degree, whiche thyng done he likewyse inuaded Scotlande and conquered the countreye to the towne of Perche called Sainte Jhons towne standyng on the ryuer of Tay, whiche he walled, diched and fortefied, rulyng that part with Englishe lawes, Englyshe customes and by Englishe Judges, and was all moste at a poynte thereof to haue made a perfighte conqueste and a complete Monarchie. But Oh Lorde, hasty deathe whiche maketh an ende of all mortall creatures, sodeynly bereste hym of hys lyfe and toke a waye his spirite, and so all thynges whiche he had deuysed, whiche he had ymagened and seriously pretended, the small momente of an houre turned vpside doune and sodaynly subuerted. Sith whose deathe your greate Graundfather, ye and your noble father haue attempted to bryng that runnegate region into hys auncient course and former lyne, as a thyng bothe necessary, conueniente and mete to bee ioyned and vnited to this realme, and so not only to reuiue the old empire and famous Monarchye, but also to vnite and cõbine that vertue and strẽgth whiche from the tyme of Brute was dispersed and seuered, in one body, in one hed and one corporacion. Wherfore, if to your high wisedome it seemeth not necessary takyng this terme necessary for nedefull to conquere the realme of Scotlande as a thyng that nedes muste be doen, yet will I not flye from my first saiyng, but proue it necessary (as the logicall paraphrasian and Philosophicall interpreters) do by a distinccion expounde this terme necessary to signifie a thyng conuenient: That the conquest in Scotlande before the inuadyng of Fraunce is moste expedient, for experience teacheth and reason agreeth that euery persone entẽdyng a purposed enterprice, or a determinate voyage should not onely prouide and make preparacion for al thinges requisite and nedefull for his purpose or exployte, but also ought vigilauntly to forsee with * Lincis yes, and preuẽt and study with the serpentyne policie how to auoyde and refell all thynges whiche might ether bee an impediment to his progression and settyng forward or occasion of his returne and losse of his enterprise, least he leuyng behynd hym an euill neighbour, a continuall aduersary & a secrete enemye, maye assone lese his owne propre realme, as conquere and gayne the dominion of another: wherfore the trite and common adage saith, leaue not the certayn for the vncerteyn. Wherefore it is necessary that I enucleate and open to you certain articles cõteined in the old league and amitie betwene the realmes of Fraunce and Scotlande, wherof the wordes be these.

THE warre or iniurie moued or done by the Englishemen to one of the said nacions, to be as a common wrong to bothe.

IF the Englyshemen make warre on the Frenche nacion, then the Scottes at the costes and charges of the Frenche kyng, shall ministre to theim succours.

LIKEVVYSE if the Scottes be molested by the Englysh warres, the Frenche nacion hauing their costes allowed, shall be to theim ayders & assisters.

AND that none of bothe the nacions shall either contracte or make peace with the realme of England without the consente and agrement of the other.

AND to thentent that this league and amitie should be kept inuiolate Robert le Bruse the vsurper of Scotlande willed by his testament twoo thynges in especiall to be obserued, the one, neuer to breake the treatie concluded with Fraunce: The second neuer to kepe peace or promes with Englishemen lenger then the kepyng therof were to theim either profitable or necessary. Yet Jhon Mayer and other Scottysh wryters coloure this cause, sayyng that he would haue no peace concluded with Englande aboue thre yeres. But whatsoeuer writers write or talkers saye, they be to hym moste faythfull executors and haue neuer yet broken his testament but daily kepe his precept and commaundement. And for the perfourmaunce of this wyl and kepyng of this league, none of your auncetours euer inuaded Fraunce, but incontinent the Scottes troubled and vexed Englande. None of your progenitors euer passed the sea in iust quarell against the Frenche nacion, but the Scottishe people in their absence entered your realme, spoyled your houses, slewe your people and toke great praies innumerable, only to prouoke your auncestors for to returne from the inuading of Fraũce. If I should declare to you their comen breakyng of leagues, their craftie and subtyll dissimulacion, their false faire promises often sworne and neuer kept, I doubt not but you would ten tymes more abhorre their doyng, then I would bee ashamed of the tellyng. Therefore I saye still, and affirme it necessary and conuenient to forese, that you leaue noenemies behynd at your backe when you go to conquere aduersaries before your face. Besyde this, if you cõsider the dayly charges &, the inconstant chances that maie happen, I thynke, yea and litle doubte but Scotlande shalbee tamed before Fraunce shalbe framed. For if you will inuade Fraunce, accompt what number of shyppes must transporte your armie, recon what charge of Ancors, what a multitude of Cables, and what innumerable thynges appertaigne to a naule. When you be there, if your men decay by sycknes or by sworde, if vitaill faile, or if money waxe skante, if the wynde turne contrary or an hideous tempeste aryse, you shall bee destitute of aide, prouision and treasure, which in a straunge region are the cõfusion & defacyng of an armie. On the other syde, if you inuade Scotlande, your men bee at hande, your vitaill is nere, your aide is euer at your backe, so that in that voyage you shall haue haboundance in all thynges, and of nothyng you shall haue wante. See what an occasion fortune hath offered vnto you, is not their kyng your captiue and prisoner? Is not the realme in greate deuision for the crueltie of the duke of Albany, rather desiring to haue a forain gouernour, then a naturall tyraunt. Wherfore my counsayll is, firste to inuade Scotlande, and by Gods grace to conquere and ioyne that region to youre Empire, and to restore the renoumed Monarchy of Britayn to her old estate and preheminence, and so beautified with realmes and furnished with people, to entre into Fraunce for the recouerynge of your righteous title and true inheritaunce, in obseruing the old auncient prouerbe vsed by our forfathers, whiche saieth, he that will Fraunce wynne, muste with Scotland first beginne.

NOw the Duke of Excester vncle to the kyng, (whiche was well learned, and sent into Italy by his father entendyng to haue bene a prieste) he that wyll Scotland wynne, let hym with Fraunce first begin. For if you call to remembraunce the common saiyng of the wyse and expert Phisicions, whiche bothe write and teache, that if you will heale a malady you muste firste remoue the cause: If you wyll cure a sore, you muste firste take awaie the humour that fedeth the place: If you wil destroye a plante, plucke away his sap whiche is his norisshyng and lyfe. Then if Fraunce be the norysshar of Scotlande, if the Frenche pencios be the sustainers of the Scottishe Nobilitee, if the education of Scottes in Fraunce be the cause of practise and pollicie in Scotlande, then plucke away Fraunce and the courage of the nobles of Scotlande shal be sone daunted and appalled: Take away Fraunce and the hertes of the comen people wil sone decay and waxe faint: Plucke away Fraunce and neuer looke that Scotlande wyll resiste or withstande your power. For when the hed is gone, the body sone falleth, and when the sap fayleth the tree sone withereth. Let men reade the Chronicles and peruse our Englyshe Chronographiers, & you shall sone fynde that the Scottes haue seldom of their owne mocion inuaded or vexed Englande, but onely for the obseruyng of the league in the whiche they bee bounde to Fraunce: For the Scottes are the shaft and dart of the Frenchemen to shote and cast at their pleasure against the Englishe nacion. And where they haue inuaded, as I can not deny but they haue done, what glory or what profite succeded of their enterprice, I reporte me to their peculier histories. kyng Malcolyn inuaded Englande, when kyng Willyam the second was makyng warre in Normandy. Dauid le Bruse also entered Englande, your greate graundfather kyng Edwarde the third lyng at the siege of Caleis. Was not Malcolyn slayne beside Tinmouth and kyng Dauid taken besyde Durham. Let the gouernours of Scotlande, (for the kyng is sure ynough) entre into Englande on that price

and se what he shall gaine therby. What notable acte were Scottes e-uer able to do out of their awne countrey and propre climate? Or when were they able to conueigh an armie ouer the sea at their awne costes & expentes? Rede their awne historyes and you shall fynde fewe or none.
Their nature and condicion is to tary at home in idlenes, ready to defende their countrey like brute beastes, thinkyng their rusticall fassion to be high honestie, and their beggerly liuyng to be a welfare. Besyde this, what auncient writer or autentike historyographier ether write of them honoure or once nameth theim, except saiuct Jherom, whiche saieth x that when he was yong, he sawe in Fraunce certain Scottes of the isle of Britayne eate the flesshe of men, and when they came into the woodes findyng there greate heardes of beastes and flockes of shepe, lefte the beastes and cut of the buttockes of the heardmen and the pappes and brestes of the shepehardes women, extemyng this meate to be the greatest deinties: And Sabellicus saieth that Scottes muche delighte and reioyse in liyng. You may nowe apparauntly perceiue what puissaunce Scotland is of it selfe, litle able to defende and lesse able to inuade lyke a noune adiectiue that cannot stand without a substantiue. If Fraunce be taken from them, of whom shall they seke aide? Denmarke will them xx refuse because the kyng is your brother inlawe: Portyngall and Castell will not them regarde, bothe the kynges beyng your cosyns germayn and auntes sonnes: Italy is to farre: Germany and Hungary be with you in league. So that of necessitie they in cõclusion destitute of al aide, depriued of all succoure, bereued of al frendship (if Fraunce be conquered) muste without warre or dent of swoorde come vnder your subiection and due obeisaunce. And yet I would not in this your conquest, Fraũce should bee so muche mynded, that Scotlande should bee forgotten, nor that your entier power shoulde be sent into Fraunce and no defence left againlt the inuasions of Scotlande. For of that might ensue this mis-xxx chief, that if your whole power were banquished in Fraunce, the Scottes beyng elated by the victory of their frendes myght do more displeasure to your realme in one yere then you should recouer againe in fyue.
But sithe God hath sent you people, ryches, munitions of warre and all thynges necessary, either to inuade bothe, or defende the one and penetrate the other. Passe the sea your selfe with an armie royall, and leue my Lorde of Westmerlande and other graue Capitaynes of the Northe with a conuenient nombre to defende the Marches if the subtill Scottes encouraged by the Frenchemen will any thing attempt during your voyage and absence. And this is to be remembred, if you get Scotland xl you haue a countrey barayne almoste of all pleasure and goodnes, you gayne people sauage, wauerynge & inconstant, of ryches you shall haue litle and of pouertie muche: But if you get Fraunce, you shall haue a countrey fertyle, pleasaunt and plentifull, you shall haue people, Ciuill, witty and of good ordre. You shall haue ryche cities, beautifull townes innumerable Castles, xxiiii. puyssaunt Duchies, lxxx. and odde populous Countreys, and an hundred and three famous Bysshoprickes, a thousand and more fat Monasteries, and parish churches (as the Frenche writers affirme) x. hundred thousande and mo. This conquest is honourable, this gayne is profitable, this iourney is plesaunte, and therefore neither to be left nor forsaked. Vntaill you shall haue sufficient frō Flaunders, aide of men you may haue dayly out of Englande, or els to leaue a competente crewe in the Marches of Caleis to refreshe your armie and to furnishe still your nūber. Although the cost in transportyng your men be greate, yet your gayne shalbe greater, and therfore accordyng to the trite adage, he muste liberally spende that will plentefully gayne. And because my lorde of Westmerlande hath alleged that the Romaines desired the dominion of suche as were vnderflight of their owne Egle, or whose possessions were a mote to their eye, as the Numidians and other whiche he hath wisely rehersed. Behold the condicions of the counsailers and the desire of the mouers, what persones were thei whiche coueted their poore neighbours rather then riche forreines: Men effeminate, more mete for a Carpet then a Campe, men of a weake stomacke desiring rather to walke in a plesaunt garden then passe the seas in a tempestuous storme, what should I saye: Menne that woulde haue somewhat and yet take litell paine, menne that coueted thynges noxthyng honourable nor yet greatly profytable. But I remember that the noble Cato the Censor which when it was alledged in the Senate at Rome that Affrike was farre of, and the Sea brode, and the iourney perillous, caused certayne newe figges to bee brought into the Senate, whiche grewe in the territory of Carthage, and demaunded of the Senators howe they lyked the Fygges: Some sayed they were newe, some saied they were swete and some saied they were plesaunt. Oh quod Cato, if they be newe gathered, then is not the region farof where they grewe (skant thre daies sailyng) and if it be of no longer distaunce then so nere to vs be oure enemies. If the Fygges be swete, then is the xxxsoile delicious and fertile. If the figges be plesaunt, then is the countrey profytable. If you gayne the Sicilians, you shall bee ryche men in corne. If you get the Samnites you shall haue plenty of oyle. If you vanquisshe the Numidians, you shall haue copie of beastes: But subdewe Carthage and conquere Affricke, you shall haue not onely Corne Oyle and Beastes, but gold, purple, precious stones, Oliphantes and all thynges bothe necessary and plesaunt. Therfore my counsaill is rather to seke riches beyng farre distant, then pouertie lyng at hande, for payne is forgotten euer where gayne foloweth. This noble saiyng of sage Cato so encouraged and inflamed the haute hartes and lusty courages of the manly Romaines, that they neuer desisted to persecute the people of Affricke tyll Carthage was vtterly destroied and the whole countrey subdewed and brought vnder the Romaine Empire. Julius Cesar also desyred rather to conquere the Britons deuided from the continent, ye and inhabityng almost in the ende of the worlde, rather then xl to gayne the Pannonians adioynyng to Italy, saiyng breake the stronger and the weaker will bowe: Subdoue the riche and the poore wil yeld be lorde of the lordes and the vassalles must nedes be subiect, vanquish the Frenchemen and the Scottes be tamed. This counsayll of Cato, and this saiyng of Cesar maketh me bothe to speake and thynke that yf you get Fraunce, ye get twoo, and if you get Scotland you get but one. When the duke had saied and sat doune, his opinion was muche noted and well digested with the kyng, but in especiall with his three brethren and diuerse other lordes beyng young and lusty, desirous to win honor and profite in the realme of Fraunce, ensuyng the courageous actes of their noble progenitors, whiche gat in that region bothe honour and renoune. So that now all men cried warre, warre, Fraunce, Fraunce, and the bill put into the parliament for desoluyng of religious houses was clerely forgotten and buried, and nothyng thoughte on but onely the recouveryng of Fraunce according to the title by the Archebyshoppe declared and set furth. And so vpon this poinct after a fewe Actes for the publike wealth of the realme condiscended and agreed, the parliamẽt was prorogued to Westminster.

THE kyng like a wise prince and pollitique gouernour, entending to observe the auncient ordres of famous kynges and renoumed potentates vsed aswell emong Paynimes as Christians, whiche is, not to inuade another mannes territory with open warre and the cause of thesame not to hym published and declared, dispatched into Fraũce his vncle the duke of Excester and the erle of Dorcet, the lorde Grey Admirall of Englande, the Archebyshop of Deuelyn, the byshop of Norwiche with fyue hundred horsse, whiche were lodged in the Temple hous in Paris, kepyng suche triumphante chere in their lodgyng, and suche a solempne estate in ridyng through the citie, that the Parisians and all the Frenche men had no small meruell at their honourable fassions and lordly behaviours. The French kyng receiued them very honourably, and sumptuously banquetted them, shewing to them goodly iustes and martial pastymes, by the space of thre daies together, in the whiche iustes the kyng himselfe to shewe his courage and actiuitie to the Englishemen, manfully brake speres and lustely turneyed.

WHEN this greate triumphe and martiall disport was finished, the Englishe Ambassadours according to their commission, required of the French kyng to deliuer to the kyng of England the realme and croune of Fraunce with the entier Duchies of Aquitain, Normandy and Anjowe, with the countreys of Poytieu and Mayne and diuerse other requestes, offeryng that if the Frenche kyng would without warre or effusion of Christen bloud rendre to the kyng their Master his very ryghte and lawfull inheritaunce, that he would be content to take in mariage the lady Katheryne daughter to the Frenche kyng & to endewe her with all the duchie and countreis before rehersed. And if he entended not so to doo, then the kyng of Englande dyd expresse and signifie to hym that with the aide of God and help of his people he would recouer his right and inheritaunce wrongfully with holden with mortall warre and dent of sworde. The Frenchemen were muche abalshed at these demaundes thynkyng them very vnreasonable and farre excessiue, and yet not wyllyng to make any determinate aunswere till they had farther brethed in so weighty a cause, praied the Englysh Ambassadors to saie to the kyng their master that thei now hauing no opportunite to conclude in so hie a matter would shortly send Ambassadours into Englande which should certefie & declare to the kyng their whole mynde, purpose and aunswere.

parted into Englande makyng relacion of euery thyng that was sayed or done: Here I ouerpasse howe some writers saye that the Dolphyn thynkyng kyng Henry to be geuen still to suche plaies and lyght folyes as he exercised & vsed before the tyme that he was exalted to the croune sent to hym a tunne of tennis balles to playe with, as who saied that he could better skill of tennis then of warre, and was more expert in lyght games then marciall pollicy. Whether he were moued with this vnwise presente, or espying that the Frenchemen dalied and vaynely delayed his purpose and demaunde, was moued and pricked forwarde I cannot iudge, but sure it is that after the returne of his Ambassadours, he be- ꝑ gyng of a haute courage and bold stomake, lyuyng now in the pleasauntest tyme of his age, muche desyrying to enlarge and dilate his Empyre and dominion, determined fully to make warre in Fraunce, conceiuyng a good truste and a perfight hope in this poynct whiche he had before experimented, whiche is, that victory for the moste part foloweth where right leadeth, auaunced forwarde by Justice and sette furth by equitie. And because many Frenchemen were promoted to Ecclesiastitall dignities, some to benefices, some to Abbeies and Priores within his realme and sent dayly innumerable somes of money into Fraunce for the relefe and ayde of their naturall countremen and lineall kynsmen, he therfore ꝑ for the publique wealth of his realme and subiectes, ordeigned that no straunger hereafter, should bee promoted to any spirituall dignitee or degree within his realme without his especiall licence and royall consent, and that all they that should so be admitted, should fynde sufficient suretie not to disclose the secretes of this realme to any forain or straũge person, nor also to minister to them any aide or succour with money or by any other meane. Beside this he assembled a great puissaũce and gathered a greate hoste through all his dominions, and for the more furny-ture of his naute, he sent into Holand, Zeland and Ftizeland to conduct and hire shippes for the transporting and conueighyng ouer hys men ꝑ and munitions of warre, and finally prouided for armure, vitaile, money, artillary, carriages, tentes and other thinges necessary for so hie an enterprise: Whiche prouisions were sone blowen into Fraunce & quickly knowen in Paris. Wherefore the Dolphin who had taken on him the gouernaunce of the realme, because his father was fallen again into his old olde infirmitie, sent for the dukes of Berry and Alaunson and all the counsail of Fraunce, to conclude what should be done in so great a matter and so weightie a cause. After long consultacion, it was determined to assemble people through the whole realme of Fraunce, to resist and repulse the kyng of Englande and his puissaunce whensoeuer he would atiue or set foote into Fraunce, and also to fortifie their tounes & stuffe them with garrisons and men of warre, and farther by taxes & subsidies to leuy as muche money as by wit or policie could be deuised or imagined. Moreouer to staie the king of Englād at home, it was politiquely deuised to send to hym a solempne Ambassade to make to hym some offers according to the demaundes before rehersed. The charge of this Ambassade was committed to the earle of Vandosme, to master Wyllyam Bouratier Archebyshop of Boutgues and to master Petet Fremell byshoppe of Lisieux and to the lorde of Yury and Bzaquemōt and to master Gaultier Cole the kynges secretory and diuerse other. These Ambassadours accompanied with thre hundred and fifty horses passed the sea at Caleys and landed at Douer, before whose atriuall the kyng was departed from Wyndsor to Winchester, entending to haue gone to Hampton and to haue vewed his naue, but hearyng of the Ambassadours approchyng, taried styll at Wynchester, where the said Frenche lordes shewed them selues very honorably before the king and the nobilitie. And in the byshoppes hal before the kyng, sittyng in his throne imperiall and his lordes spirituall and temporal and a great multitude of the commons there for that entent assembled. At a tyme prefixed, the Archebyshop of Bourgesse made an eloquent and a long Oracion, dissuadyng warre, and praisyng peace, offering to the kyng of Englād a great some of money with diuerse base and pore countreis with the Lady Katherine in mariage, so that he would dissolue his armie and dismisse his souldiours whiche he had gathered and made ready.

When this Oracion was ended, the kyng caused the Ambassadours to be highly feasted, & set them at his awne table And at a daye assigned in the forsaid hal, the Archebyshoppe of Cauntorbury made to their Oracion a notable aunswere: The effecte wherof was, that if the Frenche kyng would not geue with his daughter in mariage, the duchies of Acquitain, Normandy, Aniowe, & al other seigniories and dominions somtyme appertaining to the noble progenitours of the kyng of England, he would in no wise retire his armie nor breake his iorney but would with all diligence entre into the realme of Fraunce & destroy the people, depopulate the countrey & subuerte the tounes, with sworde bloud fyre & neuer cease till he had recouered his auncient right & lawfull patrymony. The kyng auowed the archebishops saiyng & in ỹ word of a prince promised to perfourme it to the vtteremost. The byshop of Bourgesse being inflamed with anger that his purpose toke none effect, desiryng licence & pardon of the kyng that he might speake: whiche once attained he verye rashly and vnreuerently said, Thynkest thou to put doune and destroy wrongfully the mooſt chriſten kyng, our moſte redoubted ſouerain lord and moſt excellētest prince of all chriſtiantie of bloud and prehemīnēce. Oh kyng, ſauyng thine honoure, thynkeſt thou that he hathe offered or cauſed to be offered to the landes, goodes, or other poſſeſſions with his awne daughter tor feare of the or thy Englyſh nation, or thy frendes or well willers or fautours. No no, but of truthe he moued with pitie, as a louer of peace, to the entent that innocent bloud ſhould not be diſperled abrode, and that chriſtian people ſhould not be afflicted with battaill & deſtroied with mortall warre, hath made to the this reaſonable offers & this Godly motion, puttyng his hole affiaunce in God mooſte puiſſaunt accordyng to right and reaſon, truſtyng in his quarell to be ayded and ſupported by his beneuolente ſubiectes and fauourable well willers. And ſith we be ſubiectes and ſeruauntes, we require the to cauſe vs ſafely and ſurely without dammage to be cōducted out of thy realme and dominions and that thou wilt write thyne aunſwere wholy as thou haſt geuen it, vnder thy ſeale and ſygne manuell.

THE kynge of Englande nothynge vexed nor yet moued with the preſumptuous ſaiynges and proude bragges of the vnordered and vnmanerly Byſſhop, but well remembryng kyng Salomon in the foure & twenty of his Prouerbes, whiche ſaieth, that with diſcretiō warres muſt be taken in hande, and where many can geue counſaill, there is victory, coldely and ſoberly aunſwered the byſſhop ſaiyng: My lorde, I littell eſteme your Frenche bragges, and leſſe ſet by your power and ſtrength I know perfightly my right to your region, and excepte you wyll deny the apparant truthe ſo do you, and if you neither do nor will know, yet God and the worlde knoweth it. The power of your Maiſter you ſee dayly, but my puiſſaunce you haue not yet taſted, If your maſter haue louyng frendes and faithfull ſubiectes, I am I thanke God not diſgarniſhed nor vnprouided of theſame: But this I ſaye vnto you, that before one yere paſſe I truſte to make the hyghest croune of your countrey ſtoupe and the proudeſt Witer to knele downe: And ſaye this to the vſurper your Maſter that I within three monethes wyll enter into Fraunce not as into his lande, but as into myne awne true and lawfull patrimonye entendyng to conquere it, not with braggyng wordes, flatteryng Oracions or coloured perſuaſions, but with puiſſaunce of men and dent of ſworde by the ayde of God in whome is my whole truſt and confidence. And as concernyng myne aunſwere to be written, ſubſcribed and ſealed, I aſſure you that I would not ſpeake that ſentence the whiche I would not wryte and ſubſcribe, nor ſubſcrybe that lyne to the whiche I would refuſe to put my ſeale. Therfore your ſauconducte ſhall be to you deliuered with myne aunſwere and then you may depart ſurely and ſafely I warrant you into youre Conntrey, where I truſte ſoner to viſite you then you ſhall haue cauſe to ſalute or byd me welcome. With this aunſwere the Ambaſſadours ſore diſmaied, but more diſpleaſed (although they were hyghly entertained & lyberally rewarded) departed into theyr countrey countrey, relatyng to the Dolphyn and the kynges counsaill what they had done duryng the tyme of their Ambassade.

After the Frenche Ambassadours were departed, the kyng as I said before hauing a greate foresight and disposyng all thynges in an order forgetting not the old prankes and sodein trickes of the variable Scottyshe nacion, appointed the earle of Westmerlande, the lorde Scrope, the Baron of Greystocke and sir Robert Umfreuile with diuers other hardy personages, and valiaunt capitaynes to kepe the frontiers and Marches adioinyng to Scotlande, whiche sir Robert Umfreuile on the f daye of Mary Magdalene entered with the Scottes at the Toune of Gederyng, hauyng in his company onely foure hundred Englyshemen, where he after long conflict and doubtfull battayle slewe of his enemies syxty and odde, and toke captiues thre hundred and syxty and discomfited and put to flight a thousand and mo, he folowed in chace aboue. xxii. miles, and so laden with praies and prisoners retuled agayn not vnhurt to the castle of Rokesbrough, of the which at that tyme he was chief capitayne and gouernour.

When the kyng had ordered all thynges for the tuition and sauegarde of his realme and people, he leauyng behynde hym for gouernour xx of the realme, the Quene his mother inlawe, departed to the Toune of Southhampton, entendyng there to take ship, and so to transfrete into Fraunce. And to thentent he would steale on the Frenche kyng before he were ware of hym, he dispatched Antelop his pursuiuant at armes with letters, the whiche the Frenche cronographers declare to be these.

TO the right honourable Prince Charles our cosyn of Fraunce and tories, and it was to them a notable vertue to decore and beautifye the house of God, to the whiche appertained holynes, and to set a concorde in Christes religion. And by their agreable warres they brought fortunately the publike enemies to their subiection: But alas this fratetnall faith is peruerted to fraternall occasion as Lot persecuted Abrahã by humayne impulsion, but nowe the glory of fraternall loue is deade, and the discent of auncient humaine condicion is departed, and mother

SE the chaunce, the nyght befoze the day of departure appointed, he was credibly infozmed that Rycharde earle of Cambzidge bzother too

Edward duke of Yorke and Henry Lorde Scrope & syr Thomas Gray knight hath compassed his deeth and final distruction: wherfore he caused them to be apprehended lamentyng sore his chaunce that he should be compelled to lose suche personages by whose valiauntnes and puissaunce he should be more dreadfull and fearefull to his foes & enemies. When these prisoners were examined, they not onely confessed the conspiracy, but also declared that for a great some of money which they had receyued of the Frenche kyng, they intended either to deliuer the kyng alyue into the hande of his enemies, or els to murther hym before that he x should arriue in the duchy of Normandy. When kyng Henry harde all thinges opened whiche he sore desired, he caused all his nobilitie to assemble before his maiestie royall, before whom he caused to be brought the thre great offendours and to them sated: If you haue cõspired the death and destruction of me whiche am the head of the realme and gouernour of the people, without doubt I muste of necessitie thynke that you lykewyse haue compassed the confusion of all that be here with me, and also the finall destruction of your native countrey and naturall region. And although some priuate Scorpion in your hartes, or somewild wormes in your heades hath caused you to conspire my death and cõfusion, yet you xx should haue spared that deuelishe enterprise as lõg as I was within mine army whiche cannot continue without a capitayne, nor be directed without a guide, nor yet with the destruction of your awne bloud and nacion you should haue pleased a forein enemy & an auncièt aduersary. Wherfore seyng that you haue enterprised so great a mischiefe, so abhominable a fact, to thentẽt that your fautours being in the army may abhorre so detestable an offence by the punishement of you, haste you to receiue the payne that for your demerites you haue deserued, and that punishement that by the lawe for your offences is prouided.

VVHEN these noble men were executed, the kyng sayed to hys Lorxxx des, se you not the madd imagination of men whiche persecute me that dayly studye, and hourely labour, to my greate trauayle and vnquietnes for the aduauncement of the publique wealth of this Realme and region, and for that cause I spare no payne nor refuse no tyme, to thentent to doo good to all men, and to hurt no man, and thus to do is my duetie and to this as I thinke am I borne. I pray to God that there be none among you that be infected with so much vntruthe that had leuer se me destroied and brought to confusion, rather then to se his countrey florishe encreased with honor and empire. I assure you that I cõceiue no suche opinion in any of you, but put in you both trust & confidence xl and if I may haue yout helpe to beautify my realme and to recouer againe the olde honoure of myne auncestours by subduyng the Frenche nacion, I for my selfe wyll forget all perill and paine and be your guide lodesman and conductoure. And if you drawe backe and will not moue forwarde, beleue me GOD wyll so dispose, that hereafter you shalbe deceiued and sore repent had I wist. When the kyng had finyshed hys

saying all the noble men kneled doune and promised faithfully to serue hym and duely to obey hym, and rather to dye then to suffer hym to fall into the handes of his enemies.

THIS done, the kyng thought surely in his conceipte all sedicion to be drowned and vterly extincte. But if he had cast his eye to the fyre that was newly kyndled, he should haue surely sene an horrible flame incensed against the walles of his owne house and family, by the which in conclusion his line and stocke was cleane destroied and consumed to ashes, whiche fyre at that very tyme peraduenture might haue bene quenched and put out. For diuerse write that Richarde earle of Cambridge dyd not conspire with the lorde Scrope and Sir Thomas Graye to mutther kyng Henry to please the Frenche kyng withall, but onely to thentent to exalte to the croune his brotherin lawe Edmond earle of Marche as heyre to duke Lyonell. After whose death consyderyng that the earle of Marche for diuerse secrete impedimentes was not hable to haue generacion, he was sure that the croune should come to hym by his wife, or to his children. And therefore it is to be thought that he rather confessed him selfe for nede of money to be corrupted by the Frenche kyng, then he would declare his inwarde mynde and open his very entent. For surely he sawe that if his purpose were espied, the earle of March should haue dronken of the same cup that he did, and what should haue come to bys owne children he muche doubted. And therfore beyng destitute of comfort and in dispayre of lyfe, to saue his children he fayned that tale, desirying rather to saue his succession then him selfe, whiche he did in dede. For Richarde duke of Yorke his sonne not priuely but openly claymed the croune, and Edward his sonne both claymed and gayned it as hereafter you shall heare, whiche thyng at this time if kyng Henry had forsene I doubte whether euer that lyne should haue either claymed the garlande or gained the game.

WHEN the wynde was prosperous and plesaunt for the nauye too xxx set forward, they waied vp the Ankers and hoysed vp their sayles and set forward with .xv.C. shyppes on the vigile of the Assumpcion of our Lady and toke lande at Caux, comonly called Kyd Caux (where the ryuer of Seine runneth into the sea) without resistence or bloudshedding. The kyng was lodged on the shore in a small priory with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester his brethren: the duke of Exceter and Yorke, the earles, Marshall, Oxforde, Suffolke, Warwicke and other lordes were lodged not farre from hym. The next day after, he marched toward the toune of Harflewe standing on the riuer of Seyne betwene two hilles and besieged it on euery parte. The Capitaine of the toune was the xl lorde Escouteuile with the lorde Blaynuyle of Yacqueuile, the lordes of Harmanuile of Galarde Boyes, of Clere de becton, of Adsanches, of Brian, of Gaucort, of Lisleadam and many other.

Bonciqualt Marchall of Fraũce,the Seneschal of Henaude,the lorde Ligny and diuerse other capitaines, whiche fortefied tounes with men vitaile and artillary on all the sea coaste. And heryng that the kyng of England had besieged Harflew at hys first landyng, came to the castle of Cawdebec beyng not farre from Harflewe,to thentent to succor their frendes whiche wer besieged if thei might by any pollicy or inuencion, and if not,then they imagined how to greve and hurte the Englischemen when they wente into the countree on foragyng for beastes and vitayll and so trappe and destroye them, for thei cõstrued with themselfes that x their vitaile would sone fayle because of the ayre of the sea and smell of the water. But they were deceiued,for notwithstandyng the prouision and pollicy of the Frenchemen, the Englischmen forrayed the countree, spoyled the villages and brought many a riche praie to the Campe before Harflewe.Thenglischemen daily ceassed not to assaile the toune,the duke of Gloucester to whõ the order of the assaulte was comitted,made thre mynes vnder the ground & approched the walles wyth ordinaunce and engynes, and would not suffre theim wythin to reste at any tyme. The kyng lyng on the hyll side with his battail did not onely kepe the Frenchemen from succoryng of the toune,but also toke awaie from the xx tounes men all the hope and trust of their succor,aide and relief,and all so all the gonnepouder that was sent by the Frenche kyng to them that wer besieged was taken bi thenglischmen. The capitaines of the Frẽch men within the toune perceiued that they wer not able to resist the continuall inuasions and hourely assaultes of the fierce Englischemenne, and knowyng that their walles were vndermyned and shortely like to fal,& feryng that might happé of the chance if thei should fortune to be ouercome and takẽ by force,desired of the kyng of England only truce for thre daies,promisyng that if they were not reskewed within thesame tyme,then they to yelo themselfes and the toune their liues only saued.
xxx And to performe this, they deliuered into the kynges possession.xxx.of the beste capitaines and Marchauntes of the toune. The kyng of Englande accepted thys offre, least he entendyng greater exploites myght lese hys tyme in suche small matters. When thys composicion was agreed,the lorde Hacqueuile was sent to the French kyng to declare the necessite of the toune and the shorte time of the truce. To whom the dolphyn aunswered that the kynges power was not yet assembled in suche a nombre as was conuenient to raise so greate a siege. When the aunswer was reported to the capitaines,they seyng no hope nor similitude of aide and comfort to them commyng, after the third daie rendered to xl the kyng of Englande the toune,beyng the.xxviij.daie after that it was besieged,whiche was the daye of sainct Mawrice,to the greate abashement of all Normandy,for it was the soueraigne porte of al that countree. The souldiours wer raunsomed and the toune was sacked to the greate gayne of the Englischemen. The kynge of Englande ordeigned capitain of the toune of Harflewe hys vncle Thomas duke of Excester whiche eſtabliſhed hys leuetenaunte there Jhon Faſtolffe wyth.xb.C. men and.xxxb.knightes, wherof the Baron of Carew & syr Hugh Lutterell were two counſaillers. And becauſe diuerſe of hys nobles lyng before Harflew wer ſicke of the flixe and many wer ded, emongeſt whom therle of Stafford, the biſhop of Norwich, the lordes Molins & Burnell wer foure beſide other. The kyng licenſed the duke of Clarence his brother, Jhon erle Marſhall and Jhon erle of Arundel beyng infected with that deſeaſe to returne into Englande.

KYNG Henry not a litle reioyſyng of hys good lucke and fortunate ſucceſſe in the begynnyng of his pretenſed conqueſt, determined wythal diligence to ſet forward in perfornyng his intended purpoſe and warrely enterpryſe, but becauſe Wynter approched faſter and more furiouſly then before that tyme had been accuſtomed, he was ſore troubled and vexed. For the whiche cauſe he called together all the Cheuetaines and men of pollicy in his armie to conſult vpō the procedyng forward and to be ſure of waie and redy paſſage. After long debatyng and muche reaſonyng, it was as a thynge bothe neceſſary and conueniente and fully agreed and determined to ſet forwarde wythall diligence before the dedde tyme of Winter approched, toward the toune of Calcis. And becauſe their goyng forward ſhould be called of ſlaunderous tongues a rumnyng or flyng away, it was decreed that the whole armye ſholde paſſe the next waye by lande through the middeſt of their enemies, and yet that iourney was adiudged perilous by reaſon that the numbre was muche minyſhed by the flyxe and other feuers, whyche ſore vexed and brought to death aboue.xb.C. perſones, which was the very cauſe that the returne was ſonet concluded and apointed: but before his departyng he entered into the toune of Harflew and went on foote to the churche of ſainct Martynes and there offered. And all the men of warr which had not paied their raunſome, he ſware them on the holy Euangeliſtes to yeld themſelfes priſoners at Calcis by the feaſt of S. Martyn in Nouember nexte. diuerſe of the burgeſſes he highly raunſomed, and a greate part of the women and children he expelled the toune, geuyng to euery poore creature fiue ſowſe. The prieſtes had lycence to depart leuyng behynde them their ſubſtaunce. The goodes in the toune wer innumerable whiche were al prate to the Engliſhemen, whiche ſent the beſt into Englande as a remembraunce of good lucke. There were twoo ſtrong toures ſtandyng on the hauen ſide, whyche lokyng for aid did nat yelde ten daies after the toune was rendered.

VVHEN the kyng had repaired the walles, fortified the bulwarkes refreſſhed the rampiers and furniſhed the toune wyth vitail and artillary, he remoued from Harflew toward Pountoyſe, entendyng to paſſe the riuer of Some with his armie before the bridges were either withdrawen or broken. The Frenche kyng hearyng that the toune of Harflewe was gotten and that the kynge of Englande was marchyng forwarde into the bowelles of the realme, ſente out proclamacions and assembled people in euery quarter, committyng the whole charge of hys armie to hys sonne the Dolphin & the duke of Aquitayn, whiche incontinent caused the bridges to be broken and all the passages to be defended, beside that they caused all corne and other vitaill to be destroied in al places where they conjectured that thenglyshemen would repaire or passe through, to thentent that they might either kepe thē in a place certain wythout any passage or departure, and so to destroye them at their pleasures, or els to kepe theim in a straite without vitailes or comfort, and so by famyne eithre cause them to dye or yelde.

¶ The kyng of Englande afflicted withall these incōmoditees at one tyme was nether dismaied nor discoraged, but keping furth hys iorney approched to the riuer of Some, where he perceiued that all the bridges wer by his enemies broken and vnframed: wherfore he came to the passage called Blanchetaque where kynge Edwardes greate graundfather passed the riuer of Some before ỹ battail of Cressy. But the passage was so kepte that he could not passe without greate daunger, considerynge that his enemies wer at his backe and before his face. Wherfore he passed forward to Araines, burnyng villages & takyng greate booties, and euery daye he sente his light horsemen abrode to spye and ¶ seke what perilles ther wer at hand, what embushmentes ther wer layd on the one side or thother, & to find out where he might most sauely pas the riuer. The espialles returned and declared for a truth that the cōtree swarmed with men of warre, whereof he beyng aduertised, set furth in good ordre, kepyng still his waie forwarde and so ordred hys armie and placed hys cariage, that hauyng his enemies on both sides of him, he passed so terribly that his enemies wer afraid once to offre hym battaill, and yet the lorde Delabreth Constable of Fraunce, the Marshall Bonneqault, the erle of Vandosme greate Master of Fraunce and the lorde Dampier Admirall of Fraunce, the duke of Alanson and the erle
¶¶ of Richemonde withall the puyssance of the Dolphyn late at Abbeuile and durste not once touche his battailles, but euer kepte the passages and coasted alofe lyke a hauke that liketh not her praie. The kyng of Englande still kept on his iourney till he came to the bridge of saincte Marence, where he founde aboue .xxx.M. Frenchemen and there pitched hys felde, lokyng surely to be set on and fought withall. Wherfore to encorage his capitaines the more, he dubbed certain of his hardy & valeant gentlemen knightes, as Jhō lord Ferrers of Groby, Reignold of Greistocke, Piers Tempest. Christopher Morisby, Thomas Piketing, Williā Huddleston, Jhon Hosbalton, Henry Mortimer, Philip

assembled in greate nombre and the men of Armes of the garrison of Corby skirmished wyth hys armie in the morning, which tarying was to hym bothe ioyous and profitable, for there he discomfited the crew of horsmen & draue the rustical people euen to their gates, & also found there thesame daye a shalow forde betwene Corby & Peron, whiche neuer was espied before. At the whyche he, his armie & cariages the nyght ensuyng passed the greate riuer of Some without let or daungier, the morowe after sainct Lukes daye, determined withall diligence to passe to Caleis, and not to seke for battail except he wer therto constrained & compelled, because that hys armie by sickenesse was sore minished and appaired, for he had onely two.M. horsemen and.xvj.M. Archers, bill men and of all sortes. The Englishemen were afflicted in this iourney with an hundred discomodities, for their vitaile was in maner al spent, and newe they could gette none, for their enemies had destroyed all the corne before their comyng: Rest they could take none, for theyr enemies wer euer at hande, daily it reined and nightly it freesed, of fuell was skarcenes and of fluxes was plenty, money they had ynough but comforte thei had none. And yet in this greate necessitee the poore folkes wer not spoyled nor any thyng wythout paiment was of thē extorted, nor great offence was doen except one, whiche was that a foolishe souldier stale a pixe out of a churche and vnreuerently did eate the holy hostes within thesame conteigned. For whiche cause he was apprehended, and the kyng would not once remoue till the vessel was restored & the offender strangled. The people of the countrees there aboute hearyng of hys straight iustice & godly mynd, ministered to hym bothe vitailes & other necessaries, although by open proclamacio they wer therof prohibited.

THE Frenche kyng beyng at Roan, hearyng that the kyng of Englande was passed the water of Some, was not a litle discontente, and assembled his counsaill to the numbre of.xxv. to consult what woulde be doen, the chief wherof were the Dolphin hys sonne whose name was Lewes, callyng hymself kyng of Cicile, the dukes of Berry & Britayn therle of Pontieu the kynges yongest sonne and diuerse other, wherof xxx. agreed that the Englishemen should not departe vnfoughten with all, and fiue wer of the contrary opinion, but the greater numbre ruled the matier. And so Mountioye kyng at Armes was sent to the kyng of Englande to defie hym as the enemie of Fraunce, and to tell hym that he should shortly haue battaill. Kyng Henry sobrely aunswered: Syr myne entent and desire is none other, but to do as it pleaseth almighty God and as it becometh me, for surely I wyll not seke your Maistre at this tyme, but if he or his seke me I wil willyngly fight with him. And if any of your nacion attempt once to stoppe me in my iourney toward Calcis, at their ieoperdy be it, and yet my desire is that none of you be so vnaduised or harebrained as to be the occasion that I, in my defence shall coloure and make redde your tawny grounde with the deathes of your selfes and the fusion of Christen bloud. When he had aunswered ted the harauld, he gaue to hym a great reward & licéced him to depart

VVHEN the Lordes of Fraunce heard the kyng of Englandes aunswere, it was incontinent proclaymed, that all men of warre should resorte to the Constable of Fraunce to fight with the kyng of Englande and hys puissaunce. Wherupon all men accustomed to beare Armure and desirous to wyn honor through the realme of Fraunce drewe toward the felde. The Dolphyn sore desired to bee at that battaile, but he was prohibited by the kyng hys father, likewyse Philip erle of Charolous sonne to the Duke of Burgoyn would gladly haue been at that x noble assemble if the duke his father woulde haue suffred him, but many of his men stale awaye and went to the Frenchemen.

THE kyng of Englande informed by his espialles that the daye of battaill was nerer then he loked for, dislodged from Bompers & roade in good arrate through the faire plaine beside the toune of Blangy, where to the intent that his armie should not be included in a streight or driuen to a corner, he chose a place mete and conueniente for two armyes to darrayne battaile betwene the tounes of Blangy and Agincourte, where he pight his felde

THE Constable of Fraunce the Marshall, the Admirall, the Lorde
xx Rambures Master of the Crosbowes and diuerse lordes and knyghter pitched theyr banners nere to the banner royall of the Constable in the Countee of sainct Paule within the territory of Agincourte by the whyche wate the Englishemen must nedes passe towarde Caleis. The Frenchemen made greate fires aboute their banners, and they were in numbre had.lx.M. horsemen, as their owne historians and writers affirme, beside footemen pages and wagoners, and all that night made greate chere and were very mery. The Englishmen that night sounded their trompettes and diuerse instrumentes Musicall with greate melody, and yet they were bothe hungery, wery, sore trauciled and muche xxx vexed with colde deseases: Howbeit they made peace with God in confessyng their synnes, requiryng hym of help and receiuyng the holy sacramente, euery man encouragyng and determinyng clerely rather to die then either to yelde or flie.

NOVV approched the fortunat faire daie to the Englishemen and the infest and vnlucke daye to the Frenche nobilitie, whyche was the fiue and twenty daye of October in the yere of our Lorde Jesu Christe a thousande foure hundred and fiftene, beyng the Fridaye and the daye of Crispin and Crispinian. On the whyche daye in the mornyng, the Frenche menne made thre battailes: In the Vaward were eight xl thousande Healmes of Knightes and Esquiers and foure thousande Archers and fiftene hundred Crosebowes, whyche were guyded by the Lorde Delabret Constable of Fraunce, hauyng wyth hym the dukes of Orleaunce and Burbone, therles of Ewe and Richmond the Marshall Bouciqualt and the Master of the Crosebowes, the Lorde Dampier Admirall of Fraunce and other capitaines. And the erle of

The battaile of Agincourt

Uandosme and other the kynges officers with.xvj.C.men of Armes wer ozdzed foz a wyng to that battail. And the other wyng was guided by sir Guyshard Dolphyn and sir Clugnet of Bzabant and syz Lewes of Burbon wyth.viij.C.menne of Armes, of chosen and elect persones. And to bzeake the shot of the Englishmen wer appoincted sir Guyllia of Sauoiens with Hectoz and Philip hys bzethen. Ferry of Vaylley and Alen of Galpanes with other.xiij.C. men of Armes. In the midle ward wer assigned as many persones oz mo as wer in the fozmoste battaill, and therof was the charge comitted to the dukes of Barr and Alenson, therles of Neuers, Uawdemont, Blamoût, Salynges Graunt- r pzee and of Roussy. And in the rerewarde weze al the other men of Armes, guyded by the erles of Marle Dampmartyne, Fawquenberge and the Lozde of Lourrey Capitayne of Arde, who had with hym men of the Frontiers of Bolonoys.

VVHEN these battailes were thus ozdzed, it was a glozious syght to behold thē, and surely they wer estemed to be in numbze sixe times as many oz moze then was the whole compaigny of the Englishmen wyth wagoners, pages, and all. Thus the Frenchmen wer euery man vnder his banner onely waityng foz the blouddy blast of the terrible trompet, and in this ozdze they continued restyng themselfes and reconcilyng e- rr uery one to other foz all olde rancozs and hatredes whych had been betwene theim till the houre betwene.ix.and.x.of the daye. Duryng whyche season, the Constable of Fraunce sayed openly to the capitaynes in effecte as foloweth.

The ozacion of The Cõstable of Fraũce

FRENDES and companions in armes, I cannot but bothe reioyce and lament the chances & foztunes of these two armies whiche I openly se and behold with myne iyes here pzesente. I reioyce foz the victozie whyche I se at hand foz our part, and I lamẽt and sozow foz the misery and calamitee whyche I perceiue to appzoche to the othezside: Foz wee cannot but be victours and triumphãt conquezozs, foz who saw euer so rrr flozisshyng an armie within any chzistian region, oz suche a multitude of valiaunt persones in one compaignie? Is not here the flower of the Frenche nacion on barded hozsses with sharpe speares and dedly weapons? Are not here the bold Bzitons with fiery handgõnes and sharpe swerdes? Se you not pzesent the pzactised Pickardes with strong and weightie Crossebowes? Beside these, we haue the fierce Bzabanders & strong Almaines wyth long pykes and cuttyng slaughmesses. And on the otherside is a smal handfull of poze Englishemen which are entred into thys regon in hope of some gain oz desire of pzoffite, whyche by reson that their vitaill is cõsumed & spent, are by daily kampyn soze weke- rl ned, consumed & almost without spirites: foz their foze is clerly abated and their strength vtterly decaied, so ẏ oz the battailes shall ioyne they shalbe foz very feblenes vãquished & ouercom, & in stede of men ye shal fight with shadowes. Foz you must vnderstand, ẏ kepe an Englishmã one moneth from hys warme bed, fat befe and stale dzynke, and let him

that season tast colde and suffre hunger, you then shall se his courage a bated, hys bodye waxe leane and bare, and euer desirous to returne into hys own countrey. Experience now declareth thys to be true, for if famine had not pinched theim, or colde wether had not nipped them surely thei would haue made theyr progresse farther into Fraunce, and not by so many perilous passages retired towarde Calays. Suche courage is in Englishmen when fayre wether and vitaile folow them, and suche weaknes they haue when famine and cold vexe and trouble them. Therfore nowe, it is no mastery to banquishe and ouerthrowe x them, beyng bothe wery & weake, for by reason of feblenes and faintnes their weapones shall fal out of their handes when they profer to strike, so that ye may no easelier kyll a poore shepe then destroye them beyng alredy sicke & hungerstaruen. But imagyn that they wer lusty, strong and couragious, and then ponder wisely the cause of theyr cõmyng hither, and the meanyng of theyr enterprice: Fyrst their king a yong stripling (more mete for a tenice playe then a warlike campe,) claimeth the croune, scepter and souereigntie of the verye substance of the Frenche nacion by battaile: then he and hys entende to occupy this countrey inhabite this lande, destroy our wiues and childzen, extinguishe our blud xx and put our names in the blacke boke of obliuion. Wherfore remembre well, in what quarel can you better fight then for the tuicion of our natural countrey, the honor of your prince, the surety of youre childzen and the sauegard of your land and liues. If these causes do not encourage you to fight, beholde before your eyes the tentes of your enemies, wyth treasure, plate & Jewels wel stuffed and richely furnished, which pray is surely yours if euery man strike but one stroke, beside the great raunsomes whyche shalbe paied for riche capitaines and welthy prisoners, whyche as surely shalbe yours as you now had them in your possession. Yet thys thyng I charge you wythal, that in nowise the kyng xxx him selfe be killed, but by force or otherwise to be apprehended & taken to the entent that wyth glorye & triumphe we may conuey hym openly through the noble citie of Paris to oute kyng and dolphyn as a testimony of our victory & witnes of our noble act. And of thys thyng you be sure, that fly they cannot, and to yelde to our fight, of necessitie they shalbe compelled. Therfore good felowes take courage to you, the victory is yours, the gaine is yours & the honor is yours without greate laboure or muche losse.

KYNG Henry also lyke a leader & not like one led, like a souereigne and not like a souldior ordred hys men for hys most aduantage lyke an xl expert capitaine and a couragious warrier. And fyrst he sent priuely CC. archers into a low medowe whiche was nere to the forward of his enemies, but seperate wyth a great diche, and were there commaunded to kepe them selues clole tyl they had a token to them geuen to shote at their aduersaries. Beside this, he appointed a bawarde, of the whyche he made capitayne Edward duke of Yorke whyche of a haute courage had of the kyng required and obteined that office: and wyth hym were the lordes Beaumond, Mylloughby and Fanhope, and this battaile was all archers. The middle ward was gouerned by the kyng hym self with hys brother the duke of Glouceſter, & the erles Marſhall, Oxford and Suffolke, in the whych wer al the ſtrong bilmen, The duke of Exceter vncle to the kyng led the rereward, whiche was mixed bothe with archers & bilmen. The horſemen like winges went on euery ſide of the battaile. When the kyng had thus ordred his battaile, like a puiſſaunt cõqueror without feare of hys enemies, yet cõſidering the multitude of them farre to excede the ſmal nombre of hys people, doubtynge that the Frenchemen would compaſſe and beſet hym aboute, and ſo fight wyth hym on euery ſide, to thentent to banquyſhe the power of the Frenche horſemen whyche might breake the order and arraye of his Archers, in whom the whole force of the battaile did conſiſt and in maner remaine he cauſed ſtakes bound with yron ſharpe at both endes of the length of v. or. vi. fote, to be pitched before the Archers and of euery ſide the foote men like an hedge, to the entent that if the barde horſes ranne raſhely vpon them, they might ſhortely be gored and deſtroied, & appointed certaine perſones to remoue the ſtakes when the Archers moued, and as tyme required: ſo that the fotemen were hedged about wyth the ſtakes, and the horſemen ſtode like a bulwerke betwene thẽ and theyr enemies without the ſtakes. This deuice of fortifyng an armye was at thys tyme fyrſt inuented, but ſence that tyme, they haue imagined caltrappes, harowes and other new trickes to defende the force of the horſmen ſo that if the enemies at aduenture runne againſt theyr engines, either ſodenly theyr horſes be wounded wyth the ſtakes, or theyr feete hurt wyth the other engines, ſo that of very neceſſitie for pane, the ſely pore beaſtes are compelled to fal and tumble to the ground. When he had ordred thus his battailes, he left a ſmal company to kepe hys campe & baggage, and then callyng his capitaines and ſoldiours about hym, he made to them an heartie Oracion in effect as foloweth, ſaiyng.

The oracion of kyng Henry the fift.

VVELBELOVED frendes and countrymen, I exhort you hartely thynke and conceiue in your ſelues that thys daye ſhalbe to vs all a day of ioy, a day of good lucke and a day of victory: For truely if you well note and wiſely conſidre all thynges, almighty God vnder whoſe protection we be come hither, hath appoincted a place ſo mete and ape for our purpoſe as we our ſelues could neither haue deuiſed nor wiſhed whyche as it is apt and conuenient for our ſmal nombre and litle army ſo is it vnprofitable and vnmete for a great multitude to fight or geue battaile in: and in eſpecial for ſuche men in whom is neither conſtant faith nor ſecuritie of promiſe, whiche perſons be of God neither fauored nor regarded, nor he is not accuſtomed to ayde and ſuccoure ſuche people whyche by force and ſtrength contrary to right & reaſon detain and kepe from other their iuſt patrimony and lauful inheritance, wyth whyche blotte and ſpotte the Frenche nacion is apparantly defyled

and distained: so that God of hys iustice wyl scourge and aflicte them for their manifest iniuries and open wronges to vs and oure realme dayly committed and done. Therfore puttyng your onely trust in hym,let not theyr multitude feare youre heartes, nor their greate nombre abate your courage:for surely old warlyke fathers haue bothe said and written that the more people that an army is, the lesse knowledge the multitude hath of materiall feates or politique practises, whyche rude rustical and ignorant persons shalbe in the felde vnto hardy captaines and lusty men of warre a greate let and sore impediment. And x though they al were of like policy, like audacitie and of one vniforme experience in marcial affayres, yet we ought neither to feare them nor once to shrinke form them,considerynge that we come in the right,which euer of God is fauored,set furth and auanced:in whyche good and iust quarel all good persones shal rather set bothe theyr feete forward, then once to turne theyr one hele backward. For if you aduenture youre liues in so iust a battaile & so good a cause, whyche way soeuer fortune turne her whele, you shalbe sure of fame, glory and renoune: If you be victors and ouercome your enemies, your strength and vertue shalbe spred and dispersed through the whole worlde: If you ouerpressed with xx so great a multitude shal happē to be slaine or taken,yet neither reproche can be to you ascribed, either yet infamy of you reported, considerynge that Hercules alone was not equiuolent vnto.ii.men,nor a smal handfull is not equal to a greate nombre,for victory is the gift of God and consisteth not in the puissaunce of men. Wherfore manfully set on your enemies at theyr fyrst encountre, strike with a hardy courage on the false hearted Frenchemen, whom youre noble auncestours haue so often ouercome and vanquished. For surely they be not so strong to geue the onset vpon you,but they be much weaker to abid your strēgth in a long fight and tyred battaile. As for me I assure you al,that Engxxx land for my person shall neuer paye raunsome, nor neuer Frencheman shall triumph ouer me as his capitain,for this day by famous death or glorious victory I wyl wynne honor and obtaine fame. Therfore now ioyously prepare your selues to the battaile and couragiously fyght wyth your enemies,for at thys very tyme all the realme of Englande praieth for our lucke and prosperous succes.

WHILE the kyng was thus speakyng,eche armye so maligned and grudged at the other beyng in open sight and euident apparence, that euery man cried furth,furth,forward forward. The dukes of Clarēce, Gloucester and Yorke were of the same opinion,thinkyng it moste con-xl uenient to marche toward theyr enemies wyth al spede & celeritie, least in prolongyng of tyme and arguyng of opinions, the Frenche armye might more and more increase & hourly multiply. Howbeit,the kynge taried a whyle least any ieopardy were not forsene, or any hazard not preuented.

THE Frenchemen in the meane season litle or nothynge regardynge

the small nombre of thenglische nacion, wer of suche haute courage and proud stomackes that they toke no thought for the battaile, as who saye they wer victours and ouercomers before any stroke was striken, and laughed at the Englishmen,and for very prid thought them selues lifted into heauen iesting and boasting that thei had thenglishmen inclosed in a straight, & had ouercome & taken thē without any resistence. The capitaines determined howe to deuide the spoyle: the souldiors plaied the Englishemen at dice: the noble men deuised a chariot howe they might triumphantly conueigh kyng Henry beyng captiue to the cytie of Paris, criyng to theyr souldiors, haste your selues to obtaine spoyle,glory and honor,to thentent that we may study how to geue you thankes for the great giftes and rewardes which we hope to receiue of your great liberalitie. The folishe folye of this vaine solace brake out so farre, that messengers were sent to the cyties and tounes adioynyng, willyng them to make open playes and triumphes,(as though that the victory were to them certaine and no resistance could appeare) and also to geue God thankes for their prosperous act and notable dede, not remembryng that the whirlewynd shortely with a puffe blew awaye all their folishe ioy and phantastical braggyng.

Of thys doyng you may gather,that it is as muche madnes to make a determinate iudgement of thinges to come, as it is wisdome to doubt what wyll folowe of thynges begōne. I may not forget how the Frēchmen beyng in this pleasaunt pastyme, sent a herault to kyng Henry to inquyre what raūsome he would offre, and how he answered that within.ii.or.iii.houres he hoped that it should so happen that the Frenchemen should cōmen rather with thenglishmen howe to be redemed, then the Englishemen should take thought how to pay any raūsome or money for theyr deliuerance: asserteinyng them for him selfe that hys deadcation should rather be their pray,then hys liuyng body should pay any raunsome. When the messenger was departed, the Frenchemen put on theyr healmettes and set them in ordre vnder their banners, rychely armed and gorgeously trapped,and caused theyr trumpettes to blowe to the battaile.

THE Englishemen perceiuyng that,sette a lytle forwarde, before whom there went an olde knight called syr Thomas of Herpingham,a man of great experience in warre, with a warder in his hand,and when he cast vp his warder al the army shouted,at the which the Frenchmen muche maruelled, but that was a signe to the Archers in the medowe, whiche knowing the token, shot wholy altogether at the vaward of the Frenchemen. When they perceiued the archers in the medow,whō they saw not before, and sawe they could not come to them for a ditche, they with al hast sent on kyng Henryes forward, but or they ioyned,the archers in the forfront and the archers on the side whiche stode in the medow, so wounded the fotemen, so galled the horses and so combred the men of armes that the fotemen durst not go forward,the horsmen rāne

in plumpes without ordre, some ouerthrew his felow, and horses ouerthrew their maisters: So at the fyrst ioynyng, as the Frenchemen were cleately discouraged, so thenglishemen were muche chered. When the Frenche vaward was thus discomfited, the English archers cast away theyr bowes & toke into theyr handes axes, malles and swordes, billes and other weapons, and therwith slewe the Frenchemen tyll they came to the middleward. Then the kyng approched and encoraged his souldiors, that shortly the second battaile was ouerthrowen and dispersed not without greate slaughter of men: howbeit diuers beyng wounded x were releued by theyr varlettes and cõueighed oute of the felde. for the Englishmen so sore labored with fightyng and slayng, and wer so busy in takyng of prisoners that they folowed no chace, nor would once breake out of ỹ battaile. The Frenchmen strongly withstode the fearcenes of the thenglishmen whẽ thei came to hãdystrokes, so that the fight was very doubtfull & perilous. And when one part of the French horsemen thought to haue entred into the kynges battaile, they were wyth the stakes ouerturned and either slaine or taken,

THVS this battaile continued .iii. long houres, some strake, some defẽded, some foyned, some trauersed, some kylled, some toke prisoners xx noman was idle, euery man fought either in hope of victory or glad to saue hym selfe. The kyng that day shewed hym selfe lyke a valiaunt knight, whyche notwythstandyng that he was almoste felled with the duke of Alaunson, yet wyth plain strength he slew .ii. of the dukes company and felled the duke: but when the duke would haue yelded hym, the kynges garde cõtrary to the kynges minde outragiously slew hym. And in conclusion, mindyng to make an ende of that dayes iorney, caused hys horsmen to fetch a compasse about & to ioyne wyth hym against the rereward of Fraunce: in the whych battaile were the greatest numbre of people. When the Frenchemen perceiued hys entent, they wer so-xxx denly amased and ranne away lyke shepe without aray or ordre.
When the king perceiued the banners cast doune & the aray was clerely broken, he encoraged his souldiors and folowed so quickely that the Frenchemen turnyng to flight, ranne hither and thither not knowyng whyche way to take, castyng awaye theyr armure and on theyr knes desired to haue theyr liues saued. In the meane season while the battaile thus continued and that thenglishemen had taken a great tõbre of prisoners, certain Frenchemen on horsbacke wherof were captaines Robinet of Bozneuile, Rifflart of Clamas and Iſambert of Agincourt and other men of Armes to the nombre of .vi. C. horsemen: whyche fled fyrst xl from the felde at theyr fyrst commyng, and hearyng that the Englyshe tentes and pauilions were farre from the army wythout any great nõbre of kepers or persons mete and conuenient, for defence, partlymoued and styred with coueteous desire of spoyle and pray, and partly entendyng by some notable act to reuenge the damage and displeasure done to them & theirs in battaile the same day, entred into the kynges campe

beyng voide of men and foztified with varlettes and lackeys, and thei spoyled hales, robbed tentes, brake vp cheftes & caried awaie caskets and flewe fuche feruantes as they could find in the tentes & pauilions. Foz the whiche act thei wer long imprifoned and foze punifhed and like to haue loft their liues if the Dolphyn had longer liued.

VVHEN the king by a fearefull meffenger was of this euil act fodainly aduertifed, and when the outcry of the lackeys and boyes which rãne awaye foz feare of the robbers was heard into the felde, faying that the Frenchmen had robbed all the tentes and lodgynges of the Englifhemen, he fearyng leaft his enemies beyng difperfed and fcattered abzoad fhould gather together againe and begynne a new felde: and doubtyng farther that the prifõers would either be an aide to his enemies oz very enemies to him if he fhould fuffer thẽ to liue, contrari to his accuftomed gentlenes & pitie he commaunded bi the founde of a trompet that euery man vpon paine of death fhould incontinently fley his prifoner. When this dolozous decre and pitiful proclamacion was pronounced, pitie it was to fe and lothfome it was to behold how fome Frenchmen wer fodainly ficked with daggers, fome wer brained with polaxes, fome wer flaine wyth malles, other had theyr throtes cut and fome their bellies paunched: fo that in effecte hauyng refpecte to the greate nombze, few prifoners oz none were faued.

VVHEN this lamentable manflaughter was finifhed, thenglifhmen forgetting their woundes and hurtes and not remembzing what paine they had fuftained all day in fightyng with their enemies, as men that were freffhe and lufty, ranged them felues again in aray both preft and redy to abide a newe felde, and alfo to inuade and newly to fet on theyr enemies, and fo couragioufly thei fet on the earles of Marle & Faucombzige and the lozdes of Louray and of Thyne, whiche with .vi.C. men of armes had all day kept together and flew them out hand.

When the kyng had paffed through the felde & faw neither refiftence noz apparaunce of any Frenchemen fauyng the dead cozfes, he caufed the retrayte to be blowen, and brought al his army together about .iiii. of the clocke at after noone. And fyrft to geue thankes to almightie God geuer & tributoz of this glozious victozy, he caufed his prelates & chapelaines fyrft to fyng this pfalme In exitu Iſrael de Egipto. &c. commaundyng euery man to knele doune on the ground at this verfe. Non nobis domine, non nobis, fed nomini tuo da gloriam, which is to fay in Engliſh, Not to vs lozd, not to vs, but to thi name let the gozy be geuen: whiche done he caufed Te deum with certaine anthemes to be fong geuyng laudes and praifynges to God, & not boãftyng noz braggynge of him felfe noz his humaine power.

THAT night he toke refreſhyng of fuche as he found in the Frenche campe, and in the mozning Moũtioy kyng at armes and .iiii. Heraultes came to hym to knowe the nombze of prifoners and to defire burial foz them whiche were flaine. Befoze he could make any anfwere to the

Heraultes, he remembring that it is more honorable to bee praised of his enemies, then to be extolled of his frendes: and he that praiseth him selfe lacketh louyng neighbors: wherfore he demaunded of thē why thei made to him that requeit, consideryng that he knew not certaynly whether the praise & the victory were mete to be attributed to him or to their nacion. Oh Lorde of Mountioy kyng at Armes, thinke you vs officers of armes to be rude and bestiall persons? If we for the affection that we beare to our naturall countrey, woulde ether for fauor or mede hide or deny your glorious victory: The foules of the ayer, the wormes of x the ground feoyng on the multitude of the dead carions, by your onely puyssaunce destroyed and confounded, will beare witnesse againste vs, ye and muche more the captiues whiche be liuing and in your possession with their Wiues and litle Infauntes will saie wee bee openly arts and vntrue taletellers: Wherefore accordyng to the dutie of our office whiche is or should bee alwaies indifferently to write and truely to iudge, we saie, determine and affirme that the Victory is yours, the honour is yours and yours is the Glorye, aduising you, as you haue Wankully gotten it, so polletikely to vse it. Well saied the kyng, seeyng this is your determinacion, I willingly accepte thee same, desiryng you too xx know the name of thee castle nere adioining. When they had answered that it was called Agyncourt, he said that this conflict should be called the battaill of Agyncourte, whiche victorye hathe not been obteined by vs nor our power, but onely bi the sufferaunce of GOD for inury and vntruethe that we haue receaued at the handes of your Prince and hys nacion. That daie he feasted the Frenche officers of Armes and graunted theym their requeste, whiche busely soughte throughe the felde for suche as were slaine, but the Englishemen suffred theym not to go alone for they serched with them and founde many hurt but not in ieoperdy of their life, whom thei toke prisoners and brought them into their tentes.
xxi VVHEN the king of Englande had well refreshed hymselfe and his souldiers and had taken thee spoyle of suche as were slayne, he with hys prisoners in good ordre returned to his toune of Calice. When tydynges of this notable victory was blowen into Englande, solempne processions and other praisynges to almightie GOD, with Bonefiers and dances wer ordeigned in euery toune, cite and borough, and the Maire and the citizens of the citee of London wente thee morowe after the daie of sainct Simon and Jude from the Churche of Saincte Paule to the church of S. Peter at Westminster in deuoute manner rendring to god their moofte humble and hartye thankes for his haboundant grace and xl forturnate lucke geuen and sent to the kyng their souereigne lord.

VVHEN the kyng of Englande was departed the sondaye toward Caleis, diuerse Frenchmen repaired to the plain where the battaill was and remoued agayn the ded bodies, some to fynde their lordes and masters and theim to conueygh into theire countreys there too bee buried, some to spoyle and take the reliques whiche thee Englishemen had lefte behynde: For thei toke nothyng but gold, siluer iuelles, riche apparell and costly armure. But the ploughmen and peysantes spoyled the dead carcasses, leuyng them neither shette nor cloute, and so they laie starke naked till Wednesday. On the whiche daie diuerse of the noble menne wer conueighed into their countrees and the remnant were by Philip erle Charoloys (sore lamentyng the chaunce and moued with pitee) att his cost and charge buried in a square plot of xv.C.yardes, in the whi= ch he caused to be made thre pittes, wherin wer buried by accompt.v. M.and viii.C.persons beside them that wer caried awaie by their frēn= des and seruauntes, and other whiche beyng wounded to death died in x Hospitalles and other places, whiche groūd after was made a churche yarde, and for feare of Wolues enclosed with a high walle

AFTER this dolorous iorney and piteous, slaughter, diuerse clerc= kes of Paris made many lamentable Verses, complayning that the kyng reigned by will, and that counsaillers wer perciall, affirming that the noble men fled against nature, and that the commons were destroyed by their prodigality, declaring also that the clergy wer domb and durst not saie the truth, and that the humble cōmons duely obeyed and yet e= uer suffered ponishment: For which cause by persecution deuine, the lesse numbre vanquished, and the great was ouercome. Wherfore thei xx concluded that all thynges were out of ordre, and yet there was no man that studied to bryng the vntuly to fraime. And no meruel though this battaill were doloyous and lamentable to the Frenche nacion, for in it were taken and slayne the flower of all the nobilitie of Fraunce, for there wer taken prisoners.

But ſurely by the relacion of the xx Heraultes and declaracion of other notable Perſons worthy of credite as Enguerrant writeth, there wer ſlain on the Frenche parte aboue ten thouſande perſones wherof wer princes and nobles bearyng banners Cxxvi. and all the remnant ſauyng xvi. C. wer knightes, eſquiers and gentelmen: ſo of noble men and gentelmen were ſlain. viii. M. iiii. C, of the whiche. v. C. wer dubbed knightes the night before the battail. Frõ the felde eſcaped on lyue, the erle Dampmartyn, the lorde Delartuier, Clunet of Brabante, ſir Lewes of Burbon, ſir Galliot of Gaules, ſyr Jhon Dengermes and few other men of name.

C, perſons, whiche is not vnlyke, conſidring ỹ the battail was earneſtly and furiouſly foughte by the ſpace of three long houres wherfore it is not incredible nor yet vnpoſſible but more Engliſhemen then. xxv. were ſlain and deſtroyed.

THIS battail may be a mirror and a glaſſe to all Chriſtian princes to beholde and followe, for kyng Henry nether truſted in the puiſſaunce of his people, nor in the fortitude of his champions, nor in the ſtrength of xl his barded horſes, nor yet in his owne pollicie, but he putte in GOD (which is the corner ſtone and immouable rocke) his whole confidence hope & truſt. And he which neuer leaueth them deſtitute that putt their confidence in hym, ſent to hym this glorious victory, whiche victory is almoſt incredible if we had not redde in thee booke of kinges that God likewiſe had defended and aided them that onely put their truſt in hym

AFTER that the kynge of Englande had refreshed hymselfe and hys souldiours in the Toune of Calice, and that suche prisoners as he had lefte at Harflew (as you haue heard) wer come to hym to Caleys: the.vi. day of Nouembre he with all his Prisoners toke shippyng at Caleis, and the same day landed at Douer, hauynge with hym the dead bodies of the duke of Yorke and the erle of Suffolke, and caused the Duke to bee buried at his colledge of Fodrynghey, and the erle at Ewhelme. In this passage the seas were so rough and troubleous that two shyppes laden with souldiors apperteyning to sir Jhon Cornewall Lorde Fanhop, wer driuen into zelande, howbeyt nothyng was lost nor no person was perished. The kyng by soft iourneis with al his prisoners cam to London and so to Westminster, where he rested hymself a conuenient time to deliuer his Prisoners to their kepers, and to se them all in saue custody. Here I might declare vnto you if I woulde bee tedious and Prolixe, how the Mayre of London and the Senate appareled in orlēt grayned Skarlet, how .iij. C. comoners clad in beautiful Murrey well mounted and gorgeously horsed with riche collers and greate chaynes met the kyng at Blackhethe, reioysyng at his victorious returne. How the clergy of London with riche crosses, sūpteous copes & Wassy cēlers receiued hym at .s. Thomas of Watering with solempne procession lauding and prasing God for the high honor and victory to hym geuen & graunted: but all these thynges I omit and returne to the very matter.

WHEN the dolorous tidynges of this bloudy battaill was declared to the Frenche kyng beeyng then at Roan, and with hym the Dolphyn, the dukes of Berry and Bryteyne and his second sonne therle of Ponthew, if he lamented this chaunce and cursed that euill daie in the whiche he lost so many noble men, no man haue maruaill. And yet thee dolor was not onely hys, for the ladies sowned for the deathes of theyr housebandes, the Orphalines wept and rēt their heates for the losse of their patentes, the kayze damoselles defied that day in thee whiche they had lost their paramors, the seruātes waxed mad for destrucciō of their masters, and finally euery frend for his frende, euery cosyn for his alye, euery neighbor for his neighbor, was sory, displeased & greued. Where fore the Frenche kyng and his counsell perceiuing that the warre was but newely begon, and that toward them with euill spede, determined to prouide for chances that might folowe, and to forsee thynges or they sodainly happened. And first he elected his chief officer for the warres called the Constable, whiche was therle of Arminack, a wise and a politique capitain and an auncient enemye to thenglishmen, and sir Jhon of Corsey was made Master of the Crosbowes, and then they fortyfied tounes & furnished garrisons. While these thynges were thus in worckyng, either for Melancoly that he had for the losse at Agincourt or by some sodayn disease, Jhon Dolphyn of Vienoys heire apparaunte to Charles the Frenche kyng departed out of this naturall life without issue, whiche was an happy chaunce for Robynet of Bournouille and his compaignions as you haue heard before, for his deathe was their life, and his life would haue been their death.

After this notable victory obteined by the Englishmē & ỳ kyng Henry was departed into England, & the Frē- che kyng had made newe officers in hope to relieue & set vp againe the old estate of his realme & countrey, Tho- mas duke of Excester capitain of Harflew accōpanied with thre M. Englishmen made a great road into Nor- mandy, almoste to thee city of Roan: In whiche iorney he gat great habundaunce bothe of riches and prisoners. But in his re- turne therle of Armynacke newly made Constable of Fraunce, enten- dyng in his first iorney to wynne his spurres, and in his compaignie a boue. v. M. horsemen, encountred with hym. The skirmishe was sore and the fight fierse, but because the Englishemen wer not able to resyste the force of the Frenche Horsemen, the Duke to saue his men was com- pelled to retire, as polletiquely as he could deuise: But for all that he could do he lost almost. ccc. of his fotemen. The Frenchmen not content with this good lucke folowed theim almoste too thee Barriers of Har- flew. When the Englishemen within the toune espied the chase, thei is- sued oute in good ordre and met with their enemies, and not onely slew and toke a greate numbre of theim, but also chased theym aboue eyghte miles toward the citee of Roan.

ABOVTE this season Sigismond Emperour of Almayne whiche had maried Barbara doughter to therle of Zilie cosyn germayn remoued to kyng Henry (as by the pedegree set out in the end of this boke you shall plainly perceiue) a man of greate vertue and fidelitie, whiche had nott only long labored to set an vnitie and concord in Christes Churche and christian religion, bnt also he sent diuers Ambassadors aswel to ỳ frēch kyng as to the kyng of Englande, because he was farre distaunt from their countreies and regions to encrease perfight peace and reasonable vnitie. Wherfore, seyng that his Ambassade broughte nothyng to con- clusion he in person came frō the farthest part of Hungary into Fraunce and after into England, intendyng to knit together all christian pryn- tes in one line and amitee, and so beyng frendes together, to make warre and reuenge their quarrelles against the Turk the persecutor of Chri- stes faithe and enemie to all christendome. With this noble Emperor came the Archebishoppe of Reynes and diuerse other noble men, as Am- bassadors frō the Frenche kyng into England. The kyng of Englande for old amitee betwene the hous of Englande and Beame, withall hys nobilitie hym receiued on Blackheth the. vii. date of Maie, and brought him through London to Westminster with greate triumphe, where Justes, tournayes and other marcyall feates were to hym with all ioye and pleasure shewed and set furth. During whiche tyme there came in to Englande Albert duke of Hollande, whiche also was frendly entertetgned. And theese twoo pynces were by thee kyng conueihed to Wynsoze to. S. Geozges feast, and elected compaignions of thee noble ozdre of the Garter, and had the coloz and habite of the same to theim deliuered, satte in their stalles all thee solempnitie of thee feaste: by thee whiche ozdze thei knowledged themselues highly honozed and muche exalted. After this solempne feast finished, the duke of Holland well feasted and greatly rewarded, returned into his countrey. But the Emperoz tatied still, neuer ceasyng too declare & perswade what vtilitie, what goodnes and what ioye mighte ensue if bothe thee realmes of Englande and Fraunce wer brought to a finall concozd and perfighte vnitee But thee euell chaunce of the Frenche nacion was to his purpose a barre and a lette, because thei were predestinate to suffre yet moze plagues and detrimentes of thenglishe people then befoze thei had tasted. Foz when concozde was at hande and peace was enteryng into the gates, a newe cause of moze discozd and dissencion sodainly brake out and came to the kynges knowledge: foz he beyng infozmed of the losse of his mẽ at the conflict late had in the territozy of Roan (as you haue heard) was so displeased and vnquieted that he woulde heare of no treatye, noz haue once this word peace named.

THE Empiroz like a wise pzince, seyng then the aspect of the planet reigned contraty to his purpose, ceassed to talke of the matter any moze till an other daie when the coniũction should be in moze meker signes stirring to peace. And so when a meete & conuenient tyme came he bzoched again the vessell of concozd and amitee, & put it in so faire a cup and pzesented it with suche pleasant wozdes, that surely the kyng had tasted it sufficiently if ỹ Frenchmẽ had not sodaynly pzepared a new army. Foz thertle of Azmnacke puffed vp with his laste victozy, although the honoz wer small and the gain lesse, determined clerely to get agayne the toune of Harflewe, wherfoze as closely as he could, he gathered together men in euery parte, and appoynted theim all to mete at Harflewe at a daie assigned. The appointment was kept and the Toune was besieged bothe by water and lãd befoze the Capitaines of the toune knewe perfightly the first motion. Foz Jhon Vicount Narbon Viceadmirall of Fraunce had bzought the whole naup to the ruage and shoze adioynyng to the toune, entendyng pziuily to haue entered into thee toune on the water side oz he had been perceiued, But his subtle ymagmacion toke no place, foz thei whiche kept the wache toute, sodainly perceiuing their enemies to appzoche, rang the alarum bell. The duke of Excester incontinente caused all his men to repaire to thee walles, and fozti fied the gates, and dispatched a swifte Barke to kyng Henry with letters, requiring hym of ayde and succoz. Although thee Frenchemen perceiued that their wyly enterprice was knowen, and that the toune could not be taken and sodeinly stolen as thei had deuised, yet they continued their siege both by water and by lande, and made diuerse assaultes, at the whiche if thei nothyng gained yet euer somewhat thei lost.

When these newes were come to the eares of kyng Henry, and that hee knewe that his people were in greate ieopardy excepte greate diligence were vsed for their relief and deliueraunce, he without delay apparelled a greate nauy & intended in person to minister succours to his subiectes so besieged. The Emperor Sigismond sagely dissuaded him and wisely counsailed him not to aduenture him selfe in that iorney, but onely to x send some valiant capitain whiche shortly mighte appease that furious storme & quickely to quenche that blasing flame: aduertising him that it was neither necessary nor honorabli for a prince in whome thee whoole waight and charge of the cõmon welth consisteth, to aduenture and hazard him self in euery peril and doutfull chaunce. The kyng beyng persuaded with the reasonable and louing aduertisement of his frende thee emperor, appointed the Duke of Bedforde his Brother, accompanied with therles of Marche, Marshall, Oxford, Huntyngdon, Warwycke, Arundell, Salisbury, Deuonshyre, and diuerse Barons with. CC. saile to passe into Normandy for rescew of the toune of Harflew. Whiche xx makyng good expedicion shipped at Rye, and with a prosperous wynd and a freshe gale came to the mouth of the riuer of Seyn on the daye of the assumpcion of our Lady. When the Vicount Narbon perceiued the Englishe nauy to approche, hee geuing a token to all his company, corragiously set toward his enemies & gate the possession of thee mouthe of the hauen. When the duke of Bedford perceiued the nauy of his enemies to come forward so fiersly he set before certayn stronge and well made shippes, whiche at the first encounter vanquished and toke twoo Frenche shippes (whereof the capiteines were rashe and somewhat to bold) withal their souldioures and tackelyng. The duke folowed incõtinently with all his puissaunce and like a valiant capitain with greate xxx courage and audacitie, set on his enemies: thee fighte was long, but not so long as perilous, nor so perilous as terrible, for battailes of the sea be euer desperate, for neither the assailauntes nor defendantes loke for any refuge, nor know any backdoze how to scape out. After long fighte the victory fell to the Englishemen, and they toke and sonke almoost all the whoole Nauy of Fraunce, in the whiche were many shippes hulkes and Carickes to the numbre of fiue hundred, of the whiche. iii. great Carickes were sent into England In the same conflict were slaine of thee Frenchmen no small nombre as it appered by their bodies which swarmed euery daie about the Englishe shippes.

xl AFTER this victory fortunately obteined, the duke of Bedforde sailed by water vp to the very toune of Harflew, and without let or impedyment landed and refreshed it both with vitaile and money. Which succors if they were welcome to the duke of Excester his vncle, I report me to them that haue bene in necessitie and woulde haue gladly bene refreshed.

When

VVHEN the earle of Armynacke heard that the puissaunt nauye of Fraunce was vanquished & taken, he raised hys siege before the toune and returned wyth smal ioy to Paris, as he that had no hope nor sawe any lykelyhod or meane to recouer again the toune of Harflew for whe che he so sore thirsted.

AFTER this discomfiture and great losse, the fortitude & strength of the Frenchmen began to decay, & their bragging beautie began to fade, For nowe the princes & nobles of the realme fel into diuision & discorde among them selues, as who saye, that the nobilitie studyng howe to reuenge theyr olde iniuries and displeasures, refused to take payne for thaduauncemēt of the publique wealth and sauegard of theyr countrey And for priuy displeasure or couert hatred, theyr power began to were so slender, & theyr libertie was brought into suche a malicious diuersitie and doubtfull difference, that as hereafter shalbe shewed, it was mery ueil that theyr coūtrey was not brought to a perpetual bondage: whyche thing no doubt had folowed if kyng Henry had lenger liued in this mutable worlde. For notwithstandyng that the duke of Orleaunce the capitaine and head of the one faction was at that tyme captiue and prisoner in England, yet there grewe so muche priuy displeasure & cankard hatred betwene Charles the Dolphyn and Jhon duke of Burgoyne, that while the one studied, compassed and deuised how to ouercome the other with armure or wyth policy, with dissimulacion or craftye cōueyaunce, euery torneiman of their faction, & euery noble man partaker wyth the one or the other put all theyr whole study and diligence to auance forward theyr sect and part, and not one of them would take hede howe to resist and refell the present icopardye whyche was comyng out of England. And as one incōuenience suffred many to folow so was it in Fraunce at this time, for the French kyng was not of good memory, the war that was toward, semed both doubtfull and perilous. the princes were vntrusty and at discord, and an hundreth mo thinges whiche might bryng the realme to extreme misery and vtter distructiō as after you shall heare.

VVHEN the Duke of Bedford had acheued hys enterprise and performed hys cōmission, bothe in raisyng the siege of Harflew and victayling of the toune, he with no smal nombre of prisoners and greate habundance of pray as wel in shippes as prouision for the sea, returned into England wyth great triumph and glory. For that victory he was not so much thanked of the kyng his brother, as lauded and praised by the Emperor Sigismond beyng to hym a straunger, whiche sayd openly, happy are those subiectes whyche haue suche a kyng, but more happy is the kyng that hath suche subiectes

VVHEN the Emperoure perceiued, that to moue farther a peace, was but a vayne request, and to tarye lenger in Englande to procure an amitie was but losse of tyme, because he sawe the Englyshemens myndes sore offended wyth the last siege of Harflew, with whyche facte,

he

he hym selfe was not welcõtent but gteatly moued: Therefoze leauing all treaty and persuasion, he entered into a league and amitie with the kyng of England. Whiche confederacy least it should be broken euery of the cõtractoys studied & deuised al waies and meanes possible howe to obserue it vnuiolated and preserue it vnbroken: whiche playne meaning and true dealing was to thẽ both after, not onely much honoz but greate cõmoditie. When the Emperoz had thus cõcluded a league with the kyng of England and had done al thynges in England accozdyng as was thought necessary, he toke his iozney homeward into Germany, and the kyng partely to shewe him pleasure, and partely because of his owne affaires, associated him to his toune of Calice. Duryng whiche tyme the duke of Burgoyn offered to come to Calice to speake with the Emperoz and the kyng because he heard speake of the League and confederacy that was concluded betwene them. The kyng sent to the water of Graueling the Duke of Gloucester his bzother, and the earle of Marche to be hostages foz the duke of Burgoyne, and sent also thee earle of Warwicke with a noble company to cõduct him to his presẽce At Grauelyng toozde the dukes met, and after salutacions done, thee duke of Burgoyn was conueighed to Caleys, where of the Emperoz & of the kyng he was highly feasted and welcommed. Duryng whiche tyme a peace was concluded betwene the kyng of England & the duke of Burgoyn foz a certain space, cõcerning onely the counties of Flaunders and Arthoys, foz the whiche cause the French kyng and hys sonne were highly displeased. The duke of Gloucester also was receiued at Grauelyng by the earle Charoloys sonne to the duke of Burgoyne, and by him honozably conueighed to S. Omers & there lodged that nyght The next day the Earle Charoloys came with diuers noblemen to visite the duke of Gloucester in his lodging, and when he entered into the chambze the Dukes backe was towarde him, talkyng with some of his seruauntes, and did not se noz welcome the erle Charoloys at the fyzste entrey: but after he saied to him shoztly without any great reuerence oz cõmyng toward him, you be welcome kayze cosyn, and so passed fourthe his tale with his seruantes. The earle Charoloys foz al his youth was not wel content, but suffred foz that tyme, VVHEN the duke of Burgoyn had done all thynges at Caleys that he came foz, he after the ix day returned to Grauelyng, where the Duke of Glouester and he met agayne, and louingly departed the one to Caleys and the other to saincte Omers: foz the whiche voiage the duke of Burgoyn was suspected to be enemy to the croune of Fraunce. After all the dukes departyng, the Emperoz was highly feasted and rewarded, and at his pleasure sailed into Holand, and so roade into Beame. The kyng likewise toke ship and returned into England on Sainct Lukes euen, the yere of our Lozd, 1417.

In

N this yere the kyng assembled together his high Court of Parliament, and there in open Audience made to theim a shorte and pithy Oracion, declarynge vnto them the iniuries lately doone and committed by the Frenche Nacion, he showing also the iust and lawfull occasion of hys warres, signifieng furthermore the great discord and Ciuile dissencion whiche reigned amongest the Nobilitie of Fraunce, reherlyng many thynges for the whiche it were very necessary and nedefull to represse & ouercome them withal their power & puissaunce, & that without deferryng or prolongyng of tyme, desiryng thē to prouide for money & treasure out of hand for the conduct & wages of souldiors, to thentent that nothyng should lacke when they should be redy to set on their enemies. His causes wer so iust and his demaūdes so reasonable, that he had no soner spoken but it was assented, and he had no soner demaūded but it was graunted. And for to geue men a courage for to go furth, money was first gathered to make prouision for al thynges necessary for suche a royal voyage. for surely ther was no creature whiche with that warr was either discontented or displeased, for it semed to al mē no lesse profitable then honorable, nor no lesse honorable then conuenient. xlii

IN this Parliament also Jhon Duke of Bedford was made gouernor or regent of the realme and head of the publique welth, which office he should enioy as long as the kyng was making warre on the French nacion. The kyng before he would take hys voyage, sent the erle of Huntyngton to serche and skoure the seas, least any Frenchemen lyng in wayte for hym, might attrap him sodeinly or he had any knowledge of their settyng forward. This lusty earle called Jhon Holand, sonne to the Duke of Excester beheded at Circiter in the tyme of kyng Henry the fourth and cosyn to the kyng with a great numbre of shippes seatched the sea from the one coast to the other. And in conclusion he encoūtred with .ix. great Caricks of Jeane (which lord Jaques, the bastard of Burbon had reteined to serue the Frenche kyng) & set on thē sharpely, the conflict was great & the fight long, but in coclusion the Frenchemen wer ouercome and fled, and .iii. of the greatest Caricks, with their patrones, and Monsure Jaques de Burbon their Admiral wer taken with asmuche money as should haue payed the souldiors of the whole flete for halfe a yere, and .iij. other Caricks wer bouged and sent to the botome of the sea. xliii

THE kyng hearyng of this good chaunce, about the end of July toke his ship at Portesmouth, accōpanied with the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester bretherne to the sayd kyng, the Earles of Huntyngdon, Mershall, Warwike, Deuonshyre, Salisbury, Suffolke, and Sōmerset: The lordes Rosse, Wyllowghby, Fitzhugh, Clynton, Scrope, Mautrivers, Bourchier, Ferreys of Groby and Ferreys of Chartley, Fanhope, Gray of Codnore, sir Gilbert Umfreuile, sir Gilbert Talbot & di- xlv

uers other: and so hauing the wynd and wether to his desier, he lãded in Normãdy nere a castle called Touque, wher he cõsulted with his capitaines what wai was best to be taken cõcerning their high enterprice.

THE Normans hearyng of the kynges arriual wer sodaynly striken with a deadly feare and wer almost distracted frõ their sences for dred. wherfore like mad menne in desperacion they ranne out of their houses, tounes and villages with wiues ond chyldren, bag and baggage into the walled tounes and fortified garrisons, cariyng with theym corne, wyne and vitayle nessessary for their sustenance and lyuing, preparyng swordes, hatchettes, crossbowes and al other weapons mete to set back and resist their enemies, sent woord to Charles the Frenche kyng, requiryng hym to defend and preserue his louing subiectes against theyr cruell and fierse enemies. The men of warre whiche were left in euery place to skoure the countrey, went into walled tounes with the rurall cõminaltee, to thentent to aide and assist the tounes menne, for well they knewe that they were not able to resiste their enemies beyng abroade in the feld. So were al the walled tounes and castles in Normandy and Mayne wel furnished with men and vitaile. The names of the Frenche capitaines were to tedious to reherse, and therefore I ouer passe them.

WHEN kyng Henry had taken counsel, he laied siege to the castle of Touque beyng very wel fortified both with nature and mannes arte and began to assault it: & although that they within valiantly defended it, yet by fine force he ouercame it, & toke it, and them within to mercy, & made thereof capitayne sir Robert Ketkeley knight, and after determyned to besiege the strong toune of Caen, remembryng accordyng to thee dutye of a good capitaine, that the Frenchemen woulde come to healpe their frendes beynge in nede and extreame necessitte: whiche thyng hee moste desired and wished. And vpõ ỹ purpose he set furth toward Caen after thewarlikest fashion, depopulatyng the coũtrey, & destroyeng thee villages on euery part as he passed. The toune of Caen standeth in a playne fertile coũtrey, no stronger walled then depe Diched, wel vitayled and replenished with people. For the citizens fearyng the kynges cõmyng had prouided for al thynges necessary & defensible. And assone as the kyng was come, he cast a depe trenche with a high mount to prohibite theym within the toune to haue any egresse or outwarde passage: and that done, began fiersly to assault the toune. But the men of thee toune wer nothyng abashed and stode manly to their defence, abydyng al chaunces which might ensue. The fight was fierce and euery man toke hede to his charge. The Englishmen studied all the waies possible to daunmage their enemies, some shot arrowes, some cast stones and other shot gonnes: some brake the walles with engynes and other undermined: some set skalyng ladders to the wall, and other cast in wylde fyre, euery man laboured to come to handstrokes, whiche was their desyre, On the other side, the Normans threw doune great stones, barres of yron, dartes, hote pitche and burnyng brymstone and boyling lead.

diuers daies this assault cõtinued, not to the litle losse of the Englyshemen, whiche toke more harme of the defẽders then they gat hurte of thee assailantes. When kyng Henry perceiued that the dice ranne not to his purpose, he abstained from the assault, and determined by vnderminyng to subuert and ouerthrowe the walles and towers of the toune. Wherefore withal diligence the pyoners cast trenches & the labozers broughte tymber, so that within a fewe daies the walles stode onely vppo postes, to fall when fire should be put to it. The kyng caused his people to approche the walles and to kepe thee Citizens occupied, leaste either they shoulde make a coũtremyne or be an impediment to his workemen and labozers. Wherfore he caused thassaulte to be cried agayne: then euery man ranne to the walles, some with skalyng ladders, some with hookes and some with cordes and plommettes, euery man desieryng to get vpõ the walles and with hand to hand to graple with his enemy: The citezens manfully defended. While the fight was quicke and feirse on both partes, the Englishmen in diuers places perced and brake through thee walles, and diuers ouertures and holes were made vnder the Foundacion by the pyoners, by the whiche thenglishmen mighte easely enter in to the towne. The kyng hauyng cõpassion on the tounes men, desyryng rather to haue them saued then destroyed if they wold humbly submitte thẽ selues to his grace, & fearyng that if the toune by fine force shoulde be spoyled and taken, that he should be compelled to geue it as a pray to his men of warre to be sacked and destroied, sent them woorde by an Herault that yet the tyme of mercye and clemency if thẽy woulde incontinently render them selues & the toune: But they obstinately hoppynge of succouz, answered that thei would stand at their defence. Then the Englishmen agayn skaled the walles and enterpzised to enter through the trenches. The fight was soze by the space of an houre, the Englishmen couragiously enfozced to enter, and the Nozmans manfully defended, but in conclusion the Englishmen obteined.

WHEN the kyng was possessed of thee toune, he incontinently commaunded all harneys and weapons to bee brought into one place whiche with al diligence was done with out any resistence. Then the miserable people knelyng on their knees, holdyng vp their handes & cried mercy mercy, to whome the kyng gaue certayne comfortable woozdes & bad them stand vp. And then as he was euer accustomed to do he went on fote to the chief churche in the toune and rendzed to God his moste hearty thankes foz his prosperous successe and foztunate chaunce. And yet that same night he would not slepe, but commaunded al his army to watche in aray, either leaste his men of warre in the nighte tyme myghte fal to spoyle & sacke, oz els the citizens featyng thee sequele that myght ensue would pzively steale and conueigh theim selues away.

IN the mozning he called althe magistrates and gouernozs into the Senate House, wheare some foz their stony stubbernes and mad obstinacye were adiudged to dye, other were soze fined and highly raunsomed.

somed. Then he callyng together his souldiors and men of war, boths gaue to thē high laudes and prayses for their manlye doynges, and also distributed to euery man accordyng to his desert the spoyle & gaine taken of the toune & the tounesmen, chiefly because at that assault he had tried to his honor their valiant corages and vnfearfull hertes.

It is to be imagined that kynge Henry in this conflict would principally shewe aswell his owne force as the puissance and experience in warres of his nacion, ether to the intent that the Frenchemen shoulde know that they mette with suche an enemy as both was able to inuade f their countrie and defend their strength & malice, or els not obliuious that in makyng of warre euery prince muste study to obtaine fame and renoune: and as the old prouerbe saieth, of a thyng well begone, succedeth a prosperous ende and a happy conclusion.

Although the toune were wonne: yet the castle whyche was strong and well fortified bothe with men and all thynges necessary for the defence, was yet in the Frenchemens possession: The capitayn where of, to thentent to shewe hymselfe valiante and not willyng to breake hys othe, neither to wauer frō hys allegeance, bosted that he would rather dye in the defence then frely yeld the castle. Kyng Henry was not muff ded to subuert the Castle (without whiche waie it was not easy to bee wonne) because it was beautifull and necessary, both to kepe the toune frō goynge backe, and also to defend thesame when opportunite shoulde serue: Whyche Castle yf he destroyed, he of very necessitee must agayn build and reedifie, or els another in the place. Wherfore he sent worde to the lorde Mountayny beyng capitain, that if he would yelde the castle by a daie, he should depart without dammage. And yf he would be foolishe and obstinate, all clemencye and fauor shoulde be from hym requestred. When the capitain and his compaignions had well digested his message, beyng in dispaire of cōfort, vpon the condicions offred, renfff dred the Castle and yelded themselfes. And so kynge Henry obteigned bothe the toune and castle of Caen.

While the Kyng of England was besiegyng this toune, the Frenchmen had nether a conuenient hoste to resist their power, nor were readye or able to releue their frendes in this miserable necessite, because thei had such deuision and dissencion emongest themselfes, and a good cause why: for kyng Charles was of so small wit by reason of hys sicknes, that he could not rule, and so he was spoyled both of hys treasure and of his kyngdome, and euery man spente and wasted the common treasure. Charles the Dolphin beyng of the age of.xvj.or.xvij.yeres fl onely lamented and bewailed the ruyne and decaye of his countrie: He onely studied thaduauncemēt of the comon wealth, and he onely deuised how to resist his enemies: but hauyng nether menne nor money, he was greatly troubled and vnquieted. And in conclusion, by the counsaill of therle of Armynacke Constable of Fraunce, he founde a meane to get all the treasure and riches whiche quene Isabell his mother had gotten and hoxded in diuerse secrete places: and fox the comon vtilite of his countrie he spente it wisely in wagyng of souldiozs and pzeparyng of thinges necessary fox ỹ war. The quene foxgettyng the great perell that the realme then stode in, but remẽbzyng ỹ displesure to her by this act dooen, declared her sonne and the Constable to be her moztall enemies, & promised that they should be persecuted to the vttermoste. And eue fox very womanlye malice, she set in the highest authozitie aboute the kyng her husband, Jhon duke of Burgoyn geuynge hym the regiment and direccion of the kynge and hys realme with all pzeheminence and souerauntie. The duke of Burgoyn hauyng now the swozde of au- x thozitie, fox the whiche he so soze longed, and glad to be reuenged of his old iniuries, began to make warre on the Dolphyn: and when he had once tamed and framed to his purpose this younge vnbzideled gentleman, then he determined as he might to refel and withstande the comẽ enemies of the realme. Thesame oz like reason moued the Dolphin, fox he myndyng firste to repzesse and extincte the ciuill dissencion at home, befoze he woulde inuade foxain enemies, pzepared warre to subdew & destroy duke Jhõ of Burgoyn as the chief hed & leader of that wicked and great mischief: Wherby the realme was muche vnquieted & moze decayed, and in maner bzought to a finall ruyne and otter destruccion. xx So Fraunce was inflamed and in euery part troubled with warre and deuision, and yet no man would ether pzouide in so great a danger, noz once put furth their finger to hynder the mischief.

Kynge Henry not myndyng to lye still in Nozmandye, noz to leaue his enterpzice vnperfozmed, sent the duke of Clarence to the sea coaste, whiche with greate difficulty gatte the toune of Bayeux. The duke of Glocestre also with small assault and lesse defence toke the citee of Liseaux. In the meane ceason Kyng Henry taried still at Cane fozteficynge the toune and the castle, & put out of the toune. xv. C. women and impotent persons, and replenished the toune with English people. While xxx the kyng soiourned at Caen, he kepte there a solempne feast and made many knightes, and be beside that, he shewed there an example of great pitee & moze deuocion. Foz in searchyng the castle he found there innumerable substance of plate and money belongyng to the citezens, wher of he would not suffre one peny to be touched oz conueighed away, but restozed the goodes to the owners & deliuered to euery mã his owne. When the fame of gettyng of Caen was blowen thzough Nozmandy, the Nozmans wer so soze afraied & so muche abashed that you shoulde not onely haue seen men, women & childzen tonnyng in euery waye by great plõpes frõ toune to toune, not knowyng whether to flie: but also xl the rurall persones and husbande men dzaue the beastes out of the villages into suche places where thei hoped of refuge oz defence: so that a man would haue thought that Nozmandy had sodainly been left desolate and voyde of people and catell. But when the rumoz was spzed abzoade of his clemency shewed to captiues and of his mercye graunted

to suche as submitted themselfes to his grace, all the capitaines of the tounes adioynyng came willyngly to his presence, offryng to him them selfes, their tounes and their goodes. Wherupon he made proclamacion that all men which had or would become hys subiectes and swere to hym allegeance should enioy their goodes and liberties in as large or more ample maner then they did before. Which gentle entreteinyng and fauorable hādlyng of the stubburne Normans, was the very cause why they wer not only contēt, but also glad to remoue and turne from the Frenche part and become subiectes to the croune of Englande.

x When kynge Henry had set Caen in a good ordre, he left there, for capitaines, the one of the toune and the other of the Castle, sir Gilbert Umfreuile erle of Kyne, and sir Gilbert Talbot: and made bailife there sir Jhon Popham, and so departed frō Caen to Argenton which was shortly rēdred to hym. When the kynge of England wanne thus in Noymandy, hys nauy loſte nothynge on the ſea, but ſo ſkowred the ſtremes that nether Frencheman nor Briton durſt once apere, howbeit one day there aroſe ſo hideous a tempeſt and ſo terrible a ſtoyme, that nether cable held noz anker pzeuailed, ſo that yf the erles of Marche and Huntyngdon had not taken the hauē of Southamptō, the whole nauie had periſhed and the people had been deſtroyed, and yet the ſauegard was ſtraunge: Foz in theſame hauen two Balyngers and two great Carickes laden with marchaundiſe wer dzouned, and the bzoken Maſte of another Caricke was blowen ouer the wall of Hāpton (as diuerſe writers affirme) ſuch is the power of the wynd, and ſuche is the rigoure of the tempeſt. Whē the fury of the wynd was aſſwaged and the ſea waxed calme, therles of Marche and Huntyngdon paſſed ouer the ſea with all their compainy and landed in Noymandy marchyng towarde the kynge, befoze whom the Noymans fled as faſt as the fearfull hare dooth befoze the gredye Greyhounde, oz the ſely Partridge befoze the Sparowhauke. And ſo they paſſed thzough the countrie deſtroiynge of villages and takynge paynes tyll thei came to the kyng goyng towarde Roan. Duryng this marciall feactes and greate conqueſtes in Noymandy, ſir Jhon Oldecaſtle Loyde Cobham whiche as you haue heard befoze was conuicted of hereſy, and proclaimed a rebell, and vpon theſame outlawed, and bzake out of the toure, was now as his foztune chaunced apprehended in the Marches of Wales by the Loyde Powes, and ſo reſtoyed to hys olde lodgyng in the toure, where hys kepers looked moze narowly to hym then thei dyd befoze. After whyche takynge, he was dzawen from the toure on a hardell to Sainct Giles felde, and there hanged in chaynes, and after conſumed with fire. Well nowe leauyng the matters of Englande let vs returne to the affaires in Noymandy.

After kyng Henry had thus victoziouſly obteined ſo many tounes and ſo many foztreſſes from the poſſeſſion of his enemies, and that his great fame and litle perſonage was the whole terroz and feare of the Frenche nacion, he ymagined with hymſelf that he had nothyng doen noz anye thyng gotten excepte he bzought the famous citie of Roan beyng the Empery and diademe of the Duchy of Noymandy into his poſſeſſion & dominion, to the whiche out of euery parte the Noymans had conueighed their money Jewelles and houſhold ſtuffe: And whyche

tressed with many rampiers & stronge bulwarkes, but also with valiãt capitaines and hardy souldiours to no small numbre. Wherfore he set forward his army toward the toune called Pontlarche standyng vpon the Riuer of Seyne. viij. mile from Roan betwene Paris and Roan.
When the Frenchemen whych kepeth the passage heard of the kynges approchynge, thei gathered together a great numbre of men of warre redy to defend and prohibite the passage, appointynge another band of men if thei failed to kepe the farther side of the bridge and to watche x and hourely attend that he nether by bote nor by vessell shoulde eskape any maner of waye. When he came to the toune, first he sette forwarde towarde the bridge, whiche when he sawe it so well defended that it would not without greate losse be obteigned, sodainly he blewe the retraite and reculed almoste a myle backward, where in a pleasant place by the riuers side he pitched his Campe: and in the night season, what with botes and barges, what with hoggeshedes and pipes he conueighed ouer the brode ruer of Seyne a greate compaignie of his armie without any resistaunce of his enemies. For they which wer on the hetherside of Seyne, thynkyng that thenglishmen had gone to conquere xx some other place folowed thẽ not, but studied how to defẽd their toune (which was ynough for them to do.) When the kyng sawe that his men wer on the other side of the water, he the next day earely returned to ỹ toune and assauted it on bothe the sides. When thinhabitantes perceiued that cõtrary to their expectaciõ they wer cõpassed & beset by their enemies & sawe no hope of refuge or succor, with humble herte and no great ioy rendered vp the toune. And so the kyng hauyng no let or impediment determined to besege and assault the citie and castle of Roan for the whiche he had taken diuerse longe and tedious iornayes, & sent before hym his uncle the lorde Thomas duke of Excester with a great xxx compaignie of horssemen and Archers, whiche with banner displayed came before the toune and sent to the capitaines Wyndsore a heraulte at armes, willyng them to deliuer the toune to the kyng his Master, or els he would persecute them with fire, bloud and sworde. To whõ they proudly answered, that none thei receiued of hym, nor none thei would deliuer, except by fyne force thei wer therunto cõpelled. And to declare thẽselfes valiant capitaines & hardy men of war, there issued out of the toune a great band of men of armes & encoũtred fiercely with thẽglish men, whiche like men nether afraied nor astonied manfully them recei-ued, & with fyne force draue them into the toune again, leuyng with the xl Englishmen. xxx. of their compaignie prisoners and ded persons. The duke with this good spede and proude aunswer of the Frenche capitaines, returned to the kynge to whõ was rendred a litle before ỹ toune of Louyers, which he gaue to his said brother the duke of Clarẽce, which made there his deputie sir Jhon Godard knight. The duke of Exce-ster also had newly taken the citie of Eureux and made capitain ther sir Gilbert Halsall knight. When the duke of Excester was returned to Pontlarch as you haue heard, the capitaines of Roan set fire on the suburbes, bet doune Churches, cut doune trees, shede the bushes, destroyed the vines round about the citee, to thentent that thenglishmen should haue no relief nor comfort ether of lodgyng or fewell.

The citie of Roan besieged.

When the kynge heard of their dispitefull doynges, he wyth hys whole army remoued from Pontlarche, and the last daie of July came before the citie of Roan and compassed it rounde aboute wyth a strong siege and a fearfull assaute. The kynge laye with a greate puissaunce at the hous of Charitee on the East side of the citie, & the duke of Clarence lodged before the port of Caux on the West part of the citie. The duke of Excester toke his place on the Northside at the porte Denise: betwene the dukes of Excester and Clarence was appoynted the erle Marshall euen before the gate of the castle, to whom wer ioyned therle of Ormond and the Lordes of Haryngton and Talbot. And from the duke of Excester toward the kyng were encamped the lordes of Rosse, Willoughby, Fitzhugh and sir William Porter with a great bande of Northrenmē euen before the port sainct Hillary. Therles of Mortaint and Salsbery wer assigned about the Abbey of saint Katherines. Sir Jhon Grey was lodged directly against the Chapel called Mount S. Michell, sir Philip Leche treasorer of the warres kept the hil next the Abbey, & the Baron of Carew kept the passage on the riuer of Sayne, and to hym was ioyned a baliaunt esquire called Jenico, whyche twoo capitaines baliauntly kept the riuage of the water of Sayne. On the farther side of the riuer wer lodged therles of Warren and Huntyngdon, the lordes Neuell and Ferrers, sir Gilbert Umfreuile with a well furnished company of warlik souldiors directly before the gate called port du Pont. And to the intent that no aide shoulde passe by the riuer toward the citie, a greate chaine of yron was deuised at Pōtlarche and sette on piles from the one side of the water to theother, and beside that chayne he sette vp a new forced bridge, sufficient bothe for cariage and passage. At whyche therle of Warwicke whiche had gotten Dampfrōt was sent to the toune of Cawdebeck standyng on the riuerside betwen the sea and the citie of Roan, whyche toune he so hardly assaulted, that the capitaines offered to suffre ỹ Englishe nauy to passe by theyr toune wythout hurte or detriment to the citie of Roan: And also yf Roan yelded, they promised to rendre their toune without anye fayle or farther delaie. And this composicion they sealed, and for performaunce of the same thei deliuered pledges. Thys appoynctment the Englishe nauy to the numbre of. C. sailes passed by Cawdebeck and came before Roan and besieged it on the waterside. To this siege came the duke of Glouceter with therle of Suffolke and the lorde of Burgainy whych had taken the toune of Chierburgh and wer lodged before the porte of Sainct Hillarij nerer their enemies by fortie roddes then anye other persones of the armie.

Duryng this siege arriued at Harflew the lord of Kylmaine in Ireland with a band of.xvj.hundreth Iryshmen armed in mayle with dartes and skaynes after the maner of their countrey, all talle, quicke and deliuer persons, which came & presented them selues before the kynge lyng stil at the siege: of whom they were not onely gently entertained but also (because that the kyng was informed that the Frenche kynge & the duke of Burgoyn would shortly come, and either rayse the siege or bitaile or man the toune at the Northy gate) they were appoynted to kepe the Northsyde of the army, and in especial the way that commeth x from the forest of Lyons. Whiche charge the lord of Kylmaine and his cõpany ioyfully accepted & did so their deuoire, that no men were more praised nor did more damage to their enemies then they did, for surely their quicknes and swiftnes did more preiudice to their enemies, then their great barded horses did hurt or damage the nimble Irishmen.

Thus was the fayre cytie of Roan compassed about wyth enemyes besieged by princes, and beset about both by water and lande, hauynge neither comfort nor aide of kyng nor dolphyn. And although the army were strong without, yet within there lacked neither hardy capitaines nor manful souldiors. And as for people, they had more then ynow, for xx as it was written by him that knew the nombre and had no occasion to erre from the trueth, there were at the tyme of the siege within the cytie, of christen people CC.and.x.thousand persons. Dayly were issues made out of the cytie at diuers portes, sometyme thenglishmen gate, at another time the Frenchmen saued, somtime neither of both either got or saued: for surely the capitaines and men of warre within the toune setting more by honor then by life, preferryng fame before worldly rythes, dispising pleasure & vilependyng fearfull heartes, sware ethe to other neuer to rẽder or deliuer the toune while they might either hold sworde in hand or put spere in rest. The kyng of England beyng aduerxxx tised of their haute courages and high stomackes, determined to conquere them by famyne whiche would not be tamed by weapon.

Wherfore he stopped all the passages both by water and lande that no bitaile could be cõueighed to the cytie, he caste trenches rounde about the walles, and set them ful of stakes and defended thẽ with archers, so that they within could haue no way out ether to inuade their enemies (or yf they coulde) to depart and relinquishe their fortresse and cytie. One day tidynges wer fayned that the Frenche kyng approched with al his power to raise the siege, & reskew the cytie: Wherfore kyng Hẽry cõmanded al men to lye in their harneys lest they might by some sub-xl tile cautel be surprised vnware and taken vnprouded. But the Frẽche kynge neyther came nor sent, to the great wonder of the Englishemen. This siege thus continuyng from Lammas almost to Christmas, diuers enterprises were attempted and diuers polices wer deuised how euery part might damage and hurte his aduersary and enemy, but no part muche reioysed of their gaine. Duryng whiche tyme, bitayle began sore to faile within the toune, so that onely vineger & water serued for drinke. If I should reherse accordyng to the writynge of diuers authors, not onely howe deare dogges, rattes, mise and cattes wer solde within the toune: but how gredely they were by the poore people eaten and deuoured, and also how the people died daylye for faute of foode, and how yong infantes lay sucking in the stretes on their mothers brestes lyng dead, staruen for hunger, you would more abhorre the lothsome doynges then reioyse at their miserable mischãce. The riche men wichin the toune put out at the gates the pore and indigent creatures whirhe were by thenglishemen that kept the trenches beaten & driuen backe againe to the gates of the toune, whiche against them were closed and barred. So this miserable people vncomfortably forsaken and vnnaturally dispised of their owne nacion and housholde felowes, betwene the walles of their cytie and the trẽches of their enemies lay stil cryynge for helpe and relief, for lacke wherof innumerable sely solles dayly died and hourely starued. Yet kynge Henry moued with pitie & stirred with cõpassion in the honor of Christes natiuitie on Christmas day refreshed all the poore people with vitayle to their great comfort & relief: for the whiche act they not onely thanked, lauded and praised the kyng of England, but also praied to God for his preseruacion and furtherance, and for the hynderance and euill successe of their vnkynd citezens & vncharitable country men. This miserable famyne dayly more and more encreasyng so daunted the heartes of the bolde capitaynes, & so abated the courages of the riche burgesses, and so turnẽted the bodies of the poore citezens, that the stout souldiour for faintnes coulde skase welde his weapon, nor the riche marchaunt for money coulde not bye a sheuer of bread: so that the cõminaltie cried to the captaines, and the nedy people besought the lordes to haue compassion on them, and to inuent some waye for their succor and comfort. The gouernours of the toune, after long consultacion had, considerynge the great necessitie that they were in, and seyng none apparence of succour or relief, determined it both necessary and conuenient to treate with the kyng of England. And so vpõ Newyers euen ther came to the walles at the gate of the bridge diuers cõmissioners appointed by the capitaines, whiche made a signe to the Englishemen lyng wythout to speake wyth some gentlemen or other person of authoritie. The Earle of Huntyngdon whiche kept that part sent to them sir Gilbert Umfreuile, to whõ they declared that yf they might haue a guyde or a safeconduite, they would gladly speake with the kynge. Syr Gilbert promised not onely to do theyr message, but also to certifie thẽ of the kynges pleasure & purpose. Which communicacion ended, he repaired to the duke of Clarence and other of the kynges counsaill, aduertisynge thẽ of the request of the citezens, which incontinent assembled thẽ selues in the kynges lodgyng. where sir Gilbert Umfreuile wysely and soberly declared to the kynge the myndes and intentes of the citezens. The kyng like a graue prince

considerynge that a thynge gotten without effusion of Christen bloud is both honorable and profitable, and sawe that the haute corages of the braggynge Frenchmen wer now by his hard besiegynge sore abated and almost tamed, thought it conuenient to heare their lowly peticion and humble request, and so willed sir Gilbert to aduertise them that he was content to heare.xij. of them whiche should be safely cõueighed to hys presence: With this answere sir Gilbert departed and made relacion therof to the capitaynes standynge at the gate. Whiche on the next day in the mornynge appoynted.iiij.knightes.iiij.lerned men and.iiij.sage x burgesses all clothed in blacke to go to the kyng of Englãd. These.xij. persons wer receiued at the port saincte Hillarij by sir Gilbert Umfreuile accompanied wyth diuers gentlemen and yomen of the Kynges housholde, comonly called yomen of the croune, and conueighed to the kynges lodgynge, whõ they found at Masse. When the deuine seruice was finished, kyng Henry gorgeously apparelled and sumpteously adourned came out of hys trauers, fiersely and princely beholdynge the Frenche messengers & passed by them into his chambre. After hym incontinently the.xij.ambassadours wer conueighed, amongest whõ one learned in the ciuile law, more arrogant then learned, & yet not so arroxx gant as indiscrete sayd these wordes. Right high and mightie prince, right noble and puissant kyng, if you wyll with your selfe diligently cõsider wherin consisteth the glory of victorye and the triumphe of a conquerour, you shall plainly perceiue, that the type of honor is in the tamyng of proud men, ouercõmyng of valiant souldiors and subduynge of strong cyties and populus regions, and not in slaiynge christen people by hunger thirst and famine, in whiche consisteth neither manhod, wit nor pollicy. Alas, regard you your honor, and se yonder great multitude of miserable people cryng for meat and wepynge for drinke and dyng for lacke of succour and relief: hat Wglorye shall you obtayne in xxx killyng of wretches by famyne, whiche death of all deathes is moste to be dispised and abhorred. If you wyl shewe your selfe charitable before God, or mercifull before men, let al our poore people which wyll depart out of our cytie passe through your campe to get their liuynge in other places, and then manfully assaut our cytie, and by force (if you dare) subdue and conquere it. And if your enterprise succede fortunately (as a thinge that is very doubtfull) in this doyng you shall not onely obtaine worldly glory and terrestrial victory for ouercommyng the strong and puissant men of armes and the riche cytie, but also merite muche before xl God for deliueryng and hauynge compassion of the poore nedy and indigent persons. When this Orator had sayd, the kynge, whiche no request lesse suspected then that whiche was thus desired, began a while to muse: And when he had wel perceiued the crafty cautell and fraudulent inuencion of the Frenche messengers, he with a fierse countenance and a bolde spirit made to thẽ this answer saiyng: Thynke you O fantasticall Frenchmen that I am so ignorant and so brutall that I cannot

perceiue your double dealyng and crafty conueighaunce: Judge you me so simple that I know not wherin the glory of a cõqueror cõsisteth: Esteme you me so ignoraunt that I perceiue not what craftes and warlike pollices by strong enemies are to be subdued and brought to subiection: yes, yes, I am not so loiterynge a truand as to forgette so good a lesson. And if these thinges be to you blynd and obscure I wyll declare and open them to you. The goddesse of warre called Bellona, (which is the correctrice of princes for right witholdyng or iniurie doyng, and the plage of God for euill liuyng and vntrue demeanor amongest subiectes) hath these. iij. handmaides euer of necessitie attendynge on her, bloud, fyre, and famine, whiche thre damosels be of that force & strength that euery one of them alone is able and sufficient to turment and afflict a proud prince: and they al ioyned together are of puissance to destroy the most populous countrey and most richest region of the world. If I by assaultyng of your toune should seke your bloud (although I gained as I doubt not but I should) yet my gaine wer not cleare without some losse of my people. If I set your cytie on fyre, and so consume it and you also, then haue I lost that precious iewel for the whiche I haue so fore longed and so long laboured. Therfore to saue myne owne people (whiche is one poinct of glory in a capitaine) and to preserue the toune whiche is my lauful and iust inheritaunce: And to saue as many of you as wil not willyngly be destroied, I haue appointed the mekest maide of the thre damosels to afflict and plage you tyll you be bridled and brought to reason, which shalbe when it shal please me and not at your appointment: And therfore I say and affirme that the gayne of a capitaine by any of these thre handmaides is bothe glorious, honorable and triumphant, but of all thre the yongest maide is in all thinges most profitable and cõmodious. Now to answere to your demaundes, as touching the pore people liynge in the ditches, I assure you I more lament your lacke of charitie toward your christen brethre ye and your owne nation of one language and one countrey, then I reioyce at the vndoyng of so many creatures and castyng away of so manye enemies. You like tirantes put thẽ out of the toune to thentẽt that I should slay them, and yet I haue saued their liues. You woulde neither geue them meat nor drinke, and yet I beynge their mortall enemy haue succoured and releued them: so that yf anye vncharitie be, it is in you, yf any shame or reproche be taken, receiue it youre selfe, for you be the doers. If I haue done them good let God rewarde me, for I loke of thẽ for no thankes, yf you haue done thẽ euill so shall you be done to. And as to suffre your pore people to passe out of the cytie through my campe, no no, I wyll not so accomplishe youre cloked requeste, but you shall kepe them styll to helpe to spend youre vitailes: And as to assault your toune, I wyl you know it that I am therto both able and willyng as I se tyme & occasion: but seyng the choice is in my hand to tame you either with bloud, fyre, or famyne, or with all, I wyll take the choice at my my pleasure & not at yours. And with that the kyng with a frownyng countenaunce departed frō them to his chambre and cōmaunded them to dine with his officers.

When he was departed, the Frenchemen began to marueill at hys excellent wit, and to muse at the hautnes of his courage, and after they had dined and consulted together, they required once agayne to haue accesse to hys royall presence, which when it was to thē graunted, they humblynge them selues on their knees besought him to take a truce for .viij. daies, in the whiche they might by their commissioners take x some ende and good conclusion with hym and his counsaill. The kynge like a piteous prince rather couetynge the preseruacion of the people, then their distruction, after good deliberacion taken, graunted to thē their askyng, with the whiche answere they ioyously returned.

After their departure were appointed and set vp. iij. riche tentes, the one for the lordes of Englande to consult together, ỹ second for the commissioners of the cytie, & ỹ third for both partes to argue and debate the matter. The cōmissioners for the Englishe part wer the erles of Warwike & Salsbury, the lord Fitzhugh, sir water Hungerford, sir Gilbert Umfreuile, sir Jhon Robsert & Jhon de Uasques de Almada. xx And for the French part wer apointed sir Guy de Butteler & .vj. other.

Duryng this truce, euery day the commissioners met, the Englishemen accused and the Frenchmen excused, the Englishmen demaunded muche, and the Frenchmen profered lytle. Thus with arguyng & reasonyng the .viij. day came and nothyng was done, nor one article concluded. Wherfore the Englishmen toke doune the tentes & the Frenchmen toke their leaue, but at their departyng, they remembrynge them selues required the Englishe lordes for the loue of God that the truce might continue tyl the sunne risyng the next day, to the whych the lordes sone assented. Whē the Frenchmen wer returned to Roan, sodenly xxx in all the toune sprong a rumour that the truce was expired and nothyng determined. Then the poore people ranne about the stretes like frantike persones, shoutyng and cryng and callyng the captaines and gouernors murtherers and manquellers, saiyng that for their pride & styffe stomacke al this misery was happened in the toune, threatenyng to slay them if they would not agre to the kyng of Englādes demaund and request. The Magistrates beyng amased with the fury of the people, called al the toune together to knowe their myndes and opinions. The whole voice of the cōmons was to yelde, yeld, rather then starue. Then the Frenchmen in the euenyng came to the tent of sir Jhon Rob-xl sert, requiryng him of gētlenes to moue the kyng that the truce might be prolonged for .iiij. dayes. The kynge therunto agreed and appointed tharchbishoppe of Cantorbury and the other .vij. before named for his part, and the citezens appointed an egal nomber for them. So the tentes were againe set vp, dayly was assembles and muche treaty on both parties, and on the fourth day by the helpe of God, the treaty was concluded and finished to the great reioysyng of the poore citezens, the copy wherof folowethe worde by worde.

Also it is accorded that our forsayd lorde the kynge shall haue place and space of lande, of the frewyll of his highuesse to bee chosen to hym a paleys to be made within thesayde citie or wythin the walles of the same citie where it shall seme moste behouefull. So neuertheless that yf it shal within thesaid place or space to be included any hous or edefice or place or ground longynge to any of thesayde citezens or dwellers of thesame citie, our said lorde the kyng to hym whome that suche maner of houses, edefices or places of ground longeth or apperteneth shal satisfye, & of other houses & edefices or places cōgruely shal recompence. 11

Also it is accorded that al and euery subiectes of our sayd lorde the kyng that now be or were prysoners to any persone beyng in thesayde citie and castle in their pledges, shalbe vtterly fre as aneyntz their persones and the somes that they are bounde in at the day of thys present date and accorde. 12

Also it is accorded that al and euery souldier and stranger beynge in thesayd citie and castle shall swere on the Euangelies of God before their departyng, that they shall not beare armes agaynst our lorde the kyng or his, vnto the first day of January next to come, for no maner of commaundemēt that to theim or to any of them of any maner of persone in contrary may be done and enioyned. 13

Also it is accorded that all and euery reliques & other goodes longyng to the Abbey of saynct Katheryn wythin the sayd citie and castle beyng al holy, shal bene deliuered to hym whome the kyng shall depute 14

15 Also it is accoꝛded that thesayd nobles, citezens and other wythin thesayde citie and castle beynge, shall cause thesame citie and Castle beꝼoꝛe thesaid the.xix.day of this present moneth of January sufficiently and honestly to be made cleane, and also diligently and honestly all the ded bodies now ded and to be ded vnto that day of deliuerance of the sayd citie honestly and diligently shal do to be buryed.

16 Also it is accoꝛded that the foꝛsayd nobles, citezens, & all beynge in thesayd citie and castle furthwyth shal receyue and suffre to entre into thesame citie all & euery pooꝛe persone beynge in the dyches oꝛ aboute ꝼ the diches of thesame citie, which foꝛ penury did go out of thesame city whome they shalbe bounde to succoꝛ vnto the.xix.daye of January aboue sayd, as they wyl answere to God and to the kyng, and elles they shal receyue none other person into thesame citie oꝛ castle vnto the foꝛsayd day without specyal lycence of our sayde loꝛde the kyng, but yf it happe any messenger oꝛ herauld of the party aduersary to the kyng to come to the gates oꝛ diches of thesayd castle oꝛ citie.

17 Whyche articles and appoyntmentes as it is beꝼoꝛesayd, al & euery in maner as it is accoꝛded, the foꝛsayd capitain, nobles, citezens & other within thesaid castle and citie beyng, wel and truly wythout fraude oꝛ ꝼ malengine to hold, obserue and kepe they behoten, and tho to be kept & fulfilled they bynden them. So but yf it befall our foꝛsayd moste doubt full loꝛde the kynge that God foꝛbid, to be ouercome in battayll to hym ymade by Charles his aduersary of Fraunce oꝛ the duke of Burgoyn oꝛ any other to come, the siege of our loꝛd the kyng to remoue from the foꝛsayd cyty, that neither the foꝛsayd captayn ne none of the nobles, citezens, souldiours oꝛ other beyng within thefoꝛsayd cyty and Castle shal gone out, ne no maner of help thei shal deliuer, noꝛ leane to them againe our loꝛde the kyng commyng in no maner woyse.

18 Also that all these appoyntmentes, couenauntes and accoꝛdes and xx euery of theim as it is beꝼoꝛsayd wel and truly and vnbꝛoken bee kept, and foꝛ the moꝛe suretie of thesame couenauntes and accoꝛdes, thefoꝛsayde capytayne nobles and citezens and other abouesayde shalbe taken at the time immediatly into the handes of our loꝛd the kinge. lxxx. notable pledges, wherof. xx. shalbe knyghtes and esquiers and the rẽnant citezens of thesame cyty, at their owne costes to be sustayned.

19 Also foꝛ the partie sothly of oure moste Doubtful loꝛde the kynge aꝼoꝛsayde, graciously and beningly consideꝛyng the meke submitting and yeldyng of thesame citie and Castle aboue sayd, hath graunted that all and euery person of what estate oꝛ degree oꝛ condicion that he be with xl in thesayd cyty and castle being, except certayn persons within expꝛessed that will become lieges and subiectes of our loꝛd the kyng, and frõ hencefurth will dwell vnder his obedience, shall haue their heritages and goodes, moueables and vnmoueables wythin the duchy of Noꝛmandy constitute, and whiche beꝼoꝛe the day of these pꝛesent letters by our foꝛsayde loꝛd the kyng to other perſones haue not bene graunted, except armurs & artillaries abouesaid, making and doing foꝛ their he-ritages and their vnmouable goodes to our foꝛsayd loꝛd the kinge the ſeruice therof accuſtomed, oꝛ to other to whom ſuch mauer ſeruices of the graunt of our loꝛd the kyng owen to long.

Alſo it is graunted on our loꝛde the kinges behalfe that all the cite- 20 zens and dwellers of the citie of Roan that now ben oꝛ in tyme to come ſhal bene, ſhal haue all and euerye franchiſes, liberties and pꝛiuileges, which of woꝛthy minde the pꝛogenitoꝛs of our loꝛde the kynge kyngs x of Englande and Dukes of Noꝛmandy, to them and to theſaide citie were graunted in poſſeſſion, wherof they weren the firſt day that oure foꝛſaid loꝛde the kinge came befoꝛe theſaid citie. And alſo of oure large grace of his benignitie hath graunted, that the ſelfe citezens and dwellers of the citie ſhall hane at theyꝛ liberties, fraunchyſes and pꝛiuileges wherof they were in poſſeſſion thefoꝛſayd firſt day of the coming of our loꝛd the kyng befoꝛe the cyty, of the graunt of any of hys pꝛogenitours kinges of Fraunce whiche were befoꝛe the tyme of Phillip de Valoys, aduerſary to our ſayd loꝛd the king & daily warryng vpon his realme.

Alſo it is graunted and accoꝛded on our Loꝛde the kynges behalfe,

¶ When the day of appoinctmet came, which was the day of S. Wolſton, Sir Guy de Butteler and the burgeſſes of the toune in good oꝛdze came to the kynges lodgynge, and there deliuered to hym the keyes of the citie and castle, besechinge him of fauor and compassion. The kyng incontinent appoynted the duke of Excester wyth a greate compaignie to take possession of the toune, whiche like a valiaunt capitayne mounted on a goodly courser and entred into the toune and so into the castle, and appoincted watche and ward in euery toure, bulwarcke and fortresse, and garnyshed the walles wyth banners, stāderds, & penons of the kynges armes, badges and deuises. The next daye beynge Fryday the kyng in greate triumphe lyke a conqueror, accōpaignyed wyth iiij. Dukes, x. Erles, viij. Byshoppes, xvj. Barones and a greate multitude of knightes, esquiers and men of warre entred into Roan where he was receyued of the Clergie with. xlij. Crosses whichsang dyuerse swet songes, outwardly reioysing whatsoeuer inwardly they thought Then met him the Senate and the burgesses of the toune, offeryng to him diuerse fair and costly presentes. In this maner he passed through the citie to our Lady Church, where with al solempnitie he was receiued by the bishop and Cannons, and after he had sayd his Orysons, he caused his Chapelaynes to synge thys Antheme. Quis est magnus dominus? Who is so great a Lorde as is oure God, &c. And that done he came to the Castle where he contimued a good space after, receiuinge homages and fealties of the burgesses and tounes men, settyng ordres emongest them, and reedefied diuerse fortresses and toures. During which time he made proclamacion that all men which would become his subiectes shoulde enioye their goodes, landes and offices, whiche proclamacyon caused many tounes to yeld, and many men become English. At whych ceason the duke of Britayn seyng that the power of Fraunce beganne to decaye, came to the kyng to Roan and concluded with hym a league of his owne mere mocion: Fearyng that ether he should afterward be compelled therunto, or els yf he offred to late it would not be accepted.

When the renderynge of Roan was blowen throughe Normandy, and the kinges proclamacyon diuulged through the countreye, it is in maner incredible to heare how manye tounes yelded not once desired, & how many fortresses gaue vp wythout contradiccion, wherof I wyll shewe you a small nombre and the names of theim who were appoincted captaines of the same.

xx ¶ The.bij.pere.

WHen the gettyng of Roan and the deliuery of the other tou- The.bii.pere nes were blased and blowen through the whole Realme of Fraunce wonder it is to tel and more to beleue how the her-tes of the Frenchmen were sodainly heauy and their courāges sone coled, mourning and lamentyng the imminent mis-chiefe whiche they sawe by the diuision of the nobilitie lyke shortelye to fall on their heddes: and the more sorowyng their euyl chance because they sawe no remedy prepared, nor yet none help at hand thought on.
xxx But who soeuer kycked or wynched at thys matter, Jhon Duke of Burgoyn raged and swelled, yea and so much freated that he wyst not what to saye and lesse to do. And no meruayll, for he was vexed and troubled with a doble desease at one onely time. For he only ruled both kyng Charles and his, and did all thinges at hys wyl whether reason agreed or no, and for that cause he knewe that he was neither fre from disdain nor yet deliuered from the scope of malice. And therfor he imagined that all mischiefes and calamities whiche chaunced in the common wealth should be imputed and assigned to his vnpolitike doynge or to his negligent permyssyon: wherfore he ymagined it profitable to xl the realme and to hym selfe most auaylable, yf he by anye meanes possible could deuyse, practyse or inuent any way or meane by the which he might reconcile and ioyne in amitie the two great and mighty kynges of Englande and of Fraunce. Whyche thynge once obteygned and beynge deliuered from all feare of exterior hostilitie, he determined firste to reuenge hys quarel agaynst Charles the Dolphyn, and after to repʏesse all causses of grudge oʏ disdayne, and to recouer agayn both the fauoʏ of the commonaltie and also to put awaye all causes of suspycion oʏ imagined infamy agaynst hym and his pʏocedynges. And intēdinge to buyld vpon this fraile foundacion, sent letters and Ambassadoʏs to the kyng of Englande, aduertisyng hym that yf he woulde personally come to a communicatyon to bee had betwene hym and Charles the French kynge, he doubted not but by hys onelye meanes, peace shoulde be induced and blouddy battayl clersly exiled.

Kyng Henry heard gentely the Ambassadoʏs and agreed to their request and desire, and so came to Maunte, where at the feaste of Pen- ʏ tecost he kept a liberall hous to al commers, and sat hym selfe in greate estate. On which daye eyther foʏ good seruyce befoʏe by them done, oʏ foʏ good expectatyon of thinges to come, he created Gascoyn de Foix a valiant Gascoyn erle of Longeuile, and sir Jhon Grey was lykewyse made erle of Tankeruyle, and the Loʏde Burshier Erle of Ewe. After this solempne feast ended, the place of the enteruiewe and meting was apoynted to be beside Melaus on the ryuer of Seyne, in a fayʏe plaine euerye parte was by commissioners appoynted to their grounde. The Frenchmen diched, trenched and paled their lodgynges foʏ feare of af- ʏ terclappes: But the Englishmen had their parte onely barred and poʏ- ʏʏ
ted. The king of Englande had a large tent of blewe beluet and grene richly embʏodered with two deuises, the one was an Antlop, dʏawing in an hoʏse mil, the other was an Antlop sitting in an highe stage wyth a bʏaunche of Olife in his mouthe: And the tente was replenyshed and decked wyth hys posye. After busie labour commeth uictorious reste, and on ỹ top and heygth of the same was set a great Egle of gold, whose iyes were of such oʏient Diamōdes that they glystered and shone ouer the whole felde.

The Frenche kynge lykewyse had in hys parcke a faire pauilion of blew beluet rychely embʏodered wyth flower delise, on the toppe of ỹ ʏʏʏ same was set a whyte Harte slynge, made all of fyne syluer wyth win- ges enameled. Betwene these two Campes oʏ enclosers was apointed a tent of purple beluet foʏ the counsaylers to mete in & euery parte had an egall nombʏe to watch on the night and to se good oʏdʏe on ỹ daye.

When the day of appoinctment appʏoched, the kynge of Englande accompanied with the dukes of Clarence and Glouceʃter his bʏethʏen and the duke of Exceʃter hys vncle, and Henry Beaufoʏd Clercke hys other vncle which after was bishop of Winchester and Cardinalll and the Erles of Marche, Salisbury and other to the nombʏe of a thou- sand men of warre, entered into his parke and toke his lodging. Lyke ʏl wyse foʏ the French part, thether came Isabell the Frenche Quene be- cause the kyng her husbande was fallen into his old frenatieall desease hauyng in her company the duke of Burgoyne and the Erle of sayncte Paule, and she had attendyng on her the faire lady Katheryn her dou- ghter and .xxvj. ladies and damoselles, and had also foʏ herf oʏniture

After these estates had reposed them selfes one nyght in their tentes, the next day all such as were appointed repaired toward the pauilion ordayned for the consultacion. Where the kinge of Englaude, lyke a prynce of great stomacke and no lesse good behauor receiued humbly the French quene annd her doughter and them honorably embraced & familierly kissed. The duke of Burgoyn made low curtesy and bowed to the kynge, whome the kynge loungly toke by the hand and honorably entertayned. After salutacions and embraslinges fynyshed, they fell x to counsel wy thin the pauilion assigned, whych was kept with a gard appoynted by bothe the parties that none but commissioners shoulde once attempt to enter. After the kinges requestes made & his demaũdes declared, the French quene and her company toke leaue louynglye of the kyng of England and returned to Ponthoyse to certifie her husband of her demaundes and claymes. And kynge Henry returned to Mante. The next day after, they assembled agayne, & the French part brought with them the lady Katherin, only to thentẽt that the king of England seyng and beholdyng so faire a lady and so minion a damosel, should so be inflamed and rapte in loue, that he to obtayne so beautifull xx an espouse, shoulde the soner agre to a gentle peace, and louing composicion. This company met together. viij. seuerall times, sometyme the one parte was more, and some tyme the other. And notwithstandyng that the Englishmen and Frenchmen were lodged no great distance a sunder, yet was there neuer fray nor occasion of tumulte or riot prouoked or stirred of any of both the parties, whiche bothe their natures cõsidered) is somwhat to be marueyled at.

In this assemble many wordes were spẽt and no dedes done, many thinges required and few offered, many argumentes made and no cõclusion taken. Some authors wryte that the dolphin to let this treatie xxx sent to the duke of Burgoyne sir Taueygny du Chastel, declarynge to him that yf he would let this agrement, he would commõ with hym & take such an order, that not only they but the whole realme of Fraunce should therof be glad and reioyce: But what was the very cause of the breche, no man certainly declareth. When no effect ensued of this long consultacyon both parties after a princely fashyon departed, the Englishmen to Mantes anh the Frenchmen to Ponthoyse.

¶ The king of England was nothyng pleased nor yet contented that this cõmunicacion came to none ende. Wherefore he mistrustynge the duke of Burgoyne to be the verye let and stop of his desires and requesxl tes, sayd vnto him before his departyng: fayre cosin, we wyl haue your kynges doughter and al thinges that we demaund with her, or we wil dryue your kyng & you out of hys realme. Well sayd the duke of Burgoyne, before you dryue the kyng and me out of his realme, you shalbe wel weryed, and therof we doubt lytle.

After thys departure, the duke of Burgoyne beynge nobly accompanied, roade to the toune of Melune wher the dolphyn then soiorned where in the playne feldes thei.ij. like frendes cõmoned together, & cõcluded apparantly an open amitie & sure frendship, which was writtẽ by notaries and signed with their handes and sealed wyth their great seales and armes, but as the sequele sheweth, heart thoughte not that tong talked, nor mindmeant not ẏ hand wrote. This treaty was concluded the .vj. day of July in the yere of our lord 1419 and was proclaimed in Paris, Amience and Ponthoyse.

This newe alyence notified shortly to the kinge of Englande lynge at Maunt, which therwith was sore displeased, and not wythout cause & For he perceyued that the forte of these two princes were much stronger now beyng vnited in one, then they were before beyng seperated & deuided. Yet notwithstanding this great sworne and sealed amitie, he nothing more minded thẽ to set forward his intented enterpryse wyth the ayde of God to performe his conquest maugre the euyll wyll and puissance of his enemies. Wherfore he sent the captayne of Bueffe brother to the erle of Foys newly created earle of Longuile wyth. xv. C. men secretlye to the toune of Ponthoyse, whyche on Trinitie sondaye erly in the morning came to the toune, and so sodainlye and so shortlye set vp their skalynge ladders to the wall, that they were entered into xx the toune or the watche perceyued them, criyng s. George, s. George. The lord Lisleadam captayn of the tonne perceyuinge the walles skaled and the market place gayned, opened the gate toward Paris, at ẏ which he withal his retinue and diuers of the tounes men to the nombre of. viij. thousande fled. For the Englyshmen durst not because their nombre was smal ones deuide them selfes or fal to pilfryng, tyll aboute prime the duke of Clarence came to their ayde with. v. thousande men and by the way he encountred dyuers burgesses of the toune flyng wꝫ al their substance toward Beauuoys whõ he toke prysoners & brought them agayne to their olde dwellynge place. When the duke was come xxx to Ponthoyse, he muche praysed the valyantnes of the assailantes and gaue to them the chiefe spoyle of the toune and marchaunts, of ẏ which they had great plenty and foyson. Then the duke wyth a greate puyssance came before Paris and laye before the cytye two dayes and two nightes without any proffre either by yssue of his enemies or of defẽce yf he had thesame assauted, whyche he could not well do because it was long and ample, and hys nõbre small, and for so great an enterprise not furnished: Wherfore seynge that hys enemies durste not ones looke on him, he returned agayne to Ponthoyse, for the takyng of whiche toune the countrey of Fraunce, & in especiall the Parisiens were sore dismaid xl and astonied, for there was no fortresse able to resist or wythstande. In so much the Irishmen ouercame all the Isle of Fraunce and did to the Frenchemen dammages innumerable (as their writtes affirme) and brought dayly prayes to the Englyshe armye. And besyde that, they would robbe houses and lay beddes on the backes of the kine and ryde

bpō them, and cary yong childzen before them and sell them to the Englishmen foz slaues: Whiche straunge doynges so feared the Frenchemen within the territozy of Paris and the coūtrey about, that the rude persons fled out of the villages withal their stuffe to the citie of Paris.

The French king and the duke of Burgoyn liyng at S. Denyse hearynge of all these doynges, departed in all the hast with the quene and her doughter to Troys in Champaigne, there takyng great delyberacion what was best to be done, leauinge at Paris the Erle of S. Paule and the lozde Lisleadam with a great puyssance to defend the citie. At x the same tyme the duke of Clarence toke the strong toune of Gylozs, & after that was taken the toune of Gayllard: and all the tounes of Nozmandy shortly after were eyther taken by foyce oz rendzed, excepte the Mount sainct Michel, which because the gayne therof was very lytle and the losse in assautyng semed to be very muche, and also it coulde do small harme oz none to the countrey adioyuing, was neither assaulted noz besieged.

And thus as you haue heardе, was the duchy of Nozmandy reduced agayn into the ryght lyne and restozed to the possession of the right heyze, which had bene frō the tyme of kyng Henry the third, in the yere xx of our lozd 1255 wzongfully detayned from the kynges of Englande.

The wyselmen of Fraunce soze lamentyng the chaunce of their coū trey and the misery of their people sawe and perceyued that they had puyssance ynough to defend their enemies yf they were at a perfyte cōcozd amongest them selfes. Foz they apparantlye sawe that although there wer a peace openly concluded betwene the dolphin and the duke of Burgoyn, yet they imagined that no good fruit succeded of the same foz the duke eyther foz secret displeasure that he bare to the dolphyn, oz foz the doubt that he had of thenglyshmen, neuer assayled by hym self & army of kyng Henry, noz neuer sent ayde oz succours to the Dolphyn. xxx Wherfoze by meanes of frendes a newe cōmunicacion was appoynted to thentent that the cozrupt dzegges of their olde malice and inwarde grudges myght be clearely cast oute and extinct. The place of this metynge was appoynted at the toune of Monstrel faulte Yoau, so called because a small bzoke called Yoau runneth there to the ryuer of Seine ouer which riuer was made a bzidge, with diuers barres ouerthwart so that the pzinces openyng the barres myght eche embzace oz touche other, and keping the barres shut, eche might se & common wyth other at their pleasur. The day was apoynted when these two great pzinces should mete on this bzidge, to thentent that all ciuile discozd shoulde by xl this cōmunicacion be cleare forgotten, oz at the least shoulde be suspended, tyl the enemies were banquished and dzyuen out of their coūtries and confines. But thys mocyon wozse succeded thē the entreatozs deuysed, foz while euerye man was fulfilled wyth hope of peace and concozd, crafty imaginacion crepte out of cancard displeasure, had almoste bzought al thynges from libertie into bondage.

When

When the day and place of the solempne enteruiewe was agreed & assigned, Tauagny du Chastel, a mã prompt and prone to all mischiefe, called to his remembraunce the shamefull murder of Lewes Duke of Orleaunce (vnder whom he had long bene a captain) done and compted by this duke of Burgoyne as before you haue hearde, determyned wyth him self to reuenge the death of his olde master and Lord. Som say that he was therto stirred & prouoked by the dolphyn (and not vnlyke) for the dolphyn whiche bare a contynuall hatred to the Duke of Burgoyne, imagyned paraduenture by thys meanes to represse and subdue the whole power and high pride of this duke, wythout any sus- & pection of fraude or reproche of vntruth or vilany. Wel the daye came which was the.xij.day of August, and euerye prince wyth hys nombre appointed came to this bridge. The duke of Burgoyne beyng warned by his frendes to kepe his closure and the barres on his side shut, lytle regarded hys frendes monicion, as a man that coulde not auoyde the stroke for him prouided, and so opened the barres and closur & came to the dolphins presence, whych was cleane armed, and kneled doune on the one kne, shewing to him great reuerẽce and humilitie. The dolphin shewed him no louyng countenaunce, but reproued him, laiynge to his charge much vntruth and greate dishonor. The duke agayne boldely & defended his cause. Now the duke duryng this cõmunication kneled styll and his swoorde was at this backe with often turning and mouing in answeryng the dolphin and his counsel, and so he put his hand backe to plucke his swoord forward: what quod sir Robert de Loyer, wyl you drawe your swoorde against my loorde the dolphin? when Tauagny du Chastel appercyued that an occasion was geuen to performe hys enterprise, incontinẽt he strake him with a hatchet on the head, so that he could not speake, other standyng by shortly dispatched him of hys lyfe. Diuers of his part, thinking him not dead, began to drawe weapon amongest whom the lord Nouale was slaine, and the other taken. For & this murther were condempned (but not apprehended) by Parliamẽt the presidente of Prouince, the vicount of Narbone, Guilliam Battelier, Tauagny du Chastel, Robert Loyze and.iiij.other. This was the ende of Jhon called the proude duke of Burgoyne, whych more regarded ciuile warre and intestine dissencio, then his owne life and welfare. And this sodeyn death as I thynke came to him not wythout deserte, for shamefully murtheryng Lewes duke of Orleance the Frẽch kings brother. Such is the iustice of God, that bloud for the most parte is recompenced wrth bloud, & vnnatural homicide is requited with shamefull death or soden destruccyon.

After this heynous murder thus committed, I might reherse how the dolphynes seruauntes despoyled the duke of all his garmentes to his sherte, and couered hys face with his hosen. I coulde declare howe the dolphin sent his letters to Paris and other cities and tounes, publishing vntruely diuers opprobrious woordes spoken, & diuers greate

and outragious offences done by the duke againste the kynge and the whole realme. I could further declare howe the wyſemen of Fraunce deteſted and abhorred thys abhominable act, perceyuyng the end that was like to enſue, and how the contrary ſide, whiche was the linage of Orleance reioyſed and laughed at this miſerable chaunce and ſodayn fal: but becauſe thenglyſh nacyon was partie neither to the facte nor to the counſel, I wyll declare what the kinge of Englande dyd after thys notorious dede done and committed.

x When Philip Erle of Charoloys ſonne and heyre to thys duke Jhō, & now by this murther & death of hys father duke of Burgoyn and erle of Flaunders was enformed lyng at Gaunt of this miſfortune and final ende of hys noble parent and louing father, he toke the mater as he had cauſe, greuouſly and heauily, inſomuch that no man of his counſel durſt ones ſpeake to him, & in eſpeciall the lady Michel his wyfe, ſiſter to the dolphin & Doughter to the king, was in great feare to be forſakē & caſt out of his houſe and fauour: But as al xr thinges ende, ſo ſorowe aſſwageth. When hys doloure was somewhat mittegat he fyrſt by thaduyſe of this counſail receiued to his fauor and company the fayre duches his louing wyfe, and after ſent diuers notable ambaſſadoures to the king of Eugland lyng at Roan to treat and conclude a peace betwene them both for a certayne ſpace: To which requeſt in hope of a better chaunce kynge Henry agreed. After that knot knit, he kept a ſolempne obſequy for his father at ſainct Uaas in Arras where were. xxiij. prelates wyth croſſes: Duryng which tyme the erle of ſaynct Paule and the Pariſians ſent to him ambaſſadours to know what they ſhould do, and how they ſhould defende them ſelfes agaynſt xxr the Englyſhmen. He gently anſwered the meſſengers, that he truſted ſhortly by the ayde of God and licence of the kyng to conclude a peace and perpetual amitie to their great comfort & releſe. When theſe Ambaſſadors were departed to make relacio to the Magiſtrates and gouernors of the citie of Paris, he after long conſultacion had aſwel with men of the ſpiritualty as temporall and lay perſones, ſent the biſhop of Arras and two notable perſones to the kyng of England with certain articles and clauſes which the duke of Burgoyne offred to hym for very loue as he ſayd. The kyng of England conſidering wyth hym ſelfe that the duke of Burgoyne was a cōuenient organe and a neceſſary inxl ſtrument to conueygh his deſyres to hys purpoſe, louyngly receyued & honorably entertayned the dukes ambaſſadours, declarynge vnto thē that he would wythout prolongyng of tyme ſend to him hys Ambaſſadours, whiche ſhould open his lawfull requeſtes & reaſonable deſires. Wyth thys anſwere, the dukes meſſengers departed toward Arras, and incontinente after their departure, kynge Henry ſent the earle of

Warwicke and the bishop of Rochestre with many knightes & esquiers to the duke of Burgoyn, whych to him declared the effect and purpose of their ambassade and commyng: he gently heard their requestes, and some he alowed and some he augmented, and some he altered or disalowed, but in conclusion, by often sendyng betwene the duke & the king they were agreed, so the kynge and his commons would assent. Nowe was the Frēch kyng & the quene and his doughter Katherin at Troys in Champaigne, gouerned and ordred by them which would rather. x. tymes spurre forward the purpose & ententes of the duke of Burgoin then once wyth a bridle to pul backe any one iote preferred by him. x

What should I say, a truce tripertited betwene the. ij. kynges and the duke and their countreys was determined, so that the kyng of Englād should send in the cōpany of the duke of Burgoyne his ambassadors to Troy in Chāpaigne sufficiētly authorised to cōclude so great a matter. The king of England beyng in good hope that all his affaires shoulde prosperously succede and go forwarde, sent to the duke of Burgoin his vncle the duke of Exceter, the erle of Salisbury, the bishop of Ely, the lord Fanhope and lord Fitzhugh, sir Jhon Roblert and sir Phillip Halwyth diuers doctors to the nombre of. CCCCC. horse, whych in ꝑ cōpany of the duke of Burgoyne came to the citie of Trois, the. xxj. daye xx of Marche. The king, the quene and the lady Katherin them receiued and hertely welcōmed, shewynge great signes and tokens of loue and amitie. After a fewe dayes they fel to counsell, in the which it was concluded that kyng Henry of England shoulde come to Troys and mary the lady Katherin, and the kyng shoulde make him heyre of his realme croune and dignitie after hys death or departure out of this naturall lyfe wyth many other articles whych hereafter in a place more conuenient you shal heare rehersed.

When these thynges were done and concluded, the Ambassadours of England departed towarde their kynge, leuynge behynd them Sir xxi Jhon Roblert to geue hys attendaunce on the lady Katherin. When kyng Henry had heard hys Ambassadors reherse the articles & pointes of the treatie and amitie concluded, he condiscended & agreed with al dylygence to set toward Troys, lōgyng for the syght of his darlyng the fayre lady Katheryn. And althoughe he reioysed that all thynges succeded more luckely to his purpose then he before imagyned, yet he trusted not so much to the glosyng wordes and golden promises of the French nacyon beyng hys auncyent enemies, that he would rashely auenture his person wythout a perfite searche and diligent inquyry of ꝑ doynges and attemptes of hys doubtful and new reconciled frendes, xl beyng warned and admonyshed by the late mischance of Jhon duke of Burgoyn yet recent in euery mannes eye. But when he saw the sunne shyne and ayre clere on euerye syde, he accompanyed with the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester hys brethren, the Earles of Warwicke, Salisbury, Huntyngdon, Ewe, Tanberuile and Lōguile and. xb. thousande

men of warre, departed from Roan to Ponthoyse, and from thence to sainct Denis two leagues from Paris, and from thence to Pontcharenton where he left a garison of menne to kepe the passage, and from thence by Prouynce, he came toward Troys, where the duke of Burgoyn accompaignied with many noble men receiued hym two leagues without the toune and cõueighed hym to his lodgyng and his princes with hym, and all his armie was lodged in small villages theraboute.
And after he had reposed himself, he went to visete the kyng, the quene and the Lady Katheryn, whom he founde in Sainct Peters Churche x where was a ioyous metyng, honourable receiuyng and a louyng em-brasyng on bothe partes, whiche was the twenty daye of Maye. And ther wer the kyng and the lady Katherin made sure together before ỹ high Aultare, and on the third daye of June nexte folowyng, thei were with all solempnite espoused & maried in thesame Churche. At whiche mariage the Englishemen made suche triumphes, pompes and pagi-auntes as though the kynge of all the worlde had been present. In so muche (as three Frenche writers affirme) that the nobles of Fraunce more merueled at the honor & glorye of the Englishemen, then thei dis-deigned or maligned at their owne fortune.

xx And when these solempne ceremonies wer honorably finished and the mariage consummate, the twoo kynges and their counsaill assembled together diuerse daies, wherin the former league and treatie was in diuerse poyntes altred and brought to a certaintie by the deuice of the kyng of Englande and his brethren. When this great matter was finished, the kynges sware for their part to observe this agrement and league in all poynctes. Likewise sware the Duke of Burgoyne and a great nombre of princes and nobles whiche were presente, and that the soner because they marueiled before at his noble Actes dooen by kyng Henry, of whom thei had knowledge onely by report, & now thei more xxx marueled whē thei sawe and beheld the honor, estate & wisedome of his persone. But whether thei sware with outward countenaunce and inwardly thought the contrary, let them which knowe the Frenche con-stancye iudge and tell truthe. But assuredly thei perceiued hym to bee prudent bothe in askyng and geuyng counsaill. Thei sawe hym expert and apt to marciall feates, and nymble in all thynges apperteignynge to warre. Thei thought hym strong against all perelles and imagined hym fortunate in all chaunces and doynges, wherfore as I saied, they muche marueled at him, and more regarded his persone. Then was he named and proclaimed heire & Regent of Fraunce. And as the French xl kyng sent the copie of this treaty to euery toune in Fraũce, so the kyng of Englande sent thesame in Englishe to euery citie and market toune to bee published and deuulged, the very copie whereof as it was then written, woorde by woorde ensueth.

¶ The Articles and appoynctmentes of the peace betwene the realmes of Englande and Fraunce.

HEnry by the grace of God Kynge of Englande, theire and Regent of Fraunce, Lorde of Irelande, to perpetuall mind to Chriſten people and all tho that be vnder oure obeiſance we notefie and declare that though there hath been here afore diuerſe treaties betwene the moſte excellent Prince Charles our father of Fraunce and hys progenitors for the peace to be had betwene the twoo realmes of Fraunce and Englande the whiche here before haue borne no fruite: We conſiderynge the greate harmes the whiche hath not onely fallen betwen theſe twoo realmes for the great deuiſion that hath been betwene thē, but to all holy churche. We haue taken a treaty with our ſaied father, in whiche treaty betwixt our ſaied father and vs, it is concluded and accorded in the forme after the maner that foloweth.

1 Firſt it is accorded betwixt oure father and vs, that foraſmuche as by the bond of Matrimony made for the good of the peace betwene vs and oure moſte dere beloued Katheryn doughter of oure ſaied father and of oure moſte dere mother Iſabell his wife, theſame Charles and Iſabell been made father and mother, therfore them as our father and mother we ſhall haue and worſhip as it ſitteth and ſemeth ſo a worthy prince and princeſſe to be worſhipped principally before all other tem- xx porall perſones of the world.

2 Alſo we ſhall not diſtroble, diſſeaſon or letten our father aforſayed, but that he holde and poſſede as longe as he liueth as he holdeth and poſſedeth at this tyme the croune and the dignitee royall of Fraunce, and rentes and proffites for theſame of the ſuſtenance of his eſtate and charges of the realme. And our forſaid mother alſo hold aſlonge as ſhe liueth theſtate & dignitie of Quene, after the maner of theſame realme with conuenable conueniente part of theſaied rentes and proffites.

3 Alſo that the forſaid lady Katherin ſhall take and haue dower in our realme of Englande as Quenes of Englande here afore wer wont for xxx to take & haue, that is to ſay, to ỹ ſome of .xl. M. Scutes, of the whiche two algate ſhalbe worth a noble Engliſhe.

4 Alſo that by the waies maners and meanes that we maie without tranſgreſſion or offence of other made by vs, for to kepe the lawes, cuſtomes, vſages and rightes of our ſaied realme of Englande ſhall doen our labor and purſute that the ſaied Katheryn alſo ſone as it maye be doen, be made ſure to take & for to haue in our ſaid realme of Englande from the tyme of our death theſaied dower of .xl. M. Scutes yerely, of the whiche twayne algate be worth a noble Engliſhe.

Alſo yf it happ theſaid Katheryn to ouerliue vs, ſhe ſhall take and xl 5 haue the realme of Fraunce ymediatly, from the tyme of our death, dower to the ſome of .xx. M. Frankes yerely of and vpon the landes, places and lordſhippes that held and had Blaunch ſomtyme wife of Philip Boſeele to our ſaied father.

6 Alſo that after the death of oure father aforſaied, and from thence

forwarde, the croune and the realme of Fraunce with all the rightes and appurtenaunces shal remain and abide to vs and been of vs and of our heires for euermore.

Also forasmuche as oure saied father is wytholden with diuerse sickenes, in suche maner as he maie not intende in his owne persone for to dispose for the nedes of theforsaied realme of Fraunce: therfore duryng the life of our saied father, the faculties and exercise of the gouernance and disposicion of the publique and common proffite of thesayed realme of Fraunce with counsaill and nobles and wise men of thesame realme of Fraunce shalbe and abide to vs: So that from thencefurthe we maie gouerne thesame realme by vs. And also to admit to our counsaill and assistence of thesaied nobles suche as we shall thynke mete, the which faculties and exercise of gouernaunce thus being toward vs, we shall labor and purpose vs spedefully, diligently and trulye to that that maie be and ought for to be to the worshipp of God and oure saied father and mother, and also to the common good of thesaied realme, and that realme with the counsaill and help of the worthye and great nobles of thesame realme for to be defended, peased and gouerned after right & equitie. 7

¶ Also that we of oure owne power shall do the courte of the Parliament of Fraũce to be kept & obserued in his authoritie and soueraignte and in all that is doen to it in all maner of places that now or in tyme commyng is or shalbe subiect to our saied father. 8

Also wee to oure power shall defende and helpe all and euery of the Peres, nobles, citees, tounes, cõmonalties and synguler persons now or in tyme commyng subiectes to our father in their rightes, customes, priuileges, fredome and fraunchises longynge or dewe to them in all maner of places now or in tyme commyng subiect to our father. 9

Also we diligently and truly shall trauaile to our power and do that ¶ iustice be administred and doen in thesame realme of Fraunce after the lawes, customes and rightes of thesame realme, without personalx exception. And that we shal kepe & holde the subiectes of thesame realme in tranquilitie and peace, & to our power we shall defende them against all maner of violence and oppression. 10

Also we to our power shall prouide, and do to our power that able persones and proffitable been taken to the offices alwell of iustices and other offices longyng to the gouernaunce of the demaynes & of other offices of thesaid realme of Fraunce for the good, right and peaceable Justice of thesame, and for thadministracion that shalbe comitted vnto ¶ theim, and that they be suche persons that after the lawes and rightes of the same realme and for the vtilitee and proffite of our saied father shall minister, and that the forsaied realme shal be take and departed to the same offices. 11

Also that wee of oure power so sone as it maye commodiously bee doen, shall trauaile for to put into the obedience of oure saied father, all 12 maner of cities, tounes & Castles, places, countrees & persones within the realme of Fraunce disobedient and rebelles to our saied father, holdyng with them whiche been called the Dolphin or Arminack.

Also that we might the more comodiously, surely & frely doen exer-13 cise and fulfill these thynges aforsaid. It is accorded that all worthye nobles and estates of thesame realme of Fraunce aswell spirituals as temporalles, and also citees notables and commonalties, and citezens, burgeis of tounes of ỹ realme of Fraunce, that been obeysaunt at this tyme to our saied father shall make these othes that folowen.

First to vs hauyng the facultie, exercise, disposicion & gouernaunce 14 of the forsaied common proffite to our hestes and commaundementes thes shall mekely and obediently obeye & intende in all maner of thyng concernyng the exercise of gouernance of thesame realme.

15 Also that the worthy great nobles and estates of thesaid realme aswell spirituals as temporalles and also citees & notable commonalties and Citezens and Burgeses of thesame realme in all maner of thinges well and truly shall kepe & to their power shall do to be kept of so much as to theim belongeth or to any of theim all, those thynges that been apoyncted and accorded betwene our forsaied father and mother and vs, with the counsaill of them whom vs lust to calle to vs.

16 Also that continually from the death and after the death of oure saied father Charles, they shalbe our true liegemẽ and our heires, and they shall receiue and admit vs for their liege and souereigne and verie kyng of Fraunce, and for suche to obeye vs without opposiciõ, contradiccion or difficultie, as they been to our forsayd father duryng his life, neuer after this realme of Fraũce shall obey to man as kyng or regent of Fraunce, but to vs and our heires. Also they shall not be in counsaill helpe or assente that we lese life or lymme, or be take wyth euyl takyng, or that we suffre harme or diminicion in person, estate, worship or goodes, but yf thei knowe any such thing for to be cast or ymagined against vs, thei shall let it to their power, & they shall doen vs to weten thereof as hastely as they maye by themself, by message or by letters.

17 Also that all maner of conquestes that shoulde bee made by vs in Fraunce vpon thesaied inobedientes out of the Duchie of Normandy shalbe doen to the proffite of our said father, and that to our power we shall do that al maner of landes and lordshipes that been in the places so for to be conquered longyng to persones obeyng to our saied father, whiche shall sweare for to kepe this preleute accord, shalbee restored to thesame persones to whom they long to.

18 Also that all maner of persones of the holy Church beneficed in the Duchy of Normandy or any other places in the realme of Fraũce subiect to our father and fauorynge the partie of the dukes of Burgoyne whiche shall sweare to kepe this present accord, shall reioyce peaceably their benefices of holy Churche in the Duchy of Normandy, or in any other places next aforsayed.

Also

Also likewyse all maner persones of holy Churche obedient to vs & 19 beneficed in the realme of Fraunce & places subiect to oure father that shall swere to kepe this presente accord, shall enioye peaceably their be-nefices of holy Churche in places next aboue saied.

Also that all maner of Churches, Uniuersitees and studies gene- 20 rall, and all Colleges of studies and other Colleges of holy Churche beyng in places now or in tyme commynge subiecte to our father, or in the Duchy of Normãdy, or other places in the realme of Fraunce subiect to vs, shall enioye their rightes and possessions, rentes, prerogatixx ues liberties and fraunchises longyng or dewe to theim in any maner of wise in thesaid realme of Fraunce, sauyng the right of the croune of Fraunce and euery other persone.

Also by Goddes help, when it happeneth vs to come to the croune 21 of Fraunce, the Duchy of Normandy and all other places conquered by vs in the realme of Fraunce shall bowe vnder the commanndement obeysaunce and monarchy of the croune of Fraunce.

Also that we shall enforce vs and dooe to oure power that recom- 22 pence be made by our saied father without diminucion of the croune of Fraunce, to persones obeiyng to hym and fauorying to that partie that xx is saied Burgoyn, to whom longeth landes, lordshippes, rentes or possessions in the said Duchy of Normandy or other places in the realme of Fraunce conquered by vs hether toward, geuen by vs in places, and landes gotten or to be gotten and ouercome in the name of our said father vpon rebelles and inobedientes to hym. And if it so bee that suche maner of recompence bee not made to thesaied persones by the lyfe of our saied father, we shall make that recompence in suche maner of places and goodes when it happeneth by Goddes grace to the croune of Fraunce. And if so be that the landes, lordshippes, rentes or possessions the whiche longeth to suche maner of persones in thesaied Duchy and xxx places be not geuen by vs, thesame persones shalbee restored to theim wythout any delaye.

Also duryng the life of our father in all places now or in tyme com- 23 mynge subiect to him, letters of common iustice & also grauntes of offices and giftes, pardons or remissions and priuileges shalbe writtē and procede vnder the name and seale of our saied father. And forasmuche as some synguler cace maie fall that maye not bee forseen by mannes witte, in the whiche it might be necessary and be houefull that we doo write our letters, in suche maner cace yf any hap for the good & surety of our father and for the gouernaunce that longeth to vs as is before-xl saied, and for to eschewen periles that otherwyse might fall to the pre-iudice of our saied father to write oure letters, by the whyche we shall commaunde, charge and defende after the nature and qualitie of the nede in our fathers behalfe and oures as Regent of Fraunce.

Also that duryng oure fathers life wee shall not calle ne write vs 24 Kynge of Fraunce, but vtterly we shall absteyne vs from that name as long as our father liueth.

25 Also that ouer saied father duryng his lyfe shall nempne, call, and write vs in French in this maner Nostre treschier filz Henry Roy Dengleterre heretere de Fraunce, and in Latin in this maner, Preclarissimus filius noster Henricus Rex Angliæ & hæres Franciæ:

26 Also that we shall put none imposicions or exaccious, or do charge the subiectes of our said father without cause reasonable and necessary, ne otherwise then for common good of the realme of Fraunce, and after the saiyng and askyng of the lawes and customes reasonable, approued of thesame realme.

27 Also that we shal trauaile to our power to the effect and intent, that by thassent of the three estates of either of the realmes of Fraunce and Englande, that all maner of obstacles maye be doen awaie, and in thys partie that it be ordeigned and prouided that from the tyme that we or any of our heires come to ỹ croune of Fraunce, bothe the crounes that is to saie of Fraunce and England perpetually be together in one and in thesame persone, that is to saye from our fathers life to vs, and from the terme of our life thence forward in the persones of our heires that shalbe one after another. And that bothe realmes shalbe gouerned frō that we or any of our heires come to thesame, not seuerally vnder di- xxv uerse kynges in one tyme, but vnder that same person whiche for the tyme shalbe kyng of bothe the realmes and souereigne lorde as it is beforesaid, kepyng neuertheless in all maner of other thynges to eyther of thesame realmes their rightes, liberties, customes, vsages, & lawes, not makyng subiecte in any maner of wyse one of thesame realmes to the rightes, lawes or vsages of that other.

28 Also that thence forwarde, perpetually shalbe stylle reste, and that in all maner of wise, discencions, hates, rancoures, enuies, and warres betwene thesame realmes of Fraunce and England, and the people of thesame realmes, drawyng to accorde of thesame peace maie cease and xxvi bee broken.

29 Also that there shalbee fro hence forwarde for euermore peace and tranquillitee and good accord and common affeccion and stable frendship betwene thesame realmes and their subiectes beforesaid: thesame realmes shal kepe themselfes with their counsaill helpes and common assistence against all maner of men that enforce them for to doen or to ymagine wronges, harmes, displeasours or greuaunce to theim or to ether of theim. And they shalbee conuersaunt and Marchandisen frely and surely together paiyng the custome dew and accustomed. And thei shalbe conuersaunt also, that al the confederates and alies of our saied xl father and the realme of Fraunce aforsaid, and also oure confederates, of the realme of Englande aforsaied, shall in. viij. monethes from the tyme of this accord of peace as it is notified to thē, declare by their letters that thei wolle draw to this accord and wol be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, saiyng neuertheless ether of the same Crounes, and also all maner accions tightes and reuenues that longen to our sayd father and hys subiectes and to vs and to oure subiectes againe such maner of allies and confederacies.

Also neyther oure father neither our brother the duke of Burgoyn 30 shall begynne ne make wyth Charles clepynge hym selfe the Dolphyn of Uyennes any treaty or peace or accorde but by counsell and assent of all and eche of vs thre or of other thre estates of either of the sayed realmes aboue named.

Also that we wyth assent of oure sayd brother of Burgoyne & other 31 xx of the nobles of the realme of Fraũce the whiche therto owen to be called shal ordaine for the gouernance of our sayd father sekyrly, louyngly & honestly after the askyng of his royall estate & dignitie by the maner that shalbe to the worshyp of God and of oure father and of the realme of Fraunce.

Also all maner of persons that shalbe about oure father to do hym 32 personall seruice, not onely in office but in all other seruices aswell the nobles and gentles as other shalbe suche as hath bene borne in the realme of Fraunce or in places longynge of Fraunce, good, wise, true and able to that forsayd seruice. And our sayd father shall dwel in plaxx tes notable of hys obedience and nowhere els. Wherfore we charge & cõmaunde our sayd liege subiectes & other beyng vnder our obedience that they kepe and do to to be kept in all that longeth to them this accord and peace after the forme and maner as it is accorded. And that they attempte in no maner wyse any thyng that may be preiudice or cõtrary to the same accorde and peace vpon payne of lyfe and limme and all that they may forfaite against vs. Youen at Troys the.xxx. day of May. 1420. and proclaimed in London the.xx. day of June.

Also that we for the thynges aforesayd and euery one of them shall 33 geue our assent by our letters patentes sealed wyth our seale bato our xxx sayd father wyth all approbacion & confirmacion of vs and all other of our bloud royall and all other of the cities and tounes to vs obedient sealed with their seales accustomed. And further oure sayd father beside his letters patentes sealed vnder hys greate seale shall make or cause to be made letters approbatory and confirmacions of the peres of his realme and of the lordes, citezens and burgesses of the same vnder hys obedience, all which articles we haue sworne to kepe vpon the holy Euangelistes.

Here I ought not to forget howe.ij. men named learned in both the lawes, the one called master Jhon Bouchet the Aquitanicall writer & xl Archedeacon of Terbe, & the other Maister de Prato a solempne protho notary his praty ng gloser, wrote of this treaty and composicio, and make therof so a great matter as by the makyng of this peace it shulde appeare that England had no right to Fraunce, nor by this graunt nothyng to Englande was geuen. Fyrst Jhon Bouchet saieth that thys treaty was the worst cõtract that euer was made for ỹ kynges of England,for by this saith he it is appparant that the kyng of Englād had neither tytle nor right to the croune of Fraunce but by this cōposicion, for if they had right,why did they take it by cōposicion? vpon this text Master gloser saieth,that this composicion geueth a new right,and yf there wer any old it taketh it away and geueth a new, which new gifte was of litle value and lesse efficacie in the lawe because the issue female may not enherite accordyng to the lowe Salique, & therfore he cannot make his doughter heyre to the croune of Fraunce. If I might be so bold I wold axe Maister Jhon Bouchet this question: if a mā wrongfully kepe me out of the possession of my true and lawfull inheritaunce (with whom I am neither able with purse neither with power to prosecute my cause before a competent iudge by proces of the lawe) wyll of his owne mere mocion (moued paraduenture with conscience) render to me my right,so I wyl suffre hym to enioy my lande durynge his life, or that I wyll mary his daughter:haue I thys land by his gifte or as a thyng to me iustly by law and equitie rendred and receiued. Lykewise if a riche man owe to a poore man an hundreth poundes, whiche is not able in substance or for feare of displeasure dare not attempt anye suyte or quarell against his detter,yf he will offer to pay his money at daies, to the whiche request the poore man agreeth,is this a newe gift of the money or a payment of the det. In the fyrst question if the demaundant had no tytle,how could he graunt to him the accion of the land duryng his life,and in the second,yf the plaintiffe had none interest how coulde he geue him daies of payment and yet in both the cases yf the one part had no right why would the other make an offre or cōpound, for all cōposicions haue respect to a right precedent. But in thys matter, who would iudge that a kyng of so great & puissant a realme with the assent of his whole counsel would dischenerite his onely sonne & surrendre his title without an apparant right and open tytle knowen and shewed by the partie,for the olde prouerbe sayeth,long sufferaunce is no acquittance,nor prolongynge of tyme derogacion to right, also restitucion is no graūt,nor payment of duetie is no gift. Doctors write and clerkes affirme that these treaties,arbitrementes and composicious be bothe godly,charitable and honeste, both to restore the one partie to his auncient right (whether it be in landes or goodes) and to dispence & releue the other with the takyng of the profites of theland and vsyng in marchandies the occupacion of the money. Now to master gloser whyche affirmeth that a composicion taketh away an old right & geueth a new and that this composicion is of no value: surely Master Jhon de Prato I would haue suche a peuyshe proctor reteined against me,for you saye that euery cōposicion geueth a new right and taketh away the auncīēt title, yet you sayd before ȳ this cōposicion neither geueth nor can geue any right,whiche cōclusion is manifestly repugnant to the antecedent therfore you must be answered thus, if nothyng be geuen,nothynge is taken away, & so consequently no cōposicion, & yf there be no cōposicion

then remaineth styll the olde & auncient tytle in the state that it was. Paraduenture Master gloser wil say and allege the tytle of England to be abrogated because the house of Valoys maye lawfully prescribe against the kynges of England and haue had the possessiõ foztie yeres & moze, & so by this meane kynge Henry had no tytle to clayme oz chalenge any part of the realme of Fraunce. Then I pray you remember the yere & accompt the doynges and you shall euidently perceiue that kyng Edward the third the very indubitate heyze general to ỹ croune of Fraunce kyng Richard the second, kynge Henry the fourth and this x noble kyng Henry the fift neuer desisted. vi. oz. viij. yeres at the moste either by battaile oz treatie to chalenge and clayme their aũcient right and old enheritaunce to thẽ by quene Isabel discended, so the title was euer in strife and neuer quiet tyll nowe the right lyne is restozed: And as foz your law Salique put it in your boget among lyes & fayned fables. Thus you may se the affections of Frenchemen, that an Arche foole cannot forge a lye foz his pleasure, but a prothodawe wyll faine a glose to mainteine his folish fãtasie. Let vs now leue these wylful writers and returne to the kyng of England, which after al these articles of the treaty beyng concluded and swozne, made the Frenche kyng, the xx duke of Burgoyn and other the Frenche lozdes a solempne and sumptuous supper and banket, and befoze their departyng, he sadly and soberly sayd to them these wozdes.

All my thought care & study is (you noble princes & men of high hoznoz) to inuent the meane, study & way, how both my kyngdomes by the benefite of almightie God enlarged & amplified, by the cõnexyng & ioynyng the one to the other may be left to my posteritie clene & pure without domestical dissenciõ oz ciuile discozde, to thentent that as one prince noz potestate hath at this day in all Europe a greater gouernaunce, a richer regiment noz a moze puissant empire: So I trust to leue it that xxx hereafter ther shal no power oz dominion be able to be to it cõpared oz equyuolent. Wherfoze, I entende fyrst to extirpate & plucke away the rotes and leuynges of the ciuile discẽcion in this realme lately begon, which ly in the brest of Charles the kynges sonne, by your decre, iudgement and assent, of the newe state and dignitie of the dolphyn vtterly depriued and disgraded, against whom it is cõuenient and decent that you beare armure not so muche to destroy & confound him, as to bring him to do obeysance and reasonable cõformitie. What maner a prince thinke you he would proue, when he should obtaine & possesse a kyngedome, which beyng but a lusty yong striplyng not fearyng God noz re-xl gardyng his honoz contrary to his promise & against all humaine honestie, was not ashamed to polute and staine him selfe wyth the bloud and homicide of the baleaunt duke of Burgoyn, O caucard stomacke in the brest of a yong prince, oh tyrannicall heart in the body of a gentle man, O vntrue tong in the mouth of a Christen man, a Christian, no a Pagane, whiche neglecting his honoz, violatynge his promise and dis-

pisyng honestie, would procure or consent to so abhominable a fact and sedicious a murder. Wherfore these thynges well pondered and iustly considered I require you to ioyne, stand, and cleue with me as the very heyre & successor of my dere & welbeloued father in lawe kyng Charles in this realme & kyngdome, fyrst to my noble auncesters, & after to me by right title and iust claime lawfully discended. Grudge not I praye you because I that am an Englisheman shall succede in the croune of Fraũce: I assure you I am not nor wyl not be noted to be to you a mere alien and straunger, was not my great grandfather kyng Edward the third sonne to quene Isabel daughter to Philip the fayre and sister & heyre to .iij. kinges of this relme dead without issue: was not my great graundmother quene Philip discended of the noble house of Valoys: if the old & trite prouerbe be true that the womans side is the surer side and that the childe foloweth the wombe, although the one part be Englishe yet the surer part is Frenche, and of the Frenche floure budded & brought furth. And therfore remembre not that I am an Englishman, put out of your mindes in what coũtrey I was borne: and cõsider that I am a christen man & an anoynted kynge, to whõ by both the professions it apperteineth not onely to defend & protect their people and subiectes from forein powers and outward invasions, but also to minister to them indifferent iustice, to conserue them in pollitike ordre and moderate quietnes: and finally, accordyng to their desert and merites, thẽ to promote, auaunce & prefer to riches, honors and estates: which thinges yf I would not do to you my trusty frendes whose louyng hartes and beneuolent myndes I shall neuer forgette nor put in obliuion, I should not do my dutie to God, I should not do the office of a kyng, nor I shuld not do that whyche by the lawes of nature and reason I ought to do, which is to rendre kyndnes for kyndnes, goodnes for desert, and honor for merite. Therfore to cõclude I humbly require you, to stande strong with kyng Charles my father in lawe (who in the stede of myne owne parent I worshyp, loue and honor) in this concord and agreement whiche I both call & trust to be a peace final, and after his mortal ende to loue, serue & be true to me and my posteritie, and I assure you for my parte that the Occean sea shall soner leue his flowynge and the bright sunne shall soner leue his shinyng, then I shall cease to do that whyche becommeth a prince to do to his subiecte, or that a father ought to do to his naturall child.

When he had thus persuaded the nobilitie, he wyth all hys armye, hauyng with him the French kyng and the duke of Burgoyn came before the toune of Sene in Burgoyn which toke part with the dolphin and after that he had destroied the countrey about it, at the .xb. day the toune was yelded and there he made capitain the lorde Jenuale. And from thence he remoued to Monstreau fault yone, where the duke of Burgoyn was slain as you haue heard, whiche toune was taken by assault and many of the dolphyns parte apprehended before they coulde get to the castell. After the gettyng of the toune, the castle whiche was newly replenished with men and vitayle, denied to rēdre, and so it was strongly besieged: durynge whiche assault the duke of Burgoyn was enformed by diuers in what place the duke his father was buried, whose corps he caused to be taken vp & sered & so conueighed it to Diron in high Burgoyn and buried it by duke Philip his father.

The kyng of England sent certaine of the prisoners that he had taken in this toune to aduise the capitaine of the castle to yelde the same, but they obstinatly denyed the request, geuing opprobrious wordes to x the kinges Herault, wherfore the king of England caused a gybbet to be set vp before the castle, on the whiche were hanged. xii. prisoners all gentlemē and frendes to the captayne. When the Lord of Guytry lieftenant of the castle perceiued that by no meanes he could be succoured, and fearyng to be taken by force, he beganne to treat with the kyng of England, which in. viij. dayes would take none of his offers, but in cōclusion he and his rendred them selues simply, theyr lyues onely saued, and after. vi. wekes siege the castle was deliuered, & the earle of Warwike was made capitaine of the toune and castle, whiche fortified the same with men, ordinance and artillerie. From thence the king of En-xx gland departed to Molyn vpon Seyne, and besieged it round aboute in whose company were the Frenche kyng, the yong kyng of Scottes, the dukes of Burgoyn, Clarence, Bedford, and Glocester.

These valeaunt princes and noble men besieged the stroung toune xx by the space almost of.vij.monethes, they without made mynes, caste trenches and shot gunnes dayly at the walles, they within wherof the Lord Barbason was chief capitaine manfully defended the same, this euery day was skyrmishyng, scalyng, & assautynge, to the losse of bothe parties, but most of all to the losse of thē within. Dnrynge whiche siege the Frenche quene and the quene of England, and the duches of Burgoyn came diuers tymes to visite their husbandes and se their frēdes, whom the kynge of England so highly feasted, so louyngly entertained and with so pleasant pastymes comforted them, that euery creature of him reported honor, liberalitie, and gentlenes. This siege so long cōti- xxx nued that vitayles within the toune began to fayle, and pestilence began to growe, so that the capitaine began to treat, and in conclusion the toune was deliuered vpon certain condicions, wherof one was that all that were consentyng to the death of the duke of Burgoyn shoulde be deliuered to the kyng, wherof the lorde Barbason was suspected to be one, and so they wer deliuered to the kyng of England, whiche sent thē vnder the conduyte of the duke of Clarence his brother to the cytie of Paris wherof the Frenche kyng made him capitaines and he toke possession of the bastyl of saint Anthony, the Louure, the house of Neele, and the place of Boys de Uynannes: xl

When this toune was thus yelded, the kynge of Englande made capitaine ther therle of Huntyngdon. Frō thence he departed with his army to Corbeil, where the Frenche kyng and the two quenes then sojorned, and from thence the.ij.kynges accompanied with the dukes of Bedford, Burgoyn, Gloucester and Exceter, and therles of Warwyke

Salsbury

Salisbury and a greate nombre of noble men and knyghtes set furthe toward Paris, whom the citezens in good ordre met wythout ỹ gates and the Clergy also with solempne procession, al the stretes wer hãged with riche clothes & the people in the stretes shouted and clapped handes for ioye, the twoo kinges rode together, the kyng of Englande geuyng the vpper hande to his father in lawe throughe the great citie of Paris to our lady church, wher after had they said their deuocios they departed to their lodginges, the Frenche kinge to the hous of Sainct Paule, & the king of England to the Castle of Louure. The next daye x the two Quenes made their entrie into Paris and wer receiued wyth like solempnitie as their husbandes were the day before. If I shoulde declare to you the great gyftes, the costlye presentes, the plenty of vytaile, that was geuen to the kyng of Englande: or reherse how the conduites aboundantly spouted out wyne of diuerse colours, or describe ỹ costly pagiãtes, the pleasant songes or swete armony that wer shewed song and played at diuerse places of the citie, or shewe the great gladnes, the hertie reioysyng and the great delight that the comon people had at this concorde and peace final, I shoulde reherse manye thynges that you would be weried both wyth the readyng and herying.

xx During the season that these.ii. kynges thus laye in Paris, there was a greate assemble called, aswel of the spiritualtie as of the nobilitie in the which the two kynges sat as iudges, before whom the Duches of Burgoyn by her proctor appeled the Dolphin, and.vij. other for the murdre of Duke Jhon her husband. To the whych appele the counsail of the other part made diuerse offers of amendes, aswell of foundacios of priestes to pray for the soule, as recompence of money to the widow and children, for the final determinacion wherof the kynges toke a farther deliberacion and apoynted a farther day. To the citie of Paris at this tyme resorted the thre estates of the realme, where euery persone xxx seuerally swore vpon the holy Euangelistes to kepe, support, maintein, and defende the treaty and peace finall which was concluded betwene the two princes and their counsaylers and therto euery noble mã, spiritual gouernor, and tẽporal rulers set to their seales, whyche instrumentes were sent to the kynges treasurye of hys Exchequer at Westminster, sauely to be kept wher they yet remayn. These two kyugs soiorned in Paris at the feast of Christmas. The French kyng lyng at ỹ hous of S. Paule kepte no estate nor open court to noman except hys housholde seruauntes and men of base estate frequented his hous: but the kynge of Englande and hys Quene, kepte suche solempne estate so xl plentiful a hous, so pryncelye pastyme, and gaue so manye gyftes that from al partes of Fraunce, noble men and other resorted to hys palyce to se his estate and do hym honor.

Then the king of England toke vpon him as Regent of Fraunce to redresse causes, remoue officers, reforme thynges that were a misse, and caused a new coyne to be made called the Salute, wherin wer the Armes of Fraunce and the Armes of England and Fraũce quarterly. And to set al thinges in a quietnes, he constituted sir Gilbert Umfreuile capitain of Melun wyth a good nombre of valiaunt souldyees, and the erle of Huntingdon his cosin germayne was deputed captayne at Bois de Vincens, and the duke of Excester with.v.C. menne of warre was assigned to kepe the citie and toune of Paris. When he had thus ordered hys affaires according to his deuice & ordre, he with ỹ Quene his wife his princes and nobles departed from Paris and came to the citie of Roan. But before his remouyng, he caused proces to be made against Charles called the Dolphyn, cõmaundyng hym to appere at the table of Marble at Paris, where for lacke of aperance he was withall solempnitie in suche a cause requisite, denounced gyltye of the murther and homicide of Jhon late Duke of Burgoyne, and by the sentence of the court of parliament he was exiled and banished the realme and territories of Fraunce, and depriued of al honoures, names, dignities and preheminences which he then had or hereafter might haue. Wherfore the Dolphyn went into Languedoc and after to Poytiers gettyng to him suche frendes as he could, and in especiall he obteygned so hyghlye the fauor of the erle of Arminack that he not onely toke his part, but also releued hym with money, aided him wyth men and in hys own per- xx sone continually serued him against his foes and enemies.

Whyle kyng Henry soiourned in the citie of Roan, he receyued homage of al the nobles of Normandy: emongest whom therle of Stafford did homage for the countie of Perche, and Arthur of Britayn did homage for the countie of Pury, whiche the kyng before had geuen to them. He also ordeyned his liuetenaunt generall both of Fraunce and Normandy his brother Thomas duke of Clarence, and his deputie in Normandy was the erle of Salisbury. When the feaste of Christmas (whiche he kept wyth al triumphe and solemptie in his castle of Roan) was passed, he with the quene his wife departed from Roan to Amiẽs xxx and so came to Caleis where he toke ship the morow after Candelmas day and lãded at Douer, and came to Eltham and so through London to Westmynster. Meruel it is to wryte but more meruel it was to se, wt what ioye, what triumphe, what solace and what reioysynge he was receyued of al his subiectes, but in especial of the Lõdoners, whiche for tediousnesse I ouerpasse. And no doubt Englande had greate cause to reioyce at the comyng of such a noble captain, so valyante a prynce and so mightie a conqueror, whiche in so small space and so briefe tyme had brought vnder his obeysaunce the great & puyssante realme, & dominiõ of Fraunce. And first to rendre to God his creator most hũble & hertiell thankes, he caused solempne processions to be obserued & kept.v. daies together in euery citie and toune. After that done he made great purueyghance of al thinges necessary for the coronacion of his Quene and spouse the faire lady Katherin, whiche was don e the daye of s. Mathy the.xxiiij. day of Februarye, on which solẽpne feast she was conueyghed

on fote betwene two bishops vnder a rych canapy frō the great halle at Westminster at s. Peters church, & there she was anointed & crouned with al the ceremonies to so great an estate aperteininge or requisite. After which solēpnitie ended, she was again with great pompe conueighed into westminster hal & ther set in ȳ throne at ȳ table of marble at ȳ vpper end of the hal: whose seruice and solēpnitie whoso list to rede let him loke on the Chronicle of Robert Fabiā which declareth it at large.

x WHile these thinges were thus doyng in Englande, the duke of Clarence brother to the kyng and his liuetenant generall in Fraunce and Normandy, assembled together al the Garrysons of Normādy at the toune of Bernay, and from thēce departed into the country of Maine, and at Pont degene he passed the riuer of Youe and rode through all the countrie to Lucie wher he passed the ryuer of Loyre and entred into Aniow, & came before the citie of Angiers where he made many knyghtes, that is to say, sir William Rosse, sir Henry Godard, sir Rowland Rider, sir Thomas Beaufort called the bastard of Clarence and diuerse other, and after that he had forraid, brent, and spoyled the coūtrie, he returned with pray & pillage xx to the toune of Beaufort in the valey, where he was aduertised that a greate nombre of hys enemyes were assembled together at a place called Bangie, that is to say, the duke of Alanson callyng hym self lyuetenant general for the Dolphin.

The duke of Clarence had a Lomberd resorting to him called Andrew Forgusa was retayned with the part aduerse, of whom the duke inquired the nõbre of his enemies, to whom he reported that their nõbre was but small and of no strength and far vnmete to compare with halfe the power of his puissant armie, entisynge and prouokynge hym to set on the Frenchmen, warrantyng hym a famous victory and a fair day. The duke geuyng to muche credite to hys traytor, like a valiaunt and corragious prince assembled together al the horssemen of hys army and lefte the Archers behinde him vnder the ordre of the Bastarde of Clarence, and two Portingales capitaynes of Fresnye le Vicount, saiyng that he onely and the nobles wold haue the honour of that iorney. When the duke was passed a straight and a narowe passage, he espyed his enemies ranged in good ordre of battayle by the monycyon of the Lõbard which had sold hym to hys enemies, and thesayd aduersaries had layd suche bushementes at the straightes that the duke by no wayes without battayll could either retire or flye. The English mẽ seyng no remedy valiauntly set on their enemies, which were four to one, the battayl was fierce & the fyghtdedly, neuer were so few men sene more corragiously to defend themselfes, then did the Englyshemen that daye they fought & defended, they slew and felled, but it auailed not, for they wer repressed wyth a multitude & brought to confusion. There were slayin the duke of Clarence, therle of Tankeruile, the lord Rosse, Sir Gilbert Umfreuile erle of Kent, and sir Jhon Lumley, sir Robert Verend and almost two thousand Englyshmen, and therles of Somerset Suffolke and Perche, the Lorde Fitzwater, sir Jhon Barkeley, sir Rauffe Neuel, sir Henry Juglos, sir Wyllyam Bowes, syr Wyllyam Longton, sir Thomas a Borough and diuerse other taken prysoners, and of the Frenchmen were slayn aboue. xij. C. of the best men of warre so that they gayned not much. The Bastard of Clarence which taryed at Beauford was enformed of the nombre of the Frenchmen, wherfore he wyth al the Archers made hast to succor the duke, but they came to late, for the Frenchmen hearyng of the approchinge of the archers fled wyth their prysoners wyth al the hast they could, leuyng behynd them the body of thesayd duke and the ded carions. When the Archers came and saw their enemies gone: Lorde how they mourned and lamented ỹ euel chaũse of the deceyued duke, but seyng no remedy, thei tooke the ded bodies and buryed them al sauing the dukes corps, whiche wyth great solempnitie was sent into Englande and buryed at Cantorbury beside his father. After this the Englyshemen brente and spoyled the

countrye of Mayne and so returned to Alaunson and there departed euery man to his Garryson. This battayll was fought at Bawghy in Aniow on Easter euen in the yere of our lord a thousande. CCCC.xij.

I lament the foly and folisheues of thys duke, and I meruell at hys vnwitty doynge and rashe enterpryse, that he woulde adnēture his life and hazard his compaygny leuinge behinde hym the Archers whyche should haue bene hys shylde and defence: what may be sayde, he desired honor and loste his lyfe, he coueted byctory and was ouercome, thus is the old prouerbe verifyeth which sayth: If shepe ronne wilfully emonx gest wolues, they shall lese either life or fel.

Kyng Heury beynge aduertysed of this infortunate chance and deceytfull losse of his louing brother, sent without delaye Edmonde Erle of Mortaigne, and brother to therle of Somerset into Normandy, geuyng to hym like authoritie & preheminence as his brother the late deceassed duke of Clarence had or enioyed. After that he called his highe courte of Parliamentz, in the which he declared so wisely, so seriously and with so greate a grauitie the actes that were done in the realme of Fraūce, the estate of the tyme present and what thynges wer necessary for the tyme to come (yf they would loke to haue that Jewel and hygh xx kyngdō for the which they had so long labored and sought for) that the comonaltie gladlye graunted a fyftene, and the Clergie beniuolently offred a noble disme, and because no delay should be in the kinges affaires for lacke of payment, the byshoppe of Winchester his vncle lente to hym. xx. M. pounde, to be receyued of the same dismes. When al thynges necessary for this voyage wer ready and prepared, he sent his brother Jhon duke of Bedford wyth al his armie (which the Frenchemen write to be. iiij. M. men of Armes, and. xx. M. Archers, and other) before hym to Caleys. And he hym selfe shortly after in ỹ middle of May passed the seas and arriued there in great triumphe, where to him was xxx shewed that the Dolphin wyth. vij. thousand men had besieged ỹ toun of Chartiers which was manfully defended by the Bastard of Thyan and other set and apoynted there by the duke of Excester. Kyng Hēry not mindinge to lose so fayre a toune, wyth all hys Armye departed in good ordre of battayl toward Paris, and at Mūstreull there receyued him the duke of Burgoyn, which from that place attended on the kyng to Dowast in Ponthiew and so came to Abbeuile, and after the kynge tooke a toune of Sir Jaques of Harecort called al Ferte, and there the duke departed from the kyng, for a fyx dayes promysyng on his honor by that day to returne, the kyng of Englande passed forward by Beauxl uoys Gysors, and from thence came to Boys de Uincens, where he founde the Frenche kyng and hys Quene, whome he louyngly saluted and they him agayn honorably receyued & hyghly feasted, and thether came accordynge to his apoyntment Philip duke of Burgoyne, where was dayly consultyng and he wysely deuysynge howe to subdue & represse the haultnes and force of the Dolphyn, hauyng perfyght knowledge that as long as he either lyued or wandered vnbrideled so longe should neuer the treaty and final peace be obserued, wherfore he and the duke of Burgoyn apointed in all the hast to fight with the Dolphin and to reyse the siege before the Charters. The kynge of Englande with al his puissance came to the toune of Naunte, and thether repaired the duke of Burgoin wyth.iiij.thousand men, of whose comming ỹ king was not a litle reioysed, but or they frō thence departed, thei had knowledge and true instruccion that the Dolphin hearyng of the puissant army of the kynge, approchinge to geue him battayll, was reculed with his people toward Towers in Towrayn. Wherfore the kinge of ỹ Englād incontinent, not onely sent to the duke of Burgoin into Picardy to resist the malice of sir Jaques Harcort which daylie inferred war and caused wast & destrucciō in thesame coūtrie, but also apoynted James kyng of Scottes to lay siege to the toune of Dreux, whyche so sore by swoorde and engins enforced the inhabitantes, that after sixe wekes passed, they deliuered thesame to the kyng of Scottes, to the behofe of kyng Henry his soueraigne lorde whiche made there of capitayne the erle of Worcester and baily there, sir Henry Mortimer. The king hym self remoued from Naūt and passed ouer the riuer of Leyre, folowyng the Dolphin toward Tours: but he mistrustinge his power and put- ỹ ting diffidence in some of his owne flocke fled to Burges in Berrie, and chosing that place as his chiefe refuge and surest fortresse bothe for the situacion of the place, and also for the fidelitie and constancy of the people determined there to tary tyl fortune woulde turne her whele and looke on him with some gracious looke or louynge countenaunce, and therfore in a Jest he was commoly called the kinge of Burges and of Berries. The kyng of England with al hys puyssance so fast folowed the fliynge Dolphin, that bytaill began to fayle, and horssemen wared scante: so that he considerynge that Burges beynge the Dolphins only succoure and refuge, beynge wel vitayled and well manned was more ỹ profitable and auailable to the defender, then to him that should make the assaute, wherfore he wyllyng to saue hys people from famyge whō he knew to be from the dent of the frenche swoorde clerely exempte and vntouched, returned ouer the ryuer of Leyre and gat Gasconeys vpō x Thys toune was lesse vitailed then manned, and no better manned then fortified, so that the kyng of Englande could nether haue it to him deliuered at hys pleasure, nor he could not gayne it by assaut wythoute hys great losse and detriment. Wherfore he determyned not to depart tyll he had eyther gayned or subuerted the toune. Durynge thys siege was borne at Windsore on the daye of S. Nicholas in Nouember the kynges sonne called Henry, whose Godfathers wer Jhō duke of Bedford and Henry bishop of Winchester, and Jaquet Duches of Holland, was Godmother, wherof the king of England was certifyed liynge at this siege at Meaux. Whē he was aduertysed of this good fortune and xx happie chaunce that God had sent him a sonne, he gaue thankes to his Creator or redemer for the geuyng to hym so goodly an Ympe, which should succede in his croune & scepter. But whē he heard reported the place of hys natiuitie, whether he fantasied some old blind prophesy, or had some forknowledge, or els iudged of his sonnes fortune, he sayd to the lord Fitzhugh his trusty Chamberleyne, these wordes. After ỹ quene of England was thus deliuered of her fayr sonne she returned into Fraunce first to her husbande, and after to her father xxx and mother, where she was on all partes so honorably receiued, so louingly entertayned and so hyghlye feasted that she appeared to bee no lesse loued of her noble husbande then of her naturall parentes.

DUrynge the tyme of this siege, sir Olyuer Manye a baliant man of warre of the Dolphins part, whiche before was capitayn of the Castle of Faloys and yeldynge it by composicion, sware neuer to beare Armure against the kyng of England, The .x. yere a place called le parke Leuecque, in Englishe the bishops Parke; there was a sore and a longe fighte, many a prore feate of Armes was done that daie, and manie a man was in that place ouerthrowen, the Englishmen onely desired victory, and the Frenchmen desired a safe returne, but in conclusion the Frenchmen beyng not able to wythstād the charge that was layed to them began to flye, in which conflict and slight wer slayn, the lorde Coynon, the lorde of Chastell Giron, and thre hundred other and there were taken prisoners, the lord Dela Howsay, and sir Oliuer x Manny and. lx. other. The kyng beyng aduertysed of this good chāce and happy iourney, sent sir Olyuer Manny to him lyng before Meux, to whome he sayd, fayre father you haue sworne and promised vnto vs that you would neuer make war nor bear armure against vs nor oure subiectes, ye are an aunciēt knight and ought to haue kept your fayth and promyse, which you haue vntruely and vnhonestly broken and violate, and yet we wolle not (although by the lawe of armes we myghte lawfully so do) put you to death, but graunte to you youre lyfe, but we wolle sende you into Englande to lerne you to speake Englysh, and so shortly after he was sent to London, wher for very shame & mere ma- xx lyncoly he dyed and was buried in the whit Friers.

The Scottes write (beleue theim yf ye wyll) that the kinge of En-glande hearing that the Dolpin had sent for aide into Scotlande, and that he had retained theim in wages (for of their owne abilitie they bee nether able to send an army ouer the sea, nor yet of substaunce to beare a continual warre, for this all their owne histories declare and their Chronicles make mencion, and yet the countrie is not so poore but the people be as proude) sent one daye for James the Scottishe kinge and in the presence of his coūsail declared to him what humanitie, what fauor and what singuler affeccion kyng Henry his father bare durynge xxx his naturall lyfe toward the said king of Scottes: Puttyng hym in re-membraunce of the great loue and manifold gratuities which he hym self sith the beginninge of hys reygne had exhibited and shewed to the same king James, that neither he nor his father had any thinge negligently omitted which ether might apperteigne to the office of a frende or to the dutie of a tutor, which should loue and cherysshe hys Orphane or pupile, promising hym libertie wyth a greate rewarde yf he woulde cause the Sctottes which were adherentes to the Dolphin to returne again into their country and native region. To the whiche request the kyng of Scottes wyth a very fresh herte answered saiyng: what your xl noble father hath done to me & what fauor & what benefite I haue re-ceiued at your handes, I shal not nor wil not whē I may (I assure you) forget, and when my power shall serue I shall not fayle to recompence your doynges with like kyndnes. But of youre request I maruell not a litle, first considerynge that I am a prysoner and haue no possession of

my realme, secondarely ꝙ I am as yet nether swoꝛne to my subiectes, noꝛ they by no oth of allegeãce are bound to obey my cõmaundemẽtes: wherfoꝛe I desire you no moꝛe to moue me in this thing which now I cannot do, & yet if I might I would fyrst foꝛese whether it were to me honoꝛable oꝛ to my realm honest to leue our old frẽd in his extreme necessitie without aid oꝛ cõfoꝛt. Wyth this answere the kyng of England was not content (as the Scottes say) but after king James departing frõ his presence, kynge Henry sayed, happy shall they be whyche shalbee subiectes to such a kyng that is endued with suche wyt and wysedome at these yong yeres of age.

The kynge of England liyng stil before the toune of Meux in Brye as you haue heard soꝛe bet the walles with oꝛdinance & cast doune bulwarkes and rampeyꝛes on euerye side of the toune, and soꝛe oppꝛessed them within the toune, wherof hearyng the loꝛd of Offemond, wyth a cõpany of chosen persons sent by the Dolphin, came pꝛiuely in the night to the walles and set vp a ladder and diuers of his company mounted vp and entered into the toune, and as he passed ouer a plancke to come to the walles he fell into a deepe ditche, the Englyshmen hearyng thys noyse ranne to the ditche where they toke the loꝛd of Ofmount & slew diuers of his company which stode at defence. The capitayne wythin the toune perceyuing that their succours were taken, playnlye iudged that the toune could not longe continue, wherefoꝛe they caused all the goodes of the toune to be conueyghed into the market place whyche was strong and wel foꝛtefyed. The kyng of England beyng therof aduertised, cõmaunded in all hast to geue an assault to the toune, whyche was quickly done, so that the toune by fyne foꝛce was within thꝛe houres taken and spoyled. And the same day ꝙ kyng besieged round about the sayd Market place, and toke the mylle adioynyng to the same. The captaines perceyuing in what case they were, fearynge to be taken by assault, beganne to treat wyth the kyng of Englande, whiche appoynted the erle of Warwycke and the loꝛde Hungerfoꝛd to commen wyth them & in conclusyon a treaty was taken, and so the toune and Marketplace wyth all the goodes, were delyuered into the kyng of Englãdes handes the.x. day of May, in the yere of our loꝛd. M.CCCC.xij.

When the deliuery of the stronge toune of Meaux was publyshed thoꝛoughe the countreye, all the tounes and foꝛtresses in the Isle of Fraunce, in Lannoys, in Brye, and in Champaine yelded them selfes to the kyng of Englande, whych apoynted in them valeant capitaynes and hardy souldyers.

After that kyuge Herry had thus taken and possessed the toune of Meaux and other foꝛtresses at hys pleasure, he returned agayne to Boys de Uincennes where he founde the French kynge & the qnene & his wife which with all ioye him receyued, and so the. xxx. day of May beyng the Uigile of Pentecost, the.ij. kynges and the quenes returned to Paris, wher the kyng of England lodged in the castle of Loure, and the Frenche king in the house of saint Paule. These two kynges kepe great estate with their quenes at this high feaste of Penticoste, but the kyng of England (as Enguerant both confesseth & diuers other sayth) kept such a glorious estate and so costly a court that he wyth his quene sat at diner in Paris rychly adorned in vestures and with diademes of gold garnished wyth precious stones & decked with Juelx bothe radiant & pleasant: beside this hys prynces & estates, barons chiefe capitaines, & valiant men of warre wer set in solempne estate plenteously serued and aboundantly feasted, that the people of Paris whyther thyther resorted to behold his magnificent estate, iudged him to be more like an emperor, then their kyng (which sat solitary alone) to be lyke a duke or a poore Marques. But Enguerant (as I sayd) althoughe he confessed the trueth, yet goeth he about to blemishe the glory of king Henry, alleging that Englyshmen were feasted and the Parisians were not once bid drinke, which was not the custome of the Frenche kynges court in so solempne and triumphant dayes. I am somwhat sory that kyng Hēries seruautes of the seller made not maister Enguerant drinke, which then was skoler in Paris, but I more lament ỹ vntrue saiyng & no lesse variable writyng of so famous a Clerke, which to darken the honor of kyng Henry hath clearely defased the princely estate of his owne kyng & soueraigne lord, for he confesseth that kyng Charles wyth his quene kepte a solempne house within hys court of S. Paul, to whose palice no man in maner resorted, but euery frēch creature was ioyous to viewand se the estate and magnificence of kyng Henry. If he haue writtentrue, then must nedes folow, that no subiect reioysing or this hauynge comfort of their owne prince and naturall lord wil leue hym desolate & alone, and folowe a straung potestate and seke relief at a forrein princes house and table. If the Frenchmen came to wonder at the estate of the kyng of England, then was their princes estate base and not worthy to be regarded: if the Parrisians came to se the pryncely order of his household, then was it manifest that theyr soueraygne lord kept but a mean famuly: yf the poore peysantes came thyther for bytayl and fragmētes it appeareth that their soueraygne lord had a colde kychyn: yf they did not al drynke in the kyng of Englandes house, eyther they wer to euyll ruled or to byle & lothsome to haue any gentle entertainment in so honorable a court and a noble famyly, and therfore Enguerāt because he drāke not, euyl reported the estate of the Englysh court as he cōmonly doth in al other matters.

The dolphin knowyng by his espials wher the kyng of Englande & his power lay, came with al his puissance ouer the ryuer of Leyre and besieged the toune of Cosney or Conney and sent parte of hys army to waste and destroye the confynes of the duchy of Burgoyne, to the entent to deuyde the power of the kynge of Englande from the strength and force of the duke of Burgoin, & as he purposed, so that it happened for the duke of Burgoyn with his power to set forwarde to defend his owne owne lande & dominion and wrote to the king of England to send ayd to thē of Cosney or Conney, which had promised to rendre their toune to the dolphin, if they were not rescued by the king of England wythin ten daies. King Henry hearing this newes, answered that he woulde not send one creature, but he would go before him selfe. And so with all diligence came to the toune of Corbel and so to Senlis, wher, whither it were with the heate of the ayre, or that he with his daily labor were febled or weakened, he began to wax sicke, yea, and so sicke that he was constrained to tary and to send his brother the duke of Bedford to per-x forme his iourney and enterprise.

The duke like a valiant capitayne set forwarde to rescue the toune besieged, wherof hearynge the dolphin with al his capitaynes & hardy souldiers departed thence into Barrey to his great dyshonor and lesse gaine, & so was the citie of Cosney or Cōney reskued to the great honor of the Englishe nacion. In the meane season kinge Henry wexed sicker and sicker, and so was laide in a horseliter and conueighed to Boys de Vincens, to whome shortly after repaired the dukes of Bedforde and Gloucester his vncles, and the erles of Salisbury and Warwicke, whō the king louingly entertayned and embraced: and whē they seinge him xx in so great an agony and excedinge paine began to wepe and bewayle his paynefull paynes and greate maladye. He with a constante mynde without any outward shewe eyther of sadde countenaunce or sorowe comforted and encouraged them to be mery and ioious. But when the crisis of hys sickness was past and that he perceyued that healthe was ouercome and loste the victorye, he rendred to God hys moste hartie thankes, for that thiefly that he called him out of this miserable lyfe at suche tyme as he was of moste perfyte remembraunce bothe towarde God and the world and also in the time of hys florysshyng cōquest in the which he had neuer receiued misfortune, euil chāce, or spot of his dysho-xxx nor. And turning him self to his brethren and other noble personages said to them. My natural brethren and trusty frēdes, I se you lament, I perceiue you bewayle my death approching and fattall ende at hand of the whiche I am both glad and reioyce, for this shorte time and smal tract of my mortal life, shal be a testimony of my strength and declaracio of my iustice, aud a settinge furthe of all mine actes and procedynges, and shall be the cause that I by death shal obteyne fame, glorie and renoume and escape the reprehension of cowardnes, and the mocke of all infamy, which I might haue chaunsed to fal into yf nature had lenger prolonged my life or dayes: for it is commonly saide, that as time chaū-xl geth, condicions alter and in longe time al thinges continue not in one estate. But as eternitie is the triumpher vpon time, so do I trust after this short life to haue an eternal beinge, and after this miserable pilgrimage, mine hope is to enioy the celestiall kyngdome, and to come to the place of rest and palice of quyetnes.

Anexhortacion of kynge Henry the v. made a lytle before hys death.

Now as towchinge you (no doubte but this my sodayne chaunce

molesteth your hartes and disquieteth your senses, and not wythout a cause, you lamente the calamitie and mischaunce that is lyke to fall on youre countrey because that I in thys troublous worlde and tempestious season leue you destitute of a gouernor and ruler, whiche chance is the lesse to be moned and regarded, because in all worldly thynges some thing euer lacketh and nothing long endureth: wherfore because the old saiyng is, that in time of necessitie wit and wisedome be proued, I require you to consulte, studye and take payne to come to the ende of the iourney which I in my time haue begonne and entered in, and chiefly, because I haue euer loued and trusted you aboue al other persons, I require and desire you nowe to shewe lyke loue and be as trusty to my sonne that shalbe your soueraigne lord, so that whatsoeuer duty, allegiance or fauor for my liberalitie or kindnes to you shewed, was to me either of honestie of ciuilitie due or owyng: let the same for my sake be extended, shewed and recompensed to mine heire and successor litle prince Henry. Som persons haue hated the father & yet haue loued the child and some haue loued the father and murthered the child, of which sort I neither reken nor accompte you, but this I saye, yf you loue me, you ought to loue my child, not for his desert, but for myne, and sith nowe I shalbe taken from you before satisfaccion or recompence made to me for my manifolde goodnes and ample benefites to you shewed in my lyfe I say and affirme that after my death (except you be noted with ỹ blot of ingratitude, I will not saye vntrueth) you ought to render the same to my child your nephewe or kinsman, I pray God that you do not defraud me of the good expectacion that I haue euer had of you. And because I will not charge you, I wil frendly exhort you to bringe vp my litle infante in verteous liuinge, moral doctrine, and prudente pollicye to thentent that by your paine he may proue wise, by youre instruccion he maie proue politicke, and by your educacion he maye be able to rule a kingdome, and not to be ruled of other: by the which deuoier you shal not onely do your dutie to your prince and soueraygne lorde, but also merite and deserue thankes of your natiue countrey to the which you be both bound and obliged. Beside this my peticiõ is not onely to comfort my most derest and welbeloued quene and espouse (now beyng as I thinke the most dolorus and pensiue woman liuing) but also to loue her and honor her as I haue both loued and honored you.

And as touching the estate of my realmes. First I commaunde you to loue and ioyne together in one leage or concord and in one vnfayned amitie, keping continuall peace and amitie with Philip duke of Burgoine. And never make treatie wyth Charles that calleth him self dolphin of Vien, by the whiche anie parte either of the croune of Fraunce or of the duchies of Normandy or Guyan maye be appaired or diminished. Let the duke of Orleance and the other princes stil remayn prisoners, til my son come to his lawful age, lest his returning home again may kindle more fyer in one day then may wel be queuched in thre. If you thynke it necessary I would my brother Umfrey shuld be Protector of England duryng the minoritie of my child, prohybiting hym once to passe out of ỹ realme. And my brother of Bedford with the helpe of ỹ duke of Burgoyne I will shal rule & be regent of the realme of Fraũce, commaunding hym wyth fyre and swoorde to persecute Charles calling hymselfe dolphyn, to thentent either to bring hym to reason and obeysaunce, or to dryue and expel him out of the realme of Fraunce admonishynge you to lese no tyme, nor to spare no coste in recouerynge that which to you is now offered. And what thinges eyther I haue gotten x or you shal obtayne, I charge you kepe it, I cõmaunde you to defende it and I desire you to norishe it: for experience teacheth that there is no lesse prayse to be geuẽ to the keper then to the getter, for verely getting is a chaunce and keping a wit. Well I fele that death drayweth neare & I shal not long tary, therfore, I commit my soule to God, my loue to my frẽdes, my sinnes to the deuil and my body to the earth.

The noble men present promysed to obserue his preceptes and performe his desires, but their hertes were so pensiue & replenished wyth doloure that one without weppyng could not beholde the other. Then he sayd the seuen Psalmes and receiued the blessed Sacrament, and in xx saying the Psalmes of the passion completed his dayes and ended hys lyfe the last day of of August, in the yere of oure lord. M.CCCC.xxij.

This Henry was a kyng whose lyfe was immaculate & his liuynge wythout spot. This kyng was a prince whom all men loued & of none disdained. Thys prince was a cappytayn agaynst whome fortune neuer frowned nor mischance once spurned. Thys cappytaine was a sheperde whome his flocke loued and louyngly obeyed. This sheperd was such a iusticiary that no offence was vnpunished nor frẽdship vnrewarded. This iusticiary was so feared, that al rebellion was banyshed and sedicion suppressed. His vertues were no more notable then hys qualities xxx were worthye of prayse, for in strengthe and agilitie of bodye from hys youth few were to him cõparable: for which cause in wrestlyng, leaping and runuyng no man almoste durste with hym presume, in castynge of great yron barres and heuy stones, he excelled commonly all men. No colde made hym slouthful, nor heate caused him to loyter, and when he most labored hys head was bycouered. He was no more wery of harnes then of a light cloke. Hunger and thirst were not to hym noysome. He was neuer aferde of a wounde nor neuer sorowed for the payne. He neyther turned hys nose from euyl sauoure, nor from smoke or dust he would not close his iyes. No man could be founde more tẽperate in xl eatyng and drinking, whose diete was not to delicate, but rather mete for men of warre then for virgyns. Euery honest person was permitten to come to him sitting at his mele, and eyther secretly or openlye to declare hys mind and intent. High and weighty causes alwell betwene men of warre & other he wold gladly hear, and eyther determined thẽ him selfe or cõmitted thẽ to other to geue sentence. He slepte very lytle and that onely by reason of bodely labour & vnquyetnes of mynde, frō the whiche no small noyse could awake him, insomuche that when hys souldiers either sang in the nightes, or their minstreles played that all the campe sounded of their noise, he then slept most soūdly. His courage was so constant, and hys hert so vnmutable that he cast awaye al feare and dread from him was banyshed. If any alarum wer made by his enemies, he was first in armure and the fyrst that wold set forward. In the tyme of war he gat knowledge, not onely what his enemies did, but what they sayd and entended, so that al thynges to him were knowen, & of his deuices few persones before the thyng was at the point to bee done should be made priuie. He had such knowledge in ordering & guidyng an armie and suche a grace in encouragynge hys people, that the Frenchmen sayd, he could not be vanquished in battel. He had such wit, such prudence and such pollicie that he neuer enterprysed anye thynge before he had fully debated it and foresene al the mayne chaunces that myght happen, and when the ende was concluded, he wyth all diligēce and courage set his purpose forward. Marueyle it is to heare how he beyng a prince of honor, a prince of youth, a prince of ryches, did continually abstayn frō lasciuious liuing & blynd auaryce, yea, & in the tyme of losse he was no more sad then in the tyme of victory, which constācy few men haue or can vse. Suche a stable stomacke had he and suche a grauitie was geuen in the bottome of hys herte. What pollicye he had in fyndinge sodayne remedies for present mischiefes, and what practise he vsed in sauyng him selfe and his people in sodayne distresses excepte by his actes they did playnly appeare, I thinke it were almoste thyng incredible. What shoulde I speake of hys bountefulnes and liberalitie no man could be more gentle, more liberal nor more fre in geuynge rewardes to al persons according to their desertes: Saying that he had leuer die thē to be subiect to auarice, and that he neuer desyred to haue money to kepe, but to geue and spende. He was mercyful to offenders, charitable to the nedy, indifferent to al men, faithful to his frendes, and fierce to his enemies, toward God most deuout, toward the world moderate, and to hys realme a very father. What should I say, he was the blasing comete and apparant lanterne in his dayes, he was the mirror of Christendome & the glory of his countrey, he was the floure of kynges passed, and a glasse to them that would succede. No Emperour in magnanimitie euer him excelled. No potentate was more piteous nor Lorde more bounteous. No prince had lesse of his subiectes and neuer kynge conquered more: whose fame by hys deathe as liuely florysheth as hys actes in hys lyfe were sene and remembred. When hys deathe was publyshed among the cōmen people, incontinent their hertes wer appalled, and their courages abated, their dolor so much encreased and their wittes were so much troubled that they lyke mad men rent their garmentes and tare their heere, accusyng and blamyng fortune which had taken away from them so precious a iewel, so noble an ornament &

so sure a defence: for no doubt as much hope as was taken away from the Englyshmen, for the gettynge of Fraunce by his sodeyne deathe, so much truste was encreased in the stomackes of the Frenche nacion, hopyng to recouer their auncient libertie and old parentage. For whych cause some say that he was poysoned, the Scottes wryte that he dyed the disease of S. Fiacre, whych is a palsey & a crãpe. Enguerant sayeth that he dyed of S. Anthonies Fier, but al these be but fables as manye mo wryte. For Peter Basset esquire which at ỹ time of hys death was his chãberlayne affirmeth that he dyed pfa Paralisis whyche at that tyme x was so rare a sickness and so straung a disease that the name was to the most part of men vnknowen & phisicions wer acquainted as litle with any remedy for the same, and therfore euery mã iudged as he thought, and named a sickness that he knew, shothing not nere the pricke nor vnderstanding the nature of the disease. This king reygned. ix. yeres. v. moneths, and. xxiij. dayes & lyued not ful. xxxviij. yeres: he was of stature more then the commẽ forte, of body lene, well mẽbred & strongelye made, a face beautiful somwhat long necked, blacke heered, stout of stomake, eloquent of tong, in martial affaires a very Doctor, & of al chiualry ỹ very Paragone. His body was enbaumed and closed in lede & laid xx in a charet royal rychely appareled with cloth of golde, vpon the corps was layde a representacyon of his person adorned w̃ robes, diademe, sceptre & ball like a kyng, the which charet was drawẽ with syxe horses richly trapped w̃ seuerall armes, the first wyth the armes of S. George, the. ij. with tharmes of Normandy, the. iij. with the armes of king Arthur, the. iiij. wyth the armes of S. Edward, the fyft wyth the armes of Fraunce onely, and the syxt with the armes of England and Fraũce. On this Charet gaue attendance James kyng of Scottes the principal morner, the duke of Exceter Thomas his vncle, therle of Warwicke Richard, therle of Marche Edmond, therle of Stafford Humfrey, the xxx erle of Mortayne Edmonde Beaufort, the lord Fitzhughe Henry, the lord Hungerford Water, sir Lewes Robsert Burchier, sir Jhon Cornewale lord Fãhope, & the lorde Crumwel wer ỹ other morners. The lord Louell, the lord Audeley, the lord Morley, the lord Souch bare ỹ baners of sainctes and the Baron of Dudley bare the standerd & therle of Longuile bare the baner. The Hachementes wer borne onely by capitaynes to the nombre of. xii. and roũde about the charet rode. ccccc. mẽ of armes al in blacke harnes & their horses barded blacke wyth the but of their speres vpward. The cõduyt & order of thys dolorous dole was cõmaunded to sir William Philip treasorer of the kinges houshold xl and to sir Willia Porter his chief caruer and other. Besides this, on euery syde of the charet went. CCC. persons holdyng long torches, & lordes bearyng baners, banerots & penons. With this funerall pompe he was conueyghed from Boys de Vincens to Paris, and so to Roan to Abbeuile, to Caleys, to Douer and so thorough London to Westminster, where he was buried with suche solempne ceremonies, suche

mournyng of lordes, such prayer of pryestes, suche lamentynge of commons as neuer was before that daye sene in the Realme of Englande. Shortly after this solempnitie, hys sorofull quene returned into Englande and kept her estat wyth ỹ yong kyng her sonne. Thus ended this noble and puissant prince his moste noble & fortunate reygne ouer the realme of England: whose life although cruell Atropos before hys tyme abbreuiated, yet neyther fyre, ruste, nor frettyng tynne shall emongest Englyshemen ether appall his honoure or oblyterate hys glorye, whyche in so fewe yeres and bryefe dayes achyued so hyghe aduentures and made so greate a conquest.

The troubleous season of Kyng Henry the sixt.

Eath the determinate ende of The.i.yere. mannes lyfe, and of all yearthly thynges the finall poynt and pricke, which fauoureth nether Emperour nor spareth kynge, but at hys plesure confoundeth riche and slaieth poore, vnbodiyng the solle of this godly prince this marciall capitain and renoumed flower, not onely dismaied and appalled the hertes and corages of the Englishe nation, but also pufte vp and encoraged the myndes and stomakes of the Dolphyn and hys proude people: The one parte thynkyng, the kepynge of Normandy & other dominions to hym gayned to bee bery dangerus, The other part trustyng the farther conquest in Fraũce not onely to be doubtfull, but to their iudgementes apparantly impossible: Yet the politike Princes and sage Magestrates of the realme of Englande well remembryng thynges that were passed, and sagely pondryng the tyme present, but moste of al prudentlye forseynge chaunces x imminent and perels at hand, to thentent to set the membres of the body stedfast vnder the hedde. Whyche as shepe without a sheperd far from the folde might wandre and straie at large, caused yong prince Henry, the sole orphane of his noble parent kyng Henry the fifth, beyng of the age of.ix. monethes or there about with the sound of trũpettes openly to be proclaimed kynge of Englande and of Fraunce the.xxx.daye of August, in the yere of our lord. M.cccc.xxij. by the name of kyng Henry the sixt, to the great reioysyng and comfort of all the Englishe nation.

And the custody of this younge Prince was apoynted to Thomas xxx duke of Excester, and to Henry Beaufford bishoppe of Wynchester: the duke of Bedford was deputed to be Regent of Fraunce, and the duke of Glocester was assigned Protector of Englande. Whyche takynge vpon hym that office, least paraduenture he might hereafter repent hys actes and doynges, as a man remembrynge other and forgettyng hym self, called to hym wyse and graue counsaylers, by whose aduise he prouided and ordeined for all thynges whyche ether redounned to the honor of the realme, or semed profitable to the publique welth of thesame. And when he had set in an ordre al matters concernyng the inward affaires of the realme of Englande, he prouided farther all thynges necessary and conuenient for warre and farther conquest in Fraunce, and xl appoynted valiant & expert capitaines whiche shoulde be ready when oportunitie of time required. Beside this, he gathered greate somes of money to maintein the men of warre, and left nothyng forgotten that might let or hynder his purposed enterprise.

While these thynges were thus deuised within ỹ realme of Englād, the duke of Bedforde Regent of Fraunce, no lesse studied then toke payne, not onely to kepe and ordre the countrees and regions by kyng Henry late conquered and gained, but also determined not to leue of from daily warre & tontinuall trauaile tyll the tyme that Charles the Dolphyn (whiche was now a dote, because kyng Charles his father in the moneth of Octobre this present yere, was departed to God,) wer ether subdued or brought to dewe obeysance. And surelye the deth of ỹ this kyng Charles caused many alteracions & chaunges in the realme of Fraunce, for a greate parte of the nobilitee whiche ether for feare of the puissance of the Englishemen, or for to please and folowe the mynde & appetice of Charles the Frenche kyng, toke parte with kyng Henry against the Dolphyn: Heryng now of the French kynges death, returned from the Englishe part and adioyned themselfes to the compainie of the Dolphyn, and diligently studied howe to banquiche and dryue awaye the Englishe nacion out of the territory of Fraunce.

The Duke of Bedford beeyng greatly moued with these sodaine chaunges, fortified his tounes bothe with Garrisons and municions, xx and assembled together a great armie bothe of Englishmen and Normans, to whom he made a long oracion, admonishyng them to obserue & kepe their othe & faith (whiche thei had made to the late kyng Henry and his heires) inuiolate and vnbroken, willyng them in no wyse to be the occasioners or counsailers that young kynge Henry shoulde be depriued from his fathers lawfull inheritaunce, by the hatred of certayne traitors Frenchemen which had renewed the old hatred beyng of late extinct betwene the realmes of Englande and of Fraunce, and studied to set all thynges again in a broyle: requiryng them also to call to their memorye how that the realmes of Englande and of fraunce, the twoo xxx mooste famous regiōs of all Europe, by the benifite of almightie God, wer of late so vnited connexed & ioyned together in an eternall league and composicion, & so strongly established that no worldly power were able or of puissaunce sufficient, to resist or withstande the malice of the same: And although some tymes by chaunce of warre the losse mighte turne on their part, yet in conclusiō the detriment should be recouered and a surplusage gayned. And yf (accordyng to their bounden duties) they would honor serue and loue young kyng Henry their soueraigne lorde, and would diligently persecute, & set on his enemies, thei should not onely shewe thēselfes true and faithfull subiectes to their true and xl vndoubted kynge: But also shoulde for their fidelitie and good seruice receiue of hym condigne rewardes, ouer and beside immortall fame & renoune.

This exhortacion staied the hertes of many of the Frenche capitaines, whyche wyllyngly sware to Kynge Henry feaultie and obedience by

by whose example the comonaltie dyd the same. Thus all the people set in an ordre in the realme of Fraunce, nothyng was mynded but warre and nothynge was spoken but of conquest. The Dolphyn whiche laye at this tyme in the citee of Poytiers heryng of the death of his parent had hys herte mixed bothe with ioye and sorowe: for notwithstandyng that he was sorowfull as a naturall child which lamented the death of his father, yet he was ioyous that power & princely estate was now to hym happened by the whiche he iudged that he shoulde be ỹ more able to defend his enemies and recouer more frendes: & so callyng together x the Princes of his faccion, caused hym self to bee proclaimed Kynge of Fraũce by the name of Charles the.vij. And thẽ beyng in good hope of recouering his patrimony & expellyng his enimies, with a haut corage prepared war & assembled together a great armie, and first the war began by light skirmishes, but after it proceded into mayne battayles.

The Dolphyn thynkynge not to make longe delayes in so greate a cause, lest the power of his enemies might dayely be augmented, sent ỹ lorde Graville to the toune of Pount Melance stãdynge on the riuer of Seyne, whych so sodainly came to the same that he was on the walles or the souldiors within heard of his apprpoche, & so he toke the toune & xi slewe a greate nombre of the Englishe souldiors. When the Regent of Fraunce was aduertised of this sodain enterprise, he apoynted the Lorde Thomas Montacute erle of Salisbury, a manne bothe for hys greate pollicie and haute corage more to be compared to the olde valiant Romans then to men of his daies, accompaignied with the earle of Suffolke, the lorde Scales, the yenge lorde Pounynges, sir Jhon Fastolffe master of the houshold with the said lorde Regent, & diuerse other to besige the toune of Pont Melance, which after two monethes was rendered to the said earle, & the lorde of Graville sware to be trew to the Kyng of Englande euer after that daie, but shortlye after he for-xxx gettyng his othe returned to his old master again. The erle of Salisbury apoynted sir Henry Mortimer and sir Richard Vernon to be capitaines of that toune. And from thence departed into Champaigne and ther besieged the toune of Sens and toke sir Guillam Maryn the capitain and slewe all the souldiors within the toune, and made there capitaines sir Hugh Geddyng and sir Richard awbemond.

The Parisians whiche euer like the Wethercocke be variable and inconstaunt, perceiuynge that the Dolphyn dailye began to haue more aide and power then he was before accustomed, trustynge to returne again vnder his obeysance & subiection (whiche they bothe wished and xl desired) to the intente that it shoulde not apere to come of their desire and that their fayth and fidelite would not be put in the balance of diffidence with the Englishe nacion, sent diuerse Senators of their citee as Ambassadors to the Kynge of England, desiryng hym of aide & succor, to whom not onely greate thankes were rendered for doyng their dutie of subiecciõ, but also higly feastes wer made, & promises declared that yf they styll continued in due obeysance, and were not adherent to the kynges enemies, ẏ neither succour should want, nor coste should be spared for their comen cõfort and publike vtilite. With whiche answer ẏ cõpaigny outwardly pleased (whatsoeuer they inwardly imagined) departed to Paris. In thys season Humfrey duke of Gloucester either blynded with ambicion or dotyng for loue, maried the ladye Jaquet or Jacomin doughter and sole heire to William of Bauier duke of Holland, which was lawfull wyfe to Jhon duke of Brabant then liuynge, whiche mariage was not onely woundered at of the comon people, but also detested of the nobilite, & abhorred of the Clergie. But suerly the & swete tast, of this pleasant mariage, brought after a sower sauce, bothe to the amorus housbande, and to the wanton wyfe. For Jhon duke of Brabant, what with force, and what with spirituall compulsaries, neuer left of, tyll he had recouered his Lady out of the Duke of Glocesters possession, as after you shall here.

Hese chaunces thus happenyng as you haue heard, Jhon duke of Bedford, Philip duke of Burgoyne, & Jhon duke of Britayn, made an assemble & frendly enteruiewe in the citee of Amias, where they renewed the olde league and & auncient amitie made betwene the noble Prince Kynge Henry ẏ fifth, & thẽ, before concluded: adding therto these condicions & argumentes, eche of them to be to other bothe frend and aider, & the enemy of the one to bee enemy to the other, & all they to bee bothe frendes & aiders to the kyng of Englande, & well willyng to hys well willers, & auengers of hys aduersaries. And because that affinitie is an embracer of amitie, there was concluded a mariage betwene the duke of Bedford, and the Ladye Anne sister to the duke of Burgoyn. When these agrementes wer finished, the Regent departed to Troys in Chãpain, whether with high pompe was conueighed the lady Anne & of Burgoyn, whiche in the presence of her brother and her Uncle duke of Brabant, and of therles of Salisbury and Suffolke: and of .ix. C. Lordes knightes and esquires, she was maried to Jhon duke of Bedford with suche solempnitie, feaste & triumphe, as before that tyme had not been seen of the Burgonions.

Durynge this triumphe, the Parisians thinkynge to blind the iyes of the duke of Bedford wrote to hym, how diuerse Castles & fortresses lyng rounde about their territory, wer replenished with hys enemies daily stoppyng their passages, and robbyng their marchantes, to their vtter vndoyng, yf they by his helpe wer not relieued: fraudulẽtly mea- & nyng, and falsely entisyng hym to absent hymself from theim, tyll their craftie conueighed purpose wer compassed and achiued. For diuerse of them stubbernly beryng the yocke and subieccion of the English nacion perceiuyng the duke of Bedforde and the principall capitaines of the

Englishmen to be farre from Paris, emploiynge themselfes to ioy and solace for the honor of this high mariage, conspired to brynge into the citee Charles the Dolphyn callyng hym self Frenche kyng, durying the tyme of his absence. And to thentent that their inuẽted purpose should succede, they therof aduertised the Dolphyn and his counsayll appoyntyng the daie of his comyng and the post of his entre. But no treason is commonly hiden nor no sedicion long vnreueled, for Pies wyll chatter and Mice wyll pepe, but by whom I cannot declare: The Regente was informed of al the secrete confederacy and seditious faccion, wherfore he meanyng not to lose in short tyme, that whiche in no small space was gayned, put spurres to the horsse, and with a greate power entred into Paris one daye before the faire was apoynced, and two nightes before the lokyng for of his enemies, whō beyng vnprouided he sodainlye caused to be apprehended and taken, and openly putte to execucion. After this ieoperdy thus escaped, he putte diffidence in all the Parisyans trustyng litle the nobles and geuyng lesse credite to the comons, determined to fortifye the Garrisons of his owne nacion and all the Castles nere and adioynyuge to the citee, whyche wythin small tyme were habundauntlye furnished. And to auoyde all nyghte watchers adioynyng to Paris and the confines of thesame, he firste toke into hys possession ether by assaute or composicion the toune of Traynell and Bray vpon Seyne, and because twoo Castles the one called Pacy and the other called Cursay were also euill neighbors to the Parisians, he sent sir Jhon Fastolffe great Master of his houshold, with a notable armye to beliege the Castle of Pacy, whyche takyng vpon him that enterprise so handled his enemies that the capitayn named Guyllam Reymon esquire & all the garrison yelded them symply to hys mercy and discrecio whom he sent as prisoners to the citee of Paris, and after belieged the Castle of Coursay whiche to hym was shortly rendered vpon lyke appoyntmẽt, and so with praie and prisoners he returned to the lord Regent his master. In this very season the Dolphyn sent lorde Willyam Stuard Constable of Scotlande, and therle of Uentadorze in Auergne and many other nobles of his part to laye siege to the toune of Crauãt in the coũtie of Auxerre within the partes of Burgony, wherof heryng the lorde Regent and the duke of Burgoyn thei assembled a greate armye, wherof was ordeined capitaine the erle of Salisbury, accompanyed with these valeant personages.

After this fortunate victorye obteined, the Englishemen fyrste gaue great laudes and thankes to almightie God and after entered into the toune of Crauant muche praysyng the doynges of the capitaines and the fidelitie of the citezens, and when they had set all thynges in an ordre they returned to Paris where of the regent they were ioyously receiued, whiche there constituted therle of Salsbury (as he was wel worthy) vicegerent and lieftenaunt for the kyng & him in the countries of Fraunce, Bry and Champaigne, & sir Jhon Fastolf he substituted deputie vnder him in the duchy of Normãdy on this syde the riuer of Seyne, & with that the deputed hym gouernor of the countreys of Aniow & Mayne, & assigned able capitaines in euery holde & fortresse. Therle of Salsbury whych could not slepe in hys great office of trust, ladye siege to the toune & castle of Mountaguillõ in Bry, wherof were capitaines Pregent of Cotyny & Guille Bourgoys Britons whyche valiantly defended the castle by the space of.v. monethes, but in conclusion the assaulantes were so fierse that they within for safegard of theyr liues rendred the hold, and the capitaines sware neuer to bere armure xx agaynst the Englishmen on this side the riuer of Leyre, durying which siege the erle of Suffolke toke by force the castle of Coucy: & the strong castle dela roche he gat by appointment in Mosconoys.

Nowe muste I go backe to put you in memorye howe James kyng of Scottes beynge bothe prisoner in the tyme of kynge Henry the fourth & also as subiect of kyng Henry the fift his sonne, seruynge hym in his warres in Fraunce tyll he departed out of this transitory life at Boys de Vyncens and so as chief morner attended on the corps of the sayd deceassed vnto his buriall, and after at Westminster was released of his captiuitie and restored to his realme and possession. For the true xxx knowledge therof you shall vnderstande that Englande demaunded a small raunsome for so greate a prince as the Scottes accompte their kyng (and the Scottes were neither able nor offered no summe conuenient) wherfore ỹ counsell of the realme of England grauously pondered and wisely considered that yf by coniunction of mariage, Englande and Scotland were perfectely knit in one, that the indissoluble band of amitie betwene the Frenche and Scottishe nacions should be shortlye broken and dissolued. Wherfore the protector of the realme of Englãd by the cõsent of the whole baronage of the same gaue to him in mariage the Lady Jane doughter to Jhon earle of Somerset descealed, not xl onely sister to Jhon then duke of Sommerset but also cosyn germayne remoued to the kyng and nece to the cardinall of Wyncester & the duke of Exceter.

The kynge of Scottes hauyng great affection to this fayre Lady, but muche more desiryng his deliuerance and libertie, put in hostages for the residue of his raunsome because a great part therof was deminished and abated for the money allowed to hym for hys mariage, & so was deliuered to depart at his pleasure. Alacke the olde prouerbes be to true: an Ape although she bee clothed in purple, will be but an Ape, and a Scotte neuer so gentlye enterteined of an Englishe prince wyll be but a dissimulyng Scotte. What kyndnes could be more shewed to a prisoner then to bryng hym vp in good litterature? What loue maye bee more declared to a captiue, then to instructe hym in marciall feates and warlike affaires? What fauor can be more ascribed to a high and renoumed prince, then to geue in mariage to his vnderlyng and vassall his cosyn and kinswoman of his royall parentage lawfully discen- x

ded. All these kyndnesses suffised not, nor all these gratuites auailed not to make thys kyng James frendly to the realme of Englande. For he notwithstandyng hys homage doen to the younge Henry kynge of Englande and of Fraunce at his Castle of Wynsore thys present yere, before three Dukes, twoo Archebyshoppes. xij. erles. x. byshoppes. xx. barons, and twoo hundred knightes and esquires and mo, accordyng to the tenor here after foloyng.

,, I James Stuart kynge of Scottes, shalbe true and faithfull vnto
,, you lorde Henry by the grace of God kyng of Englande and Fraunce
,, the noble and supperior lorde of the kyngdome of Scotlande, and vnto xx
,, you I make my fidelitie for thesame kyngdome of Scotlande, whiche
,, I holde and claime to hold of you, and I shall beare you my faythe and
,, fidelitie of life and lymme and worldly honor against all men, and faith,, fully I shall knowledge and shall do to you seruice due of the kyngdom
,, of Scotland afore said. So God help me and these holy Euangelistes.

Nether regardyng hys othe, nor estemynge the great abundance of plate and riche Clothes of Arras, to hym by the mother and vncles of his wife liberally geuen and frendly deliuered (of whiche sorte of riches fewe or none before ỹ daye were euer seen in the coũtrey of Scotlande) like a dogge whiche hath caste vp his stomacke and returneth to xxx his vomet, or like a snake whiche after hys engenderyng with a Lampray taketh again his old poyson: After he had once taken the ayre and smelled the sent of the Scottishe soyle became like hys falce fraudulent forfathers, an vntrue prince, and like his proude prayenge progenitors toke the ymage of a braggyng and bostyng Scot, newly alied hymself with the Frenche nacion. And yet what soeuer he dyd, his nacion bothe write and testifye, that by the learnyng which he by the greate benefite of the kynges of Englande durynge his captiuitee in this realme had obteigned, replenished his countrey with good litterature, and by the nurture the which he was brought vp in England, he brought his peo- xl ple to ciuilitee: So that hys captiuitee was to hys nation the greatest libertie that euer thei could haue, deliuerynge them from blynde ignorance to Angelicke knowledge, reducynge theim from bestiall maners to honest behauor, and in conclusion causynge theim to knowe vertue from vice, pollicie from rudenes, and humain honestye from sauage ly-

uyng. This was the deliuerance and the doynges of James the fyrste of that name kynge of Scottes, whiche neither reigned verye quietly, nor yet euer fauored Englishemen before the Frenche people: sauynge that he hauyng with hym into his countrey a yonge gentlemē of Northumberland called Andrew Gray (whiche duryng his captiuitie was his companion) promoted him to the mariage of the heyre of the lorde of Foules in Anguis, of the whych the lorde Gray of Scotland at thys day do descend.

NOw leue I the doynges of Scotlande, and returne to the x affaires of Englande. The duke of Gloucester beynge protector and gouernor of the realme, considerynge that wood muste be ministred to kepe fyre, and men ought to be sent to set forwarde war, called to hym the pieres and nobilitie of the realme, and by their agrementes and deuises, sent into Fraunce to the regent hys brother. x. M. men of warre, whyche were of the same regent in the countrey of Paris louyngly receiued, & accordinge to their degres honestly entertained. Duryng their liynge in Paris, diuers chaunces happened in Fraunce, for euen as Englishmen valiantlye wonne, and xx victoriously cõquered tounes and castles wyth open warre and apparant conquest: so the Frenchmen fraudulently stale & couertely obtayned diuers fortresses and holdes appertainyng to thenglishe faccion, & in especiall che fayre toune of Compaigne, & the prety toune of Crotoy.

When the duke of Bedforde was aduertised of thele craftye tric-kes and sodaine inuented traines, he sent furth an army, fyrst to Compaigne, wheaof was capitaine the erle of Suffolke accompanyed wyth therle of Liguy, & diuers other capitaines of the Englishmen, whyche lay on the one side of the riuer of Sohame, & on the other syde laye the lord Lisle Adam, sir Thomas Raupstone, & the prouost of Paris. The xxx Frenchmen beyng strongly furnished and well vitailed, corragiously defended the toune against the assailantes. The Englishmen perceiuyng that Guylliã Remond otherwise called Mariolayn, had bene the leder of the souldiers within the toune, which before at Pacy was taken prisoner by Sir John Fastolf, caused hym to be sent for to Paris, and so brought him to the seige, and set him in a chariot with a halter aboute his necke, and cõueighed him to the gibbet without the toune, sendinge worde to the garrison within the toune, that if they would not without delay rẽdre the toune & fortresse, they would incõtinẽt strãgle their old capitaine and chief conductor. The souldiors within the toune percey-xl uyng that if Guylliã Raymond the onely truste of their relefe, and the auncient frend in their necessitie, should suffre death, that thẽ their hope of all ayde were extinguished, & the sure nutriment of their liuyng was from them secluded: for the deliuerance of him and sauegarde of them selues, yelded the toune: so that both he & they might depart with horse and harnes onely, in sure conduite and safetye: yet long or the toune of Compaigne was deliuered, sir Philip Hall whiche was sent to Crotoy by the lorde regent with. viij. C. men to besiege the toune, gatt it by assault sodainly, or the Frenchmen had either desposed their garrison, or appointed their lodgynges and toke al the men of warre and put them to raunsome. In so these. ij. tounes cowardely stollen, were manfullye recouered, but yet the writers of Frenche fables to deface the glorye of the Englishmen, wryte and say that these tounes were yelded to the Burgonyons, whiche neither had the keppng of them nor were souldiers to any other person but to the kyng of England. While these thinges were thus doyng in Fraunce, sir Jhon de la Pole brother to therle of Suffolke capitaine of Auranches in Normandye, assembled all the garrisons of the base Marches of the coūtrey of Anow, & came before the cytie of Angiers and brent the subbarbes, spoyled and destroyed the whole countrey, and hauyng as many prayes and prisoners as hys men might cary, he was encountred by the earle of Aubemerle, the viscount Narbone and. vj. thousand Frenchmen: whiche findyng the Englishmen out of arraye because of the cariage of their great spoyle, sodainly set on thē and slewe. CCC. persons and toke prisoners the sayd sir Jhon Delapole, sir Jhon Basset, Jhon Auford leuetenaunt of Faloys, Jhon Clyfton, Henry Mortymer and. vi. C. other. Although the Frenchmen gat this day in one place, yet thei went not victours away in another, for the bastard de la Baulme and the Lorde Craignar capitaines of Courrallon with a great bande, made a roade into Masconnoys, with whom by chance met Mathew Gough and other Englishemen whych were scouryng the countrey to se and heare newes of their enemies, there was a sore conflict and an hard encountre, the partes in maner beyng of corage & nombre egal, but after long fight, the Frenchmen almost al wer slaine & taken, and the bastard beyng wel horsed fled after whom folowed with the fiersnes of his spurres Mathew Gough and chased him to hys castle gate and there toke him as he would haue hid him in the diche & presented him to therle of Salisbury, returnyng from Compaigne to Paris, whiche not onely gaue to hym the rightes belonging to ỹ prisoners, but also rewarded him with a goodly courser and highly exalted his name and manhode.

Aboute thys season, Arthur brother to Jhon Duke of Britaine cōmonly called the earle of Richemonde, hauynge neither profite of the name nor of the countrey, notwithstādyng that kyng Henry the. v. had created him earle of Pury in Normandy & gaue him not onely a great pencion but thesame toune of Pury: yet because his brother the duke of Brytaine fearyng the Englishmen now hauyng Normandye woulde smel and desire to tast the swete soyle of Britaine, was late (contrary to his leage & othe) returned to the part of Charles the dolphyn, he likewise returned and craftly without cause fled into Flanders & so came to the dolphyn to Poytiers, which was more glad of his cōmyng then

yf he had gained à C. M. crounes, for the Britons whiche kept ȳ toune and castle of Pury hearyng that their master was ioyned with the dolphyn bothe kepte the castle against the duke of Bedford, furnishynge it dayly with new people & municions, and also infested, spoyled and robbed the countrey adioyning, doyng, to the Englishmen the most hurt & damage that either coulde be deuised or imagined.

The Lord Regent beyng aduertised of all these troubles & calamities, assembled a great armye both of Englishmen & Normans, entendyng to serche the dolphin in euery part, to thẽtent to geue him battaill in a pitched feld and so to make a finall ende of his entended conquest. So hauynge in hys companye therle of Salsbury, therle of Suffolke, the lord Scales, the lord Wylloughby, the lorde pounyng, sir Reynold Gray, sir Jhon Fastolf, sir Jhon Saluayne, Lanslot Lisle, sir Philippe x Halle, sir Jhon Paschely sir Jhon Gray, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Robert Harlyng, sir William Oldhal, and many other valiant knightes and esquiers to the nombre (as the Frenche writers testifie) of .xviij. C. men of armes and .viij. M. archers and other, came before the toune of Pury whiche was wel defended: but the Englishemen began to vndermine the walles, so that they within were glad to rendre the toune vpõ condicion, whiche was taken. Howbeit the capitaines of the castle promised to yelde yf their fortresse wer not rescued at a day assigned by the dolphyn with a nomber sufficient to raise the siege, & vpon this promise hostages wer deliuered into the possession of the lord regent. By his li-xx cence, an herault was sent to the dolphyn to aduertise him of the tyme determined, the whiche hearyng of the destresse that his people & frendes wer in, sent incontinent Jhon duke of Alanson his lieftenant generall, therle Doglas whom at that settynge furth he made duke of Toraine, and therle Boughan, whom then in hope of good spede he made Constable of Fraunce (whiche office he enioyed not fully an hundreth houres) and therles of Aumarle, Uãtadoure, Tonnerre, Maulieurier Forest, the vicountes of Narbon and Thouars, the lordes of Grauile, Gaules, Malycorne, Mãny, Vallay, Fountaines, Mountfort, & many other noble knightes and esquiers to the nombre of .xb. M. Frenche xxx men & Britons and .v. M. Scottes whom the erle Doglas had transported late out of Scotland more for nede then for loue.

This armye royall approched within .ij. miles of Pury and sent .xl. light horsmen to viewe and espy both the nomber and cõduit of the Englishmen. These spyes came very nere to the siege and wer espied and chased to their companions againe, and declared al what they had seen and perceiued. The duke of Alanson seyng that he could not gette any auantage of the Englishemen (although the Dolphyn had geuen hym in straight cõmaundement to fight with the regent) whether his heart fayled or he thought to wayte a more fortunate season for hys purpose xl and enterprise, retired backe with his whole army to the toune of Vernoyle in Perche whiche belonged to the kyng of England, & sent word to the garyson of that toune that they had discōfited & slaine all the Englishe army and that the regent with a small nōber by swyftnes of hys horse had saued him selfe. The inhabitantes of Uernoyle geuynge to light credit to the Frenche fablers, receyued the duke of Alāson with al hys army into the toune & submitted thē selues to hym. Whyche toune he desyred to haue of the gift of the dolphyn as his owne inheritance & lawfull patrimony. Now approched the day of rescous of Pury, which was the day of our Lady the Assumpcion, at which day no rescous appeared to sir Gerrard de la Pallier captain of the castle, whyche beyng in dispayre of all ayde and comforte, presented the keys to the duke of Bedford & shewed hym a letter signed & sealed with the hādes of. xviij.

great lordes whiche the day before promised to geue the duke battaile and to dessolue the siege and raise the assault: Well sayde the duke, yf their hartes would haue serued, their puissaunce was sufficient ones to haue profered or to haue performed this faithfull promyse. But syth they disdaine to seke me, God and saint George willyng I shall not desist to folowe the tractes of their horses tyll one part of vs be by battail ouerthrowen: and so he gaue a safeconduyte to the capitaine and other which wold depart, but many of the Britons within the castle of Pury seyng the faint heartes and the false promises of the flatteryng French men submitted them selues to the lorde regent and sware to be true to the kyng and him, whom he gently accepted and put them in wages.
Then he furnished the castle and toune with a newe garrison, & incontinent he sent the earle of Suffolke with. vi. C. horses to espy wher the Frenchemen were lodged, whiche passed by Dampeule, and came to Bretnel wher he heard newes that the Frenchmē had taken Uernoile in Perche & were there yet abidyng, wherof with all diligēt celerite he sent worde to the duke of Bedford, which not mindyng to lese hys long desired pray set forward in great hast toward his enemies. The Frēhmen hearyng of his cōmyng set their people in array and made all one maine battaile without forward or rereward, and appointed certaine Lūbardes & horsmen to breake the array of the Englishmen either behynd or at the sides, wherof was capitaine sir Stephyn Uenoyles called the hyre. The duke of Bedford not ignorant howe to ordre hys men, made likewise one entier battaile & suffered no man to be on horse backe, and set the archers (euery one hauyng a sharpe stake) both in the front of the battaile and on the sydes like wynges, and behynd the battaile were the pages with the chariottes and cariages, and all the horses were tyed together either with the reines of their bridles or by the tayles, to thentent that their enemies should not sodainely surprise or disturbe them on the backe behynd: and for to defend the cariages wer appointed two thousand archers. The Frenchmen at the fyrst sight re-membryng how often tymes in piched feldes they had bene ouercome and vanquished of the Englishe nacion, began some what to feare, but when they sawe no remedy but to fight, they toke good courage to the

and set softely forwarde. In whiche marching the Duke of Alaunson sittyng on horsebacke sayed to his capitaines.

Dracpon of the duke of Alaunson.

Louing compaignions, and hardy souldiers, call to youre remembraunce, howe the Englishmen haue not onely gotten from vs the noble isle of Fraunce, the duchies of Normandy and Aniow, but also sith their enterprise and conquest hath both slain our parentes and kylled our frendes, yea, and hath driuen our naturall Prynce, and very souereaigne Lord from his chiefe habitacion and surest chaumber, the fayre citie of Paris: which act neuer Pagan durst attẽpt or euer any prynce was able to acheue. Besides this, you se that the duke of Bedford Regent here for the kyng of Englande, entendyng nothing more then the deposicion or the destruccion of our kyng and his nobilitie, and in finall conclusyon to bryng to extreme bondage all vs, oure wiues and children, and all the people of thys so long renoumed regyon, by many hũdred yeres called the realme of Fraunce, whiche is as muche to say, as a fre countrey or a franke lande. Alas, shal your kynge now be made a subiecte? shall your peres and nobilitie be made vassals, & you also slaues and bondmen to a forrain nacion? Where is the libertie of Fraunce and where is the auncient fredome? When you defended your Fraunchises, and when youre hartes serued you: your kynge ruled kynges, your princes possessed the empire, and your nacion subdued Germany, conquered Italy, and ouercame the proude Spanyardes. Shall we now, fallyng out of kynd from our fathers, feare the puissaunce of the arrogant Englyshmen, beynge men of no forecast, nor of no excellente wyt, long in gettyng, and shortly lesyng? Wyll you now suffre the olde glory of Fraunce to be put in obliuion? wyll you haue an Englyshe infant, whiche lyueth with pappe to be your kinge and gouernor? Wyll you lyue in seruitude of a barbarous nacion, in whom is neyther bountifulnes nor honour? Clerckes saye, that the greatest plague, that euer God scourged with the Israelites, was, when he permitted them to be caried from their natiue countreye to the bondage of Babylon, where they lyued in captiuitie by the space of many yeres. What canne bee a more greater scourge, then to haue a forrein ruler in a free regyon? What dishonour can there be more to a countrey, then to haue the nobilitie put backe from rule, and to be gouerned by Straũgers? Beleue me beleue me, it is to vs all one blot, to be a slaue in Turkey, vnder the Turkishe bondage, and to be a fre man in Fraunce vnder the Englyshe libertie. Of this poynt you be sure: yf they gayne this battayll, they be not vnlike to obtain the whole regiõ: which if thei get, then is the enheritaunce theirs: then be al the riches theirs, and then all the people bee their subiectes. If they be rulers, fare well the Francke and Frenche libertie. If they be lordes, welcome English seruitude. So that now we stand al on this poynt, either to be fre or bondmen. Whyche terme of bondage is so detested of al nacions, that there can be no more reproche to a man then to call hym a villaine or a bondman. Therfore manly defence must onely withstand this mischief, and harty corage must dryue backe this imminent plage. This is the day either of our deliueraunce oute of vile seruitude, or the day of our entry into the vale of bondage. The conclusion of this battayl is verye doubtfull, for yf we be vanquyshed, the gain for our side is almost without recouery, cõsideryng, that here be the best men, & wisest captains vnder our kyng: And yf we get the vpper hande, our heddes shalbe free and out of the Englysh yoke. And although the duke of Bedford hath here with him, all the power that he can gather on this side the sea, yet I assure you, (God wyllyng) I wyl not turne one fote backward for feare of hym, or hys picked armye. Therfore I exhorte you to remembre, your wifes, your childzen and your selfes. Fight manfully and sticke eche to other for the libertie of our countrey: I doubt not but the victorie shalbe oures, and the honor shalbe our kynges. For yf this daye we vanquishe hym and sparcle his armie, we shal so diligently folowe Fortunes good grace, that not onelye Fraunce to vs shal yelde, and Normandy bowe, but we shall recouer agayne al our cities and tounes, which out of our possessiõ were gained, before any ayde can come to rescue oute of the poore isle of Englande. Now considerying, that we hange in the ballaũce betwene honor and shame, libertie and bondage, gayne or losse, let euery man take harte and corage to hym, litle regarding, or caryng, either for death, or the force of his enemies, and wyth a manly countenaunce march furth toward our foes.

The Englishmen perceyuing their greate nomber and knowynge that the chiefe strẽgth cõsisteth in the Scottes, began somwhat to stay and consult, what was moste expedient to bee done. The duke of Bedford sittyng on a baye courser in the middes of the battayll vnder a bãner curiously beten with hys Armes, not contẽt wyth their whisperinges and protractyng of tyme, sayed vnto them with an audible voyce.

The oracion of the duke of Bedforde.

You valiaunt capytaynes and hardye souldyers, my louinge compaynions in armes, and frendely felowes. Yf you cõsidre with your self what day this is: What honor and profyte wee shall gette by oure trauayle and payne, I doubt not but where you nowe stand styll musyng, you would runne furth a gallope, and where you runne on youre fete, you would, yf you had winges, flye as faste, as euer dyd Hauke to hys praye. For greate is the honor that is gotten wyth payne, and swete is the lucre, that is gayned wyth trauayle, for you muste remembre, that nothing is wel done, yf it growe not to a good conclusion: and a thyng were as good neuer to be begon, as neuer ended. My brother our late soueraigne lord (whose soule God pardon) hath entred into this countrey, as into his owne lawful inheritaunce: and fyrst conquered Normandy, & after by agrement of kynge Charles the blurper, he was by assent of the nobilitie, agrement of the Clergie, & speciall request of the commonaltie, restored to his ryghtfull inheritaunce, and lawful patrymony, whiche by his death is returned and come to my nephewe oure

moste redoubted souereigne. The beginning of hys cõquest was good and the sequele better, yet resteth the finall knot to be knytte, and the last locke to be shut vp. For yf we suffre Charles the dolphyn, whyche now vsurpeth the name, and estate royall of this realme of Fraunce, to proceade farther in hys purpose, or to gather more puyssance, or allure more people, I cannot tell then what feattes flattrynge fortune wyll worke: and of this I am sure, that yf we suffre his fier still to flame, as it hath begon, we shall haue skant water to quenche out thesame. Here he hath assembled all the Frenche men that he can get, and for lacke of x aide, he hath retained the Scottes: croppe hym now at the beginning and he shall growe no more: let hym grow farther and he will passe our reache: discomfite hym now and bryng our conquest to a conclusion: let hym alone now, and we shalbe new to begyn. Therfore I say, it is wisdome to take occasyon, when the hery syde and not the bald side is profered. Yf we feare the multitude, remember ourowne victories, which we haue euer obteyned by lesse nombre, and not by the greater. If we feare death, remember the glory and immortall fame, that shal succead of our valiaunt actes, yf we sell our lifes so dere. If we shalbe slain, consyder I haue a kyng to my nephewe, and a duke to my brother, and xx cwoo noble vncles, and you haue frendes, kynsmen and children, which wyll reuenge our death to the vttermost poynte: therefore I saye lette euery man this day do hys best. For this is the day of thē of our great trauayle, the day of our great victory, and the day of our euerlastynge fame. Therfore good felowes, put your onely trust in God, call to hym for ayde boldly, and marche forward hardly, for our enemies be at hād.

He had skace ended his exhortacion, but the Englyshmen beyng incouraged wyth his prudent persuasion, sette on their enemies, cryyng, Saint George, Bedford. And the frenchmen lykewise cryed, Moūtioye, Saynct Denyse. Then the arrowes flewe out of the long bowes xxx on the one parte, the quarrelles out of the crosse bowes on the other parte. After thei came to hande strokes: great was the fight, a terrible was ỹ battail, with so indifferent iudgemēt of victory, that no herauld coulde determyne to whyche part Fortune moste shewed her louynge countenaunce. For on bothe sydes men were slayne and wounded, and on both pares some were felled and recouered, thus still in a doubtfull iudgement, the battaill continued aboute thre houres. The duke of Alaunson in the mean ceason neuer ceased to exhort and pray his people manly to fyght, and not to suffre their enemies (whych were at ỹ verye point to be ouercome) by their faynt hartes to be victors, and ouercōxl mers. Lykewise the duke of Bedford rode about his army, refreshyng the weake wyth fresh men, and encoragyng his people wyth most plesaunt wordes: But at the last, when he perceyued the frēchmen, what with heate, and wyth trauayl, to waxe wery and faynt, and not to be so fresh as they wer before (for surely the nature of the frenchmen, is not to labor longe in fyghting, and much more braggeth then fighteth) he with al his strength set incontynent on them with such a violence, that they bare theim doune to the ground by fyne force. The French horsemen that daye did litle seruyce: for the archers so galled their horses, that they desired not much to approche their presence. This battaille was fought in the.xxvij. day of August, in the yere of oure Lord. M. CCCC.xxv. in the whyche battayl were slayne.

In this battayl were slayn by the report of Montioy king at armes in Fraunce, and the Englishe Herauldes there present, of Frenchmen and Scottes. ix. thousand and seuen hundred, and of the Englyshmen xxj. hundred, but noman of name, sauyng. v. yong esquyers. And there were taken prysoners, Jhon duke of Alaunson, the bastard of Alaunson the lorde of Fayect, the lorde of Horymyt, sir Pers Heaillon, sir Loys de Uancort, sir Robert Brusset, sir Jhon Turnebul a Scot, and two hundred gentlemen besydes common souldyoures.

After that the duke of Bedforde had thus obteined the vpper hand of hys enemies, and discomfyted the onely strength of the dolphyn, he vpon his knees rendred to almightye God hys hartye thankes not wythout effusyon of teares. Then he commaunded all the Frenchmen within the toune of Uernoyle, to go out and depart, or elles abyde their aduẽture. They perceyuing the euyl successe, of their bostyng enterprise and seyng no meane, wherby in so lowe an ebbe, they mighte bee ayded, delinered vp the toune, and went furth out of the same (their lyues sa-ued (Of whiche toune the Lord Regent constituted captain, sir Philip Hall, and so departed from thence, to the citie of Roan, where wyth triumph (and not vnworthy) he was ioyously receyned & honorably feasted. And after all thynges there set in an ordre, he remoued to Paris.

Here you may se what succeded of the spirite of false prophecie. For the duke of Alaunson thinkinge it to be predestinate by the bodyes aboue, that he shoulde ouercome, and conquere the duke of Bedford, bosted (as you haue heard) to the Burgesses of Uernoil, that he had dyscomfyted the Regent of Fraunce with his whole army, before ỹ toune of Jury: Not knowyng, that Mars the God of battayl beynge angry with his liyng, appoynted, not onely all his puissaunce to bee banquyshed before Uernoyle, but also hym selfe, and hys bastarde vncle, there to be taken, and brought into bondage. So it is often sene that he x whyche rekeneth wythoute hys hoste, muste reken twyse, and he that fysheth before the net, maye lese, but nothyng gayne. When thys victory was publyshed through Fraunce, howe the common people lamented their miserable destiny, how the nobilitie mistrusted their owne estate, and howe the Dolphyn was abashed, yea, moze then abashed, wõderful it were to wzite, but moze merueylous foz to heare. Foz he was dziuen out of all the countreyes apperteyning to the croune of Frãce, & might resoyt to no countreyes, except to Burbonoys, Auuerne, Berry, Poyctou, Towzayn, a part of Aniow and Barrayn, & Languedoc. And because diuerse of his frẽds, which wer aduocats in Paris, exiled xx thẽselfes frõ the parliament of Paris, which was with all rightes, and iurisdiccions there vnto belongyng, kepte, and holden in the name of kynge Henry the. vj. as lawfull heire and very kynge of the realme of Fraunce: he therfoze to shew him selfe as a kynge, erected the court of Parliament, his Chauncery, and all other courtes in the citie of Poytiers, and there established his great seale, wyth all due circumstaunces thereunto aperteyning, which there continued by the space of. xiiij yeres, as you shall after heare declarrd. The duke of Bedfozd liynge at Paris, entendyng there to bzyng to obeysaunce Charles the Dolphyn, oz els to dzyue hym out of his litle cony holdes, and small countries, sẽt xxx the lozd Scales, sir Jhon Mountgomerey, sir Jhon Fastolfe, with two thousand men, to conquere the countries of Aniow and Mayn whych wythout assault had rendzed to thẽ the strong castles of Beaumoũt le Uicõt, Teune, Silley, Oste, Courceriers. Rously, Uasse, Couetemenãt and twenty other, which foz prolixitie of tyme, I thynke necessarye to be omitted. Foz surelye the Englishe puissaunce was so tried, pzoued, assaied, and spzed abzode throughout all Fraunce, that the Frenchmen thoughte that in conclusion the Englishmen woulde haue, oz shoulde haue al thinges, which they either wished oz enterpzised. The duke of Bedfozd yet thirstyng after moze good foztune, sent the erle of Salis-xl bury, with a great army accompaignied with the lozde Scales, and other appzoued capitaynes, (whose names you haue heard before) into the countreies of Aniow & Mayn, which were euil neighbozs to ỹ duchy of Nozmãdy: in whych army wer. x. M. mẽ of warr, oz ther about. These lusty capitaynes entred firste into the countrey of Mayne, and beseged the rych and strõg citie of Mauns, the chiefe toune & emperie of al that countrey and regiō. And although the citezens, aswel for the sodain accesse of their enemies, as for the feare of the name of therle of Salisbury (whiche was both dread of his enemies, and honored of his frendes,) were somwhat amased and astonied: Yet their captaines named sir Baldwyn of Champaigne lord of Toisse, sir Guilliam de Marignie, and sir Hughe de Goos, studied and inuented alwayes possible how to defend them selfs, and do domage and harme to their enemies: and surely, they had within the toune a crewe & a compaygny of warlike & practysed souldyoures. The Englishmen approched as nygh to the walles, as they myght wythout their losse and detriment, and shot & against their walles great stones out of great gonnes (which kinde of engines before ỹ tyme, was very littel sene or heard of in Fraunce) the strokes whereof so shaked, crushed and ryued the walles, that wythin few daies, the citie was dispoiled of al her toures & outward defences. The citezens of Maus muche merueylyng at these newe orgaynes, both seyng their destruccion imminent, & desperate of all ayde and succour: offered the toune vpon this condicion: that all persones whyche woulde tary wythin the toune myght abyde, and al that would depart wyth horsse and harnesse onely, should be permitted: which offers wer accepted, and the toune rendred, wherof the erle made captaine therle & of Suffolke, and hys liuetenaunt sir Jhon Fastolfe. After this thesaid erle of Salisbury besieged the faire towne of sayncte Susan, whereof was captayn, Ambrose the Lore, a mā of no lesse audacite then pollicy, accompaignied with a greate nombre of hardy menne of warre. When the erle of Salisbury had bothe viewed and sene the situacion and nature of the place, he determined to assault it in that place whyche was most weake and worne: and so the trompettes blew to the assault, and scalyng ladders were raysed to the walles, and the Englyshmen with great noyse began to clime and ascende. The souldiours whych durste not come out of the toune to encountre wyth the Englysh armye, man- & & fully ranne to the walles to resyste and defend the assaylantes. And so all that day the assault wyth many aduentures styl contynued, and although the inhabitauntes and citezens wer sore wounded, they neuer lefte of both to defende theim selfes, and to anoye and hurte their enemies. When therle perceiued that by this light assault and slight skirmishe he lost somewhat, and gained nothing, he made a wall and cast a trenche rounde about the toune: & caused his great ordinaunce to be shot at that part of the wal which was moste feble and slender, and so dayly and nightly he neuer ceassed to beate, and breke doune the wal & toures: so that within twoo dayes the most part of the wal was persed & and cast doune to the grounde. When the captain perceyued these new feates, he began to entreate, and offered for him self and his souldyors, two thousand crounes, so that they might departe in their doublettes onely: so their liues were saued, whiche some, because winter approched was taken and the toune yelded. Of the whyche toune he made capi-

tain,sir Jhon Popham,a valiaunt & a circumspect knight. After that the sayd erle besieged the toune and castle of Mayon la Juhez, wherin was captain the lorde of Escotaiz: whiche toune after the space of fyue wekes was yelded (the lyfes of the defendors onely saued.) To ỹ kepyng whereof he appointed sir Jhon Montgomery knight. And after the feast of the purification of our ladye, he besieged the castle de lafort Barnard:during which siege, a sale was made of the toune of Manson beyng in the Englisshmens possession by a Gascoyn & one of the garison there,for.iiij.C.crounes,to Charles de Villiers, Peter le Beuffe,and x other Frenche capitaines. When the day was apoynted of the deliuerraunce both of the toune and of the money,the Gascoygne opened and discouered the wholeagrement to the erle of Salisbury: which ordeyned the lorde of Willoughby and sir Jhon Fastolf with two thousande Englishmen to encountre wyth the byers of the kynges toune of Mã-son. At the day apoynted and tyme assigned, Charles de Villiers chief marchant of this rych enterpryse, early in the morning with twoo.C. horssemen,and thre hundred footemen approched nere the toune, and abidinge for the Gascoyne,he there displayed his banner,thinking triumphantly to entre into the toune: but it happened otherwyse.For or xr they wer ware,or suspected any rescues,they were enuironed with the Englisshe army,and slain & taken euery creature,saue Peter Dãthenazi and.xxb.other,which by the swyftnes of their horsses saued thẽselfs.

After this conflict ended,the lorde Willoughby wyth his company returned to therle of Salisbury,before the toune le fort Barnard: the captaynes wherof consydering, that there was no hope of succor to be sent to theim,and that their vittayl diminished,and that they wer not long able to abyde the hard assaultes of the Englysh nacyon, rendered the toune and castle, reseruyng to them theyr horsse and harnes onely which toune therle receyued to the vse of the kyng:But the regent for xxr the valiaunt seruice done by the erle,gaue the same toune to hym and to his heires for euer.Besyde this the erle partly by assault,parteiy by composicion,toke diuerse other tounes,as sainct Kales,wher he made captayn,Richard Gethine Esquyer, Thanceaux Lermitage,wher he made Gouernor, Matthew Gough, Guerlande,of the whiche he assigned ruler, Jhon Banaster, Malicorne,wherof he made captayn,Williã Glasdale esquier,Lisle soubz Boultõ,wherof he made captain,Sir Lancelot Lisle knight, Lowpellande, whereof was made captayne Henry Braunche,Mountsuer,of the which was made Constable,Sir Williã Oidhall knyght,la Suze, was assigned to the kepyng of Jhon xl Suffolke esquyer,and besyde this,aboue.xl.castles & pilces wer ouerthrowen and destroyed.When ỹ fame and report of thyse newes wer blowen through Fraunce,some freated, some feared, and some raged for angre:But the veritie of al thinges beyng by the duke of Bedforde declared into Englande,all men reioysed and wer very glad,not oneiy for the conquest of so many tounes, but also that God had sente theim victory in a pitched felde, and in a mortall battayl. Wherfore generall processions were commaunded, to rẽdre to God almighty humble and harty thankes, by whose onely gift, and not by power of man, these notable victories were gotten and achiued.

It is not conuenient, that I shoulde talke so much of Fraunce, and omit al thinges done in England. Wherfore, you shal vnderstand, that about easter this yere, ỹ kyng called his hygh court of parliamẽt, at his toune of Westminster, & cõming to the parliament hous he was conueighed through the citie vpõ a great courser with great triumph, which child was iudged of all men, not onely to haue the very ymage, ỹ liuely & portrature, and louely countenaunce of his noble parent & famous father, but also like to succede, & be hys heyre in al moral vertues, marcial Pollicies and Princely feates, as he was vndoubted inheritor to hys realmes, seigniories & dominions. In whiche parliament was graunted to the kyng a subsidy of .xij. d. of the pound, towardes the mainteynaunce of the warres, of al marchaundise commyng into thys realme, or goyng out of thesame, besydes other sommes set on euery tonne of liquor, & on euery sacke of woolle, aswell of Englishmen, as of Straungers. Duryng whiche Parliament came to London, Peter Duke of Quumber, sonne to the kynge of Portyngale, and cosin germain remoued to the kynge, whych of the duke of Excester and the byshop of Winchester hys vncles, was hyghly fested, & lyberallye rewarded, and was elected into the noble ordre of the Garter. Duryng whych season, Edmonde Mortymer, the last erle of Marche of that name (whiche longe tyme had bene restrayned frõ hys liberty, and fynally waxed lame) discessed wythout yssue, whose inheritaunce discended to lord Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to Richard erle of Cambridge, beheded as you haue heard before, at the toune of Southampton. Whiche Richard within lesse then .xxx. yeres, as heire to this erle Edmõd, in open parliament claimed the croune and scepter of this realme, as hereafter shall more manifestly appere. In the tyme of which Parliamente also, whether it were, either for deserte or malice, or to auoide thinges that might chaunce, accordinge to a prouerbe, which sayth, a dead mã doeth no harme: Sir Jhon Mortimer cosin to the said erle was attainted of treason and put to execucion: of whose deathe no small slaunder arose emongest the common people.

After all these actes done in Englande, and in Fraunce, Humfrey duke of Gloucester, with the lady Jaquet his supposed wife, passed the sea, and came to Mons in Henawde, and there by force tooke all suche landes, as Jhon duke of Brabant her first husband hadde in possessyon of the sayde lady Jaquet, which doyng, Philippe duke of Burgoyne, beynge greate frende to the Duke of Brabant, muche dysdayned and more frouned at, and thought for the olde loue and familiaritie, that he bare to the duke of Gloucester, that he woulde by frendelye monycion, turne him from hys vnhonest and vngodlye lyfe, to a reasonable

reformacion, and brotherly conformitie. Wherfore he wrote louyngly to him, that he shoulde vtterly leaue of, any further to folow that newe attempted enterprise, aduertisynge hym, and protestynge openly, that the vsurpinge and wrongfully withholdynge of another mannes possession, was not so vile and slaunderous, as the defilinge of a pure and cleane bedde, and adulteriously kepyng the wyfe of his christē brother. The duke of Gloucester beyng in this case very wilful, either blynded with dotage, or inflamed with coueteousnesse of his wifes possessyons, regarding neither the admonishment of the duke of Brabant, nor yet x the Godly aduertisement of the duke of Burgoyn, sware that he wold not leaue of to make farther war, till he had expulsed the duke of Brabant, out of his wyfes seigniories, teritories and dominiōs. Wherfore the duke of Burgoyn assembled together a great army to make warre on the duke of Gloucester, in the cause and quarell of the duke of Brabant hys frend and cosyn. The duke of Gloucester, partly for great affaires, ẏ then wer imminent in the realme of England, and partly to assemble more people, to resist ẏ withstād the power of the dukes of Burgoyn and Brabant, left hys wyfe at Mōs in Henaude, with the lordes of the toune, whiche sware to hym, to defend and kepe her againste all xi men, tyl the tyme of his returne. Wherfore he leauynge with her twoo thousand Englishmen, departed to Calice, and so into Englande.

When he was gone, the duke of Burgoyn so threatened, so vexed, yea, and almost so famished them within the toune of Mons, that they deliuered into his possession the lady Jaquet or Jacomine: whyche in cōtinent sent her to Gaunt, wher she disguysed her selfe in a mannes apparel, and so escaped into a toune of her owne in zeland, called zirich, and frō thence she was conueighed to a toune in Holland called Tregowe, where she was honorably receyued, ẏ there made her self strong to wythstand her enemyes: And for her succor the duke of Gloucester xii sent to her fyue hundred mē. The dukes of Burgoyn and Brabant left her not all in quiet, but brent her tounes in Holland, and slewe her people in zelande to her great detriment and displeasure. But in conclusion, thys matter was brought before Martyn the .v. bishop of Rome: whyche adiudged the first matrimony, with duke Jhon of Brabant, to be good and effectuall, and the seconde espousals celebrated with duke Humfrey of Gloucester, to bee of no value, force nor effecte: and that yf the duke of Brabant died, it should not be lawful to the duke of Gloucester, to mary agayn with the lady Jaquet. The duke of Gloucester obeyng to this sentence, beganne to waxe loth of his supposed wyfe, by xi whōm he neuer had profite but losse: for whose cause his frendes became his enemies, ẏ for whose sake he was openly slaundered. Wherfore he by wanton affeccyō blynded, toke to hys wyfe Elianor Cobhā doughter to the lord Cobham, of Sterberow, which before (as the fame wēt) was his soueraygne lady and paramour, to hys great slaunder and reproche. And yf he were vnquieted wᵗ his other pretensed wyfe, truly he was

was tenne tymes more vexed, by occasion of this woman as you shall herafter plainly perceyue: so that he began his mariage with euill, and endeth it with worse. The Lady Jaquet after the death of Jhon duke of Brabant, maried a gentleman of meane estate, called Fräke of Burselle, for the whiche cause the duke of Burgoyn imprisoned her houlbande, and left her in greate trouble: suche was the ende of these twoo mariages.

The.iiij.yere

A Litle before this tyme, Sir Thomas Räpstone, sir Philip Branche, Sir Nicolas Burdeit, and other Englishe men, to the nombre of.v.hundred men, repaired and fortified the toune of sainct James de Leitron, on the frontiers of Normandy, adioyning to Britain. Arthure erle of Richemond and Jury brother to the duke of Britayn, whiche like an vntrue gentleman, swore and forswore to the king of England, sodainly fled to Charles the Dolphyn: whiche muche reioysing of his fauor and amity, gaue to him the Constableship of Fraunce, whiche therle of Bougham slain before at Vernoyl, a small tyme occupied and lesse space enioyed. Thys newe constable not a lytle ioyfull of his hygh office, thought to do some pleasure to ỹ dolphin his maister & to aduaunce his name at the first entrie of his authoritie, he imagened no enterprise to be to him more honorable, nor to his prince more acceptable, then to auoyde and driue oute of the toune of sainct James de Beueon, al the English nacion. So in hope of victory gathered together aboue.xl.M.men, of Britons, Frenchmen and Scottes, and enuironed the toune of sainct James, or sainct Jaques de Beuron wyth a strong siege. The Englishmen within, whyche in nomber passed not vi.C. men, manfully defended the dayly assaultes of the fierce Frenchmen. The Englyshmen consulted together what waye was best to bee taken: and after long debating, thei determined to yssue out of ỹ toune and to fyght with their enemies. So on a day, whē the Britons were weried wyth a long assaulte, towardes the euenynge the Englishmen came oute of the toune, one part by the posterne of the Castle, and another part by the gate of the toune, crynge sainct George, Salisbury: and set on their enemies both before and behind. The Frenchmen seyng the corage of the Englyshmen, and hearing their crye, thinkynge that therle of Salisbury was come to rayse their siege, ran awaye like shepe, and there were taken, slain and drouned in the water, of thē. iiij. thousand men and mo. Besides this, these ioly gallantes lefte behinde theim for haste, all their tentes. xiiij. great gonnes, and.xl. barelles of pouder. CCC. pipes of Wine, CC. pipes of bisket and floure, CC. frailes of Figges and Resons, and.v.C. barelles of heryng.

The Frenchmen (beyng thus banquished) fell in deuision emongest theim selfes: the one laying to the charge of the other, the losse of their men and the cause of their fliyng. Suche is euer the chaunce of ỹ war, that when victorie is obteined, the moste coward and faint harted boy wil boste and bragge, and when the battayle is loste, the faulte is assigned to the beste, and not to the wourste. The new Constable was sore dismayed & muche ashamed of this discomfiture and shamefull flyght, but there was no remedy but pacience: But to the entent to blotte out and deface this shameful fliyng with a notable victory, he wyth a great armie entred into the countreye of Aniow, and brente, spoyled, and destroyed two or thre at the moste, lytle poore thetched byllages: Whych x final acte done, his malice was quẽched, & his old grief (as he thought) byctoriously reuenged.

In thys season fell a great diuision in the realme of England, which of a sparcle was like to growe to a greate flamme: For whether the bishoppe of Winchester called Heury Beaufoyd, sonne to Iho̅n Duke of Lancastre, by his third wyfe, enuied the authorite of Humfrey duke of Gloucester Protector of the realme, or whether the duke had take̅ disdain at the riches and pompous estate of the byshop, sure it is that the whole realm was troubled with them and their partakers: so that the citezens of London fearynge that that shoulde insue vpon the matter, xi were fain to kepe daily and nightly, watches, as though their enemies were at hande, to besiege and destroye them: In so muche that all the shoppes within the citie of Londõ wer shut in for fear of the fauourers of those twoo greate personages, for eche parte had assembled no small nombre of people. For pacifiyng whereof, the Archebishop of Cantorbury, and the duke of Quymber called the prince of Portyngale, rode eyght tymes in one daye betwene the two aduersaryes, and so ỹ matter was stayed at that tyme. The bishoppe of Wynchester not content with his nephewe the lorde Protector, sente a letter to the Regente of Fraunce, the tenor wherof insueth.

xxx Ryght hyghe and mighty prince, and my ryght noble and after one " leuest lord, I recommend me vnto you wyth all my harte. And as you " desire the welfare of the kyng our souereigne lord, and of hys realmes " of England and Fraunce, and your owne health and oures also, so hast " you hether. For by my trouth yf you tary, we shall put this land in ad- " uenture, wyth a felde, suche a brother you haue here, God make hym a " good man. For your wisdom knoweth, that the profite of Fraunce stan- " deth in the welfare of England, &c. Written in great hast on Alhallow " euen. By your true seruaunt to my lyfes ende. Henry Wynchester. "

The duke of Bedford beyng sore greued and vnquieted wyth these xi newes, constituted the erle of Warwycke, whiche was lately come into Fraunce, wyth fyue thousand men his liuetenaunte in the Frenche dominions and in the duchy of Normandy, and so wyth a small company he wyth the duches his wyfe, returned agayn ouer ỹ seas into Englãd and the tenth day of January, he was wyth all solemnitie receiued into London, to whom the citezens gaue a payre of basynnes, & a thon-sande marcke in money, and from London he rode to Westminster, & was lodged in the kinges palaice. The.xxv.day of Marche after hys cõming to London, a parliamẽt began at the toune of Leicester, where the Duke of Bedford openly rebuked the Lordes in generall, because that they in the tyme of warre, through their priuy malice and inward grudge, hadde almoste moued the people to warre and commocion, in whyche tyme all men ought or shoulde be of one mynde, harte and consent: requiringe them to defend, serue and dread their soueraigne lord kynge Henry, in perfourming his conquest in Fraunce, whiche was in maner brought to conclusion. In this parliament the Duke of Glou- x cester, layed certayne articles to the bishop of Wynchesters charge, the whych with the answeres hereafter do ensue.

¶ The artycles of accusacion, and accord, betwene my lord of Gloucester, and my lorde of Wynchester.

HEre insueth the articles, as the kinges counsayl hath conceiued, the which the hygh and mighty prince, my lord of Gloucester, hath surmysed vpon my Lord of Wynchester Chauncellour of Englande, wyth the answere to the same.

i. First, where as he beynge protector and defendor of this lande, desired the toure to be opened to him, and to lodge him therein, Rychard Woodeuyle esquyer, hauing at that tyme the charge of the keppynge of the toure, refused his desire, and kepte thesame toure against hym, vnduly and agaynst reason, by the commaundement of my sayed Lord of Winchester: and afterward in approuyng of thesaid refuse, he receiued thesaid Wooduile, and cherished hym against the state and worshyp of the kyng, and of my sayed Lorde of Gloucester.

ij. Item my sayed Lord of Winchester, wythout the aduise and assent of my saied lorde of Gloucester, or of the kinges counsail, purposed and disposed hym to set hande on the kynges persone, and to haue remoued hym from Eltham, the place that he was in, to Wyndsore, to the entent to put him in suche gouernaunce as him lyst.

iij. Item, that where my saide Lord of Gloucester, to whome of al persones or that should be in the land, by the waye of nature and byrthe, it belongeth to se the gouernaunce of the kynges person, informed of the said vndue purpose of my sayd Lord of Winchester, declared in the articles next aboue saide. And in the letting therof, determining to haue gone to Eltha vnto the kyng, to haue prouyded as the cause requyred. My saied lorde of Winchester, vntruly and agaynst the kinges peace, to the entent to trouble my saied lord of Gloucester goyng to the kyng purposing his death in case that he had gone that way, set men of armes and archers, at thende of London bridge next Southwerke: and in forbarringe of the kynges high way, let draw the cheyne of the stulpes there, and set vp pipes and hardelles, in maner and forme of Bulwarkes: and set men in chambers, sellers and windowes, with bowes

and arrowes and other weapons, to thentent to bryng to final destruc-cion my saied lorde of Gloucesters persone, aswell as of those that then should come with hym.

Item my saied lord of Gloucester saith and affirmeth, that our sou- 4 reigne lorde hys brother, that was kynge Henry the fifth, told hym on a time, when our said souereigne lorde beyng prince, was lodged in the palaice of Westminster in the greate chambre, by the noyes of a span-yell there was on a night a man espied and taken behynd a tapet of the said chambre, the whiche man was deliuered to therle of Arrundell to x be examined vpō the cause of his beyng there at that tyme. The which so examined at that tyme, confessed that he was there by the steryng vp & procuryng of my saied Lorde of Winchester, ordained to haue slayne the saied prince there in his bedde: Wherfore the said erle of Arrundell let sacke hym furthy with, and drouned hym in the Thamise.

Item our souereigne lord that was, kyng Henry the fifth, sayd vnto 5 my sayd Lorde of Gloucester, that his father kynge Henry the fourth liuyng, and visited then greatly with sickenes of the hande of God, my saied lorde of Winchester saied vnto the kyng (Henry the fifth then beyng prince) that the kyng his father, so visited with sickenesse was not xx personable: and therfore not disposed to come in conuersacion and go-uernaunce of the people, and for so muche, counsailed hym to take the gouernaunce and croune of this lande vpon hym.

¶ The answere of the Byshop.

Here ensueth the answeres and excusacions made by my lord of Wynchester Chauncellour of Englande, vnto the causes and matters of heuinesse, declared in articles agaynst hym, by my lorde of Gloucester.

Fyrst, as of the refuse made vnto my Lord of Gloucester of openyng x the toure to hym, of his lodgyng therin, by the commaundement of my xxx saied lorde of Wynchester, he answereth: that in the presence of my said Lorde of Gloucester, before hys commynge out of his countrey of Henawd, for causes suche as wer thought reasonable, it semeth lefull that the toure should haue been notably stuffed and kept with vitaile, howe beit, it was not furthy with executed, and that in likewise after, that my saied lorde of Gloucester was gone into his saied countrey of Henawd for sedicious and odious billes & language, cast and vsed in the citee of London, sounyng of insurreccion & rebellion against the kinges peace, and destruccion aswell of diuerse estates of this land, as straungers beynge vnder the defence, in so muche that in doubt therof, straungers in xl great nombre fled the land: & for the more sure keping of the said toure, Richard Wooduile squire, so trusted with ỹ kyng our souereigne lorde that dead is, (as wel ye knowe) and also chamberlain & counsailer vnto my lord of Bedford, with a certain nōbre of defensible persons assigned vnto hym, was made deputie ther, by thassent of the kynges counsayll being that tyme at London, for to abide therin for safegard therof, and strightly charged by the saied counsaill, that durynge that tyme of hys saied charge, he should not suffre anye man to bee in the toure stronger then hym self, without especial charge or commaundement of the kyng by thaduise of his counsaill.

2 Item that after, sone vpon the commynge of my saied lorde of Glouceſter into this lande from his countrey of Henawd, the saied lordes of the kynges counsaill wer enformed, that my sayed lorde of Glouceſter, grudged with the said maner of enforcyng the toure, and let saie to thē of London, that he had wel vnderstād, that they had been heuyly thretened for the tyme of hys absence, and otherwise then they should haue bene yf he had be in this land. Wherfore he was right euill contented, & especiall of the said forcyng of the toure, set vpon thē in maner of a chast vilain. Considery ng the good equitie & trouthe that thei had alwayes kept vnto the kyng, offerynge them therupon remedy yf they woulde. x

3 Item, that after this, Richarde Scot liuetenaunt of the toure, by the commaundemēt of my sayd lorde of Glouceſter, brought vnto hym Frier Randolfe, the whiche had long before confeſſed treason, doen by hym against the kynges person that dead is, for the whych knowledge he was put to bee kepte in the saied toure, and straightly commaunded vnder great payn geuen vnto the saied Scotte, to kepe hym straightly xx and surely, and not to let hym out of the saied toure, without commaūdement of the kyng, by thaduise of his counsaill. The which saied Frier Randolf, my said of lorde Glouceſter kept then with hym self (not wittynge the saied Scot) as he declared vnto my said lorde of Winchester. Sone after that he had brought the sayd Frier Randolf vnto my lord of Glouceſter, saiynge vnto my saied lorde of Winchester, that he was vndone but he helped hym, and expreſſed as for cause of the saied withholdyng of Frier Randolf: And saying more ouer, that when he desired of my said lorde of Glouceſtre, the deliueraunce of the sayd Frier Randolfe, to leade hym again vnto the toure, or sufficient warraunt for hys xxx discharge, my saied Lord of Glouceſtre answered hym, that his commaundement was sufficient warraunt and discharge for hym. In the whiche thynge aboue saied, it was thought to my Lorde of Wynchester, that my sayed Lorde of Glouceſter, toke vpon hym further then his authoritie stretched vnto, and caused him for to doubte and dreade, leaste that he would haue proceaded further. And at suche tyme as the saied Woodeuile came vnto hym to aske his aduise and counsaill, of lodgynge of my saied lorde of Glouceſter into the toure: he aduised & charged hym, that before he suffered my said lorde of Glouceſter or any person lodge therin stronger then hym selfe, he should puruey hym a sufficient warrant therof, of the kyng by thaduise of hys counsaill. xl

4 Item as to the saied article of the foresaied causes of heuineſſe, my saied Lorde the Chauncellor answereth, that he neuer purposed to set hande on the kynges person, nor to remoue hym, or that he shoulde bee remoued, or put in anye maner of gouernaunce, but by thaduise of the

kynges counsaill. For he could not conceiue anye maner of goodnes or of aduauntage that might haue growen vnto hym therof: But rather greate perell and charge, and hereof my saied Lorde of Winchester is redy to make prefe in tyme and place conuenient.

Item, as to the third article of the forsayd causes and heuinesse, my 5 said lorde Chauncellor answereth, that he was ofte and diuerse tymes warned by diuerse credible persones, aswell at the tyme of the kynges laste Parliament, holden at Westminster, as before and sithe, that my said lorde of Gloucester, purposed him bodely harme, and was warned therof, and counsailed by the saied persones, and that diuerse tymes to abstain hym from commyng to Westminster, as my said Lorde of Winchester declared vnto my saied Lorde of Gloucester.

Item, that in the tyme of thesayed Parliament diuerse persones of 6 x lowe estate, of the citee of London in greate nombre, assembled on a daye vpon the Wharffe, at the Crane of the Vintry, wished and desired that they had there the persone of my Lord of Winchester, saiyng: that they would haue throwen hym into the Thamise, to haue taught hym to swymme wyth wynges. For whiche billes and language of slander and threatenynges, cast & spokē in the said citie, by my said lord the Chauncellor, caused hym to suppose, that they that so saied and dyd, willed and desired hys destruccion, although they had no cause.

Item, that after the commynge to London of sir Raufe Bottiller & 7 master Lewes, sent frō my lorde of Bedford, to the reste of the lordes of xx the counsaill, they beyng informed that my saied Lorde of Gloucester, dyd beare displeasure to my saied Lorde of Winchester: They came to my sayed lorde of Gloucester to his Ynne, the second Sondaie next before Alhallowen daie, and there opened vnto him, that they had knowledge and vnderstandyng of thesaied displeasure, prayng hym to lette theim knowe yf he bare suche displeasure agaynst my sayed Lorde of Winchester, & also the causes thereof. At the whyche tyme (as my sayd Lorde of Winchester was afterward informed) that my saied Lord of Gloucester, affirmed that he was heuy toward hym, & not withoutten causes that paraduenture he would put in writyng.

xxx Item, that after the Mondaye next before Alhallowē daye last past 8 in the night, the people of thesaid citee of London, by the commaundement of my said lorde of Gloucester, as it was said: For what cause my lorde the Chauncellor wyst not, assembled in the citee, armed & arraied and so continued all that night. Emongest diuerse of the whyche, (the same night by what excitacion, my said lorde the Chauncellor wist not) seditious & heuie language was vsed, & in especiall against the persone of my saied lorde the Chauncellor. And so thesame Mondaie at night, my sayed Lorde of Gloucester, sent vnto the Ynnes of Courte at London, chargyng them of the Court dwellyng in thesame, to be with hym xl vpon the morowe, at eight of the clocke in their best arraie.

Item that on the morowe, beynge Tewesday next folowyng early, 9

my saied lorde of Gloucester, sent vnto the Maire and Aldermen of the saied citie of Londõ, to ordaine hym vnto the nombre of three hundred persones on horsse backe, to accompany hym to suche place as he disposed hym to ride, which (as it was saied (was vnto the kyng, to thentent to haue his persone, and to remoue hym from the place that he was in, without assent or aduise of the kynges counsaill, the whiche thyng was thought vnto my saied lorde the Chauncellor, that he ought in no wise to haue doen, nor had not been sene so before.

10 Item that my sayed lorde the chauncellor, consideryng the thynges aboue saied, and doubtyng therfore of perelles that might haue ensued thereof, intendyng to purueye there against, and namely for hys awne suretie and defence, accordynge to the lawe of nature, ordained to lett that no force of people, shoulde come on the bridge of London towarde hym, by the whiche he or his might haue been indaungered or noyed, not intendyng in any wise, bodely harme vnto my saied lorde of Gloucester, nor to any other person, but onely his awne defence & eschewing the perell aboue saied.

11 Item as toward the fourth and fifth of the saied articles, my lorde the Chauncellor answereth, that he was euer true, to al those that wer his soueraigne Lordes, and reigned vpon hym, and that he neuer purposed treason nor vntrouth against anye of their persones, and in especiall against the persone of our saied soueraigne lorde kynge Henry the fifth. The whiche cõsideryng the greate wisedome, trouthe and manhod, that all men knewe in hym, ne would not for the tyme that he was kyng, haue set on my sayd lorde the Chauncellor so greate truste as he dyd, yf he had founde, or thought in hym suche vntrouthe. The whych thyng my saied Lorde the Chauncellor, offred to declare and shewe, as it belõgeth to a man of hys estate to do, requiryng therupon my lord of Bedford, and all the lordes spirituall and temporall in this parliament, that it might be sene, that there wer iudges cõuenient in this case, that they would do hym right, or els that he might haue leaue of the kynge by their aduise, to go sue hys right, before hym ỹ ought to be hys iudge.

12 And as toward the letter sent by my lorde of Winchester, vnto my lord of Bedford, of the whych the tenor is before rehersed, of the which my lorde of Gloucester complayned hym of the malicious and vntrue purpose of my said lorde of Winchester, as toward the assemblynge of the people and gatheryng of a felde in the kynges lande, in troublynge therof, and against the kynges peace: My saied lorde of Winchester answereth, that of his said letters duely vnderstande, & in such wise as he vnderstod and meant in the writyng of them, it maye not reasonably be gathered and taken, that my saied lorde of Winchester, intended to gather any feld or assemble people in troublyng of the kynges lande, and against the kynges peace, but rather he purposed to acquite hym to the kyng in his trouthe, and to kepe the rest and peace in the kynges lande, and to eschewe rebellion, disobedience and all trouble. For by that that in the beginnyng of the said letter, he callth my saied lorde of Bedford, hys leueft lorde, after one, that is the kyng, whom he ought to except of dutie of his trouthe, the whyche he hath euer kept and wyll kepe.

Moreouer in the saied lettre, he desireth the commynge home of my 13 Lorde of Bedforde, for the welfare of the kynge and of hys realmes of England and of Fraunce, the whiche stande principally in his keppynge of reft and peace, and praieth my saied Lorde of Bedford, to spede hys commyng into England, in eschewyng of ieoperdy of the land, and of a felde the whiche he drade hym, myght haue folowed yf he had longe x taried: As toward those wordes, and ye tary we shall put this lande in aduenture wyth a feld, suche a brother ye haue here. &c. My saied lord of Winchester saieth, the sothe is: before or he wrote the sayd letter, by occasion of certain ordinaunces, made by the Maire and Aldermen of London, against the exceffiue taking of Masons, Carpentars, Tilers, Plasterers and other laborers, for their dayly iorneis and approued by the kynges aduise and hys counsaill, there were caste many heuineffes and sedicious billes, vnder the names of suche laborers, thretenynge rising wyth many thousandes, and manassyng of estates of the lande, and likewyse sedicious and euyll language sowen, and so continued & xx likely to haue sued of purpose and intent of disobedience and rebellion. To redreffynge of the whyche, it semed to my Lorde the Chauncellor, that my sayde Lorde of Gloucester, dyd not hys endeuor, nor diligence that he might haue shewed, for lacke of whyche diligence, they that were disposed to do disobeysaunce, were incoraged and vnboldened. So that it was lyke that they shoulde haue made a gatherynge, and that the kynge and his true subiectes, should haue been compelled to haue made a felde, to haue withstand theim, the which felde makyng had been aduenturynge of this lande. And in tokenynge that it was neuer my saied Lorde Chauncellors intent to gather no felde, but as xxx trouth moste stirred hym against suche as riotously, would make suche assemble against our soueraigne Lord, and the weale of this lande: He desired so haftely, the commynge of my saied Lorde of Bedforde, the whyche he would in no wise haue so greatly desired, yf he woulde haue purposed hym vnto any vnlawfull makyng of a felde, for he wyste well that my sayd lorde of Bedford would moste sharply haue chastised and punished, al those that so would any riotous assemble make. When this answere was made, the duke caused thys writyng folowyng, openly to be proclaymed.

Beit knowen to all folkes, that it is the entent of my lorde of Bed- 14 xl forde, and all these lordes spirituall & temporall, assembled in this present parliament, to acquite hym and them, and to procede truly, iuftely and indifferently, without any parcialitie, in anye maner of matters or querelles, moued or to be moued, betwene my Lorde of Gloucester, on that one partie, and my lorde of Winchester, Chauncellor of Englande on that other party. And for sure keping of the kinges peace, it is accorded by my saied lorde of Bedford, and by my saied lordes spirituall and temporall, an othe to be made, in forme that foloweth, that is to saye.

That my saied lorde of Bedford, & my saied lordes spirituall and temporall, & eche of them, shall as farfurth as their connynges and discrecions, suffisen, truly, iustly & indifferently, counsayll and aduise the kyng, and also procede and acquite them self, in al the said matters and quarelles, without that they, or any of theim, shall priuely and apertly, make or shewe hymselfe to be party or parciall therin, not leuyng or elchewyng so to do, for affeccion, loue, mede, doubt, or dreade of any person or persones. And that they shal in all wise, kepe secrete all that shalbe commoned by waye of counsayll, in the matters and quarrelles aboue said, in the said parliament, without that they or any of them shall, by worde, wrytyng of the kyng, or in any wise open, or discouer it to any of the said parties, or to any other person that is not of the saied counsaill. But if he haue a speciall commaundement or leaue thereto of the kyng, or of my saied lorde of Bedforde, and that eche of them shall, wyth all hys might and power, assist by waye of counsaill, and els shewe it vnto the kyng, my lorde of Bedforde, and to the rest of my sayd lordes, to put the said parties to reason, & not suffer that any of the saied parties, by them or by their assistentes, procede or attempte by waye of feat against the kynges peace: nor helpe, assiste, or comfort any of thē thereto, but let them wyth all their might & power, and withstande them, and assist vnto the kynge and my sayed Lord of Bedford, in keppyng of the kynges peace, and redressyng all such maner of procedyng by waye of feit or force.

Whiche othe in maner and forme aboue rehersed, all the Lordes aswell spirituall as temporall, beynge in this parliament at Leicester assembled the fourthe daye of Marche, promised vpon their faythe, x dutie and allegeaunce, whiche they owe to the kynge their soneraigne Lorde truly to obserue and kepe, accordyng to the true meanynge and purport of thesame.

¶ The Arbitrement.

IN the name of God, we Henry Archebishop of Cantorbury, Thomas Duke of Excester, Jhon Duke of Norffolke, Thomas Bishop of Duresme, Phillip bishop of Worcester, Jhon Bishop of Bathe, Humfrey erle of Stafford, William Alnewike keper of the Kynges priuie Seale, Rauffe Lorde Cromwell, arxx bitratoures in all maner of causes, matters and quarels of heuinesses and greuaunces, with all incidentes, circumstaunces, dependentes, or connexes, beyng & hangyng betwene the hygh & worthy prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, on the one partie, and the worshypfull father in God, Henry byshoppe of Winchester and Cauncellor of England, on the other partie, by either of theim for the peacyng of ỹ sayed quarelles and debates, taken and chosen in maner and forme, as it is conteined more plainly in a compryinyse made therupon, of the whyche the tenor sheweth in thys forme.

Memorandum the. bij. daye of Marche, in the. iiij. yere of oure soxxx ueraigne lorde the kynge, Henry the sixt. The high and mightie prince Humfrey duke of Gloucestre, at the reuerence of God, and for the good of the kyng our soueraigne lord in this lande, and namely at the reuerence, and speciall at the request and praier of the mightie and hyghe prince, my lord of Bedford his brother, agreed hym to put and putteth all maner matters and querelles in deede, with all their incidentez, circumstaunces, dependentez and connexes, that touchen hym & his persone, that he hath in any wyse, do, or feleth hym greued, or heuy against my lorde his uncle, my Lorde of Winchester. Or els that my Lorde of Winchester findeth hym greued against hym, in asmuche as they touch xl hym or hys persone, frō the beginnyng of the worlde vnto this day. In the aduise, ordinaunce and arbitrament of the worthy father in GOD Henry Archbishop of Cantorbury, the high and noble prince Thomas Duke of Excester, and Jhon Duke of Norffolke, the worshipfull father in god Thomas bishop of Duresme, Philip bishop of Worcester, Jhon byshop of Bathe, The noble lorde Hnmfrey erle of Stafford, the war-

shipful persones, Master William Alnewike keper of the kynges priuy seale, and Raufe lorde Crumwell, promisynge and behightyng, by the fayth of his body, and worde of his princehode and kynges sonne, to do kepe, obserue and fulfill, for him and in his behalf, all that shalbe declared, ordeined and arbitred, by the forsaid Archebishop, Dukes, Bishoppes, Erle, keper of the priuie seale, and Lorde Crũwell, in all matters and querelles aboue saied: Graunting also and promisynge ouer that, to be comprehended in the forsaied arbitrement, as towarde puttyng awaye all heuinesse or displeasures in any wise, conteyned by my lorde of Gloucester, againste all those that haue in any wyse assisted, counsayled, or fauored vnto his saied vncle of Winchester, and as toward anye matters, that be touchyng my Lord of Gloucester, remitteth it and the gouernaunce thereof vnto the kynge and hys counsayll, they to deme it by the aduise of his counsayll, as hym thinketh it to be doen. In witnesse of the whyche thynge, to hys present compromise, my sayed lorde of Gloucester, hath subscribed hys name with his awne hand, Humfrey Gloucester. And in like forme, my Lord of Winchester in another compromise, hath subscribed wyth hys awne hande, vnder the worde of priesthod, to stande at the aduise, ordinaunce and arbitrement of the persones aboue sayed, Mutatis Mutandis.

The causes beforesaied and querelles by vs seue, hearde, and diligently examined and decreed, by the assent of the saied parties, ordeine and award, that my Lordes of Gloucester and of Winchester, for anye thynge doen or spoken, by that one partye against that other, or by any of theirs or anye other persone or persones, afore the. vij. daye of thys present Moneth of Marche, neuer here after take causes, querelles, displeasures or heuinesses, that one against the other, ne nether against the counsaylers, adherentes or fauorers of that other, for anye thynge or thynges that are past. And that my sayed Lorde of Gloucester, bee good Lorde to my sayd lorde of Winchester, and haue hym in loue and affection as hys kynseman and Uncle. And that my sayed Lorde of Winchester, haue to my saied Lorde of Gloucester, true and sadde loue and affection, do and bee ready to do to hym suche seruice, as appertaineth of honestye to my saied Lorde of Winchester and hys estate to do. And that eche of theim be good Lord vnto all those adherentes, counsaylers and fauourers of that other, and shewe theim at all tymes fauorable loue and affection, as for any thing doen by them, or saied afore the seuenth daye of Marche.

And we decre, ordaine and awarde, that my sayed Lorde of Wynchester, in the presence of the Kynge oure soueraigne Lorde, my Lord of Bedforde, and my Lorde of Gloucester, and the residue of the Lordes Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons beeyng in thys presente Parliamente, saye and declare in maner and forme that followeth.

My soueraigne Lorde I haue well vnderstande, that I am noysed emōg the states of your land, how that the kynge our soueraigne lorde that was that tyme, beyng prince and lodged in the greate chamber at Westminster, by the baiynge of a spanyell, there was on a night taken, behynd a tapet in thesame chamber, a man, that shoulde haue confessed, that he was there by myne excitacion and procuryng to haue slain the forsayd Prince there in hys bedde, where vpon thesayed erle, let sacke hym furthwith, and droued hym in the Thamise. And furthermore I am accused, how that I should haue stirred the kyng that last died, the x tyme also that he was Prince, to haue taken the gouernaunce of his realme, and the croune vpon him, liuyng his father thesame tyme beynge kyng: Through which language and noysyng, I fele my name & fame greatly enblemysshed, in diuerse mennes opinions. Where vpō I take firste God to my witnesse, and afterwarde all the worlde, that I haue been at all tymes, & am true louer and true man, to you my soueraigne Lorde, and shalbe all my life. And also I haue been to my soueraigne lorde, that was your father, all tyme of hys reigne, true man: and for suche, he toke trust & cherished me to his liues end, & as I trust no man xi wyll affirme the contrary, nor neuer in my life procurynge, nor imagenyng death nor distrucciō of his person, ne assentyng to any such thing, or like thereto, the tyme that he was Kynge or Prince, or els in other estate. And in lyke wise, I was true man to Kyng Henry the .iiij. all the time that he was my soueraigne lorde, and reigned vpon me: In which matters, in all maner of wyse, that it liketh to you my soueraigne lorde for to commaund me, I am ready for to declare me: And further more, where, how and when, shall like you by thaduise of youre counsayll to assigne me. Wherefore, I beseche you my soueraigne lorde, as humbly as I can, considerynge that there is no grounded processe, by the which I might lawfully, in these matters aboue saied be conuicte, blessed be xii God, to holde me and declare me, by thaduise of all the lordes spiritual and temporall, beyng in this presente Parliament, true man to you my soueraigne lord, & so to haue been vnto my soueraigne lordes that wer your father & graundfather, and true man also, to haue been at all tymes vnto hys sayed father, whilest he was Prince, or els in anye other estate, the said slaunder and noysyng notwithstandyng. And this same declaracion to be enacted, in this your sayed present parliament.

The which wordes declared in maner as it is aboue sayd by my said lorde of Winchester, it semeth to my saied lords the arbitratours, that it is fittyng that my sayd lorde of Winchester drawe hym a part, and in xi the meane tyme, ỹ Lordes beyng present, be singulerly examined therevpon and saye their aduise: And yf it be assented by theim, in maner as my saied Lorde of Winchester desireth, let hym be called agayn, & that then my lord of Bedford, then haue these wordes in effect that folowē.

Faire vncle, my lord, ỹ kyngs gerat by ỹ aduise of hys counsayll, hath commaunded me to saie to you, ỹ he hath well vnderstande & cōsidered all the matters whiche ye haue here openly declared in his presence, and thereupon ye desire a peticion that he will declare you, and by the aduise and assent of the lordes spirituall and temporall, beynge in thys presente Parliamente, he declareth you a true man to hym, and that ye haue so bee to my lorde his father and his graundfather, and also true man to my Lorde hys father whiles he was Prince or els in any other estate, thesaied dissaunder and noysyng notwythstandynge: And wyll that thesaied declaracion be so enacted in this present Parliament. After the whyche wordes thus sayed, as before is declared, by thesayed lordes arbitratours, that my saied Lorde of Winchester, shoulde haue these wordes, that foloweth, to my sayed lorde of Gloucester.

My Lorde of Gloucester, I haue conceiued to my greate heuinesse that ye should haue receiued by diuerse reportes, that I shoulde haue purposed and imagined against your persone, honor and estate, in dyuerse maners, for the whiche ye haue take against me great displeasure Sir I take God to my witnes, that what reportes so euer haue been to you of me, paraduenture of such as haue had no greate affeccion to me, God forgeue it them, I neuer imagined, ne purposed anye thynge that might be hynderyng or preiudice to your persone, honor, or estate. And therfore, I praye you that ye be vnto me good Lorde from this tyme forthe, for by my wyll I gaue neuer other occasion, nor purpose not to do hereafter through Goddes grace.

The whych wordes so by him saied, it was decreed by the sayd arbitratours, that my lorde of Gloucester should answere and saye.

Faire Uncle, sithe ye declare you such a man as ye saie, I am right glad that it is so and for such a man I take you.

And when this was doen, it was decreed by the saied arbitratours that euery ech of my lordes of Gloucester and Winchester shoulde take either other by the hande, in the presence of the kyng and all the parliament, in signe and tokēs of good loue and accord, the whyche was doen and the Parliament was adiourned till after Easter.

When the greate fire of this discencion, betwene these twoo noble personages, was thus by the arbitratours to their knowledge and iudgement, vtterly quenched out, and laied vnder boord all other controuersies betwene other Lordes, takyng parte with the one partie or the other, wer sone apeased and brought to cōcord. For ioy wherof, the kyng caused a solēpne feast, to be kept on Whitsondaye, on the whyche daye, he created Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to the earle of Cambridge (whome hys father at Hampton, had putt to execucion, as you before haue hearde) Duke of Yorke, not forseyng before, that thys preferment shoulde be hys destruccion, nor that his sede shoulde, of hys generacion, be the extreme ende and finall confusion. He the same daye also promoted Jhon Lorde Mowbrey and Erle Marshall, sonne and heire to Thomas duke of Norffolke, by kyng Richard the seconde exiled this realme and dominion, to the title, name, and stile of the Duke of Norffolke, duryng whyche feaſte, the Duke of Bedforde adourned the kynge with the high ordre of knighthode, whiche on theſame daye dubbed with the ſweard theſe knightes whoſe names enſue.

After this ſolempne feaſte ended, a great aide and ſubſidye was graunted, for the continuaunce of the conqueſt in Fraunce, and ſo money was gathered, and men wer prepared in euery citee, toune & countrey: duryng whych buſines, Thomas duke of Exceſter, the layde, wiſe and wel learned coūſailer, great vncle to the kyng, departed out of this mortal life, at his manner of Grenewiche, & was with al funerall pōpe, conueyed through London to Berry, and there buried. In which yere xxx alſo died the Lady Elizabeth his halfe ſiſter, & of the whole bloud with kyng Henry the.iiij. maried to lorde Jhon Hollande duke of Exceſter, and after to the lord Fanhope, buried at the Blacke Friers of London.

Whyle theſe thynges wer thus appoyntynge and concludynge in Englande: The erle of Warwicke leuetenaunt for the Regente in the realme of Fraunce, entered into the countrey of Mayne, and beſieged the toune of Chaſteau de Loyre, the which ſhortly to him was rēdered wherof he made capitayn Matthew Gough eſquire. After ỹ, he toke by aſſaute the caſtle of Mayet, and gaue it for his baleauntnes to Jhon Winter eſquire, & after that he conquered the caſtle of Lund, and made xl there gouernor, William Gladdiſdale gentleman. At whyche place he was informed, that the Frenchemen were aſſembled together, in the countrey of Beauſſe, wherfore like a balyaunt capitain, he wyth all his power marched thetherwarde, to encountre with his enemies, and to fight with his aduerſaries, whiche hauynge knowledge of hys approchyng, fled, and durſte not abide the triall, nor ieoperde the aduenture, and in his returnyng, he beleged the Castle of Montdublean, whereof was capitain sir Robertõ des Croix, which siege cõtinued thre wekes, but in conclusion the Englishemen, so sore charged theim with in, that the capitain with his whole company, were contente to yelde the castle their liues, horse and harneis, onely reserued: Whiche to thẽ was after longe consultacion had, and many agrementes made, frankely graunted. And the saied erle of Warwicke, leauyng there the valeaunt lorde Willoughby, returned agayn to Paris. Durynge whiche season, he was ordained by the assent of the thre estates of the realme of England to be gouernor of the young kynge, in like maner as the noble Duke of Excester before his death was appoynted and assigned, but yet he tarried styll in Fraunce, and dyd there no small seruice as you shall here after perceiue.

THe Regent of Fraunce thus beeynge in Englande, meanes was made by ỳ Duke of Burgoyne, for the deliuery of the Duke of Alanson, whyche was taken prisoner at the battayl of Uernoyle the laste yere. So he for the some of twoo hundred thousande crounes, was deliuered and set at large: but neyther for release of all, or abatement of part of hys raunsome, he woulde in no wyse acknowledge the kynge of Englande, to be hys liege and souereigne Lord: Suche affeccion bare he to the Dolphyn, & suche trouth shewed he to hys naturall countrey. When all thynges wer concluded, ordered and established bothe for the conseruacion of peace and tranquilitie within the realme of Englande, and also for the maintenaunce of warre, for the finall gainyng of the region of Fraunce: The Duke of Bedforde and his wyfe, toke their leaue of the kynge, at Westminster and landed at Calice, with whom also passed the seas, Henry Bysshoppe of Winchester, whiche in the saied toune was inuested with the Habite, Hatte and dignitie of a Cardinall, with all Ceremonies to it appertainynge. Whyche degree, kynge Henry the fifth knowynge the haute corage, and the ambicious mynde of the man, prohibited hym on hys allegeaunce once, either to sue for or to take, meanynge that Cardinalles Hattes shoulde not presume to bee egall with Princes. But now the kynge beynge younge and the Regent hys frende, he obteyned that dignitie, to hys greate profite, and to the empouerishynge of the spiritualtie. For by a Bull legatyne, whiche he purchased at Rome, he gathered so much treasure, that no man in maner had money but he, and so was he surnamed the riche Cardinall of Winchester, and nether called learned Bishoppe, nor verteous priest.

After that, the duke of Bedford was returned into Fraunce, the lorde of Rustinan Marshall of Britayn, assembled a greate companye of the Britishe nacion, whyche fortefied & repaired the toune of Pountorson, toꝛson,and after the sayd Marshal, with a thousand men entered into the countrey of Constantyne in Noꝛmandy,and came besoꝛe the toune of Auranches. Thenglishmen within the garryson, issued out & boldly fought with their enemies: but after longe conflyct and manye strokes geuen,the Britons were ouercome,and the loꝛde Rustynan takē, and the moste part of his people slayne. The Duke of Bedfoꝛde hearynge that the toune of Pountoꝛson was newely foꝛtifyed and strōgly defended,sent thither the erle of Warwicke,accōpaignied with the loꝛd Scales,and diuerse other valiaunt capitaines and souldiers,to the nomber x of.vij.thousand men to besiege the toune,which so enuironed it on euery parte,that nèyther man coulde steale oute,noꝛ beaste coulde passe in. The siege longe continuing,vital began to ware skant in the Englyshe armye,wheresoꝛe the Loꝛde Scales hauyng in hys compaygny, syꝛ Jhon Harpeley Bayly of Constantine, syꝛ William Brearton Bayly of Caen,sir Raufe Tesson,sir Jhon Carbonell and.iij. thousand good men of war,departed frō the siege to get vitall, pouder and other thinges necessary foꝛ their purpose and enterpꝛise. And as they wer returnyng with their cariages on the sea cost,nere to S.Michaels Mount, they sodainly were encountred with their enemies,whereof̄ chief wer xx the Baron of Colosses,the loꝛd Dausebost capitain of the sayde Mount the loꝛde Mountabon,the loꝛde Mountburchier,the loꝛd of Chasteau Giron,the loꝛd Tyntygnat, the loꝛdof Chasteau Brian wyth.vj.M. men of warre. The loꝛd Scales and hys compaigny (seing y̆ they wer compassed on euery syde with deadlye daungiers, foꝛ the sea was on y̆ one side,and their enemies on the other,and no meane waye to escape oꝛ flye,descended from their hoꝛsses and lyke gredy Lyōs, together in an vnpeaceable fury,set on their enemies. The skirmishe was strong & the fight was fyerce,the Englyshmen kept themselfs so close,that their enemyes could haue no auantage of them. At the last the loꝛde Scales xxx cried S. Geoꝛge,they flie,wyth that thenglishmen toke such a coꝛage, & the Frenchmen that fought befoꝛe,were so dismayed that they begā to flie. The Englyshmen leped agayn on hoꝛssebacke, and folowed thē, and slewe and toke aboue.xj.C.persones,emongest whō were taken, y̆ Baron of Colsoes,and the loꝛde of Chasteau Brian and.xxx.knightes.

After thys victoꝛy,the Loꝛde Scales with his vitayles, pꝛouision and pꝛysoners,returned to the siege, where he was of the Earle and other noble menne,ioyously receyued,and foꝛ this notable fact, highlye magnified and pꝛeysed. Whyle the siege thus continued befoꝛe Pountoꝛson, Chꝛistopher Hanson and other souldyers of the garrison of S. xl Susan,made a rode into the countrey of Anioy,& came to a Castle called Ramfoꝛt,whych castle was pꝛiuely scaled, that the captaine wyth in & his company,wer taken oꝛ slain befoꝛe they knew of their enemies apꝛochinge. When knoweledge of thys feate was made open to the Frenchmen,whych were assembled to the nombꝛe of.xx.M. to reyse the siege, and bꝛeake vp the campe, lyinge befoꝛe the toune of Pountoyson, they lefte that iourney foy a time, and returned to the Castle of Ramfoyt, and besieged thesame by the space of tenne dayes.

The Englishmen considering the multitude of the enemies, and the farre absence of their frendes, began to treate wyth the Frenchemen and so vpon condicion to departe with bagge and baggage, hoyse and harnes, thei rendered vp the castle, and departed with moye riches thē they brought, which castle thus possessed by the Frenchimen, they foy= gat the reskew of Poũtoyson, and brake vp their army. But sone after the loyde of Rair, calling himself liuetenaunt generall foy the dolphyn, accompaignied with the loyd Mount Jehan, the Loyde Beaumanoir, & and the loyd Tussye, and other to the nõbye of thye thousand persones, entered into the countrey of Mayn, & layed siege to the castle of Mali= coyne, wherof was captayn an Englyshmã, called Oliuer Oswatersby, which castle with the capitayne, was by foyce taken & obteyned: in lyke maner they toke the litle castle of Lude, and there in Wylliam Blacke= boyne leuetenaunt foy Williã Glasdale esquier, & put hym to raunsom, and slewe al hys souldiers. After this victoyy, in the whych they muche gloyied, the French men perceiuing that therle of Warwike continued stil hys siege before the toune of Pountoyson, & knowyng by their espy= als, that the Englishmen wer determyned to geue them battayl, if they yy once attempted to rayse the siege, and therfoye fearynge to fyght in an open battayl, reculed backe agayn to the dolphyn wyth litle gayne and smal honoy. The Frenchmen & Bytons beyng straigtly belieged with in the toune of Pountoyson, perceyuing no lykelihode of succoures to come, and seyng the Englysh army dayly dyd increase, fearyng the se= quele thereof, yf they by violence should be taken and vanquyshed, thei offered the toune, so that thei might depart with hoyse and harnes on= ly: whych requeste (after long sute and peticion) to them was hardelye graunted. The Erle like a valiaunt captayn, entered into the toune & there apoynted foy gouernoys, the Loyd Roos, and the loyde Talbot, yyy and leuing there a conuenient garrison, returned to the loyde Regent.

After the takynge of thys toune, there was a league, and a treatye concluded betwene the Regent and the duke of Bytayn, by the which agreement both the tounes of Pountoyson and S. James de Beuron wer beaten doun to the ground & clery defaced. After the loyd of Rais was departed out of the territoyy of Mayne as you haue heard, Chri= stopher Hanson, Philip Gough, Martyn Godfrey called the scaler, and dyuerse other of the garryson of S. Sulan, to the nombye of. xxx. archars, went out in a moynyng to seke their aduentures, & came nere to the Castle of sainct Laurence de Moytiers (at the same very season) yl whē sir James de Sepeaulx captain of the same, was gone oute of his Castle wyth the greatest uombye of his retinue, to a Churche directly against the castle. In the masse tyme, thenglishmen entered by subtilty into the gate & so gat the dongeon. And when sir James returned frō Masse, as he entered into the gate he was taken, and hys men fled, and so was the castle furnished with Englishmen, and captain thereof was appoynted, Sir William Oldhaule.

The same season, sir Jhon Fastolfe, gouernoure of the countries of Aniow and Maine, assembled a great puissaunce of men of warre, and laied a siege before the castle of sainct Owen Destays, beside the toune of Lauall, whereof was capitain sir Guilliam Orenge, which, after ten daies besieging, rendred the castle, their lyues and armure only except: howbeit, one rayling and slaunderous person was put to terrible execucion. And from thence, thesayd sir Jhō remoued to the strōg castle of x Grauile, & after .xij. daies, they within offred to yeld the castle by a day if thei wer not succored by ỹ dolphin or his power. The offre was takē & pledges delyuered, which wer Guillia Cordonen, & Jhō de Mailirie esquyers. After these pledges deliuered, sir Jhon Fastolfe returned in post to the Regent, aduertisyng him of this composicion and agremēt: wherfore the said lord, reised a greate power, to fight with the Frenchmen at the day appoynted, and in his company, wer the erles of Mortaigne and Warwycke, and the Lordes Roos, and Talbot, sir Jhō Fastolfe, sir Jhon Aubemond, sir Jhon Ratclyffe, and diuerse other, to the nombre of twentye thousand men, and so marched forward in hope to xx mete and ioyne battaill wyth their enemies. But their aduersaries, whych were not far of, durste not approche, wherfore the Regent sent sir Jhon Fastolffe incontynent to receyue the castle: but they within (contrary to their promesse and appointment) had newly vitayled and manned the place, & so forsakinge their pledges and felowes in armes, refused to rendre the fortres according to the appoyntment: wherfore ỹ pledges were brought before ỹ syght of theim wythin the castle, and there openly put to death. After thys, ỹ lord Talbot, was made gouernor of Aniow and Mayn, & sir Jhon Fastolffe was assigned to another place: whyche lord Talbot, beyng both of noble birthe, and haute couxxx rage, after hys cōmyng into Fraunce, obteyned so many glorious victories of his enemies, that his only name was, and yet is dreadful to ỹ Frenche nacion, and much renoumed emongest all other people. This toly capitayn, and sonne of the valiaunt Mars, entred into Mayn and slewe men, destroyed castles, and brent tounes, and in conclusion, sodainly toke the toune of Laual: but the Lord Loghac, and diuerse other, retrayted theim selfes into the Castle, and ther remayned eight daies. Duryng whych tyme, it was agreed, that all captaynes, Burgesses, & men of warre, which were within the Castle, should depart with bagge and bagages, paiyng to the Lord Talbot for al thinges, one hundred xl thousand Croines. And the Castle so being deliuered, was committed to the kepyng of Gilbert Halsal, whych after, was slain at the siege of Orleance, for whō was made captayn Mathew Gough, which beyng at the iorney before Senlies, by treason of a myller that kept a mil adioyning to the walle, the Frenchmē entred into the toune, and brought it into their subiection and obeysaunce.

The duke of Bedford was aduertised by hys espyals, that ỹ toune of Montarges, whiche was in the territory of Orleance, was but slenderly kept and smally furnished, and that it myght be taken wyth lytle pain & no losse. The Regent glad of these newes, sente therle of Suffolke, sir Jhon Pole his brother, and sir Henry Bisset, with. vi. M. mẽ to assaute the toune, but when they came thether and found the toune better manned and more strongly defenced, then their expectaciõ imagined, they gaue no assaut, but laied siege aboute the toune, and therle of Warwycke was appoynted to lye wyth a great nombre of menne of warre, at S. Mathelynes de Archamp, to encountre the Frenchmen, & if they would attempt to ayde or vitail those that were enclosed within the toune. This fortresse stode in such a place, that what wyth waters and what wyth marisches, the army must seuer in thre partes, so that ỹ one could not esely helpe the other, but eyther by boates or bridges: so the toune was besieged by the space of two moneths and more. In the meane season, Arthur of Britayne, Constable for the dolphyn, sent thether in all hast, the lorde Boisac Marshal of Fraunce, Stephin le Hire, Ponton de Sentrailes, the lorde Graupie, and diuerse other valiaunt horsemen, to the nomber of thre thousand and aboue, which prpuily in the nighte, came on that syde where sir Jhon de la Pole, and sir Henry Bisset lay, whom they found out of all ordre and wythout any watche. So the Frenchemen entered into their lodges and slewe many in their beddes, they spared no man, for the resistance was smal. Sir Jhõ de la pole with his horse saued him selfe, and fled ouer the water to hys brother, & sir Henry Bysset escaped by a boate and eyght wyth him. The residue which would haue passed the bridge, and ioyned with the erle of Suffolke, fled in such prẽpes ouer the bridge, that the tymber brake and a great nomber was drouned, so ỹ ther wer slain & drouned. xv. C. men. The erle of Warwycke hearyng of thys chaunce, departed from saynct Mathelyn with all diligent spede, and came before Montarges offeryng battayl to the Frenche captaynes, which answered that they had manned & vytayled the toune, and entended to do nomore at that time. Thenglishmen seyng that their trauayle should be in vain, came backe shortly agayn with al their ordinaunce to the duke of Bedforde.

It should seme that fortune at this tyme would not, that the Frẽche men should haue one ioyful daye, but thesame also shoulde be myngled with dolor or displeasure. For at this very tyme, sir Nicolas Burdett appoynted by the Duke of Somerset, to vexe and trouble hys enemies in the costes of Britayn, sent lyght horsemen into euery part, vexyng the people and wastyng the countreyes. All tounes ỹ he passed by were brente al, & buyldynges spoyled & robbed, prisoners and prayes wer aboundantly taken, small byllages were destroyed, & greate tounes wer raũsomed, & so wythout hurt or damage, the said sir Nicholas returned into Normãdy. Thys myschãce beyng declared to the Constable of Fraunce & the other capytaynes, cut their combes and plucked ked doune their hartes, whych were set on so mery a pinne, for the victory of Montarges, that they were in maner, like desperate persones, loth to attempte any farther enterpryse againste the Englische nacyon, saiyng: that God was turned Englische, and the deuyll would not helpe Fraunce.

The duke of Alaunson, which as you haue heard, was late deliuered out of Englande, reuiued againe the dull spirites of the Dolphyn, and the faint hartes of his capitaines, promysyng to theim greate victorye wyth litle trauayl, and much gain with smal labor, wherfore in hope of x good lucke, he determined to do some notable feate against thenglyshe men. Then happened a chaunce vnloked for, or vnthought of, euen as they woulde haue wyshed or desired, for not onelye the Magistrates, but chiefly the spiritual persons of the citie of Mauns, knowynge that the duke of Britayne and hys brother, were reuerted and turned to ỹ French partie, began sore to mourne and lament, that they wer subiectes and vassals to the yoke and power of the Englyshmen. Wherefore they determined and fully cõcluded, to aduertyse of their myndes and determinacions, the capitaynes of Charles ỹ dolphin, (of thẽ called the Frenche king) and so by certain false Friers, therof wrote humble and xx louyng letters. These newes pleased much the French capitaynes, but no lesse you may be sure the Dolphyn hym selfe, as a thyng discended from heauen, of theim vnsought, vnimagined and not deuysed. Wherfore to take opportunitie when time serued, and not to lese so great a benefite so honestly offred, the lordes Delabreth and Fayet, Marshals of Fraunce, accompaignied with the lordes of Mont Jhan, of Buel Dorual, Torsye and Beaumamoyre the Heire, and Guylliam his brother, and fyue hundred other hardy captaynes and baliaunt souldiors, toke vpon theim this enterpryse, sendyng great thankes and laudes to the Clergie and citezens, for their assured fidelitie to their soueraigne lord xxx promysyng theim to be there at the daye appoynted, not doubtyng to fynd them redy accordynge to their promes, gladly to receyue them.

When the daye assigned and the nyghte appoynted was come, the Frenche capitaynes priuely approched the toune, makynge a lytle fire on an hill in the sight of the toune, to sygnifye their cõming and approchyng. The citezẽs, which by the great church wer loking for their approch, shewed a burnyng Tresset out of the steple, which sodaynly was put out & quenched. What should I say, the captaynes on horsebacke came to the gate, and the traytors wythin slew the porters and watchmen, and let in their frendes, the footemen entered firste, and the mẽ of xl armes wayted at the barriers, to the intẽt that yf much nede required or necessitie cõpelled, they might fight in the open feld. And in the meanseason many Englishmen were slayn, and a greate claymor & a houge noyse was hard thorough the toune, as is wonte & accustomed to be in a toune, by treason sodainly surprised & taken: but what was the cause of the cry, or beginning of the noyse, few excepted the cõfederates, ether knewe or perceiued. For the remnaunt of the citezens beyng no partakers in this faccion, imagined that the Englishmen had made hauocke in the toune and put all to the swerde. The Englishmen on the otherside, iudged that the citezens had begonne some new rebellion against theim, or els had striuen emongest theim selfes. The erle of Suffolke, whiche was gouernour of the toune, hearyng the clamor and noyse of the people, hauing perfect knowledge of such as escaped from the walles, in what case the citie stode in, wythout any tariyng or prolongynge of tyme, entered into the Castle whych standeth at the gate of Sainct Uincent, whereof was Constable Thomas Gower esquier: whether also fled so many Englyshmen, that the place was pestured, and there yf they were not so rescued, likely to be famished: but surely they wer sore assauted & marueylously hurte, with the shot of alablasters and crosse bowes, but they defended them selfes so manfully, that their enemies gat small aduauntage at their hãdes. But all their hardines had not serued, nor all their pollicy had not defended theim, yf they had priuely sent a messenger to the lorde Talbot, which then lay at Alaunson, certefiynge him in what case they stode, for vitail had they none, municiõs fayled, and the Castle was almoste vndermyned, so that yeldynge must folowe, and resystaunce coulde not preuayle. The lorde Talbot hering these newes, neyther slept nor bãquetted, but wyth al haste assembled together his valyaunt capitaynes, whose names you haue before oftẽ tymes heard rehersed, to the nombre of. vij. hundred men of warre, & in the euening departed from Alanson, and in the mornyuge came to a Castle called Guierche twoo Myles from Maunς, and from thence sent as an espial Mathew Gough, to espie the gouernaunce of the enemies, & yf he myght to shewe to hys countreymen that he was at hãde to be their ayde and rescowes. Mathew Gough so well sped ỳ priuely in the nyght he came into the castle, where he knew how that the Frẽch men beyng lordes of the citie, & nowe castynge no perels nor fearynge any creature, began to waxe wãton and fell to ryote, as thoughe their enemies could do to theim no damage: thinkinge that the Englishmen which were shut vp in the Castle, studied nothinge but howe to escape and be deliuered. When Mathew Gough had knowen al the certainty & had eaten a litle breade and dronke a cuppe of wyne to comforte hys stomacke, he priuely returned agayn, and wythin a mile of the citie met with the Lorde Talbot and the Lorde Scales, & made open to theim al thyng accordyng to his credence, whych to spede the matter, because the day approched, wyth al hast possyble came to the posterne gate and alyghted from their horses, and about sixe of the clocke in the morning thei issued oute of the castle criyng saynct George, Talbot. The French men whiche were scace vp, & thought of nothyng lesse then of thys sodayn approchement, some rose out of their beddes in their shertes and lepte ouer the walles, other ranne naked out of the gates for sauynge of their lyues, leuyng behynd theim all their apparell, horsses, armure

and riches, none was hurte but suche, whiche ether resisted or wouldè not yelde, wherof some were slain and cast in prisone. There were slain & taken foure hundred gẽtlemen and the villaynes frankely let go. After this, inquisicion was made of the authors of this vngracious conspiracion, and there were accused thirtie citezens, twenty Priestes and fiftene Friers, which according to their desertes were put in execuciõ.

The syxt yere.

THe citie of Mauns thus beyng reduced into the Englishmennes handes, the Lorde Talbot departed to ỹ toune of Alanson. After whiche marciall feate manly acheued, the erle of Warwicke departed into Englande, to be gouernour of the yong kyng, in steade of Thomas duke of Excester, late departed to God. In whose steade was sent into Fraunce, the lorde Thomas Mountacute erle of Salisbury wyth fyue thousande menne, whyche landed at Calice, and so came to the Duke of Bedford in Paris. Where he consultynge wyth the Duke of Bedforde, concernynge the affaires of the Realme of Fraunce: seyng all thynges prosperously succede on the Englishe parte, beganne marualously to phantesye the citie and countrey of Orliance, standynge on the ryuer of Loyre. But because the citie was wel fortified bothe by the nature of the situacion of the place, and by the pollicie of manne, he imagined it not the woorke of one daye, nor the study of one houre. Wherfore he rempted it to a farther deliberacyon, yet he was the mã at that tyme, by whose wytt, strength and pollicy, the Englyshe name was muche fearfull and terryble to the French nacion, whyche of hym selfe myght both appoynt, commaunde and do all thinges, in maner at hys pleasure, in whose power, (as it appeared after hys deathe) a great part of the conquest consisted and was estemed, because he was a man both painfull and diligent, redy to wythstand thynges perylous and imminent and prompt in counsayll, & with no labor be wearied, nor yet his corage at anye tyme abated or appaled, so that all men putte no more trust in any one man, nor so synguler person gat more the hartes of all men. After thys great enterpryse, had long bene debated and argued, in the priue counsail, the erle of Salisburies deuyse, (althoughe it semed harde and straunge to all other and to him as it wer to a thyng predestinate very easye) was graunted and allowed, which enterprise was the final conclusion of his natural destiny, as you shall shortelye perceyue. Thus he replenished with good hope of victory, & furnyshed with artillery, and municions apperteygning to so greate a siege, accompanied with the erle of Suffolke and the lorde Talbot, and wyth a valiaunt company, to the nombre of tenne thousand men, departed from Paris and passed through the countrey of Beause. He toke by assaute the toune of Yainuyle, but the Frẽchmen fled into the Castle, and there continued fiue dayes, at the ende wherof they rẽdered themselfes simply ply: of the said nombre, some wer put to death for certain causes, & some were taken to mercie. He tooke also the toune of Bawgency, sufferyng euery man, which would become vassaile & subiecte to the kyng of England, to enherite their landes and enioy their goodes. The tounes of Meum vpon Loyre & Jargenan, hearyng of these treatyse, presented to hym the keyes of the toune, vpon like agrement & egall condicions.

After this in the moneth of September, he layed hys siege on the one syde of the water of Loyre, before whose commyng, the Bastard of Orleaunce, and the Bishop of the citie and a great nombre of Scottes, hearyng of therles intent, made diuerse fortificacyons about the toune & and destroyed the suburbes, in the which were twelfe parishe churches and foure ordres of Friers. They cut also doune all the vines, trees & bushes within fyue leages of the toune, so that the Englishmen shoulde haue neither comfort, refuge nor succor.

Here must I a litle disgresse, and declare to you, what was this bastarde of Orleance, whyche was not onely now captayn of the citie, but also after, by Charles the syxt made erle of Dumoys, and in great authoritie in Faaunce, and extreme enemie to the Englyshe nacion, as by this story you shall apparantlye perceyue, of whose lyne and steme dyscend the Dukes of Longuile and the Marques of Rutylon. Lewes xx Duke of Orleance murthered in Paris, by Jhon Duke of Burgoyne, as you before haue hearde, was owner of the Castle of Concy, on the Frontiers of Fraunce toward Arthoys, wherof he made Constable the lord of Cauni, a man not so wise as his wyfe was fayre, and yet she was not so faire, but she was aswell beloued of the duke of Orleance, as of her husband. Betwene the duke and her husbande (I cannot tell who was father) she conceiued a child, and brought furth a pretty boye called Jhon, whiche chylde beynge of the age of one yere the Duke disceased and not longe after the mother and the lorde of Cawny ended their lyues. The next of kynne to the lord Cawny chalenged the enheritaunce xxx which was worth four thousand crownes a yere, alledgyng that the boye was a bastard: and the kynred of the mothers syde, for to saue her honesty, it plainly denyed. In conclusion, this matter was in contentiō before the Presidētes of the parliament of Paris, and there hanged in controuersie tyll the child came to the age of. viij. yeres old. At whiche tyme it was demaunded of him openly whose sonne he was: his frends of his mothers syde aduertised him to requyre a day, to be aduised of so great an answere, whiche he asked, & to hym it was graunted. In the meane season his sayed frēdes persuaded him to claime his inheritaūce xl as sonne to the lord of Cawni, which was an honorable liuinge, and an auncient patrimony, affirming that if he said cōtrary, he not onely slaūdered hys mother, shamed himself, & stayned hys bloud, but also should haue no lyuyng, nor any thynge to take to. The scholemaister thinking yt hys disciple had well learned his lesson, & woulde reherse it according to hys instrucciō, brought hym before the Judges at the daye assigned and when the question was repeted to him again, he boldly answered, my harte geueth me, and my noble corage telleth me, ỹ I am the sonne of the noble Duke of Orleannce, more glad to be his Bastarde, wyth a meane liuyng, then the lawful sonne of that coward cuckolde Caumy, with hys foure thousande crounes. The iustices muche merueyled at his bolde answere, and his mothers cosyns detested him for shamynge of his mother, and his fathers supposed kinne reioysed in gayninge the patrimony & possessions. Charles Duke of Orleance hearynge of thys iudgement, toke hym into his family and gaue him great offices & fees & which he wel deserued, for (duryng his captiuitie) he defended his landes, expulsed thenglishmen, & in conclusion procured his deliueraunce.

Thys coragious bastard, after the siege had continued thre wekes ful, issued oute of the gate of the bridge, and fought with the Englyshemen, but they receyued him with so fierce and terrible strokes, that he was with al companye compelled to retire and flye backe into the cytie: but the Englyshmen folowed theim so faste, in killinge and takynge of their enemies, that they entered wyth theim the Bulwarcke of the bridge, whiche wyth a great toure, standyng at thend of the same, was taken incontynent by thenglishmen. In whiche conflict many Frenche ff men were taken, but no were slayne, and the kepyng of the toure and Bulwercke was committed to Willi Glasdale esquyer. When he had gotten this Bulwarke, he was sure that by that way neyther man nor vitayl coulde passe or come. After that, he made certayne Bulwarkes round about the cyty, castyng trenches betwene the one and the other laiyng ordynaūce on euery part, where he saw that any battery might be deuised. When they within perceyued that they were enuironed wt forstresses and ordinaūce, they layed gonne against gonne, and fortefied toures against bulwarkes, and within made new rampyres, and builxxx ded new mudwalles, to auoyde crackes and breches, which might by violent shot sodainly insue. They appoynted the Bastard of Orleance, and Stephin Veignold called the Hire, to see the walles and watches kept, & the bishop saw ỹ thinhabitātes within the citie, wer put in good ordre, and that Vitayll wer not wantonly consumed, nor vainly spent.

In the toure that was taken at the bridges end, as you before haue heard, there was a hyghe chāber hauyng a grate full of barres of yron by the which a mā might loke all the length of the bridge into the cyty, at whych, a greate many of the chiefe capitaynss stode diuerse tymes, vieuyng ỹ cyty & deuysyng in what place it was best assautable. They within the citie perceyued well this totyng hole, and layed a pece of or-xl dynaūce directly against the wyndowe. It so chaunced ỹ the.lix. daye after the siege layed before the citie, therle of Salisbury, sir Thomas Gargraue, and Willi Glasdale and diuerse other, went into the sayde toure & so into the hygh chābre, and loked out at the gate, and wythin a short space, the sonne of Maister gonner, perceyued men lokynge out at the wyndowe, tooke hys matche, as hys father hadde taught hym, which was gone doune to dynner, and fyred the gonne, which brake & sheuered ꝧ yron barres of the grate, wherof one strake therle so strōgly on the hed, that it stroke away one of hys yes and the side of his cheke. Sir Thomas Gargraue was likewyse stryken, so that he dyed within two dayes. The erle was conueied to Meum vpon Loyre, wher he lay beyng wounded. viij. dayes, during whiche time, he receyued deuoutly the holy Sacramentes, and so commended his soule to almighty God, whose body was conueyed into Englande, with all funerall and pompe and buryed at Bissam by his progenitors, leuing behind him, an onely daughter named Alice, maryed to Richard Neuel, sonne to Raufe erle & of Westmerland, of whome herafter shalbe made mencyon. What detryment, what damage, what losse succeaded to the Englishe publyque wealth, by the sodain death of thys valiaunt capitaine, not longe after dis departure, manifestly appered. For hygh prosperitie, and great glory of the Englysh nation in the parties beyonde the sea, began shortlye to fall, and litle and litle to vanyshe awaye: which thing, although the Englysh people lyke a valiaunt & strong body, at the firste tyme did not perceyue, yet after ꝧ they felt it grow lyke a pestilent humor, which successiuely a litle and litle corrupteth al the membres, and destroyeth the body. For after the death of thys noble man, fortune of warre began to change, and triumphant victory began to be darckened. Although the death of therle wer dolorous to al Englishmen, yet surely it was most dolorous to the duke of Bedford, regent of Fraunce, as he whyche had loste his ryght hand or lacked hys weapon, when he should fyght with his enemie. But seyng that dedde men cannot with sorowe be called againe, nor lamentacion for dedde bodies cannot remedy the chaūces of men lyuing: he (like a prudent gouernor & a pollitique patron,) appointed therle of Suffolke to be his liuetenaunt, and captain of the siege, and ioyned with him the Lorde Scales, the lord Talbot, sir Jhon Fastolfe, and diuerse other valiaunt knightes and esquiers. These lordes caused bastiles to be made round about the citie, wyth the whiche they troubled their enemies and assauted the walles, and left nothynge vnattempted, whych myght be to them, any aduātage, or hurtful to their enemies.

In the tyme of lent, vitayle and artillery, began to ware scant in the Englyshe armye, wherfore therle of Suffolke appointed sir Jhon Fastolfe, sir Thomas Rampston, & syr Philip Hal with their retynewes, to ryde to Paris, to the lord Regēt, to informe him of their scarsenes and necessitie. Whyche beyng therof informed, wythout any delaye or prolongyng prouyded vitayle, artillery and municions, necessary and conuenient for so greate an enterpryse, & laded therwyth many charriottes, cartes, and horsses, and for the sure conduyte, and sauegard of ꝧ same, he appoynted sir Simon Morhier Prouost of Paris, with the gard of the citie & diuerse of hys owne houshold seruauntes, to accompany sir Jhon Fastolfe and hys cōplices, to the army lyng at the siege of Orleaunce. The which departed in good ordre, to the nomber of. v. hundred men of war, beside Wagoners out of Paris, and came to Paynuyle in Beausse, and in a morning early in a great frost they departed, from the place toward the siege, and whē they came to a toune called Ronuray, in the laundes of Beausse, they perceiued their enemies cōming against them, to the nombre of. ix. or. x. M. Frenchemē & Scottes: the captaines wherof was Charles of Cleremōt, sonne to the duke of Burbon, then beyng prisoner in Englande, sir William Stewarde Constable of Scotlande, a litle before deliuered oute of captiuitie, the x erle of Perdriacke, the lorde Jhon Vandosme, Vidame of Charters, ỹ Lord of Touars, the lord of Lohat, the Lorde of Eglere, the Lorde of Beauiew, the Bastard Tremorle, and many other valiant capitaines. Wherfore sir Jhon Fastolfe and his companions, set all their compayny in good ordre of battayle, and picked stakes before euery Archer, to breke the force of the horsemen. At their backes they set al their wagōs and cariages, and within theim they tyed al their horses, so that their enemies could neyther assaile them on the backe syde, nor yet spoil thē of their horsses, and in this maner they stode still, abydyng the assaut of their aduersaries. The Frenchmen (by reason of their great nombre) xx thinking the victorie to be in their handes, egerly like Lions set on the Englishmen, whych with great force, them receyued and manfully defended: for it stode theim vpon, considering the inequalitie of the nombre. And after longe and cruell fyght, the Englishmen droue backe and vanquished the proude Frenchmen, & compelled theim to flie. In thys conflict were slayn, Lord William Stewarde constable of Scotlande and hys brother, the lord Dorual, the lord Delabret, the lorde Chastenabrian, sir Jhon Basgot, and other Frenchmen & Scottes, to the nōber of. xxb. C. and aboue. xj. C. taken prisoners, although some French wryters affirme the nombre lesse.

xxx After this fortunate victory, sir Jhon Fastolfe and hys compaigny of the which no man of any reputacion was either slain or taken,) came with al their cariages, vitayle & prysoners, to the siege before Orleance where they were ioyously receyued & welcomed of all the souldyours. Thys conflict (because the most part of ỹ cariage was herryng & lēten stuffe,) the French men call, the vnfortunable battail of herrynges.

The Earle of Suffolke, beynge thus vitayled, contynued hys siege and euery daye almoste, skyrmyshed with their enemies, whiche, being in dyspayre of al succours, began to commen emongest theimselfe, how they might rendre the toune, to their mooste honor and profyte. After xl muche reasonyng and longe debatyng emongest the capitaynes, and the magistrates of the toune, what way was best to be folowed: Some affyrmed it not onely to bee shamefull and dyshonorable, but also vnnaturall and vnreasonable, to yelde the toune to the Englyshmen, beyng neyther frendes nor fauorers of the French nacyon: other, fearyng the victory of the Englyshmen, imagined, that yf they by force possessed the

citie,they would do to them as tyrantes be accustomed to serue, wilful and obstinate people,and therfore they thought it a greate folye and a notable lightnes,not to beware the one,as to deny or refuse the other. But when they saw,that their glory must nedes decline to a shame and reproche,they thought to fynd a meane waye to saue them selfes, and their city frō the captiuitie of their enemies,and deuised to submit their citie thēselfs,& al theirs vnder the obeysaunce of Philip duke of Burgoyne,because he was brought out of the stocke and bloud royal of the auncient hous of Fraūce:thinking by this meanes(as thei did in dede) to breke and minishe the great amitie betwene the Englyshmen & him. ¶ After thys poynt concluded,they made open & sent to the duke alther deuises and intentes,which certified thē that he would gladly receiue their offre,so that the Regent of Fraunce would therto agre and cōsent. And therupō dispatched certain ambassadors to ỹ duke of Bedford,to whome these newes wer straunge & not very pleasaunt, vpon which poynt,he assembled a great counsayll. Some thought that maner of yeldyng to be bothe honorable and profitable to the kyng of Englande,by reason whereof,so great a citie, & so rych a countrey,shoulde be brought out of the possession of their enemies,into the hādes of their trusty frendes,withoute farther cost or bloudshed. The Duke of Bedford & other,were of a cōtrary opinion, thinkinge it bothe dishonorable and vnprofitable to the realme of England,to se a citie so long besieged at the costes & expenses of the kyng of England, & almoste broughte to the poynt of yeldyng,to be yeled to any other foren prince or potestate and not to hym or his Regent, the example wherof might prouoke other tounes herafter to do thesame. This reason toke place, & the Regēt answered the duke ambassadours, ỹ it was not honorable nor yet consonaunte to reason,that the kyng of England should beate the bush and the duke of Burgoyn shoulde haue the birdes: Wherfore syth the ryght was hys,the war was his,and the charge was hys,he said ỹ the citie ought no to be yelded to no other person, but to hym or to hys vse and profite. By this litle chance,succeded a great change in thenglyshe affaires. For a double mischief of this answer rose and sprang out. For first the duke of Burgoyn, began to conceyue a certeyn priuey grudge agaynst thinglishmen for this cause:thinkinge thē to enuy & beare malice against his glory and profite,for the whiche in continuaunce of time he became their enemy,and cleued to the French kyng. Secondly,the Englyshmen left the siege of Orleaunce, whyche by thys treatye they mighte haue had to frend,or to haue continued neutre, till their Lord the duke of Orleaunce,or the erle of Angulosie hys brother were delyuered out of the captiuitie of ỹ Englysh people. But yf men wer angels and forsaw thynges to come, they like beastes would not rōne to their confusion:but fortune, which gideth the destiny of man, wyl turne her whole as she listeth,who soeuer sayth nay.

Whyle thys treatye of the Orleaunces was in hande, Charles the Doldolphyn, daily studied and hourly labored, to plucke the fauor and hartes of the nobilitie of Fraunce, from the Englishe nacion, to the intent, that he might assemble a puyssance, sufficient to relefe hys frendes, beynge shut vp in the citie of Orleaũce. While he was studiyng and compassyng this matter, there happened to hym, a straunge chaunce, of the whiche I will write a litle, because some of the Frenche aucthours, and especially, Jhon Bouchet, of it writeth to muche.

For as he and other saye, there came to hym beynge at Chynon, a mayd of the age of .xx. yeres and in mans apparell, named Jone, borne x in Burgoyne in a toune called Droymy deside Vancolour, which was a greate space a chamberleyn in a common hostrey, and was a rampe of suche boldnesse, that she would course horses and ride theim to water, and do thynges, that other yong maidens, bothe abhorred & wer ashamed to do: yet as some say, whether it wer because of her foule face, that no man would desire it, either she hadde made a vowe to liue chaste, she kept her maydenhed, and preserued her virginitie. She (as a mouster) was sent to the Dolphin, by sir Robert Baudrencort capitain of Vancolour, to whõ she declared, that she was sent from God, bothe to aide ỹ miserable citie of Orleaunce, and also to remit hym, to the possession of xi his realme, out of the whiche, he was expulsed and ouercomed: rehersyng to hym, visions, traunses, & fables, full of blasphemye, superstition and hypocrisy, that I maruell much that wyse men dyd beleue her, and lerned clarkes would write suche phantasies. What should I reherse, how they saie, she knewe and called hym her kyng, whom she neuer saw before. What shoulde I speake how she had by reuelacion a swerde, to her appoynted in the churche of saincte Katheryn, of Fierboys in Torayne where she neuer had been. What shoulde I write, how she declared suche priuy messages from God, our lady, and other sainctes, to the dolphyn, that she made the teres ronne doune frõ his iyes. So was he xii deluded, so was he blynded, & so was he deceiued by the deuils meanes which suffred her to beginne her race, and in conclusion rewarded her with a shamefull fal. But in the meane season suche credite was geuen to her, that she was honoured as a sainct, of the religious, and beleued as one sent from God of the temporaltie, in so muche that she (armed at all poyntes) rode from Poytiers to Bloys, and ther found men of war vitayll, & munition, redy to be conueyed to Orleaunce. The Englishemen perceiuyng that they within coulde not long continue, for faute of vitaile & pouder, kepte not their watche so diligently as they wer accustomed, nor scoured not ỹ coũtrey enuironed, as thei before had ordai-xl ned: which negligence, the citezens shut in perceiuing, sent worde therof to the Frenche capitaines, whyche with Puccelle in the dedde tyme of the night, and in a greate rayne and thundre, with all their vitaile and artillery entered into the citie. If thei were welcomed marueil not, for folkes in greate trouble, be ioyous of a litle comfort. And the next daie the Englishemen boldely assauted the toune, promisynge to theim that best scaled the walles great rewardes. Then men mounted on ladders coragiously, and with gonnes, arrowes and pikes, bette their enemies from the walles.

The Frenchemen, although they marueyled at the fierce fightynge of the English people, yet thei wer not amased, but they defended them selfes to the darke night, on which daye, no great priuate feate worthy of memory, was either attempted or doen. The Bastard of Orleaunce (seyng the puyssaunce of thenglishe nation) began to feare the sequele of the matter, wherfore he sent worde to the duke of Alaunson, aduertisyng hym in what case the toune then stoode, and that it could not long continue without his hasty spede, and quicke diligence. Whiche delaiynge no tyme nor deferrynge no space, came with all his army within two leagues of the citie, & sent woorde to the capitaines, that on ỹ next morowe they should be redy to receiue them. Whiche thynge, the next daye they accomplished, for the Englishemen thought it to be muche to their auaile, yf so greate a multitude entered into the citie, vexed wyth famyne & replenished with scarsenes. On ỹ next daye in the mornyng, the Frenchemen altogether issued out of the toune, and assauted the fortresse or Bastile, called the Bastyle of sainct Loure, the whiche with great force and no litle losse they toke and set it on fire, and after assauted the toure at the bridge foote, whiche was manfully defended. But the Frenchemen beyng more in nombre, so fiersely assauted it, that they toke it or the Lorde Talbot could come to succors: in the whyche William Gladdisdale the capitain was slain, and the Lorde Morlyns, and the Lorde Pownynges also.

The Frenchemen puffed vp with this good locke, seyng the stronge fortres was vngotten, whiche was vnder the defence of the lorde Talbot, fetched a compasse about, and in good ordre of battayle marched thether ward. The lorde Talbot like a capitain, without feare ordred of so great a multitude, issued out of his Bastile, and so fiersly fought with the Frenchemen, that they not able to withstande hys puyssaunce fled (like shepe before the Wolffe) again into the citie, with greate losse of men and small artilerie: and of the Englishemen wer losste in the two Bastyles sixe hundred presones. Then the erle of Suffolke, the Lorde Talbot, the Lorde Scales, and other capitaines, assembled together, where causes wer shewed, that it was bothe necessary and conuenient either to leue the siege for euer, or to deferre it tyll another tyme, more luckey & conuenient. And to the intent that thei should not seme either to flie or to be driuen from the siege by their enemies, they determined to leaue their fortresses and Bastyles, and to assemble in the plain felde and there to abyde all the daye, abidyng the outcommyng and battaile of their enemies. This conclusion taken, was accordynglye executed. The Frenchemen, wearied with the last bickeryng, held in their heddes and durste not once appere: and so thei set fire in their lodgynges, and departed in good ordre of battail frō Orleaunce. The next daie whiche

was the.viij.daye of Maye, the erle of Suffolke, ridyng to Jargeaux with.CCCC.Englishmen, and the lord Talbot wyth another cõpany returned to Meum. Whiche toune, after that he had fortified, he incõtinent, assauted and wan the toune of Lauall & the Castle, sore veryng and punishyng the tounes men, for their hard hartes, and cancard obstinacie: and leauyng there a garrison, reculed to Meum.

After this siege thus broken vp, to tell you, what triumphes were made in the citie of Orleaunce, what wood was spent in fiers, what wyne was dronke in houses, what songes wer song in the strete, what x melody was made in Tauernes, what roundes were daunced in large and brode places, what lightes wer set vp in the churches, what anthemes, wer song in Chapelles, and what ioye was shewed in euery place, it were a long wooꝛke and yet no necessarye cause. For they dyd, as we in like cace woulde haue doen, and we being in like estate, woulde haue doen as they did. After that the Englishemen, wer thus retired from ỹ siege of Orleaunce & seuered them selfes in diuerse tounes & fortresses, holdyng on their part: The duke of Alaunsou, the Bastard of Orleaunce, Jone the puzell, the lorde of Gancort, & diuerse other Frenchemen, came before the toune of Jargeaux, where the Erle of Suffolke xx and hys two brethren soiorned the.xij. daye of June, and gaue to the toune a great and a terrible assaut, whiche the Englishmen, (beyng but a handfull) manfully defended on three partes of thesame. Poyton of Sentraules, perceiuyng one part of the toune to be vndefended, scaled the walles on that part: and without any difficulte toke the toune, and slewe sir Alexander Pole brother to therle, & many other, to the nombre of two hundred: but they not much gayned, for they lost.iij.C. good men and more. Of thenglishmen wer taken.xl. beside his brother Jhõ. After this gain and good lucke, the Frenchemen returnynge towarde Orleaunce, fell in contencion and debate, for their captiues & prisoners xxx and slewe them all, sauyng the erle and hys brother.

After the gaynyng of the toune of Jargeaux, thesame army cam to Meum, and toke the toure at the bridge, and put there in a garrison, and frõ thence remoued to Bangency. Whiche garrison, beyng not ditailed rendered the toune, so that they might departe wyth bagge and baggage, frankely and freely: whyche desire to them was graunted. At this toune of Bangency, met wyth xl the duke of Alaunson, Arthur of Britayne the false forswoꝛne gentleman to the kyng of Englande, newely made Constable of Fraunce (as you haue heard,) with whom was the lorde Delabret with.xij.C. men: to whom daily repaired freshe aide out of euery parte, as the Erale of Vandosme, and other, to the nombre of.xx.or.xxiij.M. men. All these men of warre, determined to go to Meum, and to take the toune, but they wer infoꝛmed, that the Englishemen, had lefte the toune desolate, and wer returned to the loꝛd Talbot to Jeneuile. Then thei cõcluded to passe towarde that toune. But, as they marched foꝛwarde vpon a Saterdaie, thei had perfite knowledge, that the loꝛde Talbot wyth .v. thousand men, was commyng to Meum. Wherfoꝛe, thei intendyng to stop hym a tyde, conueyed their company to a small billage called Patay, whiche way, they knewe that the Englishmen must nedes passe by. And first thei appoynted their hoꝛsemẽ, whiche were well and richelye furnished, to go befoꝛe, and sodainly to set on the Englishemen, oꝛ they wer, either ware oꝛ set in oꝛdꝛe. The Englishmen commyng foꝛwarde, perceiued the hoꝛsemen, and imaginyng to deceiue their enemies, commaunded the fotemen, to enuirone & enclose thẽselfes about, with their stakes, but the French hoꝛsmen came on so fiersly, that the archers had no leyser, to set themselfes in a raie. There was no remedy, but to fight at aduenture. This battaill, cõtinued by the space of thꝛe long houres. And although thenglishmen wer ouerpꝛessed, with the nombꝛe of their aduersaries, yet thei neuer stedde backe one foote, til their capitain the loꝛde Talbot, was soꝛe wounded at the backe, and so taken. Then their hartes began to faint, & thei fled, in which flight, there wer slain aboue xij. C. and taken. xl. wherof the loꝛde Talbot, the loꝛd Scales, the loꝛd Hungerfoꝛd, & sir Thomas Rampston, were the chief: howbeit diuerse archers which had shot all their arrowes, hauyng only their swerdes, defended thẽself, & with ỹ help of some of ỹ hoꝛsmẽ, cam safe to Meum.

When the fame was blowen abꝛode, that the Loꝛde Talbot was taken, all the Frenchmen not a litle reioysed, thinkyng surely, that now the rule of the Englishemen, shoulde shoꝛtly assuage and waxe faint: foꝛ feare wherof, the tounes of Jeneuile, Meũ, Foꝛt, and diuerse other, returned from the Englishe part, and became Frenche, to the greate displeasure of the Regent. Frõ this battaill, departed without any stroke striken, sir Jhon Fastolffe, the same yere foꝛ his valiauntnes elected into the oꝛdꝛe of the Garter. Foꝛ whiche cause the Duke of Bedfoꝛd, in a great anger, toke from hym the Jmage of sainct Geoꝛge, and his Garter: but afterward, by meane of frendes, and apparant causes of good excuse by hym alledged, he was restoꝛed to the oꝛder again, against the mynd of the loꝛde Talbot.

Charles, callynge hym selfe Frenche Kynge, beynge aduertised of this victoꝛy, thought now, that al thynges succeded, accoꝛdyng to hys opinion and good hope, whiche euer, was of that hie coꝛage and haut mynd, that in his moste aduersitie, he neuer dispaired in good lucke at length: so that the Erle of Salisbury beyng dedde, and the loꝛde Talbot liuing in captiuitie, (which wer ỹ gloꝛye of his enemies) he thought to enterpꝛise great and waighty thinges, wher befoꝛe he medeled with small and litle doynges. Foꝛ fulfillyng of his mynd and appetite, he determined, first to conquere the citie of Reynes, to the intent, that he beynge there, might accoꝛdyng to the fashion of his pꝛogenitoꝛs, with all accustomed Ceremonies, be sacred and anoynted kynge with the holy ampulle, that all men might se and perceiue, that he was, by all lawes and decrees, a iust and a lawfull kyng. Wherfore he assemblynge to gether a great army, & hauyng in his company Jone the Puzel, whom he vsed as an oracle and a southsaier, passed through Champaigne, by the toune of Anxer. They within, sent to him messengers, prayng him of certain daies of abstinēce of war, in the which (yf they wer not rescued) they promised to rēdre ỹ toune. He not willing to recōpēce with ingratitude, the louing hartes of the citezens, graunted gently to their petix cion, and leuyng there certain persons, to se that they shoulde not iugle with him departed from thence to Troys, beyng the chief citie of Chā-paigne, whiche he besieged .xij. dayes. Sir Philip Hal capitain there, vnprouided bothe of vitaill and men, mistrustyng, that aide woulde not come in tyme, vpon cōposicion rendered the toune, so that he & his, with all their moueables might in sauetie depart the citie: whyche demaund was agreed to. After that Troys was yelded, the cōmonaltie of Chalons, rebelled against sir Jhon Iwbemōd their capitain, and constrained hym to deliuer the toune vpon like cōposicion, whyche against hys wil, he was fain to do: and likewise dyd the citezens of Reys, desirynge xi hym to geue saueconduite to all Englishemen, safely to departe.

When he had thus conquered Reyns, he in the presence of all the noblemen of his faccion, and the dukes of Lorayne and Barre, was sacred kyng of Fraunce, by the name of Charles the .vj. wyth all rites & ceremonies therto apperteining. Thei of Anxer which wer not rescued within the tyme appoynted, brought the kayes to hym, and submitted themselfes to his obeysaunce: likewise diddē all the cities and tounes adioynyng, geuyng thankes to almightie God, whiche hauynge compassion of their misery, had restored them to libertie and fredome. The xxx Duke of Bedford, hearyng that these tounes and soyssons also, had returned to the part of his aduersaries, and that Charles late Dolphyn had taken vpon hym the name and estate of the kynge of Fraunce, and also, seyng that daily, cities and tounes returned from thenglishe parte and became frenche, as though the Englishemen had now lost all their hardy chieftaines and valiaūt men of warre, espied and euidently perceiued, that the laste and vttermoste poynt of recouery, was dryuē only to ouercome by battaill, and to subdue by force. By whiche victory, (as he putte hys confidence in God) he trusted not onelye to scourge and plague the cities, whiche were so sodainly chaungeable, but also to assuage and caulme the haute corage of the newe sacred frenche kynge xl and his companions. Wherfore, be hauynge together .x. M. good Englishemen, (beside Normans) departed out of Paris, in warlike fashion and passed thyough Brye to Monstreau Faultyow, and there sente by Bedforde his herault letters to the frenche kyng, alledgynge to hym that he contrary to the lawes of God and man, yea, and contrary to the finall conclusion, taken, concorded, and agreed betwene his noble brother kyng,Henry the fifth,and kyng Charles,the.v.father to thesaied nowe vsurper, leuyng all humayne reason and honest communicacion, (which sometyme appeaseth debates and pacifieth strifes) onelye allured and intised by a deuilishe wytche, and a sathanicall enchaunteresse, had not onely falsely and craftely,taken vpon hym, the name, title and dignitie of the kyng of Fraũce: But also had,by murder,stelynge,craft, and deceiptfull meanes,violently gotten,and wrongfully kept,diuerse cities and tounes,belongyng to the kynge of Englande,his moste beste beloued lord,and moste derest nephew. For profe wherof,he was come doune from Paris,with his armye,into the countrey of Brye, by dent of swerde and stroke of battaill,to proue his writynge and cause trewe, willyng his enemie to chose the place, and he in thesame, wouldegeue hym battayle.

The newe Frenche kynge,departyng from his solempne Ceremonies at Reins,and remouyng from thence to Dampmartine, studiyng how to compasse the Parisiãs,ether with money,or with promes, was some what troubled with this message,howbeit,he made afreshe countenaũce,& a Frenche brag,answeryng to the herault:that he wolde soner seke his Master,and the Duke should pursewe hym. The duke of Bedford hearyng his aunswer,marched toward hym,and pitched hys rp feld in a stronge place,and sent out diuerse of his raungers, to prouoke the Frenchmen to come forward. The Frenche kyng was in maner determined to abyde the battayll, but when he hard saie by his espialles, that the power and nombre of the Englishmen,wer to hys army equall in power,he determined that it was more for his profite, to abstain frõ battaill without daũger,then to entre into the coufficte with ieopardy: fearynge,least that with a rashe corage, he might ouerthrowe al his affaires whiche so effecteously proceded. And so well aduised,he turned with his army,alitle out of the waye. The duke of Bedford perceiuyng hys faint corage,folowed hym by mountaines and dales, tyll he came rrp to a toune in Barre,not farre from Senlys,where he found the Frẽch kyng and hys army. Wherfore he ordred hys battail, like a man expert in marciall science,settyng the archers before,and hymself with the nobiemen in the mayne battaill,and put the Normans on bothe sides for the wynges. The Frenche kyng also ordered his battailes, accordyng to the deuise of hys capitaines. Thus,these twoo armies without any greate doyng,(except a fewe skirmishes, in the whiche the dukes light horsmen dyd very valiauntly)laye eche in sight of other, by the space of twoo daies and two nightes. But when the Frenche kynge sawe,and perceiued,how glad,how diligent and coragious the Englishmen were pl to fight and geue battaill,he imagened that by his tariyng,one of these twoo thynges must nedes chaũce:that is to saie,either he shoulde fight against his will, or lye still like a cowarde, to his greate rebuke and infamy. Wherefore in the dedde of the night, (as priuely as he coulde)he brake vp his campe and fled to Bray. When this slight was perceiued

in the mornyng, the Regent could scace refrain his people, from folowyng the Frenche army, callyng them, cowardes, dastardes, and loutes, and therfore, he perceiuing that by no meanes, he could allure the new Frenche kyng to abide battaill, mistrustyng the Parisiās, and geuynge no great credit to their faire, swete, and flatterynge wordes, returned agayn to Paris, to assemble together a greater power, and so to prosecute his enemies.

In this season, the Bohemians, (whiche belike had espied the vsurped authoritie of the bishoppe of Rome) began to rebell against his sea, which, (as Eneas Siluius doth report wer) fallē into certain sectes of heresie. Wherfore, Martyn the fifth bishop of Rome, wrote vnto them to abstain from warre, and to be reconciled by reason, from their damnable opinions. But they, (beyng persuaded to the contrarye) neither gaue eare vnto hym, nor yet obeyed hys voyce. Wherfore the bishop of Rome, wrote to the princes of Germany, to inuade ỹ realme of Beame as the denne of heretikes, and caue of deuilishe doctrine. Beside this, he appoynted Henry bishoppe of Winchester, and Cardinall of. S. Eusebie, a man very wel borne, (as you haue hard) but no better borne thē high stomacked, and yet no higher stomacked, then abundantly enriched, to be his legate in this greate iorney, and to bryng out men from the realme of Englande, into the countrey of Beame. And because the warre touched religion, he licenced the said Cardinall, to take the tenth part of euery spirituall dignitie, benefice, and promocion. This matter was declared in open Parliament in Englande, and not dissented, but gladly assented to, wherfore the bishop gathered the money, and assembled foure thousand men and mo, not without great grudge of the people, whiche daily were with tallages and aides weried, and sore burdened. And when men, munitions, and money wer ready for his high enterprise, he with all his people came to the sea stronde at Douer, ready to passe ouer the sea into Flaunders.

But in the meane season, the Duke of Bedforde considerynge, how tounes daily wer gotten, and countries hourely wonne in the realme of Fraunce, for lacke of sufficient defence and nombre of men of warre, wrote to his brother the duke of Gloucester, to releue him with aide, in that tempestious tyme and troubelous season. When thys letter was brought into Englande, the duke of Gloucester was not alitle amased, because he had no army redy to sende at that tyme: for by the reason of the Crewe, sent into Beame, he could not sodainly reyse a newe armie. But because the matter was of suche importaunce, and might neither be, frō day to day differred, nor yet long delaied, he wrote to the bishop of Winchester, to passe with all his army toward the duke of Bedforde, whiche at that tyme had bothe nede of men & assistaunce, considerynge that now, all stoode vpon losse or gaine: whiche thyng doen, and to hys honor acheued, he might performe his iorney against the vngracious Bohemians. Although the Cardinal was some what moued with this countermaunde,yet leaſt he ſhould be noted,not to ayde the Regent of Fraunce,in ſo greate a cauſe and ſo neceſſarye an entrepryſe, he bowed from his former iorney, and paſſed the ſea with all his companye, and brought them to his coſyn,to the citie of Paris.

Charles the Frenche kynge, hauynge knowledge in the meane ſeaſon by his eſpialles,which went round about the countrey, to intiſe and ſollicite tounes and cities, to returne from the Engliſhe part, and become Frenche, that the inhabitãtes of Champeigne, and Beauoys ſ ought hym greate loue and ſynguler fauor, and gladlye coueted to renounce the ſubiection of England, and to be vnder his protection, and ſ alſo offred to open him their gates,ſo that they ſhould not therby,be in ieoperdy of their lifes & loſſe of their goodes, with all haſte & diligence remoued towarde Champeigne. The Duke of Bedford beyng aduertiſed of his progreſſe,and hauyng his armie augmented, with the new aide,whiche the cardinal had of late conducted,marched forward with greate ſpede to encountre and geue battayll, to hys mortall enemy the Frenche kyng. When the duke was come to Senlys, the Frenchemen wer lodged on the Mountpilioll,betwene Senlis and Champiegne. Euery army knew of other,and euery hoſte might behold other. Then ſ the cãpes wer trenched,and the battailes pitched, and the feldes ordered. Thus,theſe great armies lay two daies,nothyng doyng but with ſkirmiſhes,in the whyche the Normans ſore vexed the Frenchemen. Wherfore the lorde Regent,gaue to them many high laudes and praiſynges,and determined ſurely the next daye,to ſet on the French kyng in his campe,yf he would not remoue out, and abide battail. But while kyng Charles dyd politiquely conſider,what a variable lady, Fortune was,and what a ſodain and vnthought chaũce of a ſmall thyng, might do in a battaill:for the detrimentes and ouerthrowes,that he and hys nacion had taken and taſted by thenglichemen, wer to them a lernyng, an example and a plaine experiment,to auoyde open ioynyng, mutuall ſ conflict,and force to force. And beſide that,he had by hys explorators & ſpies,plain and perfect knowledge, ỹ many and diuerſe cities & tounes in Fraunce,abhorryng thenglyſhe libertie,and aſpiryng to the Frenche bondage & natiue ſeruitude,(accordyng to the nature of Aſſes, whiche the more they be charged with,the more they deſire) would,(whẽ they ſawe their tyme) not onely rebell and returne to his faccion and parte, but alſo were ready to aide and aſſiſte hym, in recouery of hys deſired realme and auncient dominion,in expellynge alſo the Engliſhe nacion, out of the territories of Faunce. And therefore, he imagined that the duke of Bedforde,was ſo haſty to geue hym battaill,thynkynge,that yf ſ ye then wer ouercome,the game for the Engliſhemen had been clerely gotten,& to the Frenchmen,a perpetuall checkemate. Wherfore he determined neuer,(except very neceſſitie compelled or cõſtrained him) to fight in open battaill with the Engliſhemen, nor by a feld to aduenture his realme with thẽ,of whom his predeceſſors ſo often tymes had been vanquiſhed, banquished. Wherefore, like a carpet capitain, he in the night, remoued his campe and fled to Crespy, and yet his nōbre was double to the Englishe army. The duke of Bedforde, seyng that the Frenche kyng was, thus cowardly retrayted, and as a man, whiche durste not once assaye the stroke of an Englishe arme, shamefully reculed: with all his power and armie, returned agayn to Parys, sore suspectyng the deceiptfull faith of the pollitique Parisians. The Bishop of Winchester, after, the Frenche kynges flight, went into Beome, and there did somewhat, but what it was, authors kepe silence, and so do I: But shortly, he without x any greate praise, and small gayne, returned into Englande, more glad of hys retraite, thē of hys aduaūsyng forwarde. Sone after, the bishop of Rome without his agrement, vnlegated hym, and set another in his stede & authoritie, with which doyng, he was neyther cōtēt nor pleased.

the.viij.pere

ON the.vj.day of Nouembre, being the day of sainct Leonard, kyng Henry, in the eight yere of his reigne, was, at Westminster with all pompe and honor, crouned kynge of this realme of England. At which coronacion, to reherse the costly fayre, xx the delicate meate, the pleasaunt wines, the nombre of courses, the sortes of dishes, the labors of officers, the multitude of people, the estates of Lordes, the beauties of Ladies, the riches of apparell, the curious deuises, the solempne banquettes, it would aske a long tyme, and wery you: Wherfore leauyng the pleasaunt pastyme in Englande, I wyll returne to the troubleous warres in Fraunce.

After that the Frenche kynge was fled from the Duke of Bedford, (as you haue harde before) and was come to Crespy in Ualoys, he was credibly informed, how the citezens of Champaigne, desired greatly to be vnder his gouernaunce and subiection. Wherfore, he mindynge not xxx to lese so faire an offred prey, ceased not, til he came to the toune, where, with all reuerence and benignitie, he was receiued and welcomed. And after that, were rendered to hym, the tounes of Senlis and Beauoys. And the Lorde Longuenall tooke by stelth, the castle of Aumarle and slewe all the Englishemen, & in short space, the lorde Barbasan, whiche longe hadde been prisoner in the Castle Gaylard, so muche, what with faire worde and large promises, persuaded his kepers, that he not only deliuered his awne persone, but also caused the toune, to turne from thenglishmen, to the part of kyng Charles his Master. Whyche kyng, although he muche reioysed, at the good successe, that Fortune had to xl him sente, yet he was somwhat desperate, how to recouer his countrey from the possession of the Englishemen, except he vnknitted the knotte and league, betwene the duke of Burgoyn and them. Wherfore, he sent his Chauncellor, & diuerse Ambassadors to the duke of Burgoyn, first, excusyng himself of the death & murder, of duke Jhon his father, & after, declaring to him, that there could be nothing more foule, more dis-

honest,nor more detestable,then,for his awne peculiar cause, & priuate displeasure,to ioyne with his auncient enemies,and perpetual aduersaries,against his natiue countrey and naturall nacion:not onelye requiryng hym,of concord,peace, and amitie, but also promysyng golden mountaines,and many more benefites,thē at that tyme,he was either able or could performe. This message was not so secrete,nor the doyng so closely cloked,but the Duke of Bedforde, thereof was plainly informed. Whiche,beyng sore troubled, and vnquieted in his mynd,because he sawe the power of thenglishe nacion, daily waxe lesse, he, of all thynges,first forseyng,yf any losse should of necessitie chaunce, of those tounes and countreis,whiche hys noble brother,kyng Henry the fifth had conquered,in the very countrey of Fraunce, for lacke of tuicion or defence:yet for an ankerholde,he determined to kepe, possesse, & defende, the Duchie of Normandy, the olde inheritaunce and auncient patrimony,of the kynges of Englande, and from them onely, by force & not by iustice,by violence and not by ryght,sithe the tyme of kynge Henry the thirde, (the deuilishe deuision then reignyng in the realme)wrongfully deteined,and iniuriously vsurped. Wherefore,he diligently prouidyng, for thynges ỹ myght chaunce,appoynted gouernor of the citie of Paris, Lewes of Luxenborough,bishop of Turwine and Ely,being Chauncellor of Fraunce,for the kyng of England,a man of no lesse wit, then of birthe,leuyng wyth hym,a conuenient nombre of Englishemen to defende bothe the citie and territory of Paris, & the isle of Fraunce then beyng in the Englishmens possession and gouernaunce.

These thynges thus ordered, he departed from Paris, into Normandy,and called at Roan a parliament, of the thre estates of the duchie,in the whiche he declared vnto them,the great liberties,the manifolde priueleges, the innumerable benefites, whych they had receiued of the kynges of Englande,duryng the tyme, that they were possessors and lordes of thesame duchie,not puttyng in obliuion,the misery, bondage,and calamitie,whiche they had sustained,by the intollerable yoke and daily tributes,continuallye layed in their neckes like Asses, by the cruell and coueteous Frenchemen: and puttyng theim also in remembraunce,how the kynges of England, wer not only brought furth and discēded,of the Normans bloud & progeny,but wer the very true & vndoubtfull heires,to thesame countrey and duchie, lineally succedyng & lawfully discendyng from Rollo the hardy, first duke and prince of the same dominion: Requirynge theim farther, to liue in loue and amitie emongest theim self,to be true and obedient, to the kyng their soueraigne Lorde,and to kepe their othe and promes,made and sworne to his noble brother,kyng Henry the.v.promisyng to them,Englishe libertie and priueleges royall. While the duke of Bedford was thus, intertainyng and encouragyng the Normans, Charles the new frenche kyng, beyng of hys departure aduertised, longyng and thyrstynge for to obtain Paris,the chief citee, & principall place of resort, within the whole realme realme, of Fraunce, departed from the toune of Senlis well accompanied, and came to the toune of sainct Denise, whiche he found desolate, and abandoned of all garrison, and good gouernaunce. Wherfore, without force and small damage, he entered into the voyed toune, and lodged his armie at Mountmartyr, and Abberuilliers, nere adioynynge, and lyng to the citie of Paris. And from thence, sent, Jhon duke of Alaunson, and his sorceresse Jone, (called the mayde, sent from God) in whom, his whole affiaunce then consisted, with thre thousande light horsmen, to get again the citie of Paris, either by force, or by faire flatx teryng, or reasonable treatie, and after thē, he without delaie or deferryng of tyme, with all hys power, came betwene Mountmartyr & Paris, and sodainly, approched the gate of sainct Honore, settinge vp ladders to the walles, and castyng faggottes into the diches, as though, he would with a French bragge, sodainly haue gottē the faire citie. But thenglishe capitaines, euery one kepyng hys ward and place assigned, so manfully and fiercly, with a noble corage, defended themselfes, their walles and toures, with the assistence of the Parisians, that thei rebutted and draue awaie the Frenchmen, & threwe doune Jone, their great goddesse, into the botome of the toune ditche, where she laie behynd the xi backe of an Asse, sore hurte, tyll the tyme, that she all filthye with mire and durte, was drawen out, by Guyschard of Thienborne, seruaunt to the duke of Alaunson. The Frenche kynge, seyng the greate losse, that he had susteined at this assaut, and accompted, his pretensed conquest, in maner impossible, leuyng the dedde bodies behind hym, and takyng with hym, the wounded capitaines, whych wer of no small nombre, returned into Berry. Butt in the meane waye, the citezens of Laignie, became his subiectes, & made to hym an othe, promisyng to continewe from thence furth to hym, both true and obedient.

The Duke of Bedford, beyng in Normandy, and hearynge of thys xxx sodain attempt, lost no tyme, nor spared no trauaile, till he came to Paris. Where he, not onely thanked the capitaines, & praised the citezens for their assured fidelitie and good will, towarde their kynge and souereigne lorde, but also extolled their gardines, & manly doynges, aboue the Starres, and high elementes: promisyng to them, honor, fame, and greate aduauncementes. Whiche gentle exhortacion, so incoraged and inflamed the hartes of the Parisians, that they sware, promysed & concluded, to be frendes euer to the kynge of Englande and hys frendes, and enemies alwaies to his foes and aduersaries, makyng proclamacion by this stile. Frendes to kynge Henry, frendes to the Parisians, xi enemies to England, enemies to Paris. But if they spake it wyth their hartes, either for feare, that Charles the Frenche kyng, should not punishe them, if he once obteined the superioritie, ouer their citie, & toune, or that thei flattred thenglishemen, to put thē selfes in credite with the chief capitaines, you shall plainly perceiue, by the sequele of their actes.

Sone after these doynges, came to Paris wyth a greate company,

Philip

Phillip duke of Burgony, whiche was of the Regent, and the lady hys wyfe, honorably receiued, and highly feasted. And after long consultacion had, for recouerying of the tounes, lately by the Frenche kyng stolen and taken, it was agreed, that the duke of Bedford, should rayse an armie, for the recouery of thesayd fortresses, and that the duke of Burgoyne, shoulde be hys deputie, and tary at Paris, for the defence of the same. After this greate businesse, thus concluded, and appoynted, the Duke of Bedforde hym self, without any greate resistaunce, recouered again the toune of sainct Denise, and diuerse other Castles. And after that doen, he sent the Bastard of Clarence, to laye siege to the Castle of Toursie, beynge bothe by the naturall situacion, and mannes pollicie, very strong, and in maner vnable to be beaten doune. The siege continued sixe monethes, but in conclusion, the capitain discomfited of all releue and succor, rendered the fortresse, the life of hym and hys souldiers only saued. Whiche offre was taken, & the castle rased, and cast doune to the grounde. Durynge this siege, sir Thomas Kirell knight, with foure hundred Englishemen, departed from Gourney in Normandy, and rode by Beauoys, spoylyng, robbyng, and wastyng the countrey, to the suburbes of Cleremont. Wherof, hearyng the Erle of thesame toune, assembled all the men of warre, of the garrisons adioynynge, to fight with thenglishmen, and so the Frenchemen with all diligence set forward, & found their enemies in a straight place, nere vnto Beauois. The erle of Cleremount seyng, that he coulde not hurte them, with his men of armes, by reason of the straight, came doune on fote with all his company, and fiercly set on the Englishmen. The fight was fierse, and the aduauntage doubtfull. But in conclusion, the archers shot so terrible, that the Frenchmen, not able to abide the smart, and gaules of the arrowes, fled a pace, and the Englishmen leuyng the straight, leped on horsebacke, and folowed the chase. In the whiche wer taken twoo hundred prisoners, and thryse as many slain. The Erle, by the swiftnesse of his horsse, escaped hys enemies, and came to the toune of Beauoys: & so sir Thomas Kiriell, with plentie of spoyle & prisoners, returned to Gorney, renderyng to God his hartie thankes, for that good chaunce and happie victory.

Yet Fortune sent not this good lucke alone, for the erle of Suffolke at thesame very season, besiegynge the toune of Aumarle, whereof was capitain the lorde Rambures, (after .xxiiij. great assautes geuen to the fortresse) had the toune and castle to hym symply rendered. Wherfore, he caused .xxx. of the tounes men, for their vntruth, to be hanged on the walles, and all the reste he raunsomed, & sent the capitain into Englande, where he remained sixe yeres continually, & after by exchaung was deliuered. After this, the erle fortified the toune, with men, munycions and vitaile, and so by la itle and litle, the Englishemen recouered again many tounes, whiche before they had loste, without anye greate losse of their people. Whiche thyng, the Frenchemen well consideryng, imagined by what means, how to get again the toune of Laual, which the Lorde Talbot (before as you haue heard) gat, by scaling in a night. Wherfore, to possesse their desired prey, they with money, and gay promises, first corrupted a Miller, that kept a Mill adioyning to the wall, so that the Miller, suffered the Lord Homet wyth thre hundred other to passe through hys Mill into the toune, in a very darcke night. Whē they were entered, they slewe the kepers of the gate, and let in the lord Bertrand de la Ferrier, with fyue hundred men of armes: which either slewe or toke prysoners, al thenglyshmen within the toune. And shortxly after, sir Stephyn de Vignoles called the Heire, toke by scaling, the toune of Lonuiers in Normandy, and dyd muche damage, to all the tounes adioyning.

The.ix.yere.

While these chaunces happened, betwene the Englyshe men and Frenchemen, Philip duke of Burgoyne, maried the Lady Isabel, doughter to Jhon, kynge of Portyngall and great aunte to the kynge of Englande. In honour of whyche mariage, he instytuted and beganne an ordre of.xxxvi. knightes wythoute reproche, called the ordre of the golden fleece, and deuysed statutes, mātxxi els, collers, and Ceremonies for the same, muche lyke to the ordinaunces, of the noble ordre of the Garter begonne in Englande, almooste an hundred yeres before the inuencyon, of this fraternitie & frendshyp. On the which wife, he begat, the hardye duke Charles, father to Marie, after maried to Maximilian kyng of the Romayns, as (when place requireth) shalbe hereafter to you declared.

In thys very season, the Englishmen in the cold moneth of Decembre, besieged the toune of Laigny, in the whiche was the Puzell and diuerse other good captaynes. But the weither was so cold, & the rayne xxi so great and so continual, that they of force compelled, not by their enemies, but by intemperate season, reysed their siege: and in their returne the Puzel and al the garrison within the toune, issued out and foughte wyth thenglyshmē, where, (after long fyghting) both parties departed without either great gayn or losse. After this enterprise done, the duke of Burgoyne, accompanied with the erles of Arundel and Suffolke, and the Lord Jhon of Luxenbrough, and wyth a great puissaunce, besieged the toune of Champeygne: whych toune was well walled, manned and vitailed, so that the besiegers, must either by assaut or long taryng, wery or famyshe them within the toune. So they cast trenches, xl and made moines, and studied al the waies that they could deuise how to compasse their cōquest and enterprise. And it happened in the night of the Assencion of our Lord, that Pothon of xentraxles, Jone de Puzell, & fyue or syxe hundred men of armes, issued out in Chāpeygne, by the gate of the bridge, towarde Mowntdedier, intendyng to set fire in the tentes and lodgynges of the lord of Baudo, whiche was then gone to Marigny, for the duke of Burgoyns affaires. At whyche tyme, Sir Jhon of Luxenborough, with eight other gentlemen (which had riden aboute the toune to serche and viewe, in what place the toune might be most aptly and conueniently assauted or scaled) were come nere to the lodges of the lorde of Baudo, where they espyed the Frenchmẽ, which began to cut doune tentes, ouerthrowe paulions, and kil men in theyr beddes. Wherfore, shortly they assembled a great nombre of menne, as wel Englishe as Burgonions, and coragiously set onth e Frenchemen. Sore was the fight and greate was the slaughter, in so much that the Frenchemen, not able lenger to endure, fled into the toune so fast, that one letted the other to entre. In whiche chace was take, Jone the Puzell, and diuerse other: whiche Jone was sent to the duke of Bedford to Roan, wher, (after log examinacion) she was brẽt to ashes. This witch or manly woman, (called the mayde of GOD) the Frenchmẽ greately glorified, and highly extolled, alledgyng that by her Orleaũce was vitayled: by her, kyng Charles was sacred at Reynes, and that by her, ỹ Englishmen were often tymes put backe and ouerthrowen. O Lorde what dispraise is this to the nobilite of Fraunce? What blotte is thys to the Frenche nacyon? What more rebuke can be imputed to a renoumed regyon, then to affirme, wryte & confesse, that all noble victories, and honorable cõquestes, whiche neyther the kyng with his power nor the nobilitie with their valiauntnesse, nor the counsayll wyth their wyt nor the cõmonaltie with their strength, could compasse or obtain, were gotten and achiued by a sheperdes doughter, a chamberlaine in an hostrie, and a beggers brat: whyche blinding the wittes of the French nacion, by reuelacions, dreames & phantasticall visions, made thẽ beleue thinges not to be supposed, and to geue faythe to thynges impossible. For suerly, ỹ credite may be geuen to the actes of the Clergie, openlye done, and commonly shewed, this woman was not inspired wyth ỹ holy Ghost, nor sent from God (as the Frenchmen beleue) but an enchantaresse, an orgayne of the deuyll, sent from Sathan, to blynd the people and bryng them in vnbelefe: as by thys letter, sent from the king of England to the duke of Burgoyn, to you euydently shall appere.

Most dere and welbeloued vncle, the feruent loue and great affec-
" cyon, whyche you (lyke a very catholyque prynce) beare to our Mo" ther holy Churche, and to the aduauncement of our fayth, doth bothe
" reasonably admonysh, and frẽdely exhort vs, to signifie and wryte vnto
" you, such thynges, which, to the honor of oure Mother holye Churche " strengthenyng of our fayth, and pluckyng vp by the rotes, of moste pe" stilent errors, haue bene solemply done wythin our citie of Roan. It is " commonly renoumed, and in euery place published, that the womanne, " commonly called the Puzell, hath by the space of twoo yeres and more,
" contrary to Goddes lawe, and the estate of womanhed, bene clothed in " a mannes apparell, a thyng in the sight of God abhominable. And in thys

this estate, caried ouer and conueied, to the presence of our chief enemy and youres, to whom, & to the prelates, nobles, and cõmons of his part she declared that she was sent from God, presumptuously makyng her vaunt, that she had communicacion personally, and visibly wyth sainct Michael, and a greate multitude of Aungels, and sainctes of heauen, as saynct Katheryn, and saynct Margarete: by the whyche falshode & subtiltie, she made diuerse to beleue, and trust in her faythe, promisinge to them great and notable victories, by the which meane she did turne the hartes of many men and women, from the truthe and veritie, and x conuerted them to lyes and errors. Besyde thys, she vsurped a cote of armes, and displayed a standard, which thynges be apperteining only to knightes and esquiers: and of greate outrage, and more pryde and presumpciõ, she demaunded to beare the noble and excellent Armes of Fraunce, whych she in part obteyned, the whiche she bare in many skirmishes and assautes, and her brethrẽ also (as men report) that is to say: the feld azure, a swerd, ỹ point vpward in pale siluer, set betwene twoo flower deluces, firmed with a croun of gold. And in this estate, she cam into the feld, & guyded men of warr, and gathred cõpanies, & assembled hostes to exercyse vnnaturall cruelties, in shedyng of christen bloude, & xx stirring sedicious, and commocions emongest the people, inducing thẽ, to periury, rebellyon, superstition and false error, in disturbing of peace and quietnes and renewyng of mortall warre. Besydes this causyng her self to be honored and worshipped of many, as a woman sanctified & dãpnably openyng dyuerse imagined cases longe to reherse, in diuerse places wel knowen and apparantly proued. Wherby almoste al chry-stendom is slaundered. But the diuine puyssaunce, hauynge cõpassyon vpon hys true people, and wyllyng no lenger to leaue thẽ in peryll, nor suffre thẽ to abyde styll in wayes dangerous, and newe cruelties, hath lyghtly permitted of hys great mercy and clemency, the sayed puzel to xxx be taken in your host and siege, whiche you kepte for vs before Champeygne, and by youre good meane delyuered into our obeysaunce and dominion. And because we were requyred, by the byshoppe of ỹ Dioces, wher she was takẽ, (because she was noted, suspected, and defamed to be a traitor to almighty God) to delyuer her to hym, as to her ordy-nary and ecclesiasticall iudge: We for the reuerence of oure Mother holy Churche, (whose ordinaunces we wyl preferre, as oure owne de-des and wylles, as reason it is, and also for the aduauncement of christen fayth, bayled the sayed Jone to hym, to the intente that he shoulde make processe against her: not willing any vengeaunce, or punishmente xl to be shewed to her, by any officers of our secular Justices, which they might haue lawfully & reasonable done, considerynge the greate hurtes, damages and intõuenences, the horrible murders, & detestable cruelties, & other innumerable mischiefes, whyche she hathe cõmytted in our territories, agaynst our people, & obediẽt subiectes. The whych byshoppe takynge in compayny to hym, the Vicar and inquisitor of er-„ tors and herisies, and callyng to them, a great and notable nombre of „ solempne doctors, and maysters in diuinitie, and lawe Canon, begã by „ great solempnitie and grauitie, accordyngly, to procede in the cause of „ thesayed Jone. And after that, thesaid byshop and inquisitor, iudges in „ thys cause, had at diuerse dayes ministered, certain interrogatories to „ thesayd Jone, and had caused the confessions & assercions of her, truly „ to be examined by thesaid doctors and maisters, and in conclusiõ gene„ rally, by all the faculties of our dere and wel beloued doughter the V„ niuersity of Paris. Against whom, (the confessions and assercions, ma-„ turely and deliberatly considered) the Judges, Doctors, & al other the x „ parties aforesayde, adiudged thesame Jone, a superstricious sorceresse, „ and a diabolicall blasphemeresse of God, and of his sainctes: and a per„ sone scismatike and erronyous, in the lawe of Jesu Christe. And for to „ reduce and bryng her agayn, to the communion and company, of oure „ Mother holy Churche, and to purge, her of her horrible, and pernycyour Mother the holy Churche, bothe gladly and willyngly. The Judges, and other Ecclesiasticall persones, gentely receyued her offer, hopyng by this meane, that bothe her body and soule were gotten agayn oute of eternall losse and perdicion. And so, she submitted her self, to the ordinaunce of the holye Churche, and wyth her mouthe openly reuoked her errours and detestable crimes: and thesame abiured openlye, signing with her hande thesayd abiuracion and reuocacion. Where vpon, oure Mother the holy Churche, beyng pitifull and merciful, glad and reioysing of a sinner, that will conuerte, willynge the strayed shepe x to returne again to his folde and flocke, condẽpned thesayed Jone only to do open penaunce. But the fire of her pride, whiche was in her harte, sodainly brast out into hurtful flammes, blowen oute by the belowes of enuie: and incontinent after she tooke agayn al her errours and false opinions, by her before adiured and reuoked, for whyche causes, accordynge to the iudgementes and institucions of holye Church, to the intent that she hereafter should not defyle any other membre of the flocke, of our Lorde Jesus Christ: was again exhorted and preached to openly. And because she still was obstinate, in her trespaces and villanous offences, she was deliuered to the secular power, the which cõ= xx dempned her to be brent, and cõsumed her in the fyre. And whẽ she saw that the fatayll daye of her obstinacy was come, she openly cõfessed, ỹ the spirites, whiche to her often dyd appeare, were euyll and false, and apparant liers, and that their promes, which they had made to deliuer her out of captiuitie, was false and vntrue: affirmyng her selfe by those spirites to bee often beguiled, blynded and mocked. And so beynge in good minde, she was by the Justices caried to the olde marked, within the citie of Roan, and there by the fyre consumed to ashes, in the syght of all the people.

This letter the kyng of Englande sente not onelye to the Duke of xxx Burgoyne and other Princes, to declare the veritie of the matter, and the administracion of Justice, but to admonyshe all rude and ignorant persones in all other countreyes, to refrayne from the credite & belefe of the saiynges of suche profane prophesies, and traftie imageners, as thys peuysh paynted Puzel was. Yet notwithstandinge, this lawfull processe, this due examinacion and publicke sentence, Jhõ Buchet, and diuerse Frenche writers affirme her to be a sainct in heauen. But because it is no poynt of oure faith, no man is bound to beleue hys iudgement, although he were an Archedeken. But Paulus Emilius, a famous wryter, rehersyng that the citezens of Orleaunce, had buylded xl in ỹ honor of her, an Image or an Idole, sayth, ỹ Pius bishop of Rome and Antony bishop of Florence, much merueyled & greately wondered at her actes and doynges. Wyth whych saiyng, I can very well agree that she was more too bee marueyled at, as a false Prophetisse, and seducer of the people: then to be honored or worshipped as a sayncte sent from God into the realme of Fraunce. For of this I am sure, that all auncient wryters, alwell deuine, as prophane, alledge these thre thinges, beside diuerse other, to apparteyne to a good woman. First, shamfastnesse, which the Romain Ladies so kept, that seldome or neuer thei were sene openly talkyng with a man: which vertue, at thys day emõgest the Turkes, is hyghly estemed. The second, is pitie: whyche in a womans harte, abhorreth the spillyng of the bloud of a poore beaste, or a sely birde. The thirde, is womanly behauor, aduoyding the occasyon of euil iudgement, and causes of slaundre. If these qualities, be of necessitie, incident to a good woman, where was her shamefastnes, when she dayly and nyghtly, was conuersaunt with comen souldiours, and men of warre, emongest whom, is smal honestie, lesse vertue, and shamefastnesse, lest of al exercised or vsed: Where was her womanly pitie, when she takyng to her, the harte of a cruel beaste, slewe man, womanne, and chylde, where she myght haue the vpperhand: Where was her womãly behauor, when she cladde her self in a mannes clothinge, and was cõuersaunt wyth euery losell, geuynge occasyon to all men to iudge, and speake euyll of her, and her doynges. Then these thinges, beinge thus plainly true, all men must nedes confesse, that the cause ceasinge, the effect also ceaseth: so ꝙ, if these morall vertues lackynge, she was no good womã, then it must nedes, consequently folowe, that she was no saynct. xx

The properties that appertaine to a good womã.

Nowe leauynge thys woman, consumed to ashes, lette vs returne agayne, to the siege of Compeigne, whiche styll contynued. Durynge whyche tyme, the Regent sent to the duke of Burgoyne, lyynge at the siege, the Earle of Huntingdon, sir Jhon Robsert, wyth a thousande Archers, whyche dayly skirmished, wyth theim of the toune, and made such Bastiles and fortresses, that the toune must nedes be rendered or els they within, famished. But se the chaunce, whẽ victory was at hãd tidinges were brought to the duke of Burgoyn, that Phillip duke of Brabant, was departed oute of thys worlde, leuynge behynde hym, no heire of his bodie: To whom, the sayed duke pretẽded to be next heire. xxx Wherfore, he takyng wyth him, his best capitaynes, for the recouery of so great a duchy, departed from the siege, leuyng his poore people behynd hym, and ordeyned in hys place, for his luetenaunt, sir Jhon Luxenborough, whiche beyng, of small strength and lesse corage, after the dukes departyng, aduysed the Englyshmen, to depart for that tyme, til the next sommer: whiche therto at the first, would in no wise agree. But there was no remedy, for he was capitain generall, and had the ordynaunce vnder hys rule, so that wythout that, they could nothyng doo: Wherfore in greate displeasure, they returned into Normandy. After whose departure, the captain set fire in all the bastyles, and secretly departed, leuynge behynd hym, dyuerse peces of ordynaunce, for lacke of carriage. Wyth whych returne, ꝙ dukes of Bedford and Burgoin, were fore displeased: for yf he had continued hys siege, eyght dayes lenger, ꝙ toune had bene rendered, wythout dent of swerd. For pestilence & famyne, had almoste consumed al the souldiors, and left the toune, wythout sauegard or defence.

After this siege broken vp, Jhon Duke of Norfolke, toke agayne the tounes of Dãpmartyn, and the Chasse Wongay, and diuerse other tounes. And therle of Stafford, toke the toune of Brie, in Coũtie Robert, and from thence, forraged al the coũtrey to Sens, and after toke Quesnoy in Brye, Grand Puys, and Rampellon, with many prisoners as sir Jaques de Milly, and sir Jhon de la Hay. Duryng whyche time the Frenchmen toke Louiers & Villuense. And then the toune of Melune rebelled, and had such ayde, of other tounes adioyninge, that the x Englyshe souldyours, were fayne to leaue Melune, Moret, & Corbel. Thus accordynge to the chaunce of war, the one part gat, and ỹ other lost. Thus the Englyshe affaires (as you haue heard) within ỹ realme began to wauer, and waxe variable, whyche caused the Englishe capitaines, to be of diuerse opinions. For one part, beynge sory and pensiue adiudged the thynges present, lyght and of no moment, in comparyson of them whyche they saw likely to folowe: and another sort, adiudged that present tyme, to be mooste ieoperdus, and most repleted with perils. Because they sawe, the power of their enemies, now increased and their owne strength rather decayed, then cõserued. And so euery man xx studyng on this busyneste, aduised secretely with him self, what coũsail was best to be taken, and what way was best to be folowed, to remedy these thynges, thus wauering, in a doubtful balance. And then it was concluded, that it was moste apte and mete, for the tyme present, that kyng Henry in his royal person, with a newe army, should come doune into Fraunce, partly to comfort and visite hys own subiectes ther: partly, eyther by feare or fauour, (because a chylde, of hys age and beautie, doeth commonly allure to hym, the hartes of elder persones,) to cause the Frenchemen to contynue, in their due obeysaunce towarde hym. Wherfore, after a great hoste, conuenient for that purpose, assembled, xxx and mony for the maintenaũce of warre, redy gathered, and the realme sette in an ordre, and the Duke of Gloucester, appoynted gouernoure whych duryng the kynges absence, appeased diuerse riottes, and punyshed many offenders, the kyng wyth a great power, tooke shipping at Douer, and landed at Calice, and there taried a good space, and frõ thence he remoued to Roan, where with al triumphe, he was receiued and there soiorned, tyll the middest of August, hys nobles dayly consultyng, on their great busynes, and weyghty affaires.

The tenth pere.

xl In the moneth of Septembre, he remoued from Roan to Ponthoise, and so to sainct Denyce, to the intent to make hys entry, into the citie of Parris, and there to be sacred kyng of Fraunce, and to receyue, the sceptre and Croune of the realme and countrey.

There were in hys cõpany, of his owne nacyon, his vncle the Cardinall of Winchester, the Cardynall and Archebyshoppe of Yorke, the Dukes of Bedforde, Yorke, and Norffolke, the Earles of Warwycke, Salisbury, Oxford, Huntingdon, Ormond, Wortayn, Suffolke and of Gascoynes, the erle of Longuile, and Marche, beside manye noble men of England, Guian, and Normandy. And the chiefe of the French nacion, wer the dukes of Burgoyn, and Lewes of Luxenbrogh Cardinall and Chauncellor of Fraũce for kyng Henry, the Bishops of Beauoys and Reyon, both peres of France, beside the Byshop of Paris, and diuerse other bishoppes, therle of Vaudemount, & other noble mẽ whose names were very tedious to you to here rehersed. And he had x in a gard, aboute his person, thre thousand strõg archers, some on horsbacke and part on fote. And as he was commyng, betwene sainct Denice and Paris, he was mete at the Chapell, in the meane waye, by Sir Simon Morner prouost af Paris, wyth a greate company, al clothed in redde Satin, with blewe whoddes, which dyd to him, due reuerẽce and lowe obeysaunce. After whome, come diuerse ryche and notable burgesses, of the toune of Paris, al appareled in Crimosyne clothe. After they had done their reuerence, there approched to the kinge, the.ix. worthies, sittyng rychly on horsebacke, armed with the armes to them apperteignynge. Next after them, came the knight of the watch, for the xx prouost Marchauntes, and with him, al the officers of the court, appareled in blewe and hattes redde. And in a long space after, came maister Phillip de Moruillier, chiefe president of the Parliament, appareled in a robe of estate: and al the ocher presidentes of the Parliament, clothed in robes of Scarlet, and in like robes folowed the Lordes of the Chãber of accomptes, and of the finaunce, the Maisters of the Requestes, the secretaries and regestres, and euery company, as their course came saluted the kyng, with eloquent oracions, and heroicall verses, and so conueyed hym to the gate of saynct Denice, where the prouoste, of the Marchauntes, & the Shirifes of the toune, receyued hym with a Canapie of blewe veluet, rychly embraudred, wyth flower of delices gold, xxx and bare thesame ouer hym, through the toune, whiche on euery syde, was hanged wyth rych clothes of Arras and Tapistrie. And at euery porte and bridge where he pãssed was set a pageaunt, of greate shewe and smal coste, whyche because they were but tryfles, I ouer passe, and speke but of one deuyse, made before the gate of the Chastelet wherupon a stage stode a goodly chylde, clothed wyth habyt royall, set full of flower delices, hauyng two Crounes on hys hed, representyng ỹ yõge kyng, and on his ryght hande, stoode twoo noble personages, in the armes of Burgoyne and Flaunders, and on the lefte syde on hym, stoode xl thre personages, clothed in the Armes, of Bedforde, Salysbury, and Warwycke, whiche to hym delyuered, the swerde of Englãde. Thys pagiaunt was well regarded, & hyghly praised. From thence he departed, to the palace, & offered in the Chapell, and from thence he departed, to the hous of Tournelles, & there toke hys repast. And after dinner

Isabell, late wyfe to kyng Charles, hys grandfather, longe before disceased. And the next day he was cõueyed, to Boys de Vincẽnes, wher he reposed him self, til the. xv. day of Decẽbre: on which daye, he returned to the palayce of Paris. And on the. xvij. of the said moneth, he departed from the place, in greate triumphe, honorably accompanyed, to our Lady Church of Paris: where, with al solempnitie, he was anointed and crowned kyng of Fraunce, by the Cardinal of Winchester: (the bishop of Paris, not beyng content, that the Cardinal shoulde do suche a highe Ceremony, in his Churche and iurisdiccion.) At the offering, x he offred bread and wyne, as the custome of Fraunce is. When ỹ deuine seruice was finished, and all Ceremonies due, to that high estate were accõplished, the kyng departed towarde the palaice, hauing one croune on hys hed, and another borne before hym, and one scepter in hys hand & the second borne before hym. What should I speake of the honorable seruice, the daintie dishes, the pleasant conceiptes, the costly wines, the swete Armony, the Musycall instrumentes, which wer sene & shewed at that feast, sith all men may coniecture, that nothynge was omitted that myght be bought for golde, nor nothyng was forgotten, that by mannes wytte could be inuented. Yet this hygh and ioyous feast, was xx not wythout a spotte of displeasure, for the Cardinall of Whinchester, whyche at thys tyme, woulde haue no man to him egall, commaunded the duke of Bedforde, to leaue of the name of Regent, duryng the time that the kyng was in Fraunce: affyrmyng the chief ruler beyng in presence, ỹ authoritie of the substitute, was clerely derogate: accordyng to the cõmon saiyng: in the presence of the high power the final authoritie geueth place. The duke of Bedford, toke such a secret displeasur with thys doyng, that he neuer after fauoured the Cardinal, but repugned & disdayned at all thynges that he dyd or deuysed. And so because the xxx Cardynall would haue no temporall Lorde, eyther to hym superior, or wyth hym egall, he set furthe thys proude & arrogant conclusyon, tho-rowe which vnhappie deuision, the glory of thenglyshmen wythin the realme of Fraunce, began first to decaye, & vade awaye in Fraunce.

The next day after thys solempne feaste, were kepte tryumphãt iustes and Turneys, in the whych, the Erle of Arundell, and the Bastard of Sent Polle, by the iudgement of the Ladies, wã the pryce, and gat the honor. When he had kepte open hous to all comers, by the space of xx. dayes, because the ayre of Paris, was somewhat contrariant to his pure complexion, he was aduysed by his counsayll, to returne to Roã.
But before his departure, he caused al the nobilitie, ỹ presidentz of the xl parliament, the prouostes of the cyty, and of the Marchauntes, and the chief burgesses of the toune and cyty, and al the doctors of the vniuersitie, to be assembled in hys presence: to whõ the duke of Bedford sayde in this maner.

It is not vnknowen to you all my lordes, aswel spiritual as tempo-

An Oracion of the duke of Bedforde made to the Parisians.

led Gaule,and now in Fraunce,sith the tyme of Charles surnamed the Greate,beyng both Emperor of Rome,and kyng of this realme,hathe bene accompted, reputed and renoumed the moste chriſten region and fámous seigniory within the circle of al chriſtendō:yea, and within the whole part of Europe,and not vndeseruingly for thre causes. First,for your sincere fayth and obedient loue toward your sauiour & redemer Jesu Christ. The second, for obseruyng your fidelitie & due obeysaūce, to your kynges and soueraygne Lordes. Thirdly,for keping and performing your promyses and agrementes,aswell by worde as by wrytyng:from the whiche no Pagane,nor honest Christian, will or shoulde disagree. Thys famous renoume and immaculate honor,so longe contynewyng without reproche or blotte: I thinke, yea,and doubt not,but you will to the death kepe,defend and obserue, as your noble parentes and auncient progenitors,before you(to their ineffable prayse) haue vsed and accustomed. Wherfore, sith it is not vnknowen to all you, that the noble and vertuous prince, kyng Henry the fyfth,my most dearest and welbeloued brother,was the very true inheritor and the vndoubt full successor,to the croune of this realme of Frauuce, as cosin and heir to Lady Isabel, doughter and sole inheritrice,to the kynge Philip,the Faire. For the recouery of which right and title, what paine he tooke and what charge he was at, I wel knowe and some of you haue felte, as a great scourge to youre nacyon,onely prouided by God to afflycte and punyshe them:whych wyll wythhold & vsurpe, other mens rychtes,possessions,and inheritaunce. But God our sauiour and redemer, (whych wil not suffre his people,intendyng to conuert,to be dampned for euer,but gently calleth them to mercy and saluacion)of hys greate goodnes & gentlenes,willed the holy ghost to shed and poure into the hart of the noble prince, king Charles, your late welbeloued and most drad soueraigne lord,the knoweledge of the lawful line,and of the true pathe of the inheritaunce of the croune & scepter of this realme. Which verteous man, hauynge neyther an harte hardened in hys owne opinion,nor a mynd ambicious of Empire(as many tyrauntes, and couetouse princes, before this daye haue had, vsed and accustomed) for aduoydyng farther effusion of chriſten bloud, and for the saluacion of hys soule wythout battayl or stroke of weapō was contēt(vpon an honorable composicio) to restore the lawfull inheritaūce to the true heire and to rendre his title to the rycht lignage,& vndoubted lyne. Whych treatie and fynal composicion, was nether wātonly ouerloked,nor vnwysely ouersene. For al the noble peres of thys realme,both spiritual & temporall:yea,& the most part of the nobilitie(except a certayne wylde and wylfull persones)wyth the whole comminaltie(in whom the very base & burdē of the realme doth consist) not onely by worde, but by auncient wrytyng,signed with their hādes,and strēgthened wyth the seales of their armes,here redy to be shewed, haue frankely & frely wyth out scruple or cōtradiccion,agreed and affirmed thesame. By whyche compoſicion, (as the mirror and plain ſhew and token, of kyng Henries ryght) he was by the three eſtates, aſſigned, and allowed, as heire apparant to the ſaid kyng Charles, lately deceaſſed. But cruell death ſeperatyng his body from his ſoule, longe before the exhortacyon of hys people, ſuffered him not to poſſede and enioye the title and regalitie of this his due inheritaunce, and ſucceſſion royal. Yet, God willynge not the ſtocke, of ſo noble, ſo famous, and ſo vertuous a prince, to remayne bare yn wythout budde or flower, hath ſent to hym, and frō him to you a flouriſhing child, a goodly prince of bothe the noble houſes, of Englād, & Fraunce, indifferently diſcended: as who would ſaie, that by nature, he is neither perfect Engliſhe, nor perfect Frenche, but a man indifferent called an Engliſhe Frenchman, and a Frenche Engliſheman. Whyche noble prince, and your ſoueraigne Lorde, you may with glad hartes, and louinge countenaunces, ſe, hear and behold. And as for hys honorable behauor, & princely maieſtie: fewe princes of full & rype age, be to hym comparable or equipollent. As for his beautie and other giftes of nature, ſcace Abſalon can be to hym aſſembled. But, hauing reſpecte to the vertuous diſpoſicion, the Godlye mynde, and ſincere conſience, of ſo noble a childe and pryncely infant, I ſurely thinke, & perfectly beleue & that he is aboue all other, the blaſyng Starre, and the vnmatched Paragon. Thys precious ſtone and noble Iuell, is not onely come oute of his naturall countrey, and nouriſhyng region, to receyue the Crowne and poſſeſſion, of this realme and dominion, but alſo, (lyke a good ſhepherde) to vieue, ſe, and knowe you, as his wel beloued flocke, and moſte deſired ſubiectes: and you likewyſe, (as louing and obedient vaſſalles) to behold, and knowe your ſoueraygne lord and prince, to the intente that as you, aboue all other nacyons, aſwel Chriſten as Ethenycke, haue ſerued, loued and obeyed, your Rulers and Kynges before theſe daies: ſo, he now doubteth not, but to fynde you as louyng to hym, as y xxx Turtle to her make, as ſure to him, as the Adamant to the ſtele, and as permanent in thys obedience, as the hard mountayne of Olympe, which neither craft nor engine cā either conſume or remoue. And all miſtruſt of your ingratitude, is clerely baniſhed from his harte: conſyderynge, that he knoweth, that you dayly hear it preached, that you ſhoulde fear God, and honoure your kyng, and that he, which is in ſtubburneſſe and obſtinacie toward hys Prince, is diſobedient towarde God. For the Prynce in earthe is the Vycar of G O D, and hedde and ſheperde of Chriſtes flocke: to whō both ſpiritual perſones and temporall, be ſubiectes, and inferior in al cauſes of rule & gouernaunce. And althoughe xl ſome perſones within this realme, ſeduced more by phantaſtical error then obſtinate arrogancy, haue takē part, and entered into amitie with Charles de Valoys, vntruly callyng hym ſelf the French kyng: yet the very true and vndoubtful prynce, and our ſoueraygne Lorde, here beyng preſent, is reſolued and content, to remit and pardō their offences and crimes, ſo that they wythin twelfe dayes, returne to the true folde

and forsaked the infected flocke, and sedicious company. Wherfore his requeſt is at that tyme, this you, for the fidelitie, whiche you haue euer borne to hym, and for the loue, that he hath, and styl intendeth to beare to you, will vouchaſe hereafter, wythoute lettinge of time, diligently study, and buſely take payne, both to kepe his louing ſubiectes in good ordre and due obeyſaunce towarde hym, and alſo to ſe theim lyue in mutuall amitie and brotherly concorde, betwene theim ſelfes: not forgettyng, that the olde prouerbe, which ſayth: inward diſcord, bryngeth realmes to ruyne. Which honorable requeſtes, yf you accomplyſh and performe, (as of your bery boundē duty, you be bound in dede) you ſhal deſerue ſo much fauor, of your king and ſouereigne Lorde, that to all your honeſt requeſtes, hys eares ſhalbe open, and to al your reaſonable deſires, hys mouth ſhall not be ſtopped: & thus he wiſcheth you, health in bodies, increaſe in your ſubſtaunce, and to your ſoules, ioye and felicitie without ende perpetually.

When the duke had finiſhed and ended this oracion, the people beyng glad and reioyſyng at his ſayinges, cryed: lyue kynge Henry, lyue kyng Henry. After whiche crye paſſed, the noble men aſwell of Fraūce and Normandy, dyd to hym homage, and the common people, ſware to hym feaultie: to whome, (although he were a childe) he gaue bothe pleaſaunt and faire wordes, with hartie thankes, and many gratifications, to the great admiracion of the Frenche people.

After he had feaſted, the nobles and commons of Fraunce, wythin the citie of Paris, he with a great company, departed from thence, and by ſmall iourneyes came to Roan, wher he celebrated wyth greate ſolempnitie, the highe feaſt of Chriſtmas. Whyle theſe noble Ceremonies wer thus in doyng, in the citie of Paris, ſondery chaūces, diuerſly happened in ſeueral places, to the diſpleaſure of the one part, & to the gain of the other. For Sir Fraunces Surrien Arragnoys, a noble captayn in Normandy, toke by force and pollicy, the toune of Mountarges, wt a great prey of treaſure and priſoners, and therein he put a garriſon and vitayled the toune, to the greate diſpleaſure of the French kynge. Aboute theſame ſeaſon, the Earle of Arundell, beynge truly informed, that the Lorde Bouſac, Marſhall of Fraunce, was come to Beauoys, intendyng to do ſome feate in Normādy, aſſembled the nomber of thre and twentye hundred men, and layed him ſelfe priuelye, in a cloſe place, not farre from theſayd toune, and ſent a great nombre of lyght horſſemen, to ronne to the barriers of the citie. The Frenchmen like valiāt men of warre, iſſued out, and manfully fought with the Engliſhemen: whiche ſodainly towarde the ſtale. The Frenchmen, corragiouſly followed, thinking the game gotten on their ſyde: but when they wer entered, into the ſtrayght, therle ſet freſhly on them, ſo that after long fightyng, there wer ſlayn and taken, in maner al the Frenchmen, ſaue a few whych fled into the toune, wyth the Marſhal. Emōgeſt the capitaines was found pryſoners, the valiaunt captayn, called Pointon of Sanctrayles trailes, (which without delay,) was exchaunged for the lorde Talbot, before taken prisoner, at the battaill of Patay. There was also taken one, called the shepherd, a simple man, & a sely soule, whom, the Frenchmen reputed, to be of suche a holinesse, that if he touched the walle of a toune, of their enemies, that incontinent, it would fall to the grounde, & ouerturne, Such false phantasticall fainers, were at that tyme much regarded, and no lesse beleued in Fraunce.

This chaunce succeded not, fortunaly alone: for Richarde Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke, had a great skirmishe, before the toune of x Gourney, where he discomfited & repulsed his enemies, and beside the carions, whiche wer left dedde on the ground, he tooke prisoners, three score horssemen, all gentlemen of name and armes. Like chaunce of infortune, happened at the same tyme, to Renate or Reyne duke of Barr, a greate frend to Charles the French kyng, bothe, in lendyng hym money, and also in ministeryng to hym aide and succors. This Duke bearyng displeasure, to Anthony Erle of Vaudemont, his cosyn and kynsman, gathered together a greate armie, and besieged the toune Vaudemont. Therle, before the dukes approchyng, to thentent ỹ he would not be encloled and compassed about by his enemies within a wall, lea-xx uyng behynde hym, a conuenient crue of men of warre, to defende the toune for a tyme, with all deligence rode to ỹ dukes of Bedford & Burgoyne, beyng then at the greate triumphe at Paris, whose part he had euer taken. After longe consultacion, it was agreed that sir Jhon Fastolffe, should go with hym, hauynge in his companye sixe hundred Archers, and the duke of Burgoyne sent to hym, his Marchall, called sir Anthony Doulongō, with. xv. hundred men. The earle of Vaudemont thus beyng accompanied, marched toward his enemies. Duke Reine, hearyng of his commyng towarde him, was somewhat dismayed, featyng, least yf his enemies shoulde approche to the walles, and be espied xxx by the garrison within the toune, that, at one tyme he should be assailed before, by them that would issue out of the toune, and behind, by therle and his armye. Wherefore, like a hardy capitain, he brake vp hys siege, and met face to face, with therle and his company: betwene whom, was a cruell and a mortall battaill. The horsemen indured longe, but in conclusion, the Englishe Archers, so galled the horses and so wounded the men, that the Barroys, and their frendes, wer cōpelled to flie: in which chace was taken, the saied duke of Barr, the bishop of Myes, the Lorde of Rodemaque, sir Euerard of Saleabery, the Vicount Darcy, & two hundred other, beside three thousande men, whiche were slaine. In this xl lucky tyme also, no lesse occasion of victory, was offred to the Englishemen, beyng in another parte, yf, when the pigge had been profered, thei had opened the poke: for Robert, Lorde Willoughby, and Mathewe Gough a valiaunt Welsheman, with. xv. hundred Englishemen, layed siege to a toune in Aniow, beyng bothe by situacion, and pollicie, verye strong, and defensible, called sainct Seueryne. The Englishmen, assailed it not so corragiously, but they within, with egall audacitie, boldelye made defence: so that fortune semed, to waie bothe the parties in egall balance. Charles the French kyng, beyng thereof aduertised, sent with all spede, the lorde Ambrose de Lore, with many noble and baliaũt personages, to aide and releue his frendes, inclosed in the toune by hys enemies. This lorde de Lore, beyng capitain of the toune, made muche haste to comfort his deputie and capitain within thesame, and so marched forward with greate spied: but fearyng to be sodainlye compassed aboute, he taried styll at Beaumont, lokyng for the armye and capitaynes, that should folow, and then altogether to set on their enemies, and so to reyse the siege. Whiles he there made his abode, and toke his leysure, the Englishmen, by their especialles, were assertened and aduertised, what progresse their enemies made, & what they intẽded. Wherefore, they pollitiquely prouided, to fight with the one parte, before the whole puyssaunce wer ioyned. And so a greate parte of them, departed secretly in the night, toward their enemies, and found the watch so out of order, & ouersene, that a thousande men wer entered into the campe before thei were espied. But the slaiyng of men, and cuttynge doune of tentes, awaked the capitaines, whom this sodain feare, and vnlooked chaunce, so greately abashed, that no man in maner, either coulde heare his felow or hymself, or could make signe to expulse and driue out their enemies out of their campe. But when the day beganne to appere, and the sunne had setfurth his bright beames, that all thynge might be sene and perceiued, the Englishemen, geuen to couetuousnes of spoyle, and desire of Rauyne, neither chaced, nor folowed their enemies, but beyng content with their prey and gayne, began to retraite toward the siege again. But se the chaunce: the Frenchmen which wer commynge after, heard by the noyce of the people, that some fraie was then in hande, put the spurres to the horse, & set on their enemies, beyng laded with bagges and wallettes, of preys and spoiles. The other part, which before fled, returned again, and assailed their enemies. The Frenchmẽ egerly assailed, and the Englishemen manfullye defended, whyche beynge out of order, wer compelled to flie, of whom, Mattew Gough and diuerse other wer taken prisoners, and yet of the other parte, many were slain, and a great nombre taken, emõgest whom, was the lord of Lore, which for all the battaile, was kept and not deliuered.

The lord Willoughby, hearyng of this chaunce, reysed the siege and departed, verie sore displeased. Therfore, let euery capitain take good hede of victorie, the whiche as she is harde to obtain, so she is quicke to flie awaie: for it is dailye sene, that he, whych thynketh suerlye, that the hath her in his handes, before he can catche her, is deceiued, & ronneth into a great losse and daũger: and on the other side, when she is gotten, (except good watche be hourely kept) she will steale awaie, with muche hurte and detriment, to the first gainer. Thus the Englishmen, for the gredy appetite of gain, lost the triumphaunt victorie, whiche they had in their handes. While the Englishe and Frenche nacions, thus stroue and contended, for preeminence, principalitie, yea, & for the superior power of life, by the vnreasonable rage of warre in Fraunce, the rich men were spoyled of their goodes, the spirituall persones, were taxed and brought low, the commō people wer slain, murdred, and trode vnder ỹ foote, women wer defiled, virgins wer rauished, tounes wer destroied and wasted, tounedwellers and citezens, wer robbed and exiled, beautiful buyldynges, wer cruelly brent, nothyng was spared, by the cruelties of Mars: whyche by fire, bloude, or famyne, might be catched or destroied, beside a hūdred more calamities, that daily vexed and troubled the miserable French nacion. Although Fraūce, wer at this tyme, thus miserably afflicted: yet Englande, was not without doloure & trouble: for daily Englishemen, aswell noble as meane personages, were slaine taken, wounded, or hurte, their substaunce was cōtinually exacted, and cōsumed for maintenaunce of the warres, so that mischief and calamitie was indifferent to bothe the nacions, and quyetnes and gayne, were expulsed & banished from them both: in so muche that the lamentacion and dolor of both the coūtreis, wer heard through the whole west part of the worlde, and of their continuall discencion, al Europe and Affrike, had their eares and mouthes full, so that all men, not onely marueled, that Fraūce could so muche trouble so long time sustain, but more wondered, that the realme of Englande, beynge but an Ile, was able to to scourge, plague and trouble, the large Frenche region, for whiche cause Eugnye the fourth, beyng bishop of Rome, intendyng to bringe thys cruel warre, to a frendely peace, sent his Legat, called Nicolas, Cardinall of the holy crosse, into Fraunce, to thentent to make an amitie, and a concorde betwene the two Princes & their realmes. This wise Cardinall came first to the Frenche kynge, and after to the duke of Bedford beyng at Paris: exhortyng concord, and persuadyng vnitie, for wynge, declaryng, and arguyng, peace to be moste honorable, and more profitable to Christian princes, then mortall warre, or vncharitable discencion. Which gouernors of Christes people, ought to haue an ye, to the profite of their people, to se Justice duly ministred, to rule thēselfes by reason and not by wil, and to abstain frō malice, and abhorre all wronge and iniury, to whiche thynges, warre is euer enemie & cleane cōtrary.

When the Legate had thus persuaded the princes on euery parte, bothe, gently aunswered, that they wer contēt to come, to a reasonable ende. But when the firste communicacion was moued, and by cōmissioners treated, their dooynges wer so farre disagreable, from their worldes, that not onely reasonable & honest condicyons of peace, coulde be neither heard nor accepted, but more frowardnes, pertinacie, & malice was kindeled and sprong in their stomackes, then before that time had been sene. The Cardinall beyng in vtter dispaire, of cōcludyng a peace betwene the two realmes, (least he should seme to departe empty of all thynges, for the which he had taken so muche trauayll) desired a truce for sixe yeres to come, which requeſt, as it was to him, by bothe parties hardly graunted, so was it of the Frenchmen, sone and lightly broken, after his returne: For the Bastarde of Orleaunce, newly made Erle of Dumoys, tooke by treason the toune of Charters, from the Englishemen: affirmyng by the lawe of armes, that stealynge or biyng a toune, without inuasion, or assaute, was no breach of league, amitie, nor truce. In the whiche toune, he slewe the bishop, because he was a Burgonyõ, through which occasion, newe malice increased, and mortall warre began again, to rise and spryng.

Whyle these thynges wer doynge in Fraunce, Henry Beauffordeꝑ Cardinall of Wincheſter, was sailed agayn into Englande, to appeace and represse certain diuisions and commocions, spronge vp, by mischeuous and pernicious persones, within the realme, which vnder the colour of a newe secte of religion: coniured together, to disquiet & vexe, ẏ whole quietnes of the realme. But after that Williã Maundeuile and Jhon Sharp wer taken, and executed by the gouernor and the kynges Justices, the remnaunt yelded, & confessed their offences: wherof two articles wer these, as some men write: that priestes should haue no possessions, and that all thynges, by the ordre of Charitie, emongest Christen people, shoulde be in common. After this seditious coniuracion, by ꝑ diligent enquirie, was thus quẽched out, the Cardinall began to commen with the duke of Gloucester, concernyng the affaires and busines of Fraunce: and suspecting that the truce would not long continue betwene bothe ẏ realmes, (as it did not in dede) diuised, how to send more aide, and men to the Duke of Bedforde, and gathered vp more money, and treasure, for the further maintenaũce of the warres, and resistence of their enemies. Wherupon the Duke of Gloucester, called a Parliament, in the whiche, money was assigned, and men wer appointed. Duryng whiche Parliament, James the kyng of Scottes, sent Ambassadors, to conclude a peace, with the duke of Gloucester, which, (because ꝑ the kyng was absente) referred ẏ matter to the. iij. estates. After longe consultacion, (not without greate argumentes) a peace was graunted and concluded, which all men iudged, longe to continue, because kynge James, was then vexed, with ciuil warre and intestine discencion, and also the Frenchemen had taken truce, (as you haue hard) for. vj. yeres.

When the Parliament was finished, the Cardinall well garnished with men and money, departed out of Englande, and came to Roan to the kyng, to whom also resorted from Paris, Jhon Duke of Bedford, to debate and consult of thynges, not vnlikely to happen and chaunce. Wherfore, a greate counsail was celebrate, within the Castle of Roan, ꝑ and many doubtes wer moued, & fewe waighty thynges out of hande concluded. Some imagined, that their enemies, would not longe kepe promise, nor yet obserue the trude, by them solemply graunted: cõsideryng, that the Frenche hartes brente, & their iyes were bery sore, to se the riche Duchie of Normandye, the faire citie of Paris, and the pleasaunt saunt Isle of Fraunce, to be brought and reduced, vnder the obeysaūce and subieccion, of thenglish nacion. Wherfore, thei woulde not omit, or ouerse one thyng, that soūded to defence, least the Frenchmen sodainly, (not keping their promes, & brekyng the truce,) might cause thenglishmen to be in greate & perilous ieoperdy, not knowyng what coūsaill to take, nor sodainly to prouide a remedy for a mischief, bothe for lacke of men and substaunce. Other wer of opinion, that nombres of men, could not long be maintained and kepte together, without breache of truce, and violatyng of peace: knowyng that the handes of men, be properly x geuen to spoyle, and euer redy to gain, and moste especially, when they be daily redy in harneis, prone and quicke to set on their enemies. And therfore, thei would the walled tounes, to be well manned & defended, and the rest of the army, to be sent into England again, there to remain and tary, till the tyme of the truce wer expired and ouer passed.

After this disputacion, with many argumentes ended, the dukes of Bedford and Yorke, and Edmond late erle of Mortayn, and now by the death of Jhon duke of Somerset, (which died without heire male, leauing behind hym, a sole doughter called Margaret, after, countesse of Richemōd) erected to the name and title, of duke of Samerset, liked xx and approued, the first argument, & first moued reason: affirmyng best, that warre muste be prouided for, and that money out to be disbursed, and to aduoyde all doubtes, that a greater army, was necessarye to be gathered together and assembled. When al thynges wer agreed, kyng Henry departed to Calice, and from thence to Douer, and so by easye iorneis he came the.xxj. daie of Februare, to the citie of London, where he was receiued, not onely with greate pompe and triumphe, but also highly presented with giftes and money, as in the Chronicle of Robert Fabian, you maie rede at large, whiche thyng I ouer passe.

After that the kynge, was departed into Englande the Duke of xxx Bedford, Regent of Fraunce, and capitain of Calice, taried behynde in the Marches of Picardy: where he was informed, that certain souldiors of Calice, grudgyng at the restraint of wolles, beganne to mutter and murmure against the kynge and his counsaill, so that the toune of Calice, was like to stand in ieoperdy. Wherfore the duke, forseynge the mischief that might insue, & thinkyng it wisedom, to withstand the first mocion, caused the chieftaynes of this faccion, to be apprehended, and after due examinacion had, diuerse were put to death, and many banished & exiled the Marches for euer. After that he had purged ỹ toune of that vngracious and sedicious company, and had furnished it, wyth xl new souldiors & discrete mē of war, he was determined, first to repaire again to Paris, but his harte would not serue hym: for sith his departure, Lady Anne his wife and Duchies, was departed to God, and honorably enterred in the Celestyns at Paris: by whose death, and for other causes, (as partely you haue hard) the sure loue, and approued fidelitie, betwene the duke of Burgoyn, his brother in lawe & hym, began to waxe fainte and colde. For whiche cause, he, beyng persuaded by the lorde Lewes of Luxenborough, bishoppe of Tyrwine and Ely, and Chauncellor of Fraunce for kynge Henry, agreed to marye the Ladye Jaquet, doughter to Peter, Erle of sainct Paule, and niece to the saied bishop, and to lorde Jhon of Luxenborough: to the intent, that by this newe affinitie, the olde acquaintaunce and familiaritie, whyche he had with that noble familie of Luxēborough, shoulde be reneued and inforced, and with a more surer knot, knit and confirmed. Wherupon, he departed from Calice to Tirwyne, where, he was highly receiued of the Erle of sainct Paule, and of his brethren, and there he maried, the faire and freashe Ladye Jaquet, of the age of. xvij. yeres, wyth all triumphe and nupciall solempnitie. After whiche Ceremony ended, he returned with his newe spouse to Calice, and so into Englande, where, he wyth his wife remained, vntill August next, and then returned again to Paris. The duke of Burgoyne, (whose mynde began to incline, a litle and litle, toward kyng Charles) was sore greued and angry, that the duke of Bedforde, was ioyned in affinitie, with the noble and famous hous of Luxēborough: by the whiche he sawe, that the power of the Englishmen, should be greatly aduaunced. But the mariage was fully ended, and he coulde finde no remedy. xx

The.xi. yere

WHyle these thynges were doynge thus, in other places the Frenche souldiors lackynge wages, (and emongest theim, a great nombre, whiche in hope of prey, and desire of spoile, had caste vp the plough, and left their labor,) began priuely, (as tyme serued, and occasion gaue place) to take bothe Englishmen & Burgonyons, and raunsomed and spoyled theim, at their pleasure. And although, they were prohibited thus to do, (duryng the time of truce and peace) yet inconclusion, xxx they spared not openly to robbe, spoyle, & burne: yea, & to steale tounes, whyche they affirmed to be no breache of truce. The Englishmen, pricked and vexed, with these open wronges, and manifest iniuries, prepared for warre, after the sixe moneth, that the truce was taken and concluded. And by this meanes, the war was renued and begonne again. The vntrue Frenchemen, breakers of peace, and not kepers of truce, reysed a crewe of men, and sodainlye tooke the toune of sainct Valerie, standyng in Normandy, on the Riuer of Somme: and another armye, vnder the conduict of sir Ambrose, lorde of Loze, wasted and destroyed all the countrey aboute Caen. The Duke of Bedford, not myndyng to rl lye styll in ydlenesse, sent the Erle of Arundell, the Erle of Warwickes sonne the Lorde Lisle, Adame Marshall of Fraunce, for kynge Henry, and. xij. C. men, with ordinaunce and municions, to besiege the toune of Laigny, vpon the Riuer of Marne. Whiche Earle, with the shot of a Canon, brake the arche of the bridge, & gat from the Frenchymen, their bulwarke,

bulwarke,and set it on fire. Diuerse assautes were attempted, but the toune was well defended:for within,were shut vp, eight hundred men of armes,beside other meane souldiors.

The duke of Bedford,beynge therof aduertised,gathered an armye of sixe thousande men of warre,whereof wer capitaines,Robert,Lord Willoughby,sir Audrewe Ogard, Chamberlein to the duke, sir Jhon Saluaine,Baylife of Roan,sir Jhon Montgomerie. Bailife of Caux, sir Phillip Hall, Baylife of Vernoyle, sir Richard Ratclife, deputie of Calice,sir Raufe Neuell, sir Raufe Standishe,sir Jhon Hanforde,sir x Richard Euthin,sir Richard Harrington, Balife of Eureux, sir Wyl-liam Faulthorpe,sir Thomas Griffyne of Irelande,Dauy Halle, Thomas Stranguish,Leonard Ormestõ,Esquiers,and Thomas Gerard, whiche solde the toune of Mounstreau Faultyou, to the Frenchemen: and with all thynges necessarye, came to the siege before Laigny. He, there,made a bridge of boates,and brought his ordinaunce so nere the toune,that to all people,it semed not longe able to resist.But the Earle of Dumoys Bastard of Orleaunce, with diuerse hardy capitaines,as valiauntly repulsed, as the Englishemen assauted. Thys siege contynued, as fire against flame, and sometyme flame against fire. For al-xx though the Englishemen slewe more nombre,yet they gat neither prey nor boty:and although the Frenchemen, kept valeauntly the walles, and defended the loupes,yet they loste bothe men and capitaines, and wer long secluded from their aide and succors, till Charles the French kyng,perceiuing this toune, to be the thre corner key,betwene the territories of the Englishemen,the Burgonyons,and his awne, and that the losse therof,should turne hym to innumerable damages, and incredible hurtes,sent the lorde of Rieux,Poyton,the Heire,the lorde Gancort,and sixe thousand men,with great plentie of vitailes, to thentent, either to reise the siege,or to vitaile the toune. The French capitaines, xxx made a bragge,as though they would fight with thenglishemen,within their felde and Campe. The Englishemen would not issue out, but kept themselfes in good ordre,euer lokyng for their entrie and inuasiõ. The Regent perceiuyng,that thei approched not,sente to theim an herault of Armes,declaryng his intent, and the corage of his companye, whiche nothyng more desired,then battaill. And to shewe hymself as a capitain,meanyng that, which he offred,& not dissimulyng that, which he spake:he incontinent,deuided hys men into three battailes,no more wisely ordered,thẽ pollitiquely gouerned:as who would saie, come on Frencheman,yf thy harte will serue.But his aduersaries, more craftie xl then hardy,more pollitique then coragious,framed themselfes in such ordre of battailes, as thei wer able to do all thyng, and yet inconcluliõ, (concernyng marciall feates) they did nothyng. For, while thei made a proude bragge, and a stoute skirmishe with the Englishemen,they appoynted diuerse rude and rusticall persones,to conueye into the toune, xxx.oxen & other small vitaill,but this swete gain, was sowerly payed foꝛ,if the losse with the gayn, be pondered in one balaunce:foꝛ hauynge les,bꝛother to Pothon,the baleaunt capitain Jhon,bꝛother to the loꝛd Gawcoꝛt,and fiftie other noble and baleaunt personages,beside other common people,whiche bought that bargayne, aboue the pꝛice of the common Markette. The Frenchemeu,perceiuynge their infoꝛtunate chaunce,and not only consyderyng,the vnspeakeable heate, which then weried their people,beyng in the beginnyng,of the hote moneth of August:but also,perceiuyng the Englishemen, to be planted and settled,in a place vnable to be wonne,and in a grounde, bothe daungerous to in- x uade,and hard to assaile, like men desperate of gain, and without hope of victoꝛy,departed to Foꝛt vnder Yerre,where,by a bꝛidge of tunnes, they passed into the Isle of Fraunce. The Duke of Bedfoꝛde, (lyke a wise pꝛince)not myndyng to lease the moꝛe foꝛ the lesse,noꝛ the accident foꝛ the substaunce,fearyng that Paris and other tounes,moꝛe necessary to thenglishemen,and of moꝛe estimacion, would returne to hys ad-uersaries,thynkyng yf the greater power were holden,the lesse should be sone obtained,reysed his siege,and returned to Paris,nothyng lesse myndyng,then to trie his querell with dent of sweard,against his enemies:and so sent Bedfoꝛd his herault,to the loꝛde Gawcoꝛt, and other xx chieftaines of his army,offeryng hym battaill,and a pitched feld, within a conuenient grounde, where so euer he woulde, wythin the Isle of Fraunce,assigne oꝛ appoynt. To the whiche officer of Armes, the capitaines aunswered,that battaill thei feared not,noꝛ the Englishe puyssaunce,thei not muche regarded,but they saied:that tyme was to gain, and tyme was to lose,of the whiche twoo,thei doubted not to espie the one,either to their greate gain,oꝛ to their apparaunt losse. Wherupon thei sent the loꝛde Ambꝛose de Loꝛe, with.viij.C.hoꝛsemen, to robbe & xxx spoyle the pooꝛe people,commyng to the faier, on the day of sainct Mi-chaell the Archangell,kepte in the suburbes of the toune of Caen. But whē Dauy Halle Esquier,capitain of the toune, foꝛ the duke of Yoꝛke, issued out to fight with hym,he departed by flight, wythout any either botie oꝛ gain of the faier. The Frenchmen perceiuyng,that neither power,foꝛce,noꝛ pollicie,coulde auaile against the Englishe nacion,determined to trippe and deceiue them,by their accustomed seruaunt,called master Treason,and so by money,coꝛrupted Piers Audebeuffe, Constable of the castle of Roan,that the Marshall of Fraunce, and the loꝛde Fountaynes,with twoo hundꝛed persones disguised, entered into the Castle,but thei wer sone espied,and dꝛiuen to the dongeon, where thei wer takē and yelded:wheꝛof some wer hanged,some hedded,and some xl raunsomed at the pleasure of the Regent:and suche ende had the traytoꝛs,whiche would by treason, rather then by battaill, obtained their pꝛey and desired purpose.

This pageaunt plaied, the Regent sent Peter of Luxenboꝛoughe Erle of sainct Paule,and Robert,loꝛde Willoughby, with a competent

crue of men, to besige the toune of Sainct Ualerie, whiche the Frenche men alitle before had taken. These valeaunt capitaines, not myndyng to slepe their busines, enuironed the toune with a strong siege. Within the toune, wer sir Lewes de Uancort, sir Phillippe de la Toure, and sir Reignold de Uersailles, capitaines, with three hundred good fightyng men, which by the space of.iij.wekes. manfully defended the same. But at the.xxi.daie. their perceiuyng the fiersenes of thenglishemen, and the weakenes of themselfes, (hauyng no hope of relief, nor confidence in any aide) rendered the toune, their horsse and harneis onely saued. The x Erle put, in the garrison of the toune, freasshe and valeaunt souldiors, and appoynted capitain there, sir Jhon Awbemond: in whiche toune sodainly, (whether it wer by infeccio of the ayre, or by corrupt vitaill by long lying, whiche the tounes men dyd eate,) a great pestilence sprang, in the infortunate coūtrey. Whiche, after so many calamities and euill chaunces, beyng twoo tymes besieged by the Frenchemen, and thyse recouered by thenglishe nacion, was now infected and corrupted, with the pestilent plague: whereby twoo partes of the people, within shorte space, wer destroyed and consumed.

After thys toune gotten, the Earle of sainct Paule, and the Lorde xi Willoughby, returned to the Regent, where, they wer well welcomed. And after, the said Erle departed from Paris, to laie siege to the Castle of Monchas, but beyng encamped, nere to the toune of Blangy, he, by a sodain maladie, finished his daies, and departed the worlde, leauynge his seigniories, to Lewes his sonne and heire. For whiche dedde Erle, wer solempne obsequies kepte, bothe in Paris and in London, because he was father in lawe to the Regent. In the meane season, the Frenchmen entered into the costes of high Burgoyne, and brent, toke, and destroyed tounes: for whiche cause, the Burgonyons beyng sore displeased, assembled a greate army, bothe to reuenge their querels, and also xii to recouer again the tounes, from theim iniustely taken: to whom, (as to his frendes) the duke of Bedford, sent Robert Lorde Willoughby, and sir Thomas Kiriel, with a conuenient company of souldiors, which enteryng into the laundes of Laonoys, wer encountred wyth a great nōbre of their enemies: but by whose force, (after long fight) the Frenchmen wer slain and dispersed: wherof wer left dedde in the feld, an hundred & sixtie horsemen, beside prisoners, whiche after in a fury, were all killed and put to destruccion.

xl WHyle these chaunces thus happened in Fraunce, Jhon lorde Talbot, gathered together, a crue of chosen men of warre in Englande, to the nombre of.viij.C. and sayled into Normandy, and passed by Roan toward Paris, and in his way, he toke the stronge Castle of Joing, betwene Beauoys and Gisors, and caused all the Frenchymen within, to be hanged on the walles, les,and after, raised and defaced the Castle, and came to the Duke of Bedford,to Paris. The presence of whiche renoumed capitain,(a maruelous thyng it is to se) so incoraged the hartes of the Englishe nacion, that thei thought, nothyng able to resist their puyssaunce, and so discoraged the hartes of the Frenchemen,that thei wer in doubt,whether it wer better to fight,or to flie. And this was not without a cause:for surely,he was a chosen capitain,& in marciall feates, a man fullye instructed,and his corage and practise in warre, was fearfull to the Frenche nacion,and to his awne countremen,an especiall hope & a sure defence. When this hardy Baron,had commoned with the Regent,and agreed & what waie he should take, without long delay or prolongyng of tyme, he departed from Paris with his army,and besieged the Castle of Beaumont vpō Oise,wherof was capitain, Sir Amadour de Vignolles, brother to the Heire. Whyche castle was sone rendered,vpon condiciō. After that, he regained without longe siege,the tounes of Creile, the bridge of sainct Maxens,the new toune in Esmoy, Crespy in Valoys, and Cleremoūt in Beauoys: and so with greate riches,and fatte prisoners,he returned again to Paris. Thus, prosperous successe happened,not to the lorde Talbot alone:but also thesame very season, therle of Arundell,toke the Castle of Bomelyne,and rased it to the ground, & and after,tooke by force the Castle of Doyle, and from thence came to sainct Seleryne,where the lord Ambrose of Lore,was capitain,which issued out,and fought with the Englishemen so egerly at the firste,that he droue them backe an arowe shot by fine force. But the Earle so incoraged his men,that they toke newe corages to them, and set so fiercly on the Frenchemen,that they slewe a greate nombre, & droue the remnaunt into the toune.

After thys victorye,he besieged Louiers,wherof was capitain, the Heire,and his brother,which rendered the toune,without stroke or assaute. For all this good lucke,therle forgat not to returne,to the toune & of S. Seleryne,but assembled a great army, and enuironed the toune about with a strong siege. Whē he had lien there almoste.iij.monethes euery daie attemptyng or dooyng somewhat, for the performaunce of his enterprise,in conclusion at the thre monethes ende,he gaue so fierce an assaut,that by force he entred the toune,and slewe Jhon Allemagne and Gulliam sent Aubyne, the chief capitaines,and.viij.C.other men of warre,and the Childzen of the lord Lore, wer taken captiues:he replenished and fortified the toune again with newe men, and municios, and made there capitain,sir Jhon Cornwale. Whiche acte thus accomplished,he departed,and came before the stronge toune of Sillye, and & there pitched his campe. The inhabitauntes of thesame,somewhat dismaied with the chaunce,that late happened to the toune of.S.Seleryne,deliuered to him pledges,vpon this cōdicion: that if thei wer not rescued,within.xxx.daies nexte insuyng, then they, (their lifes saued) shoulde rendre the toune, into his possession: whiche offre was taken.

The

The capitaines within the toune, sent a post to the French kyng, to aduertise hym of their hard chaunce, which incontinent sent to them, Arthur, erle of Richemond, (but after some writers, Jhon duke of Alaunson) with a greate company of men. When therle sawe the Frenche succors appere, he restored again ỹ pledges to the gouernors of the toune, and issued out of hys campe, takyng a place moste mete and conuenient for to abide battaill, for whiche he sore thirsted and longed. The Duke or the Erle, (take which you list) lyng by a brooke side, whyche a man might stride ouer, seyng the Englishemen, so warlike and strongly embattailed, thought it not for hys profite, to geue battaill, or to sette forward: but in the dedde time of the night, cowardly fled, and with shame returned: although some Frēch writers affirme, that he loked that the erle of Arundell, shoulde haue geuen hym battayll, and because he profered not forward, therfore the Frenchmē departed. This appereth to be an apparaunt lye, and a Frenche bragge: for yf they came to rescewe the toune, why dyd not they geue battayl, & so driue away thenglishmē from the toune: If they came to fight, why departed they without any stroke striken: But it semeth that thei came, to make a French face, and for to do nothyng. For thei, without skirmishe or succorynge the toune departed in the night secretely, (as you haue heard.) Whē thei within the toune knew, that their succors failed, thei rendred them selfes, to ỹ mercy of therle of Arundel, which gently receiued thē, & leauyng a garrison in the toune, departed to Maunς, and in the meane waie, toke the Castles, of Mellay and sainct Laurēce. About this tyme, the lord Willoughby, and sir Thomas Kiriell, returnynge with great victories out of the parties of Burgoyne, tooke in their waye, the toune of Louiers, and furnished it, bothe with men, and municions.

Emongest so manye good chaunces, some euill are accustomed to fall and happen, or els the gayners, will not knowe themselfes. So it happened, that a greate nombre, of rude and rustical persones in Normādy, dwellyng by ỹ sea coast, either prouoked, or intised therunto, by the Frenche kyng, or desirous of alteracion & chaunge, (whiche thyng the commen people muche couete and desire) made an insurrection, & put on harneis, & by force expulsed certain garrisons, out of their houldes, and toke certain tounes: publishyng and proclaimyng openly, that their onely purpose and intent was, to expell and banish, the whole Englishe nacion, out of their coūtreys and coastes. Wherfore, it maye euidently appere, that the blacke Ethyopian, or the blacke coloured rauē, will soner turne their colours, than the vniuersal people, bred in fraūce will hartely loue, or inwardly fauor, an Englishe borne child. And yet, the Normans of long tyme, louyngly and gentely, haue obeyed to the subiection of Englande, and haue of the Englishe nacion, been well accepted and regarded, but now thei, forgettyng their duetie, and remēbryng their hurtes, did not doubt, to rebell against their prince and soueraigne Lorde.

This

This mischeuous cõpany, thus frantiquely gathred together, with all spede marched toward Caen, to the intent there, bothe to assemble a greater nombre of people, and also to consult, what way thei should follow in their newe begon attẽptate. But the dukes of Yorke & Somerset, which then wer lyng in Normandy, hearynge of this vngracious faccion & troubelous cõmocion, & hauyng knowledge by their espiales what iorney they intẽded to take: incõtinent without delay, sent, therle of Arundell, and the lorde Willoghby, with. vj. M. archers, and. xiij. hundred light horsses, to staie and kepe them, either for settyng furthe, or makyng farther progresse. Therle of Arundell goyng one waye, appoynted the Lorde Willoughby, with twoo thousande Archers, and a certain nombre of horsemen, to go afore hym, to lye in watche and stale, secretly by the waye, to stop the iorney and passage of the rebelles, whẽ they should approch. The lorde Willoughby, couertly couered hymself and his company, sendyng worde to the Erle, of the place where he lay, to thentent that he might make a signe and a token, (when tyme should be most luckey and fortunate,) to inuade & set on their enemies. Which thynge doen, the erle folowed at the backe, the ragged route and mischeuous multitude, as a man, that draue the deare before hym into the buckestalle, or the sely coneis into the secrete hay. When the ignorant multitude, approched ner to the place of the stale, the Earle made a token, and shot a gonne for a signe. Then the Lorde Willoughby, set on them before, and the Erle behynde, shotyng so fiercly, that the dastarde people, partly, amased with the sodain chaunce, and partlye, galled and wounded with the shot of the arrowes, threwe awaye their harneis: desiryng nothing but death. Therle of Arundel, (moued with compassion) caused his souldiors to leaue of & staye, from farther murther or bloud sheding, & apprehendynge such, as he thought, to be the ledars & chief stirres of the people, let the other returne home frankly and freely: but yet there were a. M. and more slain, before the souldiors, could be brought again vnder their standerdes.

After this commocion appeased, and the sodain rage in the begynnynge staied and brideled, diligent inquirie was made of the malefactors, and suche as wer found gilty, by diuerse terrible executions, (accordyng to their desertes,) miserably ended their traiterous lifes. During which rebellion, Peter Rokefort and his cõpanye, gat by treason the toune of Deape, & diuerse other houldes, therunto adioynyng. After the Erle of Arundell, had obtained so manye conquestes, and notable victories (as you haue heard) he attẽpted an other, whiche was the last worke and extreme labor, of his liuyng daies. For the duke of Bedford, beyng informed, that his aduersaries, had sodainly surprised and takẽ the toune of Rue, and therin had put a garrison, which sore vexed the coũtreis of Ponthiew, Arthoys, and Bolenoys, sent word to therle that he, without delaye, should besiege thesaid toune. Therle obeyed to his cõmaundement, and incontinent, sente for all the people vnder his gouer-gouernaunce, and in his marching forward, came to Gourney, where he heard tel, how that there was a certain Castle, nere Beauois, called Gerborye, whiche either by force of ralyng, or violency of weather, was sore decaied and defaced. And because this place was opportune and very necessarie, to prohibite, let and stop Thenglishmen, to make sodain runnynges in, or rodes into the countrey of Beauoys: Charles the Frenche kyng commaunded Sir Stephen de Veignolles, commonly called the Heire, to se the castle reedefied and fortified. The saied sir Stephen with a great company, came to the grounde, and lackyng neither stuffe necessary, nor artificers sufficient, in small tyme erected the Castle, and began to defende the fortresse. The Erle of Arundell, beyng credibile informed of their dooynges, and perceyuyng that this newe edification, was very preiudiciall to the Englishe part, determined first to take the Castle, supposyng litle or no resistence, therein to be shutte vp, but he was deceiued, for there was the Heire, with many good and valeaunte capitaines. The Erle with fiue hundred horsemen, encamped him selfe in a litle close, not farre from the Castle: The Frenchemen, which were thre thousand men, perceiuing that the Erle and his horses were wery, and that his archars were not yet come, determined for their aduauntage to set on him, before the comming of his footmen, whiche they knewe to be litle more, then a mile behynde the Erle. Wherfore, for a policie, they set furthe fiftie horsemen, as though they were no mo in the Castle. The Erle perceauing that, sent furth Sir Randolfe Standishe, to encountre with them, hauing in his company a hundred horses: The Frenchemen fought corageously a while, and sodainly came out all the remnaunte, and slewe sir Randolfe Standishe, and all his company, and boldly set on the Erle and his bande, whiche manfully defended them, so that the Frenchemen gat litle aduauntage, for al their great nombre. The Heire perceiuing the hartes, corrage and defence of this Englysh people, caused thre Culuerynes to be shot emongest theim, whereof, one strake the Erle on the ancle, and so brake his legge, that for pane he fell from hys horsse, then the Frenche men entered emongest the Englyshe army, and tooke the Erle being on the grounde, prysoner, and sir Rychard Wooduile, and sixe score more, and there were slain almoost two C. The remnaunt saued them selfes aswell as they might. The Erle was caried to Beauoys, whereof this hurte he shortly died, and was buried in the friers Minors. He was a man of a singuler vertue, constancie and grauitie, whose death in so troubelous a worlde, did sore appall the hartes of his nacion. By this infortune, Rue was not besieged, nor Gerborie taken, suche is the chaunce of warre, thus Lady Fortune daily turneth her whiele, and mightie Mars, often varieth his countenaunce, so that one tyme the Englyshemen gat by assaut and yeldyng, dyuerse strong tounes, Castles, and pyles. At another season, the Frenche people, somtyme by bargain, somtyme by assaut, obteined thesaied cyties and fortifications againe, or other in their stede. Whiche dayly attemptes, Iomit mit and other passe, because in them, no notable acte, nor great warlyke feate was doen or committed. For small thynges, require litle wrytyng, and fewe actes, require lesse speakyng. For I assure you, that he, whiche should write the negligent losses, and the politique gaynes, of euery cyte, fortresse, and turrett, whiche were gotten and loste in these dates, should fatigate and wery the reader, more with volumes, then queares and the hearer, more with trifling woordes, then with notable matter. Wherfore, sithe in all myne authors, I fynde no matter, either greatly necessarie, or muche conuenient to be spoken of, concernyng any hygh enterpryse: I therfore, leauyng both the nacions, dayly studiyng how to greue, and gain of the other, will turne again to other thynges accidentall whiche chaunced in this .xrii. yere.

ABOVT the moneth of June, Jhon duke of Burbon and Auerne, taken prysoner at the battaill of Agyncourte .xviii. yeres paste, (as you before haue heard) now paiyng his raunsome, whiche was .xviii. M. l. sterlyng, and hauyng ready prepared all thinges necessary, for his triumphaunt returne into his countrey, was taken with a mooste sore and greuous feuer, whiche shortely vnbodied his soule, in the cytie of London, on the daye appointed, for his departure into Fraunce: whose corps was enterred, in the Grey Friers of the saied cytie. So by thys, euery creature maye se that man purposeth & God disposeth. I may not forget a chaunce whiche happened this yere, to the examples of princes, and a spectakle of gouernours. For the deuill hymself, to set farther diuision betwene the Englishe and Frenche nacion did apparell certain catchepoules, and Parasites, cõmonly called titiuils and tale tellers, to sowe discord and dissencion, betwene the dukes of Bedforde and Burgoyne, not faining trifles nor phãtasies, but thinges of reproche, repugnaunte to bothe their honors, estates, and dignities, with the whiche, eache of them was as well pricked, as hastely spurred, so that all loue, betwene theim ceased, all affinitie was forgotten, and all olde familiaritie was cast by disdayn, into the caue of oblituion. Suche a pestilent breath hath Flattery, and suche mischiefe ensueth, of Princes light credence. This grudge was perceiued, by their mutuall frendes, whiche by charitable exhortacion and Godly aduertisement, exhorted theim, to renewe their old loue and familiaritie, and to mete and enterview, in some place decent and conuenient. The Duke of Bedforde, gladly condiscended, to come to sent Diners, beyng the duke of Burgoyns Toune, and thyther, accordyng to hys appoyntment, he in honorable estate, came and resorted, and likwyse dyd the duke of Burgoyne. The duke of Bedford, beyng Regent of Fraunce, & sonne, brother, and vncle to kynges, though it that the duke of Burgoyne, shoulde first haue visited and saluted hym: duke Philip on the other parte, beyng Lorde & souereigne of the toune, iudged it not mete, nor to stande with his honour, to go to hym, where he was lodged, but was content, by entreatie of frendes, to mete with hym in a place indifferent, betwene bothe their harbero wes: Whiche offer was not accepted, & so, bothe parties departed discontent, & neuer after sawe or commoned with other. What should I speake of the courage of these two proud prynces, the duke of Bedford minding to haue no pere, and the duke of Burgoyne, willing to haue no superior, by whose proud disdain, and enuious discord, shortly England lost, and Burgoyne gayned not long, as you shall perceiue, in this history ensuyng.

THe Bastard of Orleaunce, called the erle of Dumoys, the lorde Rochefort Marshal of Fraunce, with other, in the beginnyng of this. xiii. yere, tooke the toune of sancte Denise by treason, and skirmished with theim of Paris, and leauyng behynd hym a greate garryson, tooke the toune of Howdone, and the bridge of saincte Warence by composicion, and at that tyme was taken the toune, of Pount Weulane, by sodayn scaling of twoo fyshermen: whiche entered vp at a common priuie, standing on the walle. Thus tounes vnwalled, were preys to rauenous men of war, so that the poore inhabitauntes within theim, (not beyng able to kepe their fidelitie or allegeaunce, when shielde and defence lacked,) were constrained and compelled, to yelde and rendre theimselfes, to the more power, and vpper hande: Least they being nedy and innocente people, should be vexed and turmented, with the vnreasonable men of warre: So that in all Christendome, no Region was more vnquiete, more vexed, more poore, nor more to be pitied, then the countrey of Fraunce. And although the rude and poore people, suffered many plagues and aduersities: yet the souldiours, prospered not in all thynges. For although prey and spoyle sometyme refreshed their mindes, and did comfort their stomakes, yet sometime they were slain, taken, and licked vp, or thei were ware. For euery pryncе studied and circumspectely compassed, how to kepe, defende and releue, the cyties and tounes, of their seuerall faccion, and priuate fidelitie. Wherefore, when sacietie of slaughters, and abundaunce of murthers, had replenished the stomakes, of bothe the nacions, and that bothe in generall, perceiued their hurtes,, pondered their losses, and considered their ruynes, and dayly afflictions: Although their stomakes were haute, and their hartes stony, yet they waxed lofte, priuely inclyning to peace, and wyshyng concorde, and not without an vrgente cause: For all thynges necessary to mans lyuyng, penurie shewed her selfe furth, and aboundaunce was hidden in a caue. The corne fieldes laye vntilled, the meddowes were ouer troden, the woodes were spoyled, so that all men went to harneis, and no man to the plough. The churches were seldome vsed for deuocion, but many tymes spoyled, for desyre of gayne. These, and suche innumerable mischiefes, caused bothe the people, beyng enemies to desire peace, and yet the one part, disdained openly to offre it, or the other priuatly to receiue it.

THE erle and noyes of this perillous and insaciable warre, was blasted throughout Europe, detested throughout Christendome, and especially, at the Counsayll of Basill, where then themperor Alberte, and all the Princes and potestates of Christendome, or their deputies, were assembled, for the vnion of the vngracious scisme, in the vsurped sea of Rome vntruly, and against all scripture, called sainct Peters sea. Wherefore the Emperor and the temporall princes, supposyng the exhortacion of Spirituall fathers, shoulde more profyte emongest the twoo hygh stomacked, and proude encoraged nacions, of Englande and of Fraunce, desyred Eugeny then bysshop of Rome, to be the author and arbitrer, of that great stryfe and contencion: So that by his meanes, counsaill and exhortacion, the weapon myght be taken out of the handes of two so inuincible nacions, whiche neuer would yelde or bowe, the one to the other, neyther yet, once heare of abstinence of fyghtyng, or refusyng from warre: So much were their hartes hardened, and so princely were their stomackes. And one thyng, muche put them in hope, of some good conclusion, because the duke of Burgoyn was wyllyng, (so that it were not of his awne suite,) to returne and reconcile himselfe, to Charles, his mortall enemie and auncient aduersary. Wherfore, by authoritie of this generall Counsaill, two discrete persones, called the Cardinalles of sainct Crosse, & Cypres, came to the toune of Arras in Arthois, whether, were sente for the kyng of Englande, Henry Beauffort, Cardinall of Wynchester, Henry Archebyshop of yorke, William de la Pole Erle of Suffolke, and Jhon Hollander Erle of Huntingdon, with diuerse other knightes and Esquiers: And for the French kyng, were there present, Charles Duke of Burbon, Lewes Erle of Vandosme, Arthur of Bretayne, Constable of Fraunce, the Archebyshop of Reyns, and sir Philip Hartort. There was the duke of Burgoyne, in proper persone, accompanied with the duke of Gelders, and the Erles of Estampes, Lygnye, sainct Paule, Vaudemont, Neuers, and Daniell, sonne to the prince of Orange, with a great galaunt company.

VPON the date of the first session, the Cardinall of sainct Crosse, declared to the thre parties, the innumerable mischiefes, the multitude of inconueniencies, whiche had succeded, throughout al Christendom, by their daily discord and continuall discencion: exhorting and requiring them, for the honor of God, for the loue that they bare to the settyng furthe of Christes religion, and for the aduauncement, of the publique wealth of all Christendom, that they would laye al rancor apart, represse al wrath and anger, and conforme themselfes to reason, and to Godly concorde, by the whiche, they should receaue, honor, profite, and continuall quietnesse, in the worlde, and of God, a reward euerlasting. After whiche admonicion, thus to them geuen, and after diuerse daies of communication, euery part brought in their demaunde, whiche were most contrary, and harde to come to a good conclusion. The Englishemen required, that kyng Charles shoulde haue nothyng, but at the hande of the kyng of Englande, and that not as duetie, but as a benefite, by hym of his

mere liberalitie geuen, and distributed, to whiche the Frenchemen aun-swered, that kyng Charles would haue the kyngdome, frankely & frely, without begging it of another man: requyryng the kyng of Englande, to leaue the name, Armes, and title of the kyng of Fraunce, and to be content with the dukedoms of Aquitain and Normandy, and to forsake Paris, and all the tounes, whiche they possessed in Fraunce, betwene the Riuers of Loyre and Somme, beyng no percell of the Duchie of Normandy. The Englyshemen, loth to lease so good a boty as Paris, did not esteme and allowe, the demaundes of the Frenche Ambassadors x and they on the otherside, couetyng and desyryng, to obteine againe the renoume and glory of their Region, whiche was Paris, woulde in no wise condiscende, to any part of the Englishe requestes. Thus, the pryde of the one part, and the ambicion of the other, letted concorde, peace, and quietnes. The Cardinals, seyng the frostie hartes and hardened myndes of bothe parties, determined nat, to dyspute the titles, but offered to them, honest and reasonable condicions, of truce and peace, for a season: whiche articles bothe parties, either for frowardnes, or for disdaine openly refused: In so muche as, the Englishmen in great displeasure, departed to Calice, and so into England. One writer affirmeth, that they xx beyng warned of a secrete conspiracie moued against them, sodainly remoued from Arras, and so sayled into their countrey.

VVHILES this treatie of peace, was thus in communication at Arras, the Lorde Talbot, the Lorde Willoughby, the lorde Scales, with the Lorde Lisle Adame, and fiue thousande men, besieged the toune of S. Denise, with a stronge bande. The Erle of Dunoys hearyng ther-of, accompanied with the Lorde Lohac, and the Lorde Bucill, & a great company of horsemen, haisted thitherwarde, to rayse the siege, and in the meane waie, they encountered with sir Thomas Kiriell, and Matthew Gough, rydyng also toward. S. Denise, betwene whom, was a great xxx conflict, and many slayn on both parties: But sodainly came to the aide of the Frenchemen, the garrison of Pount Melance, which caused thenglishemen to returne, without any great harme or damage, sauyng that Matthew Gough, by founderyng of his horsse, was taken and caried to Pount Melance. Duryng whiche fight, the toune of sainct Denise, was rendered to the lorde Talbot, and the other lordes, whiche caused al the walles to be rased; and abated doune to the ground, sauyng the walles of the Abbay, and a Toure called Uenyn. After this toune gotten, the Lorde Willoughby, left Sir Jhon Ruppelley at Pounthoyse, and departed to gouerne Paris, whiche then began to smoke, and sone after, xl brast out in flame, (as you shall shortly, apparauntly perceiue). After whose departure, thenhabitauntes of Pounthoyse rebelled, & droue out thenglishemen by very force, and rendered themselfes subiectes to kyng Charles. This toune was small, but the losse was great, for it was the very conuenient kaye, betwene Paris and Normandy, so that nowe the gate betwene them bothe, was set open and the passage at large.

LET vs now againg, returne to the counsaill at Arras. After the Englishe Ambassadours were departed, the Frenchemen & the Burgonyons began familiarly to commō of a peace, and talke of an amitie, to the whiche mocion, Philip duke of Burgoyne, was neither deffe noz straūge: For he in the beginning of his rule, being muche desyrous to reuēge and punishe the shamefull murder doen to his father, and to kepe hym selfe in his high estate, and preminence, began to be associate, and to reigne with thenglishe power, and to serue the kyng of England thinking that by his amitie and ioyning, that he should neither harme noz hurte, the common wealth of the countrey, whereof at that tyme he bare the whole rule, noz yet lose one iote oz poynt, of his authoritie, oz gouernaūce. But when it happened, contrary to his expectacion, that the kyng of Englande, by the right course of inheritaunce, toke vpon hym the whole rule and gouernaunce, within the realme of Fraunce, and ouered by the aduise of his counsayll, all causes, iudgementes, warres, and concordes, and that the duke iudged that he was not had in greate confidence, noz in perfite truste, as he thought, because the Duke of Bedforde, would not suffre the toune of Orleaunce, to be rendered to hym (as you before haue hearde): He therfoze ymagined, and determined with hym selfe, to returne into the pathe agayne, from the whiche he had straied and erred, and to take part, and ioyne with his awne bloud and nacion: So that some honest meane, might be sought by other, and not by hym selfe, least peraduenture by hys awne sekyng, he myght bynde hymselfe in condicions hurtfull, and soze inconueniences, to the Frenche kyng, and also be noted of vntruth and traiterous behauoz, toward the kyng of Englande and his nacion: To whom he had done homage, leage, and swozne fealte. Now this Counsayll, was foz hym a cloke foz the rayne, as who should say, that he sought not amitie, of the Frenche kyng, (whiche thyng in his harte, he moste coueted and desired) but was therunto persuaded, by the generall counsaill, and by the byshop of Rome, whom it was reason, in all honest requestes, that he should submitte hymselfe, and humbly obey. And so, shadowed with this counsayll, without long argument oz prolongyng of tyme, he tooke a determinate peace, and a finall conclusion, vpon these condicions: that he should haue to hym deliuered, the counteis of Arthoys, Pontiew, and Bullonoys, and the tounes of Amience, Corby, Mondidier, Peron, sainct Quintyne, and Abbeuile, with many other seigniozies, and superiozities, which be not foz my purpose to reherse. Prouided alwaie, that the Frenche kyng, paiyng in redy money, to the duke oz his heires, four C. M. crounes, should haue the said tounes and countreys, to be redeliuered again: And many other thynges, the Frenche kyng graunted, to the duke of Burgoyne, whiche after, he was not able to perfozme, noz accomplishe, foz he had no power, to make denial to the duke, of any demaunde oz request, which the Duke either phantasied oz moued: as who would saie, that he thought in hymselfe, that suche an aduersary, whiche desired so honest, and so reasonable sonable condicions, (consideryng the state of the tyme, and the occasion of concorde, moste apparauntly offered to hym,) ought neither to be refused nor cast away, the whiche chaunce, was to hym luckey and fortunate: for surely, the thing forsene and loked for, succeded and toke place, as you shall perceiue. This concorde, was so pleasaunt to the Frenche king, that he, not only sent for hym: but as a swanne that swimmeth after her make, met hym in proper persone, at the cytie of Reynes, and (after long cõmunication) standing vp vpõ his fete, said to him these wordes.

The oracion of the French kyng to the duke of Burgoyne.

DVKE Philip, coisyn, and pere of Fraunce, with all my harte welx come, and of your comming, my harte is fulfylled with ioy, and my spyrites be refreshed with solace, for now, all doubte of the recouery, of my lande and seignory, is clerely banysshed, and fully abandoned: consyderyng that I haue nowe, ioyned and vnited to me, the principall pere, the moste noble prince, (nexte to the Croune) and the mooste valeaunt captain, that hath bene, or is, in our dates, sene, or knowen, whome the nobilitie honor, the chiualry fauor, and the pooze commons loue, and dayly desyre to beholde: So that all men loue, and embrace you, aboue al creatures, and worshyp and reuerence you, aboue all Lordes, because you, beyng a straiyng shepe, are nowe returned, to your olde flocke, and lyke xa man wanderyng out of the pathe, are nowe brought agayne, to the right waye, and true limite. For surely, this text was euer beaten muche in my hedde: That euery realme, deuided emong theimselfe, shoulde turne to desolacion, and that all discord, should bring pouertie, and that of all dissencion, should succede mysery: whiche intollerable calamities, I euer iudged to ensue, by the discorde and controuersie, betwene vs twoo. But nowe the sore is cured, and the ship brought into the sure hauen: Trustyng perfectly, and nothing mistrustyng, but by your helpe and aide, we shall expell, cleane pull vp by the rootes, and put out, all the Englyshe nacion, out of our realmes, territories, and dominions. xxAnd if you helpe vs, (as you maie) and if you ayde vs, (as you be able) we here promise you, in the worde of a prince, to be yours, yea, so yours, that all ours, shalbe yours, at your commaundement and desire, not as ours, but as yours, to doo and spende at your pleasure. To the whiche, the duke of Burgoyne aunswered, that he would let scape nothyng, that appertayned to his duetie, nor forget any poynt, whiche myght turne to his dishonour.

VVHEN this league was sworne, and this knot was knit, the duke of Burgoyne, to sette a vayle, before the kyng of Englandes yes, sent Thoison Dor, his kyng at Armes, to kyng Henry with letters: That xxi he, beyng not only waxed faint, and wering, with contynuall warre, and dayly conflictes, but also chaked dayly, with complaintes and lamentacion, of his people, whiche, of the Frenchemen, suffered losse and detriment, embrayding and rebukyng hym openly, affirming, that he onely was the supporter and mainteyner, of the Englyshe people, and that by his meanes and power, the mortall warre was continued and sette forward, and that he more diligently studied, and intentiuely toke pain, bothe to kepe, and maintein thenglyshemen in Fraunce, and also to aduaunce and promote their desires, & intentes, rather then to restore kyng Charles his cosyn, to his rightfull inheritaunce, & paternall possession: by reason of whiche thinges, and many other, he was in maner compelled and constrained, to take a peace, and conclude an amitie with kyng Charles, exhortyng kyng Henry, with many flatterying woordes, when honest and reasonable condicions were offered, to take them, and to make an ende of the warre, which so long had cõtinued, to the decay of both the realmes, and to the effusion of Christen bloud, beside the greate displeasure of almightie God, whiche is the aucthor of peace & vnitie: promising hym his aide, and furtheraunce in that behalfe, with many glosyng and flatterying worde, whiche I passe ouer.

HERE is to be noted, that the Duke of Burgoyne, whiche thought hymselfe by this concord, in maner dishonored, and spotted with infamy sente his letters to the kyng of Englande, rather to purge and excuse hymselfe, of his vntruthe and infidelitie, (yea of periury, if a poore man maie vse that terme, of so greate a prynce) to thentent that it should appere, that he by compulsion, and not by voluntarie affection, was turned to the Frenche part: Not for any malice or displeasure, whiche he bare to kyng Henry, or to the Englishe nacion. This letter was not a litle lokked on, nor smally regarded of the kyng of England, and his sage counsaill: not onely for the waightines of the matter, but also for the sodain chaunge of the man, & for the straunge superscripcion of the letter, which was: To the high and mightie prince, Henry, by the grace of GOD Kyng of Englande, his vvelbeloued cosyn: Neyther naming hym kyng of Fraunce, nor his soueraigne lorde, accordyng as, (euer before that tyme) he was accustomed to do. Wherfore all they, whiche were present, beyng sore moued with the craftie deede, and vntrue demeanor of the duke, (whome they so muche trusted) could neyther temper their passions, nor moderate their yre, nor yet bridle their toungues: But openly called hym traytor deceyuer, and moofte inconstant prince. But when the tumor of the Dukes returning, was publyshed emongest the common people, they lefte woordes and went to stripes: For they beyng moued and pricked, with this vnhappie tidynges, ran fiercly vpon all the Flemynges, Hollanders, and Burgonyons, which then inhabited within the cytie of London, and the suburbes of thesame, and slewe and hurte, a greate nombre of them, before they, by the kynges proclamacion, could be prohibited, to leaue of and abstaine, from suche violence, and iniurious doyng: For the kyng nothyng more mynded, then to saue innocent bloud, and defende them, whiche had not offended.

AFTER the letter twise redde, and wisely brooked, he willed the officer at Armes, to tell his master, that it was not conuenient, nor honourable for hym, to be enemie to the Englyshe nacion, without cause or occasion geuen, but his duetie, (all thynges consydered) was to haue kept kept his auncient truthe and olde allegeaunce, rather then to be the occasion, of newe warre and freasshe discencion: Aduertisyng hym farther, that it was not the point of a wiseman, to leaue and let passe, the certain for the uncertain, admonyshyng hym also, not to myngle and myxte hys safetie and sureneſſe, with the vnstableneſſe and vnsuretie of his newe alye, and cosyn kyng Charles. When the messenger was departed, the kyng of England and his counsayll, thought and determyned, to worke some displeasure to the Duke, and to set some conspiracie, agaynst hym in his awne countrey. Wherfore by rewardes, they did suborne and corrupt certain gouernours and rulers, of tounes & cities, within the Dukes countreis and dominions, (which nacions surely, be euer prone & ready to commocion and rebellion.) But the Gantois, whiche of that feate euer beare the bel, and were the common rylers, against their soueraigne lordes, some of theim ymagening, that the power of the Englishmen, was not long like to continue, within the realme of Fraunce, more for feare, then loue of their Duke, sat styll and moued not, but let other tounes alone, which sore troubled the Dukes wittes, and a great while, did disquiet and vexe his senses.

xl THIS yere the. xiiii. daye of September, died Jhon Duke of Bedford, Regent of Fraunce, a man, as politique in peace, as hardy in warre and yet no more hardy in warre, then mercifull when he had victory, whose bodye was, with great funerall solempnitie, buried in the Cathedrall churche of our Lady, in Roan, on the Northside of the high aulter, vnder a sumptuous and costly monument: Whiche tombe and sepulture, when kyng Lewes the. xi. sonne to this kyng Charles, whiche recouered agayn Normandy, dyd well aduise and beholde, certayne noble men in his company, hauing more youthe then discrecion, and more enuie in their hartes, then consideracions of their parentes, counsayled hym to deface and plucke doune the tombe, and to cast the deede carcasse xxx into the fieldes: Affirming, that it was a greate dishonour, bothe to the kyng & to the realme, to se the enemies of his fathers, and theirs, to haue so solempne and riche memorial. Kyng Lewes aunswered again, saiyng: what honour shall it be to vs, or to you, to breake this monument, and to pull out of the grounde and take vp, the deed bones of hym, whom in his lyfe, neither my father, nor your progenitors, with all their power, puyssaunce, and frendes, were once able, to make flie one fote backward, but by his strength, wytte, and pollycie, kepte theim all out of the principal dominions, of the realme of Fraunce, and out of this noble and famous duchie of Normandy: Wherfore I saie, first, God haue his soule, xl and let this body nowe lye in reste, whiche, when he was a lyue, woulde haue disquieted, the proudest of vs all: And as for the tombe, I assure you, is not so decent, nor conuenient for hym, as his honoure and Actes deserued, although it were muche richer, and more beautyfull.

After

The.xiiij.yere

After the death of this noble pzince, a valeaũt capitain, the bzight sunne, that commonly shone in Fraunce fayre and beautifully vpon the Englyshemen, began to be cloudie, and dayly to waxe darker: Foz the Frenchmen seing the chiefe capitain taken away, began not only to refuse their obedience, & lotaltie, which they had swozne, and pzomised to the kyng of Englande, but takyng swearde in hande, rebelled, and persecute , and openly defied the Englishemen, yet all these myschaunces, not one poynt abated, the valeaunt cozages of the Englishe people: Foz they nothing mistrustyng God, noz good Foztune, set vp a newe sayle, and began the warre newe agyn, and appoynted foz regent in Fraunce, Rychard duke of Yozke, sonne to Richard erle of Cambzidge. Although the duke of Yozke, bothe foz birthe and cozage, was wozthy of this honoz and pzeferment, yet he was so disdained of Edmond duke of Somerset, beyng cosyn to the kyng, that he was pzomoted to so high an office, (which he in verie dede, gaped and loked foz) that by alwayes and meanes possible, he bothe hindered and detracted hym, glad of his losse, and sozy of his well doyng, causyng hym to lynger in Englande, without dispatche, tyll Paris and the floute of Fraunce, were gotten of the Frenche kyng. The Duke of Yozke, perceiuing his euell wyll, openly dissimuled that, which he inwardly thought pzively, eche wozkyng thynges, to the others displeasure. This cancard malice, and pestiferous diuision, so long continued, in the hartes of these twoo Pzynces, tyll moztall warre consumed theim bothe, and all moste all their lynes and offspzynges, as within few yeres you shall perceyue and se.

THE Nozmans of the countrey of Caux, beyng somewhat hartened, by the death of the duke of Bedfozde, began a newe rebellion, and slewe diuerse Englishemen, and robbed many pzety tounes, which were of kyng Henries faccion & parte, & toke the toune of Harflew by assaute, and diuerse other tounes. The lozde Talbot beyng aduertised, of thys rebellion, sent foz the Lozde Scales, syz Thomas Kirtell, and the Lozde Hoo, whiche afflicted and plagued the people of Caux, that they slew aboue fyue thousand persones, and bzent all the tounes, and billages in the countrey, not beyng walled, so that in that parte, was neyther habytacion noz tillage, foz all the people fled into Bzitayne, and all the beastes of the coũtrey, were bzought to Cawdebec, where a good shepe was sould foz an Englishe peny, and a kowe foz. xxii. pence. Daily was skirmishyng & fightyng in euery parte, in so muche that the Lozde Scales with foure hundzed Englishemen, discomfited at the Rye besyde Roan, the Heire and fiftene hundzed valeaunt Frenchemen, and syz Rychарde Reignold de Fountayne, syz Aleyne Gerond, Aleyne de Monsay, and Greffrey Grame capitain of Scottes, and thze hundzed, and mo were taken pzisoners, besyde seuen fayze and plesaũt coursers. But this victorie staied not the hartes of the Frenche nacion, foz their myndes were so so full of treason, and their malice so greate against the Englyshemen, that many tounes turned, to the part of kyng Charles, without cõquest or desire, and diuerse were sould for couetousnes, and many were deliuered by treason, as Depe, Boys de Vyncennes, and other.

HERE is one especiall pointe to be noted, that either the disdayne emongest the chiefe peres of the realme of England (as you haue heard) or the negligence of the kynges counsaill (whiche dyd not with quicke sight forese and preuent thynges for to come) was the losse of the whole dominion of Fraunce, betwene the ryuers of Somme and Marne, and x in especiall of the noble cytie of Paris. For where before tymes there were sent ouer, for the aide & tuicion of the tounes, and cyties, brought vnder the obeysaunce, of the Englyshe nacion, thousandes of men, apte and mete for the warre, and defence: Nowe were sent into Fraunce, hundredes, yea scores, some rascall, and some not able to drawe a bowe, or cary a byll. For the lorde Willoughby, and the Byshop of Tyrwyne, whiche had the gouernaunce, of the greate and large cytie of Paris, had in their company, not two thousande Englishemen. Whyche weakenes kyng Charles well perceiued. Wherfore he appoynted Arthur of Bytayne, the Erle of Dumoys Bastarde of Orleaunce, the Lordes de xx la Roche, and Lisle Adam, and other valiaunt capitaines, aswell Burgonyons as Frenche, to go before Paris, trusting by the fauor of certaine cytezens, with whome he had greate intelligence, and knewe thenglyshemennes power and doynges, shortely to be lorde of the cytie and toune, without any greate losse or battayll. So these capitaines came before the cytie of Paris, but perceiuing, that all thynges succeded not, accordyng to their expectation, returned to Mount Marter, and the next daie, sodainly set on the toune of sanct Denise, where, the Englyshmen manfully defended theim selfes, but being oppressed with so greate a multitude, they were compelled to flie into the Abbaye, and into the xxx Toure of Venyn, for succor and refuge: in whiche conflict two hundred Englyshemen were slayne, and the rest, vpon a reasonable composicion, rendred the toune, and departed to Paris.

THOMAS Lorde beaumond, whiche of late was come to Paris with eight hundred men, issued out of Paris, with sixe hundred souldiors, onely intendyng to see, and viewe the doynges and nombre of the Frenche armye, but he was sodainly espied, and compassed aboute: So, that within a small space, he was discomfited and taken, and with hym foure score prisoners, beside two hundred which were slain in the fielde, and the remnaunt chased to the very gates of the cytie. The Parisians xl and in especiall the Master of the Halles, and some of the Vniuersitie, and Michaell Lailler, and many notable burgesses of the toune, (whiche euer with an Englyshe countenaunce, couered a Frenche harte) perceyuing the weakenes of the Englyshemen, and the force and strengthe of the Frenchemen, signifiyng to the Frenche capitaines, their myndes and intentes, willed them to come with all diligence, to receiue so ryche a prey a prey to theim, without any difficultie, offred and geuen. The Constable delaiyng no tyme, came with his power, and lodged by the Charterhous: And the lorde Lylle Adame, approching the walles, shewed to the cytezens a charter, sealed with the greate seale of kynge Charles, by the whiche he had pardoned them their offences; and graunted to them all the olde lyberties and auncient priuileges, so they would hereafter be to hym, obedient, true, and seruisable. Whiche thyng to theim declared, they ranne about the toune, crying: Sainct Denise, liue kyng Charles. The Englishemen perceauing this, determined to kepe the gate of S. Denise. but they were deceaued, for the cheynes were drawen in euery streate, and women and children cast doune stones, and scaldyng water on the Englyshemennes heddes, and the citezens persecuted them, from streate to streate, and from lane to lane, and slewe and hurt, diuerse and many of theym. The Byshop of Tyrwyne, Chauncellor there for kyng Henry, and the lord Willoughby, and syr Simon Morier, toke great paine, to appeace the people, and represse their furie: but when they saw, that all auayled not, they withdrue them selfes, to the Bastyll of sainct Anthony, whiche fortresse, they had well vitailed and furnyshed, with men and municions.

VVHILES this rumor was in the toune, therle of Dumois and other scaled the walles, and some passed the Riuer by boates, and opened the gate of sainct James, at the whiche the Constable with his banner displaied entered, at whose entrie, the Parisians were very glad, and made great ioye. The byshop and the lord Willoughby, with their smal cõpany, defended their fortresse, tenne dayes, lokyng for aide, but when they sawe that no comforte appered, they yelded their fortresse, so that they & theirs, with certaine baggage, might peaceably returne to Roan, whiche desire was to them graunted. Then as they departed, the Parisians rayled, mocked, and taunted the Englishemen, with the moste spitefull wordes, and shamefull termes, that could be inuented or deuysed: so that al men maie apparauntly perceiue, ỹ their hartes neuer thought as their toungues vttered. For notwithstanding their obeysaunce and fidelitie, sworne to kyng Henry, and nothyng regarding the fynall composicion, to the which they had sette their common seale, when they sawe the Englyshemen at the weakest, they turned the leafe and sang another long: Declaryng to all men their inconstaunt hartes, their wauering mindes, & vntrue demeanor. Thus was the citie of Paris brought agayne into the possession of the French kyng, whiche, there, altered officers, and ordeined lawes, at his pleasure, for the surety and safegarde of hym, his realme, and people.

AFTER this glorious gain, the Frenche kyng besieged the toune of Crayle, vpon Oyse, whereof sir William Chãberlayn, was capitain. whiche with fiue hundred Englishemen, issued out of the toune, and after long fight, discomfited his enemies, and slewe twoo hundred, and toke a greate nombre prysoners: The remnaunt not lykyng their market,departed to Champeigne,and other tounes adioynyng. Durynge whiche season xij. Burgeles of the towne of Gysors,solde it for money to Poyton of Xantrayles, but he had not the Castle deliuered, Wherfore with all his power,he besieged thesame, whereof the Lorde Talbot beyng aduertised,sent for the lorde Scales, and thei bothe with .xviii. hundred men,rescued the Castle,toke the Towne and discomfited their enemies and slewe of theim aboue foure hundred persones. Now was the old prouerbes verified,that he that commeth a day after the faire, commeth to late,and when the stede is stollen, it is no bote to shutte the stable doze.For when Paris,saincte Denise,saincte Germaynes in Lay, and many other townes in Fraunce,were taken and betrayed, for lacke of succors and sufficient garrisons,then the Duke of yorke appoyncted at the parliament before, to be Regent of Fraunce,and by the disdayne and enuie of the duke of Somerset, and other,not till now dispatched, was sent into Normandy, wyth eyght Thousande men,and in his company the Earles of Salsburye,and Suffolke,and the Lorde Fauconbridge,and diuerse valiaunt capiteines, When he was landed at Harflewe,the Erle of Salisbury,besieged the Castle of Chamboys, whiche shortely was to him rendred.Then the Duke remoued to Roan, where he sett good ordres,and did great Justice in the countrey wherefore the Normans in their Chronicle, highlye extoll and muche magnifie hym, for that poynte:howbeit,thei saie,that he gate by long siege,the Towne and Abbey of Fecampe,and did none other notable act during the time of his rule and gouernaunce.

Phillip Duke of Burgoyne whiche,(as you haue heard) brake bothe his othe and promyse with the kinge of England,imagened with himself,that the Englishmen were like shortely,to be expulsed out of al the townes on that side the sea,and that thei had no certayne refuge nor place to resorte to,out of Neopatry but onely the towne of Callice Wherfore,he assembled his counsaill, and the heddes of the cities and tounes of Flaundres,Brabant,Hollande,and Zelande, in the towne of Gaunt,where was declared to theim,the right,title,and interest,that he had to the toune of Calice, and the Countie of Guysnes, as a very patrimony,belongyng to his inheritaunce: shewing farther, that thesayed toune was the golfe,and swalower vp,of all the golde and siluer of his countries and dominions, forasmuche as ther was the staple of woolles,tynne, leade,and other marchaundise, for the whiche, the Englishemen would take no common currant money,but only golde and siluer, to the greate impouerishement of his seigniories, and Regions:saiyng farther, that Calice onely was the common stop,betwene his countreys and Brittayne,and Spayne,so that Southwarde nor Westwarde,his subiectes could not passe,without the daungier of that towne,Wherefore these detrimyentes considered,he determined,(if they would assent) shortely to recouer and conquer, that toune and the countie of Guisnes To this purpose al the counsail,and common people, not onely agreed.

but also promised aide, bothe of men and money. Lorde how the Fleminges bragged, and the Hollandres craked, that Calice should be wonne and all the Englishemen flaine, sweatinge, and staring, that thei woulde haue it, within thre dayes at the mooste: thynkyng verely that the toune of Calice, coulde no more resyste their puissaunce, then a potte of double beere, when they fell to quaffyng.

To tel you what ordenaũce was new cast, what pouder was bought what engyns were deuised, what harneis was prouided, what vitaile was purueyed for this great enterprice: I will not cumbre you, in rehersing euery thyng particularly, because the Flemminges write, that the prouision was more then toung could speake, or harte could thinke yet you male beleue as you list. These doynges were not so priue, but sir Jhon Radcliffe deputie of the toune of Calice, was thereof enformed and shortely of the same, aduertised king Henry, and his counsaill, whiche incontinent sent thither, the Erle of Wortayne sonne to the Duke of Somersette, and the Lorde Cammeis with .xv.C. men, and greate foyson of vitaille, whiche issued oute of Calice, and came before Grauе-lyne, where thei were encountred, with a greate nombre of Flemminges whiche were shortely discomfited, and foure hundred of theim slain, and sixe score taken prisoners, and caried to Calice, And within twoo dayes after, the Englishmen draue by fyne force, the lordes of Waurayn, and Bado, to the barriers of Arde, & discomfited the company, to the nõbre of .xv.C. and slewe vij. valeaunt capiteynes, and toke many gentlemen prisoners. Phillip duke of burgoyne, abiding still in his high & war-lyke enterprise, assẽbled together of Flemynges, Picardes, Hollãders, and Henowiers a great army, to the nombre of .xl.M. so well armed, so wel vitailed, so wel furnished with ordenaunce, & so wel garnished in al thynges, that thei thought in their hartes, and blasted emongest theim selues, that the Calicians, would leaue the toune desolate, & flie for their sauegard, hearyng onely the approchyng of the Gauntoys. But thei reckened before their host, and so payed more then their shotte came to.
When this gallaunt army, was passed the water at Grauelyn, the duke intendng to begyn his greate conquest, besieged and assauted the lytle and poore Castle of Dye, whiche hauing in it but .L. souldiors, of the whiche .xii. sold their liues derely, the remnaunt compelled by necessitie yelded them selfes symply to the duke, which to please the Gauntoys, beyng of the moste puissaunt cõpanye in his army, liberally gaue to thẽ bothe the Castle and the prisoners, as a signe and token of good lucke and fortunate victory. Whiche rude & beastly persons, nothyng expert in warre, or lawes of Armes, not only rased and abated the Castle, but also hanged .xxix. of the captiues, and had so doen with al the remnaunt if the duke, (disdayning their crueltie) had not intreated for the rest.

After this victory, litle honorable and lesse profitable, the Pycardes beseged the Castle of marke, and three tymes assaulted it, more to their losse, then gayne. The Englyshemen within, whereof Syr Jhon Geddyng

Geddyng was capteyn, set out the banner of sainct George, and rang the beiles, to thintent to haue succours from the toune of Calice. But the capitaines there, minding not to leese the more for the lesse, nor the substaunce for the accident, wished them good lucke, and god fortune. without any ayde sēdyng. For doubt of the dukes great armye & power, The souldiors within Marke, beyng but twoo hundred and sixe, seyng no hope of succor, and desperate of comfort, rendred theimselues to the duke vpon condicion: that their lifes and limmes should be saued, and so thei wer conueied in suer custody, to the toune of Gaunt, and the Castle of Marke was rased and defaced.

AFTER this Acte dooen, the Duke of Burgoyne, accompanyed with the Duke of Cleues, the Earle of Estampes, the Lordes of Dantoyng. Croy, Cresquy, Humyers, and many other valeaunt Barons, & knightes. with his great armye, came before the toune of Calice, and placed his siege about thesame, moost to his aduauntage, and to the moste displeasure of his enemies. He gaue three great assautes to the toune, but his people wer not so fierce to assaut, but thenglishemen were as quicke to defend: so that he, gayning so litle at these .iii. enterprises, was contēt to absteyn frō farther approchyng toward the walles. At the first assaut the Heyre, whiche was come to se the duke of Burgoyn, was sore wounded and hurte. Beside this, the duke had dayly one greate rye sore, which was bycause that at euerye tyde, shippes arriued in the hauen, out of England, openly before his face, laden with victail, munitiōs, and men and also the Calicians woulde for the nonce, putte out cattaill into the marishe, vnder the toune walles, to thentent to prouoke the Flemmings to come within their catchynge, and daungier, whiche beinge coueteous of prey, and gayne often aduentured, and seldome returned agayn: For many by this meanes wer taken prisonets, but many mo slaine with ordenaunce. The duke one day rode aboute, to viewe and behold the situacion, and the walles of the toune, to thentent to take his moost aduaūtage, eyther by assaut or shot of ordenaunce. He was quickly espyed, and with the stroke of a Canon, a trōpeter whiche rode next before hym and three borles in his company, wer slain out of hande. When he sawe that all thynges succeded not to his purpose, he fyrst sett the Lorde of Croy, and a conuenient nombre to beliege the Castle of Guysnes, where thesaied capitain gat litle profit, and did lesse harme: And after deuised how to stoppe the Hauen, so that no succours shoulde entre there, and also, to prohibite thē within the toune, to make any egresse or rode outward, and so by this meanes, to famyshe and compell them to yeld, and rendre the toune. This deuise was set forward, and nothyng slepte: For .iiii. great hulkes were laden, with great square stones, semented & ioyned together with lead, to thentent that they should lye still like a moūt and not to seuer a sonder. These shippes with the tēnaunt of the dukes naule, wer cōueied into the mouth of Calice hauen, and in a full sea by craft and pollycy, were sounke doune to the ground, but whether God would not that the Hauen should be destroyed, eyther the conueyers of the hulkes, knewe not the very channell, these toure great shippes at the lowe water, late openly vpon the sandes, without any hurte doyng to the rode or chānel, which whē the souldiers had perceiued, thei issued out of the toune, and brake the shippes, and caried bothe the stones and the tymbre into the toune, whiche serued theim well to their fortificatiōns. The seconde deuise was also accomplished, whiche was a stronge Bastile, set on a litle Mountayne, furnished with .iiij. C. men and muche artilarye, whiche fortresse, did let the englishmen to issue out, when thei would to their greate displeasure and disturbaunce.

WHILES these thynges wer in doyng, there arriued into the dukes armi, an herault of England called Pembroke belonging to the Duke of Glouceste, whiche declared to the Duke of Burgoyne, that the Protectour of England his maister (if God would sende him wind and wether) would geue battayle to hym and his whole puissaūce, either there or in any other place, within his awne countrey, where he woulde appoynct: but the day he could not assigne, because of the inconstancy of the wind, and mutabilitie of the aire. The duke (like a noble man) awnswered the herrault: sir saie to youre master, that his requeste is both honorable and reasonable, howbeit he shall not nede to take payn, to seke me in myne awne Countreye, for (God willyng) he shall finde me here, till I haue my will of the towne, ready to abyde hym and all the power that he can make. After this aunswere made, the Herault was highlye feasted, and had a cup and a hundred golden guyldrens, to hym deliuered for a reward, and so returned to Calice. After whose departure, the Duke called a greate counsell, in the chiefe pauillion of the Dauntoys. and there declared bothe the heraultes message and his awnswere, desiring them to regard his honor, the estimacion of their Countreis, and the honesties of themselues, and like men to receiue their enemies and valeauntly to defende their aduersaties, promisynge to theim victorye, gain, and perpetual glory. Lorde how the Flemmynges threatned, how the Picardes craked, and how the Hollandres swore, that thenglishmē should be kylled and slayne, promising to the duke rather to dye then to flye, or to be recreaunt. Whiles this great matter was in consultacion, the Calicians, not well contented with the bastile, whiche the duke had newly buylded, issued out of the toune, in a great nombre, part on foote, and part on horsebacke. The footemen ran to assault the bastile, and the horsemen went betwene the army and the assailaūtes, to stopp the ayde and succors whiche mighte come. The alarmy was sounded, in somuch that the Duke in propre persone, was commynge on foote to releue his people but by the meanes of the horsemen, he was staied and kept back a space, in the whiche delaye of tyme, the Englishmen by fine, force gat the place, and slewe. Clx. persons, the remnaunt were taken prisoners, and defaced the fortresse, and set it on fire, carying with theim, al the ordinaūce and artillary, into the toune of Calice, to the great displeasure, of the Duke and his counsaill. The next daye after, there sprange a rumor in the army (no man coulde tel how) that the Duke of Gloucester with a greate puissaunce, was all ready embarked and shipped, and would arriue at the next tyde, and come doune before Calice, and raise the siege. What was the very cause, I cannot truly write: but surely, thesame night the duke fled away, and sent in al the hast to the Lorde of Croy, to reise his Siege before Guysnes, whiche tidynges were to hym very ioyous, for he neyther got nor saued: so these twoo cappteynes departed, leauing behynde, bothe ordinaunce, victaylle, and great ryches. The Frenche writers to saue the honor of the Duke of Burgoyne, saie, that there was a certaine discord and commocion, emongest the Flemynges and dutch nacion: affirming, that the great Lordes and the Picardes, (whome the Frenchemen greatly extoll) would betraye and sell the Fleminges, and their frendes, & that, for thesame cause, in a great fury thei cried, home, home, & woulde not tary for no request the Duke could make, nor no exhortacion that could be geuen: and so by their misgouernaunce, the Duke was enforced to raise his siege, and to departe. The Flemishe authors affirme the contrary, saying: that they were readye to abide the comyng of the duke of Glouceſtre, but the duke of Burgoyne fearing to be trapped, betwene the Duke of Gloucesters armye before and the Garrison of Calice behynd, so that he could escape by no waye, fled away in the Nyght, geuyng to theim no warnyng before. So that for lacke of tyme, and cõuenient space, to lade and cary their stuffe, and beyng commaunded to retire with all spede and diligence, thei were cõpelled to lose, and leaue behynde theim, their vitaill, and tentes, to their great losse and detriment. Now it is at your liberties, (gentle readers) whether you will geue credite to the Frenchemen. (whiche wer absent, and no doers in the acte) or to the Flemynges, (whiche were partakers of the losse and dishonor.) But the infallible veritie is, that he fled the .xxbj. daie of July in the night, and the nexte daye in the morning. the duke of Gloucester, landed in Calice hauen, and streyght wente into the Campe, where his enemies, the night before were lodged, and there he founde many goodly peeces of ordenaũce, and inespecially one, called Dygeon, named after the chief toune of Burgony, beside paulions, Woyne, Beere. Meale, and innumerable vittaill.

THE Duke of Gloucester, seyng his enemies reculed, hauyng in his company .xxb. M men, entered into Flaundres, burnyng houses, kyllyng suche as would resist, destroyng the countrey on euery parte, settyng fire in the Tounes of Poperiche and Batllens, and wasted the suburbes of many faire cities, and in al this waie, thei lost no man nor sawe any creature appere, to defend the countrey. After thei passed by Newe Castle, and destroyed Rymesture, and Vallõ Chappell, and then entered into Arthoys, to Arques, & Blandesques, settyng fire in euerye part where thei came. Thus they passed by sainct Omers to Guysnes, and so to Calice at sixe wekes ende, where thei were well refreashed for in all this tozney, they had litle plenty of good bread, whiche caused muche faintnesse and diuerse diseases in the army. When the Duke of Gloucester had sufficiently plagued and wasted the countreys of the duke of Burgoyne, & brought great prayes of beastes and spoyle, to the toune of Calice, he settyng there all thynges in good ozdre, returned into England, where he was aduertised how James kyng of Scottes, contrary to hys othe, League, and promise, had besieged the Castle of Rokesbozough, with thirty Thousande men, whereof sir Raufe Eraye was capitain, whiche manfully defended it. xx. dayes, but the Sottysh kyng beyng aduertised that, the Earle of Nozthumberlande was comyng to fyght with hym, fledde with no lesse losse, then dyshonoz, to hys toune of Edenbzough.

The xv yere.

After this daũgerous businesse finished, & for a tyme ended, by meane of frendes, and desire of Pzincies, a truce oz abstinence of warre for a certayne tyme was moued betwene the kyng of England, and the duke of Burgoyne, for which cause wer sent to Graueline for the kyng of Englande, the Cardinall of Winchester Henry Beauffozd, Jhõ Lozd Woubzey duke of Nozfolk, Humfzey Erle of Staffozd, & diuers other wel learned & honozable personages: & for the duke there appered ỹ duches his wife, the bishop of Arras, the lozde of Croy, and diuerse other. At whiche treaty, a truce was taken for a small tyme, and for a lesse space obserued. Whiche abstinence of warr was concluded betwene the kyng of Englande, and the Duches of Burgoyne, (enterleassing the duke and his name.) Some thinke that the kyng of England, woulde neuer enter in league with him, because he had bzoken his pzomise, writing and fidelytie writtẽ, sealed and swozne to him, and to his father. Other imagined, this to be doen by a cautell, to cast a myste before the Frenche kynges yes, to the entent he shoulde beleue that this feate was wrought by the duches, without assent oz knowledge of the Duke oz his counsayll, and so he was not bound to accomplishe, any acte oz thyng done in his wifes treatye. Thus you may se, that Pzinces some tyme, with soche vain gloses, and scoznfull exposicions, will hide theire doynges and cloke their purposes, to thentent that thei woulde not, eyther be espyed, oz plucke their hedde out of the Coller, at their pleasure. But, (as the common pzouerbe saiethe) he whiche is a pzomise bzeaker, escapeth not alway free: for it is well sene, that dayly it chaunceth bothe to Pzinces and meane persons, that for bzeakyng of faithe, and not kepyng of pzomise, many displeasures aryse, and innumerable inconueniences ensue.

ABOVT this season, Katherine Quene and mother to the Kynge of Englande, departed out of this transitozye lyfe, and buried by her husband band,in the Mynster of Westmynster.This woman,after the deathe of kyng Henry the fifth her husband, beyng young and lustye, folowyng more her awne appetyte, then frendely counsaill, and regardyng more her priuate affection,then her open honour,toke to husband priuilye, a goodly gentylman,& a beautifull person, garniged with many Godlye gyftes,both of nature & of grace,called Owen Ceuther, a mā brought furth and come of the noble lignage,and auncient lyne of Cadwalader. the laste Kyng of the Britonnes,by whome she conceiued and broughte forthe.iij.goodlye sonnes,Edmonde,Jasper,and another,whiche was a x monke in Westmynster,and liued a small tyme,and a doughter,whiche in her youthe departed out of this transitorye Life: After whose deathe Kynge Henry,because they were his bretherne of one wombe descended. created Edmond Erle of Rychemonde,and Jasper Erle of Pembroke, whiche Edmond engendred of Margaret,doughter and soole Heyre to Jhon,Duke of Somerset,Hēry,whiche after was King of this Realme. called king Henry the seuenth,of whome you shal heare more hereafter. Thys Owen,after the death of the Quene his wife, was apprehended and cōmytted to ward,because that contrary to the statute made in the vi.yere of this Kynge,he presumpteouslye had maried the Quene,with-xx out the kynges especiall assent,and agremente,out of which prison he escaped,and lette oute other with him,and was agayne apprehended and after escaped agayn.

THE Duches of Bedford,sister to Lewes Erle of saincte Paule,mindyng also to mary rather for Pleasure, then for Honour, without counsaill of her frendes,married a lusty knighte,called sir Richarde Wooduile,to the great displealure of hez Uncle the Byshop of Tyrwine,and the Erle her brother: But they now could not remedy it for the chaunce was caste & passed. This sir Richarde,was made Baron of Riuers,and after Erle,and had by this Lady,many noble sonnes,and faire Doughxxx ters: whereof,one was Lady Elisabethe after Quene of Englande,maried to kyng Edward the fourth.(as hereafter you shall perceiue)

VVHILES this Mariage was celebratyng, Jane late Quene of England,and before Duchesse of Britayn,doughter to the Kyng of Nauer & wife to kyng Henry the.iuj.died at the mannor of Hauering,and was buried by her husband at Canterbury,in whiche time disceased the Cōtesse of Warwicke,and Henry Archebishop of yorke.

I thought here,to omyt and ouerpasse,the regainyng and conquest of the strong toune of harflew,once Englysh and after,(by crafte(turned to the Frenche part,except the Frenche writers,more then the Englyshe xl authors,had made mencion and remembraunce,of the reduction of the same.For they saie and affirme, that the Duke of Somersett accompanied with the Lordes of Fauconbridge,Talbot,sir Fraunceis Surrien Arragonoys,Mathew Gough,Thomas Paulet, Thomas Haringtō, Walter Limbrike,Jhon Geddynge,William Watton,Esquiers,and Thomas Hylton Bailife af Roan, with a great puissaunce of the English paztie, compassed about and besieged the toune of Harflew, bothe by water, and by land. The Capitaine within the towne, was called Sir Jhon Destoutcuile, and Sir Robert his brother, with other, to the nombze of sixe hundzed good fightyng men. The assaylauntes lost no tyme, but made trenches, and cast diches, bothe to assaute the toune, and also to let the Frenche succozs that they should neither appzoche, noz ayde th citizens shut in and besieged. Diuerse assautes wer geuen, whith wer manfully resisted: but mozе to the losse of the defenders, then the assauters. Beside this, the Englishemen laied great ozdynaunce, before the gate of the toune, which continually vexed the inhabitauntes, and ouer x thzewe buyldynges, and destroyed mancions: so that neither house, noz high way was sure, oz refuge to the townes men. This siege endured long to the greate discomfituze of thee people: whereof they aduertysed the Frenche kyng and his counsaill, whiche sent thither the Erle of Ewe therle of Dumoys, called the Bastard of Orleaunce, the valeaunt Bastard of Burbon, the Lozde Gaucozt, Sir Giles of sent Simon, and the chief capitcines of all his realme, with foure thousand men both politique and proued. This valeaunt armye passed the Riuer of Soame betwene Amias and Corby, not mistrusting to gette that, whiche they lost and lefte behynd theim, and so thei came before the toune, and diuxi ded thẽselues in seuerall partes, to their most aduauntage: dayly skirmishyng with thenglishmen, but nothing pzeuailing, and so foz feare of losyng honoz, and desperacion of gayn, the flozishing Frenchemen, returned agayn with muche laboz, and litle pzofit. The capteynes of the toune seinge theire Pillers broken, and their chiefe ayders discomfited, tendzed the toune to the Duke of Somersette, whiche made there Capitaines, Thomas Paulet, William Limbzike, Chzistopher Barker, and Geozge sent Geozge, whiche many yeres, (till the diuision beganne in England) manfully and valeauntly defended the Toune, & Hauen, but afterward, when the sayd Duke was Regent, and gouernoz of Nozmãxxx dye, he not onelye loste the toune, but also the cittie of Roan, the Empire and chief tuell of the saied Duchie, with many other cities and fozтresses, whiche he mozе by entreatyng, then threatenyng myghte styll haue holden vnder his subiection. But al men haue not wit alike, noz all rulers be not of one condicion and pollicie. Foz this Duke Edmond, gatte this toune, with great glozy when he was but a Deputie, vnder the Regent, and after, beyng gouernoz him self, lost thesame, and all the whole duchie to his greate sclaunder and infamy, (as hereafter you shall perceiue). But who can pzeuent foztunes chaunce, oz haue spectacles to se all thynges to come, oz chaunces that be pzesent: seyng God disposeth pl that man purposeth, and that all wozldely deuises, and mannes cogitacions, be vncertain and vnperfite.

ALTHOVGH I haue long talked of Fraunce, yet I may not fozget the double dealing and craftie dismeanoz of James Kyng of Scottes whiche beyng, (as you haue heard) late pzisoner in Englande, not one-

onely was garnished with learninge and Ciuilitie, (whiche thynges, wer rare and straunge before that tyme within the realme of Scotlād) but also set at liberty, and honorably sent home. And to the intent that his amitie might be perpetuall, and that loue mighte continually succeade betwene bothe the realmes, by hys meane and accorde: First his greate raunsome was abridged, and diminnished, and after, he was joyned in mariage, with one of the blond royal, to thentent that he, and his heires should be united and knit, to the progeny of England, with an indissoluble knot, like the twisted tree, whiche cannot seuer, and like the hard flinte, whiche will not waxe soft: yet this vngentle prince, and forgetfull frend, puttynge in obliuion, bothe the dutie of his obeysaūce toward his souereigne and liege lorde, and the othe and promise, that he made to kyng Henry, when he dyd to hym homage, and liege at the Castle of Wyndesore, (as before you haue heard) turned his backe to his frend and kynsman, and loked to ỹ Frenche parte, which neuer did hym honor nor profite, not onely sendyng into Fraunce daily, aide & succors agaynste thee Englishe nacion, but also by new aliaunce, sought and practised waies and meanes, how to ioine him self with forein princes & to greue and hurte his Neighbors and Adioynauntes, of the realme of England. And although his awne power wer small, to do to theim any great dammage, yet he thought that he, being linked in suche noble houses, should the lesse feare the malice of his enemies: vpon whiche feble foundation, he concluded .ii. mariages, the one with Lewes the dolphin sonne to Charles the French kyng, and the other with Fraunces Duke of Britayn. Whiche mariages, were not desyred for loue of riches, but onely for ayde, to resyst and driue out the Englishmen out of Fraunce For the Lady Margaret maried to the Dolphin was of suche nasty cōplexion and euill sauored breath, that he abhorred her company as a cleane creature, doth a carrion: whereuppon she conceaued such an inward grief, that within fewe daies after, she ended her dayes. Although this lady had suche impedimentes, (as you haue heard) yet her sister Isabell, maried to Frauntes duke of Britayne, lacked neither excedyng beautie, nor pleasaunt breath: but as for wit, womanhod, and Ciuyle behauour, she neuer had, nor exercised. Wherfore when the duke before his mariage, was by his counseill admonished, to refuse and forsake so innocent a creature, he, more moued with her fayre face, then her womanly wisedome, aunswered: that it was ynough for a woman, to iudge the difference betwene thee shurte and the dublette of her husbande and to knowe him in the darke, from an other man.

FOR these mariages, kyng James demaunded of his commons, a greate subsedy or tallage, whiche was sore grudged at, and in maner denied: so that he maried theim with fayre promises, and ayde and succor against thenglishemen, rather then with bagges of money, or chestes of plate. This forein alliaunce litle profited, or auayled the realme of Scotland, nor this new amity, defended not kyng James: For Walter Steward etle of Athole,(whiche pretended a title to the Croune,by reason that he was begotten of kyng Robart the seconde, by his fyrste wife,and by whose occasion,Robert duke of Albany,murthered Dauid duke of Rothesay, eldez bzother to this kynge James) as in the storye of kyng Henry the fourth,you haue heazd declared)aftez the cozonacio of kyng James the first in Scotlande, earnestly solliceted hym to putt to death,duke Murdo,and all the ofspzinge of Robert firste duke of Albany,trusting that after he had destroyed that lyne,(which was a stopp in his way)to inuent some meane how to destroy the kyng and his children,and so to obteyne the crowne and pzeminence of the realme.Wherfoze he perswaded Robert Steward his nephiew, and Robert Grame his colyn, and diuerse other, to murther and sley the kynge their souereigne Lozde whiche thereto by deuilish instigacion incensed and procured came to the toune of Pezth,(commonly called S.Jhõs toune) and there entzed into the kynges pziuey chambze,and slewe first diuerse of his seruauntes, which made resistance,and after killed the kyng with many moztall strokes, and hurte the Quene, whiche, in defence of her husband, felled one of the traytozs:When this vngracious deede was blowen about the toune,the people rose in great plumpes, and founde out the pzincequellers, and theim bzought to streyght pzisone, whiche afterward,(accozdyng to their desertes) wer with most terrible tozmentes,put to death and executed.

AFTER James the firste, succeded James the seconde,his eldeste sonne,whiche fearing sedition and ciuile discozd, vexed moze his awne nacion,then the Englishe people.

NOVV leauing Scotland,let vs retourne to the busines of Fraunce Whiles the Scottes wer compassing,how to destroy their king:The Lozde Talbot,with a great company,layd siege to the Castle of Tankeruile,whiche after foure monethes, was to him simplye rendzed,and geuen vp.This toune was no greate gayne to the Englishemen: Foz in the meane season, the Frenche kyng in his awne persone,besieged the strong Towne of Monstreau Faultios,whereof Thomas Gerard was Capitaine:whiche,moze foz delyer of rewarde,then foz feare of enemies, sold the towne to the Frenche kyng, and had of him greate giftes,and good chere, whiche afterward, was well knowen, to his shame and repzoche. This toune had ben rescowed, oz the Frenche kyng foughten with all,if one chaunce had not happened: foz the duke of Yozke was discharged of the office of Regent, and the Erle of Warwicke pzeferred to the same,so that the duke of Yozke liyng at Roan, would haue gladly rescued the toune,if his authozitie had not surceased, and the Erle of Warwicke could not,foz the wind was so cleane cõtrary to him,that he and his army taryed foz the wind aboue tenne wekes. And so betwene the discharge of the one, and the charge of the other,this toune of Mõstreau,was deliuered and solde.

THIS pzesent yeare,was a parliament kepte at westminster, in the

which were diuerse notable conclusions ordained and taken, aswell for the preseruacion of peace and concorde at home, as for the maintenaūce of warre, and hostilitie in outward regions: in the whiche parliament. (who so will looke on the actes) shall perceiue that one act made, for byeyng & sellyng by straūgers, was profitable to the publyque wealth of this realme, if it wer wel kept. (as a few good actes or none be eyther by the negligēce of ỹ gouernors, or by the insolencie & pride of the people.)

NOVV must we speake somewhat of Charles the Frenche Kyng: whiche after he had gained again the citee of Parris, and diuers other tounes, was so puffed vp with pride, that he thought it but a trifle, to conquere Normandy, and expulse all the Englishe nacion, out of his countries and seigniories. Wherefore he sent Arthur of Britayn, Constable of Fraunce, & Jhō duke of Alāson, into Normandy with a great army, whiche besieged the toune of Auraūches, standyng vpō the knop of an hyl, nere to the Brittishe sea, bothe well walled and well manned. While thei lay there long, litle gettyng and muche spendyng, the lorde Talbot with a valeaunt company of men, approched nere the Frenche men, and encamped themselues, in the face of their enemies, to prouoke and entyse them to battail and fight The Frenchmen refusinge this offre, kept theim selues within their trenches dayly fortifieng and repairyng their campe. The Englishemen perceiuing their doynges, remoued their army halfe a mile farther, geuing their enemies, rome to issue out and to fyght, but all this litle auailed: For the Frenchemen laye still and stirred not. The lorde Talbot, seinge their faint hartes, reysed his feld, and in the open sight of them all entred into the toune, and the next day issued out, and founde the Frenchemen ridinge abrode, to destroy the playne country, whome he enuironed, bet, and discomfited, slayng many, and takyng diuerse prisoners. Although the Frenchemē gat neither honor nor profite by this iourney, yet thei enterprised a greater matter: for Ponthon of Sentrayles and the Heire, with diuerse other capiteines, and a great nombre of Frenchemen, hauing promise of certain Burgesses of Roan, to be let secretly into thee toune, came forward to a village called Ryse, and there lodged. The lorde Talbot, the lorde Scales, and sir Thomas Kiriell, hearing of theyre approche, set oute of Roan at midnight, and with greate payne came to Rise in the mornynge so couertly, that the Frenchemen, being sodaynly surprised and set on, like men madd and amased, ran away, & fled: in the chase were taked the lord of Fontaynes, sir Alleyne Geron, sir Lewes de Baile, & ix knightes and esquiers, beside other, and there wer slain, twoo hundred and more: the Heyre beyng sore wounded, by the swiftnes of his horse, escaped very narowly. The Englishmen returned to the toune of Rise, and found there a greate nombre of horsses, and other baggages, whiche thei ioyously brought with them to Roan.

The.xvi.yere.

Du

ON the sixt day of Nouembre, this present yere the erle of Warwicke, as regent of Fraunce, passed the sea, after he had been seuen times shipped and vnshipped, and landed at Humflewe, with a.M. freasche souldiors and came to Roan, and then the duke of yorke, returned into Englande, neither wholy pleased, nor halfe content. For he secretly smelled, that some men priuely disdayned his aduauncement, and enuied his promociō: yet, (like a wise man) he kept his toung close, whatsoeuer his harte thought. Betwene the chaunge of these twoo capitaynes, the duke of Burgoyne, (whiche sore enuied the glory of thenglishmen) beseged the Castell of Croytoy, with tenne thousande men and mo, hauyng with him greate plentye of gonnes, and goodly ordynaunce. The Erle of warwicke hearynge of this feate, sent the lord Talbot, the lorde Fawconbridge Sir Thomas Kiriell, sir Jhon Mountgomery, Thomas Limbricke, Thomas Chandos, Dauy Halle, and diuerse other knightes and esquiers, and many tall yeomen, to the nombre of fiue thousande men, whiche passed the Riuer of Somme, beside the towne of S. Valery: for the passage of Blāch Taque, was very daūgerous to go through, because the duke of Burgoyne had layed there ordinaunce, and other engyns, to let, trouble and stoppe the Englishemen to go ouer at that foorde. And yet, where the lord Talbot passed, his men wente in the water vp to the chinne, so glad were the men to rescew their fellowes. When the duke of Burgoyn was enformed of the approchyng of the lorde Talbot and other, he with all his power, sauinge foure hundred, whiche were left in a Bastile, by hym there newly buylded fled to Abbeuile, whiche Bastile was sone gained, and the men within eyther slayne or taken

After this towne receiued, the lord Talbot sente woorde to the duke of Burgoyne, that he would vtterly waste and destroye the countrey of Picardy, except he, (lyke a valiaunt Prince) would geue him battayle. And accordinge to his promise, he brente tounes, spoyled, and slewe many people in Picardy, but for all his doinges, the Duke woulde not appere but stale away from Abbeuile, and fled to Amias. So the Lorde Talbot was.xx. daies full, in the countreyes of Picardy, and Arthoyse, destroyeng and burning, all that they could se or come to and after departed. And in the meane season, sir Thomas Kirell had gotten all the Dukes cariages, and ordenaunce, and left asmuche vitaile in the toune of Croytoy, as would serue sixe hundred men a whole yere, and conueyed the remnaunt in safetie, to the Erle of Warwicke, which not onely, receiued the Capitaynes, with good semblaunce and louing cheare, but also highly magnified their Actes, and muche prailed their hardinesse.

After this enterprice acheued, Henry Erle of Mortayne sonne to Edmonde Duke of Somerset, arriued at Chierbuege with foure hundred archers, and thre hundred speres, and passed through Normandy, till he came into the County of Mayne, where he besieged a Castle, called led S.Anyan,in the whiche wer three.C.Scottes,beside Frenchemen. This Castle he toke by a strong assaut, and slewe all the Scottes, and hanged the Frenchmen,because thei wer once sworne English, and after brake their othe:and after he gatte also another Castle,twoo miles, from saint Julians, called Alegerche, whiche was shortly after recouered,and the Lorde Cameuys, whiche came to the rescue of the same,in the meane waie was trapped and taken. Thus the victory flowed some tyme on the one parte,and sometyme on the other,but the treason of the Frenchmen, far surmounted in gettyng, bothe the pollicy and strength x of the Englishe capitaines: for by the vntruth and falshed,of the very Burgesses and inhabitaũtes of the tounes,of Meaux in Brie, and.S. Susanne, the same were sold and deliuered to the Frenche parte, in the ende of this sixtene yere.

The.xvii.yere.

What should I reherse the great tempestes,the sharpe blastes,the sodain pities, the vnmesurable wyndes, the continuall raynes,whiche fell and chaunced this yere in England:sithe suche tormentes be bothe naturall, and of God, at hys pleasure diuersly ordered and altred. Of these vntemperate stormes, rose such a scarcety,that wheat was sold at.iii.s.iiii.d.the bussxx hell,wine at.xii.d.the gallon,Bay salt at,xiiii.d.the bussel,and malte at.xiii.s.iiii.d.the quarter,and all other graynes, were sold at an excessiue price, aboue the olde custome. The.xvii. yere.

In the monethe of June, the Erle of Huntyngdone,(as Stewarde of Guyen)with twoo.M.archers,and foure hundred speres, was sente into Gascoyne, as a suppliment to the countrey, and the commons of the same. For the kyng of England and his coũsaill,wer enformed that xxi therle of Dumoys, lay on ỹ fronters of Tholose, secretly by rewardes and faire promises,entising and prouokyng diuerse tounes in Guyen, to become French,and leaue thenglishe naciõ. Wherfore,this erle(lyke a pollitique warrior)altered not onely the capitaines, in euery toune & citie,but also remoued the magistrates,and chaũged the officers, from toune to toune,and from rowme to rowme, so that by thys meanes at that tyme,the erle of Dumoys,lost bothe trauaile and cost. In the same moneth also,syr Richard Woodvile,syr William Chãberlain,syr William Peyto, and syr William Story, with a.M.men,wer sent to stuffe the tounes in Normandy,whiche surely at that tyme,had therof great xl nede:for thenglish capitaines,had smal confidence in the Norinãs, and not to muche,in some of their awne nacion. For that harlot bribery,and her felowe couetеousnes,ran so fast abrode with Frenche crounes, that vnneth any creature,(without an especial grace)could hold either hand close,or purse shut, suche a strong percer is money, and suche a gredie glotten is auarice. You haue harde before, howe that Kyng Charles harte by gettyng of Paris, was set vpon a merie pynne, and thought daily that all thinges more and more, woulde bothe applie to hys purpose, and folowe his appetite. Whiche inuented imagination, sodainly bothe deceiued hym, and also appalled his haut corage, and abated hym somewhat of his proude stomacke. For sodainly there rose a straunge storme, and a quicke pitie, so mischeuous and so pernicious, that nothinge more execrable, or more to be abhorred, could happen in any Christian Region. Whiche seditious tempest, if wise counsaill had not with all spede repressed, no doubt, but kyng Charles, and the whole publique wealthe of Fraunce, had been turned vp, and cleane ouerthrowen. For Lewes Dolphyn of Vyen, and heire apparaunt to kyng Charles, a yong prince, of a froward stomacke and euil condicions, desiryng libertie, and to be out of ward and rule, with such as were of his nature and condicions, began to conspire agaynst his father, and souereigne lord. The chief of this vngracious faccion with hym, wer Jhon Duke of Alaunson, and Jhon Duke of Burbon. These confederates gathered together a greate power, and the Dolphyn tooke vpon hym, the rule and gouernaunce of the realme, orderyng causes, not in his fathers name, nor by his authoritie, but after his awne will, affeccion, and phantasie. When kyng Charles his father, had knowledge of thys vnnaturall disobedience, and insolent and proude doynges, he was (& no marueil) greatly moued with this sodain commocion: thinkyng hymselfe borne, & predestinate to trouble, remẽbryng, that it was no smal thyng, in his awne countrey so many yeres, bothe with straungers, & with his awne nacio, to fight and striue for rule and dignitie, but now to be constrained, to contend & make war, with his awne sonne and welbeloued child, for the Croune and regiment, of his realme & dominion. Yet these thinges did not bryng hym (beyng a man of greate wit, and counsaill, daily troubled and vnquieted with calamities and displeasures) into vtter despaire, or extreme wanhope: but lyke a pollitique prince, determinyng to withstand and resist the smoke at the beginnyng, before the fire & flame brast out abrode. called to gether all suche, as he had either in greate confidence, or especiall fauor, communicatyng to them, all his inwarde thoughtes, and priuie cogitacions. After long consultacion had, it was agreed by the mooste parte, that this sore was more mete to be cured, by pollitique and wittie handelyng, rather then by force, and dent of sweard. Wherfore, letters wer written, and postes wer sent to euery citie and borough, straightly prohibitinge all and synguler persones. either to heare, or obey, any precept or commaundement, set furthe or published, by the dolphyn himselfe, or by other, or in his name, and all offences doen in that confederacie, wer by open proclamacion, freely forgeuen and remitted. And beside this, diuerse graue and sage persones, wer sent to the dolphyn, and his alies, to common and cõclude a peace, and reconciliacion, betwene the Frenche kyng and theim, declaryng to theim, that their ciuile war, and inward discencion, was the very meane

to cause their enemyes, vtterly to plague and destroy their natiue coũtrey, whiche was almoste desolate, and brought into subiection, by the continuall warre practised before. By which meanes and perswasions, the knot of this sedicious facciõ, was losed and dissolued, and the kyng with his sonne, and other confederates, openly agreed and apparaũtly pacified. And so the spryng of these mischeuous secte, was stopped and repulsed, or the flodde had any thyng encreased, or flowen farther.

THE Englyshmen (whiche euer sought their aduauntage) hearynge of this domesticall diuision in the realme of Fraunce, reised an armye, and recouered again diuerse tounes, whiche were stollen from theim before, by the French nacion: and made great prouision, to recouer againe the citie of Paris, but when thei heard, that the dolphyn was returned again to his father, and that al his mates, were ioyned with the French kyng, thei left of from that enterprise, and reuoked their purpose.

The.xviij.yere.

IN the moneth of Nouembre this present yere, there was suche a great Frost, and after that, so depe a Snowe, that all the ground was couered with white, and all the diches hardened and frosen, whiche weather put the Englyshemen in comfort, to recouer again the toune of Ponthoise, by the Frenche kyng gotten before, by corruptyng with money, diuerse Burgesses of the toune. Wherefore, the Englishemen beyng clothed all in white, with Jhon lorde Cliffordе their capitaine, came in the night to the diches, and passed theim without daungier, by reason of the Froste, and sodainly scaled the walles, slewe the watche, and tooke the toune, with many profitable prisoners. When this toune was thus gotten, lorde Richard Beauchampe erle of Warwicke and Regent of Fraũce, died in the Castle of Roan, and was conueyed into England, and with solempne Ceremonies, was buried in his College of Warwicke, in a verie solempne and sumptuous sepulture. The.xviij. yere.

THEN was the duke of Yorke again, made regent of Fraunce, whiche accompanied with therle of Oxford, the lorde Bourchier, called erle of Ewe, Sir James of Ormond, the Lorde Clinton, and diuerse other noble men, sailed into Normandy: Before whose arriuall, the Frenche kyng beyng sore greued with the takynge of the toune of Pounthoyse, assembled a great army, and besieged thesaied toune himself, and made round about it, bastiles, trenches, & diches, and daily shot ordenaunce, and gaue therunto diuerse greate and fierce assautes. But Jhon lorde Clifford, like a valeaunt capitain, defended the toune with suche valeauntnes, that the Frenchemen rather lost then gayned. The Duke of Yorke at his landyng, hauyng true knowledge, of this siege, sent for the lorde Talbot, and a great nombre of souldiors, and so came nere to the toune of Pounthoyse, and there encamped hymself, and sent woorde to the Frenche kyng, that he was there, ready to geue hym battaill, if he would come out of hys campe and Bastiles. Kyng Charles was ruled by hys counsaill, whyche in no wyse would suffre him to aduenture hys persone wyth men of so lowe and base degree: biddyng hym remembre, what losses he and hys auncestors had susteined, by geuyng to the Englischemen battaill: whyche thynge they principally desire, willynge hym to kepe hys ground still, and to bid theym entre at their perell, and in the meane season, to stoppe the passage of the Riuer of Dyse, so that no vitaile could be brought to the Englishe army by that way, by whis the meanes, he should not onely obtein hys purpose, but also cause the Englischemen to recule backe agayn, for lacke of vitaile and succors. The Duke of Yorke perceiuyng, that the Frenche kyng was nothyng mynded to fight, determined to passe ouer the Riuer of Dyse, and so to fight wyth hym in hys lodgyng, whereupon he remoued his campe, and appoynted the lord Talbot and other, to make a countenaunce, as they would passe the Riuer by force at the gate of Beaumont, and appoynted another cõpany wyth boates, of tymbre & ledder, and bridges made of cordes and ropes, (whereof he had greate plentie, carted with him in Chariottes) to passe ouer the Riuer by neth the Abbay. While the lord Talbot made a crye, as though he would assaile the gate, certain Englischemen passed the water ouer in boates, and drew the bridge ouer, so that a greate nombre wer comen ouer, or the Frenchemen them espied. When they sawe the chaunce, they ran like mad men, to stoppe the passage, but their labor was loste, and all their pain to no purpose: for the moste parte of thenglishe people wer sodainly transported, in so muche that they chased their enemyes, by fine force into the toune agayn, and toke sir Guylliam de Chastell, nephieue to the Lorde Canchy, and diuerse other gentlemen prisoners. The Frenchemen seyng their damage irrecuperable, returned to the Frenche kyng, accomptyng to hym their euil chaũce & vnluckey fortune, which therwith was not a litle displeasaũt: and well perceiuyng, that if he taried the cõmyng of thenglishmen he was like to be either in greate ieoperdy, or sure to sustein muche dishonor and greate damage. Wherefore he remouid hys ordinaunce into the bastile of. S. Martyn, whyche he had newly made, and leauyng behynd hym the lorde of Cotigny, Admirall of Fraunce, wyth thre. M. men to kepe the bastiles, dislooged in the night from Maubuisson, and came to Poissye: for if he had taried still in that place, the lorde Talbot wyth certain of his trustie souldiors, whiche passed the riuer of Dyse in ii. smal lether boates, had either slain or taken hym, in his lodgyng, the same night. The Englischemen the next daye in good ordre of battaill came before the toune of Pounthoise, thinkyng there to haue founde the Frenche kynge, but he was gone, and in hys lodgyng, they founde greate riches, and muche stuffe, whyche he could not haue space, to conuey, for feare of the sodain inuasion. Then the Duke of Yorke with his company, entered into the toune, and sent for newe vitaill, and repaired the toures and bulwerkes about the toune, and diuerse tymes assailed

the Bastile of the Frenchemen, of the whiche he passed not greatly, because they were not of power, either to assaut, or stoppe the vitailes or succors from the toune. The Duke lyng thus in the toune of Ponthoise, was aduertised, that the Frenche kyng and the dolphyn, with al the nobilite of Fraunce, wer lodged in Poissye, wherfore he intendynge once again to offre hym battaill, left behynd hym there, for capitain, sir Geruays Clifton, wyth a thousande souldiors, and remoued his army and came before Poysye, and set hymself and his men in good ordre of battaill, redy to fight. There issued out diuerse gentlemen, to skirmishe r wyth the Englishemen, but they were soue discomfited, and foure valeaunt horssemen wer taken prisoners, and diuerse slain. The Englishemen perceiuyng the faynte hartes, and colde corage of their enemyes, whiche nothyng lesse desired, then to encountre with the Englishnacion in open felde, dislodged from Poysye, and came to Mante, and sone after to Roan.

WHEN the Regent and the lorde Talbot, wer returned again into Normandy, the Frenche kyng (for all this euill lucke) forgat not the toune of Ponthoise, and fristе he considered, what charges he had susteined, bothe durying the tyme of the siege, and also in makynge bastyrr les, trenches, and other deuises: and after remembred, that hys people, and especially the Parisians (to whō this toune was an euil neighbor) would tayle and saie, that he was not able, or lacked corage, to gette so smal a toune, or to discomfite halfe a hādful of amased people Wherefore these thynges set in ordre, he assembled all hys puyssaunce, and returned sodainly again to Ponthoise: where, he firste by assaute gat the churche, and after the whole toune, and toke the capitain prisoner, and diuerse other Englishemen, and slewe to the nombre of foure hundred, whyche derely sold their lifes: for one Frenche writer affirmeth, that the Frenche kyng lost there, thre. M. men and mo, and the whole garrison rrr of the Englishemen, was onely a. M: so thei gayned the toune, but they gat no greate boty of men. When the fame of this victory was blowen abrode, the hartes of the tounes men, began to appall, in somuche, that Melune, Corbuell, Eureux, and diuerse other tounes, yelded and turned at a proude crake, or a Frenche bragge, wythout stroke striken, or any blowe gyuen.

AFTER these hote rages, the wether began to ware more temperate for kyng Hēry and kyng Charles, wer agreed, to send Ambassadors, to common and treate some good peace & conclusion, betwene them, & their realmes. So the kyng of Englande, sent the Cardinall of Wynchester, xl wyth diuerse other noble personages of hys counsaill, to Calice, wyth whom was also sent, Charles Duke of Orleaunce, yet prisoner in England, to thentent that he might be both the author of the peace, and procurer of hys deliueraunce. The Frenche kynge, sent the Archebishop of Reyns, and the Erle of Dumoys: and the Duke of Burgoyne, sent the lorde Creuecuer, and diuerse other because that the duke of Orleaunce was passed the sea with the English Ambassadors, they would mete in none other place to commen, but in Calice. The Frenche Ambassadors perceiuyng their mynde, came to Calice, where the duke of Orleaunce gently receiued therle of Dunoys (his bastard brother) thankyng him hartely for his pain taken, in gouernyng hys cõtrey duryng the tyme of hys captiuitie and absence. Diuerse communicacions wer had, aswel for the deliueraunce of the duke, as for a finall peace: in somuche that after muche consultyng, and litle doyng, another tyme was appoynted for a newe assembly, and euery parte to declare to their souereigne, the request and desire of the other. So these Ambassadors toke their leaue and departed, and thenglishe commissioners conueyed again the duke of Orleaunce into England, whiche had nothyng then to paie his raũsome, & yet he could not be deliuered, wythout paiment. The cause why these cõmissioners did not agre, was, (as the Frenche writers saie) that the Englishemen demaunded, not onely to haue and possesse peaceably the.ii. Duchies of Aquitayn and Normandy, to their kynges & princes discharged of all resort, superioritie, and souereigntie, frãkly and freely, against the realme of Fraũce, the kinges and gouernors of the same for euer: but also required to be restored to al the tounes, citees, and possessions whyche they within.xxx.yeres, next before gone and past, had conquered in the realme of Fraunce. The Englishemen, thought that they demaunded but right and reason: and the Frenchemen, thought their request to be most hurtfull to their realme, and aũcient glory. So both parties, rather myndyng to gain or saue, then to lose, departed for that tyme, (as you haue heard). After whych diet prorroged for a tyme, Philip Duke of Burgoyn, partly moued in cõscience, to make some amendes & recompence to Charles duke of Orleaunce (thẽ beyng prisoner in Englande) for the death of duke Lewes hys father (whom duke Jhon, father to thys duke Phillip, shamefully slewe, and cruelly murdered in the citee of Paris, (as in the tyme of kyng Henry the fourth, is plainly rehercioned) And partly entendyng the aduauncement of his niece, lady Marie doughter to Adolphe Duke of Cleue, by the whyche aliaunce, he trusted surely to knit, suche a firme knot and frendly amitie with the Duke of Orleaunce, that all olde rancor shoulde cease, and all discorde should be forgotten: and in their places, concorde should be stablished, and perpetuall loue embraced) sente messengers into Englande, to the sayed duke, declaryng to hym his good will, deuise, and entent. Thinke not but this message was ioyous to a captyue, beyng out of his natiue countrey, and naturall seigniorie, by the space of.xxv.yeres. Suppose you that he, which nothyng more coueted and desired, then libertie and discharge, wold refuse so honorable an offre? Imagin you that a prince of a bloud royal, brought into thraldome, restrayned frõ liberty and liuyng, farre from kyn and father, & farther from frẽdes, would not geue hys diligent eare to that motion, by the whyche he myght be restored, bothe to hys auncient prehemynence, possession and seigniory? Yes, yes,

you maie be sure, he neither cõsulted on the matter, nor deferred the aũswere, but thereunto gently agreed. What should I saie more? As some writers affirme, foure hundred thousande Crounes were paied for hys deliueraunce, although other saie, but three hundred thousande: and so he was deliuered out of Englande into Fraunce at that tyme, bothe speakyng better Englishe then Frenche, and also swearyng, neuer to beare Armure against the Kynge of Englande. After hys arriuall in Fraunce, he came to the Duke of Burgoyne, hys especiall frend, grati-fiyng and thankyng hym of his libertie and deliueraunce: and accor-dyng to hys promes and cõuencion, maried the faire lady in the toune of sainct Omers, on whom he begat a sonne, whiche after was Frenche kyng, and called Lewes the.xii. After hys deliueraunce from captiuitie he forgat not hys vncle Jhon Erle of Angolesme, which had been as a pledge in Englande, for the debt of Duke Lewes of Orleaunce, his father, sithe the laste yere of kyng Henry the fourth, (as in his story is declared): but made frendes, borowed money, and morgaged land, and so set him at libertie, and brought hym into hys countrey. This Jhon, engendered Charles, father to Fraunces, the firste of that name, whyche after the death of Lewes the.xii, obteined the Croune of Fraunce.

xx HERE is to be noted, that olde rauncor newly appeased, will commonly spryng out again: for although the vnhappie deuision, betwene the two noble famylies, of Orleaunce and Burgoyn, wer by thys great benefite and mariage, for a tyme geuen ouer and put in Obliuion, and so continued by the space of.xx. yeres and more, yet their children and cosyns, wythin, not many yeres after, fell so far at squate, that the house of Burgoyne, was spoyled of the fairest flower of his garland, (as you shall here afterwarde, at large declared) and in especiall, in the tyme of kynge Fraunces the firste, the verie heire of the house of Orleaunce, whyche not onely continually vexed wyth mortall warre, Charles the xxx fift Emperor of that name, lineall successor to Phillip Duke of Burgoyne: but also did asmuche as in hym laye, to deprive the said Charles of hys honor, and possessions, (as men writyng their lifes, will hereafter declare). The Frenche writers affirme, that thys Duke of Orleaunce, was deteined thus long in captiuitie, by reason that the Englishemen, gayned yerely by hym, greate somes of mony, by reason of hys greate and liberall expenses, whiche he made dayly in the realme of England.
If thys be true, I repor̃t me to all indifferent and reasonable persones, for who will spende hys goodes frely, in the land of hys enemie, whiche maie by pinchyng and bearyng a lowe saile, ware riche and be set at li-xl bertie? Or who is so proude to wast & consume his substaunce, in liuyng prodigall, that maie wyth the sparyng of thesame, be deliuered out of captiuitie and bõdage? But surely it is apparaunt, that the reuenewes of hys seigniories, wer neither able to raunsome hym, nor to mainteyne hym in põpeous estate: partly, because thenglishemen possessed diuerse tounes, belongyng to his Duchy: and partly, by reason that the rentes wer scare able to defende hys possessions, againste the inuasions of the Englisch nacion, and Burgonions. But the very cause of hys longe detenyng wer two: one, the lacke of money, the second and the principall cause, was thys, that you haue heard before, how that Jhon Duke of Burgoyne father to Phillippe, shamefully and cruelly, caused Lewes Duke of Orleaunce, father to thys Duke Charles, (of whom we nowe speake) to be murthered in the citee of Paries: for the whiche murder, all the alies and frendes to the Duke of Orleaunce, had enuie against the house and familie of Burgoyne, in somuche that thesaied Duke Jhon, beyng measured wyth the same measure, that he met wyth all, was likewyse tyrannously murdered on the bridge of Mounstreau Faultyou, (as you haue also heard declared before). For whyche cause, and for to be reuenged of so heynous an act, duke Phillip sonne to thesaid Jhon, not onely toyned hymselfe, in league and amitie wyth the Englysche nacion, but also dyd homage, and sweare fealtie to Kynge Henry the fifth, as to hys kyng and souereigne Lorde: for whiche cause, the Englishemen entendyng to kepe the duke of Burgoyn, as a trusty treasure, and sure Juell, perceiued, that yf they deliuered the duke of Orleaunce, and set hym at libertie, he woulde not cease to vexe and trouble the duke of Burgoyne, in reuengyng the detestable murder, committed by hys father against hys parent: wherfore, bothe for the surety and sauegard of the duke of Burgoyne, and also to do hym pleasure, they kepte styll the duke of Orleaunce in Englande, demaundyng suche raunsome, as he was neither able, not could finde meanes or wayes to paye. But after that the duke of Burgoyn, (like an vntrue prince and vnhoneste gentleman) had broken hys promes, not kept his faith, and was turned to the Frenche part, the counsaull of the kyng of Englande, studied and deuised, how to deliuer the duke of Orleaunce, to do displeasure to the duke of Burgoyn. Duke Phillip perceiuyng, what mischief was like to rise if he wer redemed, and set at libertie without his knowledge, to preuēte the matter, to hys greate coste and charge, practised hys deliueraunce, paied hys raūsome, and ioyned wyth him, amitie and alliance, by marriage of his niece, (as before is rehersed) and by this meanes, was Duke Charles of Orleaunce, restored to hys libertie, whyche had been prisoner in England, from the daye of sainctes, Crispine & Crispinian, in the yere of our Lorde. M.CCCC.xv. to the inonethe of Nouembre, in the yere a thousand foure hundred and fourtie.

IN the beginnyng of thys.xix.yere, Richard duke of Yorke Regent of Fraunce, and gouernor of Normandy, remembryng the greate charge, and weightie office to hym deliuered and committed, determined, (after long consultacion) to inuade the territories of hys enemies, bothe by sondery armies, and in diuerse places, to thentent that the Frenche people beyng beyng vexed wythin their awne coũtrey,and peculiar dominion,should make no rodes nor enterynges,into the Duchie of Normandy,the returnyng whereof,was some what suspicious.Thys deuise for that season,semed bothe profitable and necessary. wherefore, wythout long delaiyng of tyme,he sent Robert Lorde Willoughby, wyth a greate crue of souldiors,to inuade and destroye the countrey aboute Amias , and Jhon lord Talbot,was appoynted to besiege the toune of Deape,and he hym self,accompanied with Edmond duke of Somerset,set forward into the Duchie of Aniow.The Lorde Willoughby, accordyng to hys commission, entered in the countrey to hym appoynted,and to thentent that his commission should not be espied nor knowen,he straightly forbad and inhibited,all maner fire,& of burnyng of tounes,whiche is the moste opẽ and plain token of war and inuasion. By reason wherof,the pore paysaũtes & rustical people goyng abrode,wythout feare or suspicion of euill,wer ouer ronne or taken wyth the horssemen,or they could attain to any toune,or forcelet: so that innumerable people wer slain, & taken,or they heard any tydynges of their enemies approchynge. The Frenchmen in the garrisõs adioynyng,astonnied at the clamor and cry of the poore people , issued out in good ordre,and manfully set on their enemies. The fight was sore, and the victory long doubtfull: But in conclusiõ the Frenchmen seyng their people in the forefront of the battaill,to be killed wythout mercie, like men desperate turned their backes and fearfully fled,the Englishmen folowed , and slewe many in the chace,and suche as escaped the sweard, wer robbed and spoyled,by Lewes Erle of sainct Paule,whyche was commyng to ayde the Englishe nacion.In this conflicte were slain, aboue sixe.C..men of armes , and a greater nombre taken : So the Lorde Willoughby , like a victorious capitain, wyth riche spoyle and good prisoners , returned again to the citee of Roan.The dukes of Yorke and Somerset,likewyse entered into the Duchie of Aniow, and Countie of Mayne, destroiynge tounes, spoylyng ỹ people,and wyth great prey and profite, repaired again into Normandy . The Duke of Somerset, not filled wyth this gain, entered into the Marches of Britayne,and tooke by a fierce assaute , the toune of Gerche,apperteinyng to the Duke of Alaunson, and spoyled and brent thesame,and after that departed to Ponzay,where he soiourned two monethes,from whence he sent daily men of war,which destroyed & wasted the countreys of Aniow, Traonnoys & Chatragonnoys.

THE French kyng in all haste, sent the Marshall of Loyache , wyth iiij.M.men,to resist the inuasions of the duke of Somerset,whyche capitain determined to set on the duke and hys people,in the dedde tyme of the night.This enterprise was not so secret,but it was reuealed to the duke,whyche marched forward,and mette the Frenchemen halfe waie, and after long fight,them by fine force manfully discomfited, and slew a hundred persones and mo,and tooke captiues.lxii, whereof the chief wer the lorde Dauligny,sir Lewes de Buell,and all the other almoste, were Knightes and esquires. After this encountre, the Duke tooke the toune of Beaumount Le Vicount, and manned al the fortresses, on the Frontiers of his enemies, and with riche boties and wealthy captiues came again to the Duke of Yorke.

DVRING these fortunate chaunces & victories, the lorde Talbot also, the vnweried chieftain & mãly warrior, enuironed the toune of Deape, with depe trenches and terrible mountaynes, and did set vp vpon the mount de Poulet, a strong and defensible Bastile, at whiche tyme, was capitain of thesame toune, Charles de Maretz, a man of more force in battaill, then pollitique in defence of a siege: for the Englyshemen beying a small nõbre, had to them deliuered with faire wordes, and fainte strokes, the castle of Charlemesnyl, and diuerse other fortresses, adioynyng to the toune. Duryng the siege, many encounters were had, and many great assautes geuen, thenglishemen sometyme saued, and some-tyme gained, but the moste losse lighted on the Frenchemen for awhile. But of .iii. captaines sent furth at one tyme, (as you before haue heard) all cannot returne with egall honor, and euen botie. For the lorde Talbot perceiuyng the toune of Deape, to be strongly defended, both with men, vitaile, and ordenaunce, and that he lacked all thesaied furniture for the accomplisshyng of his stoute enterprise, deliuered the custody of the Bastile, with the gouernaunce of the siege, to his Bastarde sonne, a valeaunt young man, and departed to Roan, for ayde, money, and municions. The Frenche kyng, was quickely aduertised of the lorde Talbots absence, and of the estate of the Englishemen: wherefore without delaye, he meanyng not to lose so great a prey, sent his eldest sonne Lewes dolphyn of Vyen, accompanied with the Bastarde of Orleaunce, called the erle of Dumoys, and diuerse other nobles of Fraunce, to the nombre of .xv. thousande persons, well armed, and no lesse garnished with all thynges necessary for their purpose. Three daies thei assayled the Bastile, and so many tymes thei were put backe, but poulder failed in the fortresse, and weapon wherwith to defend, was very scant, so that in conclusion, the Englishmen wer vanquesshed, and the Bastile taken and in it, the Bastard Talbot, sir William Peytow, and sir Jhon Re-peley. whiche were shortely after redemed: The other Englishe souldiors seyng the Bastile gayned, stoode all daye in good ordre of battaill, and in the night, pollitiquely returned to Roan, without losse or damage. At this assaute, the Frenchemen say, that thei slewe two hundred Englyshemen, and deny not, but thei lost fiue hundred persones, and by this meanes, the one nacion loste the Bastile, and the other saued the toune, to the greate displeasure of the lorde Talbot: Whose presence, it woulde asmuche auailed at this attempte, as his absence was losse and detrement to his frendes, and felowes in way and chiualrie. But gain is not alwayes perdurable, nor losse alwayes continuall, VVHILE these thynges were a doyng, Phillip Duke of Burgoyne, hauyng an enuious hart, at the glory and fortunate successe of the Eng-

glisshe people, intending to bereue them of one of their assured frendes, called Lewes of Luxenborough erle of sainct Poule, made sharpe war vpon his countreis, and toke diuerse tounes, and fortresses from hym, so that in conclusion more for feare, then for loue, he vtterly refused his faithe and promise, made to the duke of Bedford his brother in law and turned to the Frenche parte, and became a luke warme enemie to the realme of England. The losse of this frend and necessary neighbor, not alitle greued Kyng Henry and his counsaill: Howbeit, they made such purueiaunce and prouision, by discrete counsail, that if he of euil x will, would do theim litle good, yet he of malice should doo to them no greate hurte or damage.

THE Englysshe capitaines beyng in Guyen, hauyng knowledge of the valeaũt doynges of their countreymen in the realme of Fraũce, determined to do some notable and noble enterprise, on the French costes adioynyng to Aquitayn: & so, thei besieged the strong toune of Tartas belongyng to the lorde Delabreth, their old and auncient enemie. The capitaynes and gouernors of the toune, considery ng their weakenesse, and the force of the Englishemen, toke this appoyntment with the Englisshe capitaines, that the toune should remain neuter, and for the assuraunce therof, thei deliuered Cadet the sonne of the lorde Delabreth in pledge, vpon this condicion: that if the lorde Delabreth, woulde not assent to their agrement, then he shoulde signifie his refusall, to the Englisshe capitaynes, within three monethes next ensuyng: and he to haue his pledge, and thei to do their beste. The Frenche kynge, at the request of the lordes of Guyen, which were not able to defende themselfes, toke this matter in hand, and caused the lord Delabreth, to certifie his disa- grement to the erle of Huntyngdon, lieuetenaunt for the kynge of Englande, in the Duchie of Aquitayne. And to please the great Lordes of Guyen, he assembled.lx.M.men, and came to Tholose, and so to Tar- xx tas: to whom the chieftaines of the toune, seyng no succors commyng, rendered the toune, and Cadet Delabrethe, whiche was lefte there as a pledge, was deliuered. The French kyng after the yeldyng of Tartas, remoued to sainct Seuere, a strong toune in Gascoyn, but smally peo- pled with men of warre, which he toke by force, and slewe three hundred persones, and toke sir Thomas Rampstone prisoner. After thys toune gained, he with all his power besieged the citie of Arques, and toke the Bulwarke of thesame, whithe was smally defended, and sone gotten. The inhabitauntes of the toune, began sore to be afraied, and came to the lorde Mountferrant, capitain for the kyng of Englande, requiryng xi hym to haue mercie vpon them, and to rendre the toune to the Frenche kyng, vpon some honest couenaunt or cõposicion. The capitain perceiu- uyng the faint hartes of the Gascoyns, & knowyng that without their ayde, he was not able to resist the puyssaunce of the Frenche kyng, toke an agrement and departed with all the Englisshe true to Burdeaux, where he founde the erle of Longuile, Capdaw of Buesse, and sir Thomas Rampstone,whiche was alitle before deliuered.

AFTER this,the fortresses of Ryoll and Vermandie,yelded them to the Frenche kyng. Although these tounes thus submitted theim too hym,yet he had them not long, nor made muche tariyng in the Duchie of Guyen,for the Englishemen not onely prohibited the Gascoynes,to minister to his armie, brandze and sustenaunce, but also gat into their handes and toke suche bitailes,as wer conueyed to hym,from Tholose and Poytiers:So that in maner constrayned with famyn and lacke of prouision,he retired his army again into Fraunce. After whose departure,the Englishe capitaines recouered again the citie of Acques, and the other tounes by the French kyng gained, and toke prisoner his lieuetenaunt, called Reignault Guillam the Burgonyō, and many other gentlemen,and all the meane souldiors,wer either slayne or hanged.

WHILE the French kyng was in Guyen,the lorde Talbot toke the toune of Couchete, and after marched toward Gayllardon, whiche was besieged by the Bastarde of Orleaunce Erle of Dumoys:whiche Erle hearyng of the Englishmennes approchyng,reysed hys siege and saued hymself.Alitle before this enterprise, the Frenchemen had taken the toune of Eureux,by treason of a fisher. Sir Fraunces Aragonoys hearyng of that chaunce,apparreled sixe strong men,like rusticall people with sackes and baskettes,as carriers of corne and bitaile,and sent them to the Castle of Cornyll, inthe whiche diuerse Englishemen were kept as prisoners:and he with an embusshement of Englyshemen, laye in a baley nye to the fortresse. These sixe companions entered into the Castle,vnsuspected and not mistrusted, and straight came to the chambre of the capitaine,& layed hande vpō hym, geuyng knowledge therof to their embushement, whiche sodainly entered the Castle,and slew and toke all the Frenchemen prisoners, and set at libertie all the Englyshemen.whiche thing doen,they set all the castle on fyre, and departed with great spoyle to the citie of Roan. Thus the lady victory, somtyme smiled on the Englyshe part, and somtyme on the Frenche side. Thus one gayned this daye,and loste on the nexte. Thus fortune chaunged, and thus chaunce happened,accordyng to the olde prouerbe,sayingin war is nothing certayne,and victory is euer doubtfull.

The.xx.yere.

NOw let vs leaue the marciall feactes,the mortal strokes. and daily skirmishes,practised betwene the English and Frenche nacion in the Region of Fraunce, and speake a litle of a smoke that rose in England, whiche after grewe to a greate fire,and a terrible flame,to the destruccion of many a noble man. You haue hard before, howe the Duke of Gloucester sore grudged at the proude doynges of the Cardinall of Wynchester, and howe the Cardinall lyke wise, sore enuyed and disdayned at the rule of the Duke of Gloucester,and how by the meanes of the duke of Bedforde, their malyce was appeased, and eche was reconciled to o-their, inperfite loue and amytie, to all mens outward iudgementes. After whiche concord made, the Cardinall and the Archebishop of Yorke, did many thynges without the consent of the kyng or the duke, beyng (duryng the minorite of the prince) gouernor & protector of the realme, wherwith the duke, (like a true harted prince) was neither contente nor pleased: And so declared in writyng to the kyng, certain artitles, wher-in the Cardinall and the Archebishop, had offended bothe the kyng and hys lawes, the true tenor, here after ensueth.

A complaint made to Kyng Henry the.vi. by the Duke of gloucester, vpon the Cardinall of Wincheste.

THese bee in parte, the poyntes and Articles, whiche I Humfrey Duke of Glouchester, for my trouthe and acquitall saied late, I would geue in writyng (my right doubted Lorde) vnto your highnes, aduertisyng your excellēce, of suche thinges in partie, as haue been doen in your tendre age, in derogacion of your noble estate, & hurt of both your realmes, & yet be doēn and vsed dayly.

FIRST the Cardinall, then beyng bishop of Wincheste, toke vpon hym the state of Cardinall, whiche was nayed and denayed hym, by the kyng of moste noble memory, my lord your father, (whom God assoyle) saiyng that he had as lefe set his croune beside him, as (to se hym weare a Cardinall hat, he beyng a Cardinall: for he knewe ful wel, the pride and ambicion that was in hys person, then beyng but a bishop, should haue so greatly extolled hym into more intollerable pride, when that he were a Cardinall: And also he thought it agaynst hys fredome, of the chefe Churche of thys realme, whiche, that he worshipped, as duely as euer did prince, that blessed be hys soule. And howbeit, that my saied Lorde your father, (whom God assoyle,) would haue agreed hym to haue had certeyn clerkes of thys land Cardinals, & to haue no bishoprikes in En-glande, yet is intent was neuer to do so great derogacion to the Churche of Canturbury, to make them that wer his suffraganes, to set aboue their Ordinary and Metropolitan, but the cause was that in generall, and in all matters whiche might concerne the weale of hym, and of hys realme, he should haue proctors of hys nacion, as other kynges Christen had, in the courte of Rome, and not to abyde in thys lande, nor to be in any parte of his counsailes, as been all the spirituall and temporall, at parliamentes and other great counsailes, when you list to call theim: and therfore, though it please you to do hym that worship, to set hym in your priuie counsaill after your pleasure, yet in your parliament, wher euery Lorde bothe spirituall and temporall, hath his place, he ought to occupie but hys place as a bishoppe.

ITEM thesaied bishoppe, now beyng Cardinal, was assoyled of his bishoprycke of Wynchester, wherupon he sued vnto our holy father, to haue a bulle declaratory, notwithstandyng he was assūp to the state of Cardinall, that the sea was not voyde, where in deede it stode voyde by a certein tyme, or thesaied bulle were graunted, and so he was exempte from his ordinary, by the takyng on hym the state of Cardinall, and the churche bilhoprycke of Winchester, so standyng voyde, he tooke agayn of the Pope (you not learned therof ne knowyng wherby he was fallen into the cace of prouision) so that all his good was lawfully and clearly forfeited, to you my right doubted Lorde, with more as the statute declareth plainly for your aduauntage.

4. ITEM it is not vnknowen to (you doubted lord) how throughe your landes it is noysed, that thesayed Cardinal and tharchebishop of Yorke had and haue the gouernaunce of you, and all your lande, the whiche none of your true liege men, ought to vsurpe nor take vpon them. And haue also estranged me your sole vncle, my cosyn of Yorke, my cosin of Huntyngdom, & many other lordes of your kin, to haue any knowledge of any greate matter, that might touche your high estate, or either of your realmes. And of Lordes spirituall, of right, the Archebishoppe of Cantorbury, should be your chief counsailer, the whiche is also stranged and set a side. And so be many other right sad Lordes, and well aduised, aswell spirituall as temporall, to the great hurt of you my right doubted lorde, and of your realmes, like as the experience and workes shewen clerely and euidently, more harme it is.

5. ITEM in the tendre age of you, my right doubted Lorde for the necessitie of an armye, thesayed Cardinall lent you. iiij. M. k. vpon certayn Juels, preised at. xxij. M. marke, with a letter of sale, that and they wer not quited at a certayn daye, you should lese them. Thesaied Cardinall seyng your money redy to haue quyted your Juels, caused your treasorer of Englande at that daye beyng, to paye thesame money, in parte of another armie, in defraudyng you, my right doubted lord, of your sayd Juels, keppyng theim yet, alwaye to his awne vse, to your right greate losse, and his synguler profite and auayle.

6. ITEM thesaid Cardinal, then beyng bishop of Winchester, & Chaūcellor of Englād, deliuered the kyng of Scottes, vpō certeyn appoyntmentes (as maye be shewed,) presumpteously, & of hys awne authoritie contrary to the acte of Parliament. I haue heard notable men of lawe say, that they neuer heard the lyke thing doen emong thē, whiche was to greate a defamacion to your highnes, & also to wed his niece to thesayd kyng, whō that my lord of notable memory, your father whō God assoile would neuer haue so deliuered. And there as he should haue payed, for his costes. xl. M. k. thesaied Cardinall, Chauncellor of Englande, caused you to pardon hym therof. x. M. marke, wherof the greater some he hath paied you, right alitle, what, I repoyt me to your highnes.

7. ITEM, where thesaid Cardinall lent you, my redoubted lord, greate & notable somes, he hath had & his assignes, the rule & profite of the porte of Hāpton, wher the Customers been his seruaūtes, wher by likelihoode & as it is to be supposed, he standyng the chief marchaunt of wolles of your

your lande, that you bee greatly defrauded, and vnder that rule, what Wolles and other marchaundise haue been shipped, and maye be from tyme to tyme, hard is to esteme, to the great hurte, and preiudice of you my right doubted Lorde, and of all your people.

ITEM, howbeit that the said Cardinall, hath diuerse tymes, lent you greate sommes of money, sithe the tyme of your reigne, yet hys loans hath been so differred and delayed, that for the moste part, the conuenable season, of employing of the good lente, was passed. So that litle frute or none came thereof, as by experience, bothe your realmes, haue sufficiently in knowledge.

ITEM, where there was Juelles and plate, preised at a.xi.M.l. in weight, of the saied Cardinall, forfeited to you my right doubted lorde, he gat hym a testorement therof, for a loane of a litle percell of the same, and so defrauded you wholy of them, to your greate hurte, and hys auayle, the whiche good might greately haue eased yout highnes, in sparyng asmuche of the poore commons.

ITEM, the Cardinal, beyng feoft of my said lorde your father, (whō God assoyle) against his entent, gaue Elizabeth Beauchampe, thre.C. markes of liuelod, where that hys wyll was, that and she wer wedded, within a yere, then to haue it, or els not, where in deede it was twoo or iij. yeres after, to your great hurt, & diminishyng of your inheritaunce.

ITEM, notwithstandyng that the said Cardinall, hath no maner of authoritie nor interest into the croune, nor none may haue by any possibilitie, yet he presumeth and taketh vpon hym in partie, your estate royal, in callyng before hym, into greate abusion of all your lande, and derogacion of your highnes, whiche hath not been sene nor vsed, in no dayes heretofore, in greater estate then he is, without your expresse ordinaunce and commandement.

ITEM, the said Cardinal, nothyng conslderyng the necessitie of you my right doubted Lorde, hath sued a pardon of dismes, that he should pate for the Churche of Wynchester, for terme of his lyfe, geuyng therby occasion to all other Lordes spirituall, to drawe their good will for any necessitie, to graunt any disme, and so to laye all the charge vpon the temporaltie, and the pore people.

ITEM, by the gouernaunce and labor of the saied Cardinal, and archebishop of Yorke, there hath been loste and dispended, muche notable and greate good, by diuerse Ambassadors sent out of this realme. First to Arras, for a feined colourable peace, where as by likelinesse it was thought & supposed, that it should neuer turne to theffectuall auaile, of you my right doubted Lorde, nor to your sayed realmes, but vnder colour thereof, was made the peace of your aduersary, & the duke of Burgoyn. For els your partie aduerse, & the said duke, might not well haue found meanes nor wayes, to haue cōmoned together, nor to haue concluded with other, their cōfederacios & conspiracios, made & wrought ther then, at that time, against your highnes, whereby you might haue (right doubted lorde, the greater partie of your obeysaunce, aswell in your realme of Fraunce, as in your Duchie of Normandy, and muche other thyng gone greatly, as through thesaid colourable treatie, and otherwise, sithe the death of my Brother of Bedford, (whom God assoyle.)

14. ITEM, now of late was sent another Ambassador to Calice, by the labor and counsaill of thesaied Cardinall, and Archebishop of Yorke, the cause why of the beginnyng, is to me your sole uncle, & other lordes of your kyn and counsaill unknowen, to your greate charge, and agaynst the publique good of your realme, as it openly appeareth. The whiche good if it bee imployed, for the defence of your landes, the marchaundises of thesame, might haue had other course, and your sayd landes not to haue stande in so greate mischief as they do.

15. ITEM after that, to your greate charge, and hurte of bothe your realmes, thesaid Cardinall and Archbishop of Yorke, went to your saied toune of Calice, and diuerse Lordes of your kyn, and of your counsaill in their felowship, and there, as there was naturall warre betwene the duke of Orleaunce, & the duke of Burgoyn, for murder of their fathers, a capitall enemitie like to haue endured for euer, thesayd Cardinall and Archbishop of Yorke, licenced and suffred, thesaid duke of Orleaunce, to entreate and common a part with the counsaiell of your sayd aduersaries, aswell as with the Duchies of Burgoyne, by whiche meane the peace and alliaunce was made betwene the two dukes, to the greatest fortifyng of your said capitall aduersaries, that could be thought, and cõsequently (my deare redoubted lorde,) to your greatest charge, & hurt to both your realmes. Under colour of whiche treatie, your said aduersaries, in meane tyme wan your citee of Meurl, & the coũtrey therabout and many diuerse rodes made into youre Duchie of Normandy, to the great noysaunce and destruccion of your people, as it sheweth openly.

xx. ITEM thesaid Archebishop of Yorke, sent with other into this your realme, from thesaied Cardinall, after communicacion had with your aduerse partie, at your saied toune of Calice, made at his commyng into your notable presence at Wyndsore, all the swasions and colour, all motions in the moste apparaũt wise that he could, to induce your highnes to your agrement, to the desires of your capitall aduersaries, as I saw there in your noble presence, of his writyng, at whiche tyme, as I understode, it was his singuler opinion, that is to say: that you should leaue your right, your title, & your honor of your croune, & nomination of you kyng of Fraunce, during certain yeres, & that you should utterly abstain you and be content, onely in writyng, with, rex Anglie. &c. to the greate note of infamine, that euer fel to you, or any of your noble progenitors, since the takyng of them first, thesayd title & right, of your realme and croune of Fraũce, to which matter in your presẽce ther, after that it had lyked your sayd highnes, to aske myne aduise therupon, with other of your bloud and coũsaill, I aunswered and sayd, that I would neuer agree me therto, to die therfore, and of thesame disposicion I am yet, and be while I liue, in conseruacion of your honor, and of your othe made vnto your saied croune, in tyme of your coronacion there.

ITEM the saied Cardinall & Archebishop of Yorke, haue so labored vnto your highnes, that you should entende to a newe daye of conuencion in Marche or Apryll next commyng, where it is noysed to be more against your worshyp, then with it. And where it was euident to all the world, that the rupture and breaking of thesaid peace, should haue fallen heretofore, of your aduerse partye, because of the great vntrouthes: Now by that meane it is lyke peraduenture, to be layed vnto the verie x greate slaundre of you my doubted Lorde, lyke to come to none other purpose nor effecte, then other conuencions haue doen afore tyme. And so by subtilities and counsaill of your saied enemies, your lande (they in hope and trust of thesayd treatie, not mightely nor puyssauntly purueyed for,) shalbe like vnder the coloure of thesame treatie, to be brent vp and destroyed, lost and vtterly turned from your obeysaunce.

ITEM it is saied, that the deliueraunce of thesaied Duke of Orleaunce, is vtterly appointed by the mediacion, counsayll, and steryng of thesaied Cardinall and Archebishoppe of Yorke, and for that cause diuerse persons been come from your aduersaries, into this your realme, xx and thesaied duke also brought to your citee of London, where as my lord your father (whom God assoile) peisyng so greatly the inconueniences, and harme that might fall, onely by his deliueraunce, concluded, ordeyned and determined in his last wil, vtterly in his wisedome, his cõquest in his realme of Fraunce. And yet then it is to be doen, by as great deliberacion, solempnitie and suretie, as maye be deuised or thought, and seyng now the disposicion of your realme of Fraunce, the puissaũce and might of your enemies, & what ayde they haue gotten agaynst you there, aswell vnder the colour of thesaid treatie, as otherwise, what maie or ought to be thought or said, for that laborying thesaid duke (al thynxxx ges considered) by suche perticular persones, the lordes of your bloud not called therunto, I report me vnto your noble grace and excellencie, and vnto thesaied wise trewe men of this your realme.

ITEM where that euery true counsailor, specially vnto any king or prince, ought of trouth and of dutie, to counsaill, promote, encrease, prefer, and aduaunce the weale and prosperitie of his lorde: Thesaid Cardinall, beyng of your counsaill (my right doubted lorde) hath late purchased of your highnes, certain great landes and ltuelode: as the castle and lordship of Chirke in Wales, and other lãdes in this your realme, vnto whiche I was called sodainly, and so in eschewyng the breakyng xl & losse of your armies then agayn, seyng none other remedy, gaue thervnto myne assent, thinking that who that euer laborer, moued or stered the matter firste vnto your Lordeship, counsayled you neyther for your worshyp nor profite.

MORE thesaied Cardinall hath you bounde a parte, to make him a sure estate of all the sayed landes, by Easter nexte commyng, as coulde bee deuyſed by ãnye learned counſayll, ōr elles that ſuretie not made, theſayed Cardinall, to haue and reioye to him, and hys heyres for euermore, the landes of the Duchie of Lãcaſter, in Norffolke, to the value of. vii. or. viii. C. markes, by the yere, whiche thyng ſemeth right ſtraunge and vnſene, and vnhard wayes of any liege man, to ſeke vpon hys ſouereigne lorde, bothe in his enheritaunce and in hys Juelles, and good. For it is thought, but if right and extreme neceſſitie cauſed it, there ſhould, nor ought no ſuch thynges to be doen: frō which neceſſitie (God for hys mercy) euer preſerue your noble perſon, wherfore my redoubted lord, ſeyng that ye ſhould be ſo coũſailed, or ſtired to leaue your croune and enheritaunce in England, & alſo by fraude and ſubtile meanes, as is afore reherſed, ſo to loſe your Juelles: in my trouthe and in myne acquitall (as me ſeameth) I maye not nor ought not, counſayl ſo greate an hurte to you and to all your lande.

xi ITEM, it is not vnknowen to you my right doubted lorde, how often tymes I haue offred my ſeruice, to and for the defence of your realme of Fraunce, and duchie of Normãdy, where I haue been put therfro, by the labor of theſayd Cardinall, in preferryng other after his ſinguler affeccion, whiche hath cauſed greate parte, of theſayed Duchie of Normandy, aſwell as of your realme of Fraunce to be loſt, as it is well xii knowen, and what good (my right doubted lord) was loſt on that army that was laſt ſent thether, whiche therle of Wortayn, your counſayl of Fraunce, hath well and clerely declared to your highnes here before.

xii. ITEM, my right doubted Lorde, it is not vnkowen, that it had not been poſſible to theſayed Cardinall, to haue comen to the greate riches, but by ſuche meanes, for of his Churche it might not riſe, and enherytaunce he had none. Wherefore my right doubted Lorde, ſithe there is great good behouefull at thys tyme, for the weale and ſafegard of your realmes, the pouertie, neceſſitie, and indigence of your liege people, in highnes vnderſtande, like it vnto your noble grace, to conſidre theſaied xxx lucat of theſaied Cardinall, and the greate deceiptes, that you be deceiued in, by the labor of hym, and of the Archebiſhop, aſwell in thys your realmes, as in your realme of Fraunce, and duchy of Normandy, where neyther office, liuelode, nor capitain maye be had, without to greate a good geuen vnto hym, wherby great part of all the loſſe that is loſt, they haue been the cauſers of, for who that would geue moſte, hys was the price, not conſideryng the merytes, ſeruice, nor ſuffiſeaunce of perſones. Furthermore it is greatly to be conſidered, how, when theſayed Cardinall, had forfeited al his good, because of prouiſion, as the ſtatute, therꝑ vpō more playnly declareth, by hauing the rule of you my right doubꝑ ted Lorde, purchaſed hymſelf in greate defraudacion of your highnes, a charter of pardō, the whiche good and it had be well gouerned, might many yeres haue ſuſteyned your warres, without any tallage of your poore people.

xxi ITEM, my redoubted Lorde, where as I write moche thyng, for the weale weale of you and of your realmes, peraduenture some will say and vnderstande, that I woulde, or haue written it, by waye of accusement of all your counsaill, whiche god knoweth, I do not, for your highnes may well se, that I name theim, that be causers of thesayed inordinate rule wherfore, considering that thesayd Cardinall & Archebishop of Yorke been they, that pretende the gouernaunce of you, and of your realmes and lordshippes: Please it vnto your highnes, of your rightwisenesse to estraunge them of your consayll, to that entent, that men maye be at their fredome, to say what they thinke of trueth.

x FOR truth, I dare speake of my truth, the poore dare not do so. And if the Cardinal & the Archbishop of Yorke, may afterward declare thē selfes, of that is, and shalbe sayed of them, you my right doubted lorde may then restore them agayn to your counsayll, at your noble pleasure. 24.

VVHEN the king had heard these accusaciōs, he cōmitted the hearinge therof, to his counsaill, whetof the moste parte were spiritual persons, so what for feare, and what for fauour the mater was winked at, and dayled out, and nothing sayde to it: and fayre contenaunce was made to the duke, as though no displeasure had ben taken, nor no malice borne, either in hart or in remembraunce agaynst hym. But venyme xx will once breake oute, and inwarde grudge wyll sone appeare, whiche was this yere to all men apparaunt: for diuers secrete attemptes were aduaunced forward this season, agaynst the noble duke Hūfrey of Gloucester, a farre of, whiche in conclusion came so nere, that they bereft hym both of lyfe and lande, as you shalhereafter more manifestly perceyue. For first thys yere, dame Elyanour Cobhā, wyfe to the sayd duke, was accused of treason, for that she, by sorcery and enchaūteinēt, entended to destroy the kyng, to thentent to aduaunce and promote her husbande to the croune: vpon this she was examined in sainct Stephens chappell, xxx before the Bishop of Canterbury, and there by examinacion conuict & iudged, to do open penaunce, in.iij. open places, within the citie of London, and after that adiudged to perpetuall prisone in the Isle of Man, vnder the kepyng of sir Jhon Stāley, knight. At thesame season, wer arrested as ayders and counsaylers to the sayde Duchesse, Thomas Southwell, priest and chanon of saincte Stephens in Westmynster, Jhon Hum preest, Roger Bolyngbroke, a conyng nycromancier and Margerie Jourdayne, surnamed the witche of Eye, to whose charge it was layed, that thei, at the requeste of the duchesse, had deuised an image of waxe, presenting the kyng, whiche by their sorcery, a litle and litle cō-xl sumed, entendyng therby in conclusion to waist, and destroy the kynges person, and so to bryng hym to death, for the which treison, they wer adiudged to dye, & so Margery Jordayne was brent in smithfelde, & Roger Bolyngbroke was drawen & quartered at tiborne, takyng vpō his death, that there was neuer no suche thyng by theim ymagened, Jhon Hun had his pardon, & Southwell dyed in the toure before execution: the duke of Gloucester, toke all these thynges pacientlỹ, and sayed litle.

THE counsaill of Englande, forgat not the late enterprise of the Frēche kyng, doen in the duchie of Guyen, wherfore, to fortifie the countrey, least he peraduenture, would attempt again a like iorney, they sent thether sir William Wooduile, with.viij.hundred men, to fortifie the frontiers, till a greater armie might be assembled: And farther made publique proclamacion, that all men whiche would transporte, or cary any corne, chese, or other vitaile into the parties of Acquitayn, should paye no maner of custome or tallage, whiche licence caused that countrey, to be well furnished of all thinges necessarie and conuenient. About this season, the kyng remembring the valyaunt seruice, and noble actes of Jhon Lorde Talbot, created hym Erle of Shrewesburie, and with a company of .three M.men, sente hym again into Normandy, for the better tuicion of the same whiche neither forgat hys dutie, nor forslowed his businesse, but daily labored & hourely studied, how to molest & damage hys enemyes.

IN this yere, dyed in Guyen the Countesse of Comyng, to whom the Frenche kyng, and also the Erle of Armynacke, pretended to be heire, insomuche, that the Erle entered into all the landes of thesaied lady, as very inheritor to her of right, and tooke homage of the people of the countrey. But to haue a Rowland to resist an Oliuer: he sent solempne Ambassadors to the kyng of Englande, offeryng hym hys doughter in mariage, not onely promisyng hym siluer hilles, and golden mountaines with her, but also would be bound, to deliuer into the kyng of Englandes handes, all suche Castles and tounes, as he or hys auncestors deteyned from hym, within the whole duchie of Acquytayn or Guyen, either by conquest of hys progenitors, or by gyfte or deliuery of any Frenche kyng: offryng farther, to aide thesame kyng with money, for the recouery of other citees, within thesaied duchy, from hym and his auncestors, by the Frenche kynges progenitors, the lorde de Albrethe, and other lordes of Gascoyn, iniustly kept and wrongfully withholden. This offre semed bothe profitable, and honorable to kyng Henry and his realme, and so the Ambassadors, wer bothe well heard, and louyngly entertained, and inconclusion, with a gentle aunswere (not without great rewardes) they departed into their countrey: after whom wer sent for the conclusion of thesaied mariage into Guyen, sir Edward Hulle, sir Robert Roos, and doctor Jhon Grafton deane of sainct Seuerins with an honorable company, whiche (as all Englishe Cronographiers affirme) bothe concluded the mariage, and by proxie affied the young Lady. The Frenche kyng was not ignorant, of all these conclusions, wherfore disdainyng, that the Erle of Armynacke should bothe vsurpe agaynst hym; the Countie of Comyng, and also ioyne hymself, with hys mortall enemye, the kyng of Englande, to recouer his right, and to punishe his rebell, he sent Lewes his eldest sonne Dolphyn of Vyen, into

reuergne with a puissaunt army, whiche sodaynly toke the Erle of Armynacke, at the Isle in Jordayne, and his yongest sonne, and bothe his doughters, and by force obteined the countreis of Armynacke, Lonuergue, Rouergne and Moullesson, beside the citees of Seucrac and Cadenac, and chased the Bastarde of Armynacke out of his countrey, and cõstituted gouernor of all those seigniories, syr Theobald de Walpergne, batlif of Lyon. So by reason of this infortunate chaunce, the maciage concluded was differred, yea, and so long differred, that it neuer toke effect, as you shall heare more playnly declared.

The.xxii. yere.

HUs, while Englande was vnquieted, and Fraunce sore vexed, by spoyle, slaughter, and burnyng, all chzistendom lamented the continuall destruccion of so noble a realme, and the effusion of so muche chzisten bloud, wherfore to appease the mortall warre, so long continuyng betwene these twoo puysaunt kynges, all the pzinces of Chzistendom, so muche labored and trauailed, by their orators and Ambassadors, that the frostie hartes of bothe the parties, wer somewhat mollified, and their indurate stomackes, greatly asswaged. So there was a greate diete appoynted, to be kepte at the citee of Toures in Tourayne, where, for the kyng of Englande appered, William de la Pole erle of Suffolke, doctor Adame Wolyns, keper of the kynges pziuie seale, and Robert lorde Roos, and diuerse other: And for the Frenche kyng were appoynted, Charles Duke of Orleaũce, Lewes de Burbon erle of Uandosme, and greate Master of the Frenche kynges housholde, syr Piers de Bzesell Stewarde of Poytou, and Bartram Beautiau, Lorde of Pzecignye. There were also sente thether, Ambassadors from the Empire, from Spayne, from Denmarke, and frõ Hungary, to be mediators betwene these twoo pzinces. The assemble was greate, but the costes was muche greater, in somuche that euery parte, for the honor of their Pzince, and pzaise of their countrey, set furth themselfes, aswell in fare, as apparell, to the vttermoste poynt and highest pzike. Many metynges wer had, & many thynges moued, to come to a finall peace, and mutuall concord. But in conclusion, for many doubtes and greate ambiguities, whiche rose on bothe parties, a finall concord could not bee agreed, but in hope to come to a peace, a certain truce aswell by sea as by land, was concluded by the commissioners, for.xviij. monethes, whiche afterward, agayne was pzolonged to the yere of our Lorde. M.iii. C.xlix. if in the meane season it had not been violated & broken, as here after shalbe declared.

IN the treatyng of this truce, the Erle of Suffolke extendyng his cõmission to the vttermoste, without assent of his associates, imagened in hys phantasie, that the nexte waie to come to a perfite peace, was to moue some mariage, betwene the Frẽche kynges kynswoman, and king Henry hys souereigne: and because the Frenche kyng had no dough-

ter of ripe age, to be coupled in matrimony with the kyng hys Maister, he desired to haue the Lady Margaret, cosyn to the Frenche kyng, and doughter to Reyner duke of Anjow, callyng hymself kyng of Sicile. Napels, and Hierusalem, hauyng onely the name and stile of the same, without any peny profite, or fote of possession. This mariage was made straunge to therle a good space, in so muche that he repented hym of the fyrst mocio but yet lyke a bold man, entendyng not to take a foule in so greate a matter, desisted not still, daily to sollicitie and aduaunce forward his cause. The wily Frenchemen perceiuyng the ardent affection of the erle, toward the conclusion of mariage, declared to hym that this mariage, was not lyke to come to conclusion, as he desired, because the kyng his Maister, occupied a greate parte of the Duchie of Anjow, and the citee of Mauns, and the whole Countey of Mayne, appertenyng (as they sayed) to kyng Reyner, father to the damosell.

THE erle of Suffolke (I cannot saie) either corrupted with bribes; or to muche affeccionate to this vnprofitable mariage, condiscended and agreed to their motion, that the Duchie of Anjow, and the countie of Mayne, should be released and deliuered, to the kyng her father, demaundyng for her mariage, neither peny nor farthyng: (as who would saie) that thys newe affinitie, excelled riches, and surmounted gold and precious stone. And to thentent that of this truce, might ensue a fynall concorde, a daye of enteruieue or metyng was appoynted, betwene the two kynges in a place conuenient, betwene Chalters and Roan. When these thinges wer concluded, the Erle of Suffolke with hys company, thinkyng to haue brought ioyfull tidynges, to the whole realme of Englande, departed from Toures, and so by long iorneis, arriued at Douer, and came to the kyng to Westminster, and there openly before the kyng and hys counsaill, declared how he had taken an honorable truce, for the sauegard of Normandy, & the wealth of the realme, out of which truce, he thought, yea, and doubted not, but a perpetuall peace, and a fynall concorde, should shortly proceade and growe out. And muche the soner, for that honorable mariage, that inuincyble alliaunce, that Godly affinitie, whiche he had concluded: omitting nothyng, whiche myght extoll & setfurth, the personage of the Ladie, nor forgetting any thyng, of the nobilitie of her kynne, nor of her fathers high stile: as who would saie, that she was of suche an excellent beautie, and of so high a parentage, that almoste no kyng or Emperor, was worthy to be her make. Although this mariage pleased well the kyng, and diuerse of hys counsaill, and especially suche as wer adherentes, and fautors to the erle of Suffolke: yet Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Protector of the realme, repugned and resisted as muche as in hym laye, this new alliaunce and contriued matrimonie: alledgyng that it was neither consonaunt to the lawe of GOD nor man, nor honorable to a prince, to infrynge and breake a promise or contracte, by hym made and concluded, for the vtilitie and profite of his realme and people, declaryng, that the kyng, by his Ambassadors, sufficiently instructed and auctholised, had cõcluded and cõtracted, a mariage betwene his highnes, & the doughter of therle of Armynacke, vpon conditions, bothe to hym and his realme, asmuche profitable as honorable. Whiche offers and cõditions, thesaid erle lith his commyng out of his captyuitie and thraldome, is redi to yelde and performe, saiyng: that it was more conuenient for a Prince, to marie a wife with riches and frendes, then to take a make with nothyng, and disherite hymself and hys realme of olde rightes and auncient seigniories. The duke was not heard, but the Erles doynges, were condiscended vnto, and allowed. Whiche facte engendered suche a flame, that it neuer wente out, till bothe the parties with many other were consumed and slain, to the great vnquietnes of the kyng and his realme. And for the performaunce of these conclusions, the Frenche kyng sent the Erle of Vandosme, greate Master of hys house, & the Archebishop of Reyns, first pere of Fraunce, and diuerse other into England, whiche wer ioyously receiued, and frendly entertayned. Which ambassadors, after instrumentes on bothe parties, sealed and deliuered, (not vnrewarded) returned into their countrey. When these thinges were thus doen, the kyng, bothe for the honor of hys realme, and to assure to hymself, more speciall frendes, he created Lorde Jhon Holand Erle of Huntyngdon, Duke of Excester, as his father was, and Humfrey Erle of Stafford, was made duke of Buckyngham, and Henry Erle of Warwicke, was erected to the title of Duke of Warwicke, and the Erle of Suffolke, made Marques of Suffolke, whiche Marques with hys wyfe, & many honorable personages of men and women, richely adorned, bothe with apparell and Juels, hauyng with them many costly chariottes, & gorgious horselicters, sailed into Fraunce, for the conuenyaunce of the nominated Quene, into the realme of England. For kyng Reyner her father, for al his long stile, had to short a purse, to sende hys doughter honorably to the kyng her spouse.

The.xxiii.yere.

HIS noble company, came to the citee of Toures in Touraine, where they were honorably receiued, bothe of the Frẽch kyng, and of the kyng of Sicile. Wher the Marques of Suffolke, as procurator to kyng Henry, espoused thesaid Ladie in the churche of sainct Martyns. At whiche mariage were present, the father and mother of the bride, the Frenche kyng hymself, whiche was vncle to the husbande, and the Frenche quene also, whiche was awnte to the wife. There wer also, the dukes of Orleaunce, of Calaber, of Alaunson, and of Britayn. vii. Erles. xii. Barons. xx. Bishoppes, beside kinghtes and gentlemen. There wer triumphaunt Justes, costly feastes, and delicate banquettes, but all pleasure hath an ende, and euery ioye is not continuall. So that after these high solempnities

fynished, and these honorable ceremonies ended, the Marques had the Ladie Margaret to hym deliuered, whiche in greate estate, he conueyed through Normandy to Deape, and so transported her into Englande, where she landed at Portesmouthe, in the monethe of Aprill. This woman excelled all other, aswell in beautie and fauor, as in wit and politie, and was of stomack and corage, more like to a man, then a woman. Sone after her arriuall, she was conueyed to the toune of Southwike in Hamshire, where she, with all nupciall Ceremonies, was coupled in matrimony, to kyng Henry the.vi. of that name. After whiche mariage, she was with greate triumphe, conueyed to London, and so to Westminster, where vpon the.xxx. date of May, she with all solempnitie therunto apperteinyng, was Crouned Quene of thys noble realme of Englande. Who so would knowe, the costly receipt, the plealaunt companie, the gorgeous apparell, the diuersitie of Instrumentes, the straunge pagiauntes, the behauior of the Lordes, the beautie of the Ladies, the sumptuous feast, the delicate viander, the marciall tustes, the fierce turnais, the lustie daunces, & the minió longes, which wer shewed, setfurth and practised at her coronacion, let hym loke in the Chronicles of London, & of Robert Fabian, and there he shal finde thē set furth at the full.

THIS mariage semed to many, bothe infortunate, and vnprofitable to the realme of England, and that for many causes. First the kyng with her had not one peny, and for the fetchyng of her, the Marques of Suffolke, demaunded a whole fiftene, in open parliament: also for her mariage, the Duchie of Anjow, the citee of Mauns, and the whole cōtie of Mayne were deliuered and released to kyng Reyner her father, whiche countreis wer the very stayes, and backestandes to the Duchy of Normandy. Furthermore for this mariage, the Erle of Arminacke, toke suche great displeasure, that he became vtter enemy to the realme of Englande, and was the chief cause, that the Englishmen, were expulsed out of the whole duchie of Acquitayne, and lost bothe the countreis of Gascoyn and Guyen. But moste of all it should seme, that God with thys matrimony was not content. For after this spousage, the kynges frendes fell from hym, bothe in Englande and in Fraunce, the Lordes of his realme, fell in diuision emongest themselfes, the commons rebelled against their souereigne Lorde, and naturall Prince, feldes were foughten, many thousandes slayn, and finally, the kyng deposed, and hys sonne slayn, and thys Quene sent home agayn with asmuche misery and sorowe, as she was receiued with pompe and triumphe, suche is worldly vnstablenes, and so wauering is false flattering fortune.

DVRYNG the tyme of this truce, Richard duke of Yorke, and diuerse other capitaynes, repaired into England, bothe to visite their wifes children and frendes, and also to consulte, what should be doen, yf the truce ended.

FOR the whiche cause, the kyng called his high court of Parliament, in the whiche aboue al thinges, it was concluded, diligently to forsee, that Normandy be wel furnished and strongly defenced, before the terme of the truice should be expired: for it was openly knowen, that the Frenche kyng, was ready in al thinges, to make open warre, if no peace or abstinence of warre, were agreed or concluded. For whiche consideracion, money was graunted, men were apointed, and a great army gathered together. & the duke of Somerset, was appointed Regent of Normandy, and the duke of Yorke thereof xdischarged. In whiche Parliament, to please the people with all, it was enacted, that when whete was solde for. vi. s. viii. d. the quarter and Rye for. iiii. s.. and Barly for. iii. s. it should be lawfull to euery man to cary thesaid kyndes of corne, into the parties beiond the sea, without licence, so it were not to the kynges enemies or rebelles: whiche acte, kyng Edward the. iiii. for the vtilitie of his people, approued and confirmed.

THE Marques of Suffolke, beyng in hygh fauor with the kyng, and in no lesse grace with quene Margaret, for concluding the mariage betwene theim twoo, somewhat infected with the sede of vainglory, and thynkyng that his proceedinges and doynges in Fraunce. (duryng the xi tyme of his legacion) had aswell pleased all men, as they pleased hym self, the second day of June, in the first session of this parliament, before all the lordes spirituall & temporal, in the higher house assembled, openly, eloquently and boldely, declared his paine, trauaile and diligence, which he had taken and susteined of late tyme, in the realme of Fraunce, aswell for the takyng and concluding a truce or abstinence of warre, betwene the Realmes of Englande and of Fraunce, as in the makyng of the mariage betwene the kyng his souereigne lorde and theirs, and the noble Prynces lady Margaret, daughter to the kyng of Sicile and Hierusalem: Openyng also to them, that thesaid truce should expire the xxi first daie of Aprill next comming, except a finall peace or farther truce were concluded in the meane season: aduisyng them to prouide and forse all thynges necessary, for the warre (as though no concorde should succede, nor agrement could take place) least the Frenchemen perceiuyng theim vnprouiden, would take their aduauntage, and agree neyther to reason nor amytie: saiyng vnto theim, that sithe he had admonished the kyng, and them, accordyng to his duetie and allegeaunce, if any thyng quailed, or if daunger ensued, he was thereof innocent and gilteles, and had acquited hymselfe like a louing subiecte, and a faithfull counsailor, praiyng the lordes to haue it in their remembraunce. Lykewyse the morowe after, he with certain lordes, discended into the cõmon house, where xi he declared again all thesaied matters, to the knightes, Citezens and Burgesses, omittyng nothyng, that might sounde to his glory, nor openyng any thing, whiche might redound to his displayse: praiyng the cõmons for his discharge, that aswell all his doynges and procedynges in the kynges affaires beyond the sea, as also his aduertisement & counsaill, sayl, opened to the lordes and commons now together assembled, might be, by the kyng and theim, enacted and enrolled in the Recordes of the Parliament: wherupon the morowe after, William Burley, speaker for the commons and all the company of the nether house, repayred to the kynges presence, sitting in his trone, emongest his lordes in the Parliament chamber, where thesayed William Burley, by the counsayll of the commõs, (whether they did it more for feare then for loue, or were thereunto entised by the Marques frendes, as some men doubted) most humblie commended to the kynges highnes, the forsaied Marques of Suffolke, and all his actes and notable woorkes, whiche he had done, to the pleasure of almightie God, the honor of the kyng, and the vtilitie of the Realme: As in takyng the truce, concluding the mariage, and the good admonicion, geuen by hym in open Parliament, for prouision of warre to be made, duryng the tyme of truce, leaste to muche trustyng of peace, might encorage the Frenchemen, the soner to begyn warre and inuasiõ: beseechyng the kynges highnes, in the name of the commons, to imprynt in his hart and remẽbraunce, thesaid Marques, and all his labors and actes, to his honor and renoune, which should be an example to all other, whiche the kyng should call to like seruice, to employ themselfes in lyke endeuor, faythfully and honorably to serue their kynge and souereigne lorde: praiyng also the lordes spirituall and temporall, that they for the considerations before rehersed, would vouchesaue to make like petition to the kynges maiestie, and that all the actes and demeanor of thesaied Marques, might by authoritie of parliamẽt, be to his honor, & perpetuall fame, in the rolles of thesame Parliament, recorded and substantially registered. At whiche humble intercession, the lordes, aswell spirituall as temporal, rose from their seates, and on their knees, made to the kyng like request and petition, as they of the commons before were desired: wherupon, the kyng by the mouthe of the Archebyshop of Canterbury his Chauncellor, made answer, that their requestes were so reasonable and so honourable, that he in no wise could, but louingly accept and gently alowe thesame, sayng also: that their desires, were to him a singuler pleasure, and an especiall comforte, and that he woulde from thencefurthe accepte and take thesaied Marques to his benigne grace, and especiall fauoure, as a persone, whiche had doone bothe true, faythfull, and notable seruice to hym and to his Realme, to the intent, that all men put in like trust, should enforce theim selfes, to doo lyke or better seruice to their souereigne Lorde or Master: agreyng also (accordyng to their requestes and peticions) that the labours, demeanours, diligences, and declaracions of thesaied Marques of Suffolke, and thesaied commendacions and desires, not only of the lordes, but also of the commons, aswell for the honor of hym and his posteritie, as for his acquital and discharge, should be enacted, and enrolled in the Recordes of thesame parliament, whiche was so done. This Marques thus gotten vp, into fortunes trone, not content with his degree, by the meanes of the Quene,

was shortely erected to the estate and degree of a Duke, and ruled the kyng at his pleasure, in so muche, he obteined the wardshyppes, bothe of body and landes of the Coũtesse of Warwicke, and of the lady Margarete, sole heire to Jhon Duke of Somerset (whiche lady was after, mother to kyng Henry the seuenth) and besyde that, caused the kyng to create Jhon de Foys, sonne to Gaston de Foys, Erle of Longuile, and Capdaw of Buchez, Erle of Kendale: which Jhon had maried his niece, and by his procurement, the kyng elected into the order of the Garter, thesaied Gaston, and Jhon his sonne, geuyng to the sonne, towardes the x maintenaunce of his degree and estate, landes and Castles, in the Duchie of Guyen, amountyng to the some of one thousand poundes by the yere, whiche landes, name, and stile, the issue and lyne of thesaied Erle of Kendall at this daye haue, and enioye.

HERE a man may beholde, what securitie is in worldly glory, and what constancie is in fortune smilyng: For this Duke of Suffolke, in open Parliament of the Lordes prayed, of the commons thanked, and into the kynges fauor, entierly receyued, within foure yeres after, was in thesame place, by the commons of the Realme, accused of many treasons, misprisions and offences, done and committed agaynst the kyng, xx and the common wealthe of his Realme, and in conclusion, beyng exiled the realme, he was taken vpon the sea, and made shorter by the hedde, whiche chaunce had not happened to him, if he had remẽbred the counsayll of the poppyngay, saiyng: when thou thinkest thy self in courte most surest, then is it high tyme to get the home to rest.

THESE thynges beyng in doyng, the Frenche kyng seyng, that the toune of Mauns, and diuerse fortresses in Mayne, were not to hym deliuered, accordyng to the appoyntment made, gathered together a great numbre of people, for to recouer thesame: wherof the kyng of Englande beyng aduertysed, (least the breache of truce should begynne by hym) xxx caused the toune to be deliuered, without any force.

THIS yere, an Armerers seruaunt of London, appeled his master of treason, whiche offered to bee tried by battaill. At the daie assigned, the frendes of the master, brought hym Walmesey and Aqua vite, to comfort hym with all, but it was the cause of his and their discomforte: For he poured in so muche, that when he came into the place in Smithfielde, where he should fyght, bothe his wytte and strength fayled hym: and so he beyng a tall and a hardye personage, ouerladed with hote drynkes, was vanquished of his seruaunte, beyng but a cowarde and a wretche, whose body was drawen to Tyborne, & there hanged and behedded. Jn xl whiche yere was a greate insurrection in Norwiche, agaynst the Prior of the place, in so muche that the cytezens kepte the gates, agaynst the Duke of Norfolke, whiche came thither to appease the matter: But in conclusion, they opened the gates, and submitted theimselfes. The chiefe offenders, were (according to their desertes) straightly punished, and executed, and the Waire was discharged of his office, and syr Jhon Clifton was made gouernoure there, tyll the kyng had restored the citezens to their auncient liberties, and franchyses. This commocion, was for certain newe exaccions, whiche the Prior claimed and tooke of the citezens, contrary to their auncient fredomes and vsages: but this was not the dewe meane to come to their right and purpose, and therefore because they erred and wente out of the pathe, they were by punishemente brought againe to a very strayght trade and the ryght way.

The. xxv. yere.

Uryng the tyme of this truce or abstinence of warre, whyle there was nothyng to vexe or trouble the mynades of men, within the realme, a sodain mischiefe, and a long discorde, sprang out sodaynly, by the meanes of a woman: for kyng Henry, whiche reigned at this tyme was a man of a meke spiritie, and of a symple wytte, preferryng peace before warre, reste before busynesse, honestie before profite, and quietnesse before labour. And to the intent that all men might perceiue, that there could be none, more chaste, more meke, more holy, nor a better creature: In hym reigned shamefastnesse, modestie, integritie, and pacience to bee marueiled at, takyng and suffryng all losses, chaunces, displeasures, and suche worldely tormentes, in good parte, and with a pacient maner, as though they had chaunced by his awne fault, or neglygent ouersight: yet he was gouerned of them whome he shoulde haue ruled, and prydeled of suche, whome he sharpely should haue spurred: He gaped not for honor, nor thirsted for ryches, but studied onely for the health of his soule: the sauyng wherof, he esteemed to bee the greatest wisedome, and the losse thereof, the extremest folye that coulde bee. But on the other parte, the Quene his wyfe, was a woman of a great witte, and yet of no greater wytte, then of haute stomacke, desirous of glory, and couetous of honor, and of reason, pollicye counsaill, and other giftes and talentes of nature, belongyng to a man, full and flowyng: of witte and wilinesse she lacked nothyng, nor of diligence, studie, and businesse, she was not vnexperte: but yet she had one poynt of a very woman: for often tyme, when she was vehement & fully bente in a matter, she was sodainly lyke a wethercocke, mutable, and turnyng. This woman perceiuyng that her husbande dyd not frankely rule as he would, but did all thyng by thaduise and counsaill of Hũfrey duke of Gloucester, and that he passed not muche on the aucthoritie and gouernaunce of the realme, determined with her selfe, to take vpon her the rule and regiment bothe of the kyng and his kyngdome, & to depriue & euict out of al rule and aucthoritie, the said duke, then called the lord protector of the realme: least men should saie & repoꝛt, ỹ she had neither wit nor stomacke, whiche would permit & suffre her husband, beyng of perfect age & mãs estate, like a yong scholer or innocent pupille, to be

gouerned by the disposicion of another man. This manly woman, this corragious Quene, ceased not to prosecute furthwith, her inuented imaginacion and prepensed purpose, but practised daily the furtheraunce of thesame. And allthough this inuencio̅ came first of her awn high mind, and ambicious corage, yet it was furthered and set forward by such, as of long tyme had borne malice to the duke, for declaryng their vntruthe as you before haue heard. Whiche venemous serpentes, and malicious Tygers, perswaded, incensed and exhorted the Quene, to loke wel vpon the expenses and reuenues of the realme, and thereof to call an accompt: & affirmyng playnly that she should euidently perceiue that the Duke of Gloucester, had not so muche aduaunced & preferred the commo̅ wealth and publique vtilitie, as his awne priuate thinges & peculiar estate. Beside this, Reyner kyng of Sicile, wrote to his daughter, that she & her husbande, should take vpon them, the rule & gouernaunce of the realme, and not to be kept vnder, like yong wardes and desolate orphanes. The Quene perswaded and encoraged by these meanes, toke vpon her & her husband, the high power and aucthoritie ouer the people and subiectes. And although she ioyned her husbande with her in name, for a countenaunce, yet she dyd all, she saied all, and she bare the whole swynge, as && the strong oxe doth, whe̅ he is yoked in the plough with a pore silly asse: And first of all she excluded the duke of Gloucester, from all rule and gouernaunce, not prohibityng suche as she knewe to be his mortall enemies, to inuent and imagyne, causes and griefes, agaynst hym and hys: so that by her permissio̅, and fauor, diuerse noble men conspired against hym, of the whiche, diuerse writers affirme, the Marques of Suffolke, and the duke of Buckyngham to bee the chiefe, not vnprocured by the Cardynall of Wynchester, and the Archebyshop of Yorke. Diuerse artikles, bothe heynous and odious, were layed to hys charge in open counsaill, and in especiall one, that he had caused men adiudged to dye, to be &&& put to other execucion, then the law of the land had ordered or assigned: for surely the duke being very well learned in the lawe ciuill, detestyng malefactors, and punishing their offences, gat great malice and hatred of suche, as feared to haue condigne reward for their vngracious actes and mischeuous doynges. Although the duke (not without great laude and prayse) sufficiently aunswered to all thinges to him obiected, yet because his death was determined, his wisedome litle helped, nor his truth small auailed: But of this vnquietnes of mynde, he delyuered hymself, because he thought neither of death, nor of condempnacion to dye: suche affiaunce had he in his strong truthe, and suche confidence had he in in- &l different iustice. But his capital enemies and mortall foes, fearyng that some tumulte or commocion myght aryse, if a Prince so well beloued of the people, should bee openly executed, and put to death, determined to trappe and vndoo hym, or he therof shoulde haue knowlege or warnyng. So for the furtheraũce of their purpose, a parliament was somoned to be kept at Bery, whether resorted all the peres of the realme, and emongest them, the duke of Glouceſter, whiche on the ſecond date of the ſeſſion, was by the lorde Beamond, then hygh Conſtable of Englande, accompanied with the duke of Buckyngham, and other, arreſted, apre-hended. and put in warde, and all his ſeruauntes ſequeſtered from hym, and. xxxii. of the chiefe of his retinue, were ſent to diuerſe pryſons, to the greate admiracion of the common people. The duke the night after his empryſonment, was found dedde in his bed, and his body ſhewed to the lordes and commons, as though he had died of a palſey or empoiſone: but all indifferent perſons well knewe, that he died of no natural death, but of ſome violēt force: ſome iudged hym to be ſtrangled: ſome affirme, that a hote ſpitte was put in at his foundement: other write, that he was ſtiffeled or ſmoldered betwene twoo fetherbeddes. After whoſe deathe, none of his ſeruauntes (although they were arraigned & attainted) were put to death: for the Marques of Suffolk, when they ſhould haue bene executed, ſhewed openly their pardon, but this doyng appeaſed not the grudge of the people, whiche ſaied that the pardone of the ſeruauntes, was no amendes for morderyng of their maſter. The dedde corſe of the Duke, was caried to ſainct Albons, and there honorably buried. Thus was this noble pryncc, ſonne, brother, and vncle to kynges, whiche had valeauntly and poletiquely by the ſpace of. xxv. yeres gouerned this Realme, and for his demerites, called the good duke of Glouceſter, by a bone caſt by his enemies, choked and brought to his fatall fyne, and laſt ende. So all men may openly ſe, that to men in aucthoritie, no place no not the courte the chiefe refuge of all, nor the dwellyng houſe, nor yet a mannes priuate Caſtle, or his bed ordeyned for his quietnes, is out of daunger of deathes dart. It ſemeth to many men, that the name and title of Glouceſter, hath bene vnfortunate and vnluckie to diuerſe, whiche for their honor, haue bene erected by creacion of princes, to that ſtile and dignitie, as Hugh Spencer, Thomas of Woodſtocke, ſonne to kynge Edwarde the third, and this duke Humfrey, whiche thre perſons, by miſerable death finiſhed their daies, and after them kyng Richard the. iii. alſo, duke of Glouceſter, in ciuil warre was ſlain and cōfounded: ſo that this name of Glouceſter, is takē for an vnhappie and vnfortunate ſtile, as the prouerbe ſpeaketh of Seianes horſe, whoſe ryder was euer vnhorſed, and whoſe poſſeſſor was euer brought to miſerie. When the rumor of the dukes death, was blowen through the realme, many men were ſodainly appalled and amaſed for feare: many abhorred & deteſted the fact, but all men reputed it an abhominable crueltie, and a ſhameful tiranny. But the publique wealth of the realme of Englande, by the vnworthy death of this pollitique prince, ſuſteined greate loſſe, & ran into ruine, for ſurely the whole waight and burden of the realme, reſted & depended vpon him, as the experience afterward did declare. For after his death, good & ſage men fearing thē ſelfes, fled out of ỹ flatteryng court. into whoſe place entered ſuche as deſyryng their awne promocion, ſet open the gates to new factions, whiche could neuer be extinct, till all the seignozies beyõd the sea (except Caleice & the marches) were lost, & kyng Henry in cõclusion spoyled of his Realme & lyfe. There is an olde sayed saw, that a man entending to auoide the smoke, falleth into the fyze: So here, the Quene minding to pzeserue her husband in honoz, & her selfe in aucthozitie, pzocured & consentid to the death of this noble man whole onely death bzought to passe that thynge, which she woulde moste fayne haue eschewed, and toke from her that iewell, whiche she moost desyzed: foz if this Duke had lyued, the Duke of Yozke durst not haue made title to the crowne: If this Duke had liued, the nobles had not conspired x against the king, noz yet the cõmons had not rebelled: If this duke had lyued, the house of Lancaster had not bene defaced and destroied, which thinges hapened al contrary by the destruccion of this good man. This is the wozldly iudgement, but God knoweth, what he had pzedestinate, and what he had ozdeined befoze, against whose ozdinaunce pzeuaileth no counsaill, and against whose will auaileth no striuing.

xx IN this. xxvi. yere of the reigne of this kyng, but in the first yere of the rule of the Quene, I synde nothyng done wozthye to be rehersed, wythin the Realme of Englande, but that the Marques of Suffolke by great fauour of the kynge, and moze desyzed of the Quene, was erected to the title, and name of the duke of Suffolke, whiche dignitie he shozte tyme enioyed & which degre, he but a bziefe leasõ possessed. Foz after the deposicion oz rather the destruccion of the good duke of Gloucester, and the exaltacion and aduauncement of this glozious man: Rychard duke of Yozke, beyng greatly alied by his wyfe, to the chefe peres and potentates of the Realme, ouer and besyde hys awne pzogenie and greate consanguynitie, perceiuyng the kyng to be a ruler not ruling, and the whole burden of the realme, to depend in the ozdinaunces of the Quene and the xxx duke of Suffolke, began secretly to allure to his frendes of the nobilitie, and pziuatly declared to them, his title and right to the Crowne, and lykewyse dyd he to certayne wyse and sayge Gouernours and Rulers of diuerse cyties and tounes: which pziue attempt was so politiquely handeled and so secretly kept, that his pzouision was ready, befoze his purpose was openly publyshed, and hys frendes opened theim selfes oz the contrary parte coulde them espye: But in conclusion tyme reueled truth and olde hyd hatred openly spzage out, as you shall hereafter bothe lament and heare.

The. xxvi. yere.

DVRING these doynges, Henry Beaufford, byshop of Wynchexl ster, and called the ryche Cardynall, departed out of this wozlde, and was buried at Wynchester. This man was sonne to Jhon of Gaunte duke of Lancaster, disceded on an honozable lignage, but bozne in Baste, moze noble of bloud, then notable in learnyng, haut in stomacke, and hygh in countenaunce, ryche aboue measure of all men, & to fewe liberal, disdaynfull

disdaynfull to his kynne and dreadfull to his louers, preferrynge money before frendshippe, many thinges begynning, and nothing perfour-myng. His couetous insaciable, and hope of long lyfe, made hym bothe to forget God, his Prynce and hymselfe, in his latter daies: For doctor Jhon Baker his priuie counsailer, and hys chapellayn, wrote, that he lyeng on his death bed said these wordes. Why should I dye, hauing so muche ryches, if the whole Realme would saue my lyfe, I am able either by pollicie to get it, or by ryches to bye it. Fye, will not death be hyered, nor will money do nothyng? when my nephew of Bedford died, I thought my selfe halfe vp the whele, but when I sawe myne other nephew of Gloucester diseased, then I thought my self able to be equale with kinges, and so thought to encrease my treasure in hoope to haue worne a tripple Croune. But I se nowe the worlde fayleth me, and so I am de-ceyued: praiyng you all to pray for me. Of the gettyng of thys mannes goodes, both by power, legantye or spirituall briberie I wil not speake: but the keppynge of them for his ambicious purpose, aspyrynge to ascend to the papisticall sea, was bothe great losse to his naturall Prynce, and natyue countrey: for his hidden riches might haue wel holpen the kyng, and his secrete treasure might haue releued the cõmonaltie, whē money was scante and importunate charges, were dayly imminent. After the death of this prelate, whiche was a great stay to the kyng & the Realme, the affayres in Fraunce, were neither well loked to, nor the gouernours of the countrey were well aduised. For an Englishe capitayn, called syr Franceys Surryen the Arragonoys, a man for hys wyt and actiuitie admitted to the ordre of the Gartier, toke by scalynge sodaynly in the night, a Towne on the frontiers of Normandie, belongyng to the duke of Britayn, called Fongiers, spoyling the same, and kyllynge the inhabitauntes to the great distruccion of the people, and more displeasure to the duke of Brytayn, their souereigne lorde. The Duke beynge thereof aduertysed, sent worde to the Frenche kynge, declarynge to hym that in the tyme of truce (in the which, he as his allye and vassal was cõprehendyd) he was spoyled and bereuyd of his towne of Fongiers: Besechyng the Frenche kynge, in that cause to se a recompensse and amendemente: whereupon he sent Jhon Hauart his caruar, & Jhon Colynet one of the masters of his requestes to the kyng of Englande: & to the duke of Somerset, he dispatched Peter de Fountaynes Esquyer, & one of the chife of his stable, to whome by bothe the Princes, it was aunswered, that the facte and enterpryse was both done contrary to there mynde, wyll and knowledge. And for the truce to be kept, and not onely restitucion, but also amendes to be made to the Duke of Britayne, a daye of dyet and assemble was appointed to be kept at the town of Louiers. At the time appointed both the parties assembled: The Frenche parte demaunded amendes, with no lytle recompense: The Englyshe orators aunswered, that without offence, nothing by iustice, ought to be satisfied: affir-ming the doynge of syr Fraunceys Surrien, to be his onely acte, withoute the consent or counsaill, either of the kyng of England, or the duke of Somerset his lieuctenaũt and regent. During this daily communication & longe delaye, certayne Frenchemen, frendes to the duke of Britayne, desyring to be reuenged of the iniurie done to hym at Fongiers, and also imagening, how to do some new displeasure to the Englishemẽ, were aduertised by a wagoner of Louiers, ỹ the town of Poũtclarche, was but meanly manned and slenderly furnyshed, and the watche was but negligently loked to: With whiche saiynges the Frenchemen beynge somwhat encouraged, deuysed a waye, howe by pollicie to take the towne.

x So the wagoner laded his wagon, and passed forward, hauing in his company .ii. lytõg varlettes clad like carpenters, with great axes in their neckes. And for the furtheraũce of their purpose, the lord of Bressy, with a chosen company of men of armes, lodged him selfe in a busshement nere to the gate of sainct Andrewe. And capitayn Floquet, accompanied with sir James of Claremoũt, and an other great company, priuily lurked vnder a wood toward Louiers. When al thinges were appoynted, early in the morning in the beginning of the moneth of October, the wagonet came to the gate, and called the porter by name, prayng him to open the gate, that he might passe to Roen, and returne agayne the same xx night. The porter (whiche well knew the voice of his customer) toke little hede to the other .ii. companions & so opened the one gate, and sent another felowe of his, to open the formost gate. When the Charriotte was on the draw bridge, betwene both the gates, the Chariotmaster gaue the porter money, and for the nones, let one pece falle to the ground, & while the porter stoped to take it vp, the wagoner with his dagger stroke him in at his throte, so that he cried for no healpe, and the .ii. great lubbers slew the other porters, and with their axes cutte the axeltree of the wagone, so that the drawe bridge could not be shortelye drawen vp. Which thinges done, they made a sygne to capitaine Floquet, which, without delay or tract of time, entered the town, and slew and toke the Englishmẽ, which neither heard nor thought of any such enterprice: emõgest whom, the lorde Faucombridge, capitayne of the said towne, was apprehended as a prysoner. By this pretye cautele & slyght imposture, was the toune of Pountelarche taken and surprised, which town was the kay and passage ouer the riuer of Somme, from Fraunce to Normandy, beyng distant from Roen, only .iiii. leagues. Thus wrong was added to wrong, & iniurie heped to iniurie, wherby the terme of truce was violated, & mortall warre was reuiued. But because ỹ taking of this fortresse, had a certain colour of breking of truce. The duke of Somerset by ambassadors xl & not by force of armes, deuised to recouer again this pretye toun, & sent for ỹ restituciõ of the same, diuerse ambassadors to the Frẽche kyng & his coũsail, which made aũswer again, that if the Englishmen restored to the duke of Brytayn, the toun of Fõgiers with cõdigne amẽdes, for the damages done & cõmitted within the same, the town of Poũtlarche should agayne be rendered and deliuered: for the Frenche kynge and his coun-

sayll began now to perceyue and smell, that the affayres of Englande, by the death of the duke of Gloucester, were sore minished and decayed, and that good counsayll began to waxe faynte and decay, and sedicion freshely began to sprynge and ryse: By reason whereof, they thoughte that Normandye might sone be conqueted and recouered, and that the Englishe nacion out of that region might easely be expulsed and dryuen out: wherfore they determined to take the good occasion to them openly offered, & to lose no tyme in so good a bargaine. Wherupon kyng Charles diuided his armye into thre partes, not doubtyng of victory, by reason that the fame of the cõquest of Pountclarche, was blowen & spread abrode ouer al the countrey. So after diuers assautes (not without losse of diuers of his men) he had rendered to him by cõposicion, the tounes of Louiers and Gerborie, whereof William Harper was capitayn. Thus prosperous victorie dayly succedinge to the Frenche kynges armye, he augmenting his hooste, determined to get the towne of Vernoyle in perche, & gyrd it round about with a strong seage. The inhabitaũtes wherof, although with the sodaine chaunce they were somwhat abashed, yet hauing some succours, and hopinge of more releke, tooke to them good courage, and mankully defended the towne. But when their ayde taryed lenger, then they either thought or desyred, they were compelled to compounde and pact with their enemies, vpon this condicion: That if the seage were not reysed within twenty daies, that then they should depart with bagge and baggage, whiche condition was accepted: And because no rescous came, the toune, Castel and the great Tour, were deliuered. The Frenche historians affirme, the towne to be taken by assaute, and the Castell by composicion, but all writers agree, that the Frenchemen obteyned it. Thus was warre renued before the full terme of the truce expyred, whiche was the moost detestable and vnprofitable chaunce, that either coulde, or might haue happened or come, to the realme of England. For by this sodayn damage & losse, without thought arisyng, the Englishe capitaynes were so busyed & vnquieted, what with appeasyng dayly rumors within townes, and what with study how to recouer Castels lost and taken, that they scace wyste, what waye to take: For while they studied, how to kepe and defende one citie. iiii. or. v. other, folowing fortunes chaunce, turned to the Frenche parte, and became their enemies. The cheke cause of which reuolting and turning was this: It was blowen throughout all Fraunce, that the realme of Englande, after the death of the duke of Gloucester, by the seuerall factions of princes, was diuided in twoo partes, and that William de la Pole, late created duke of Suffolke, and diuers other, were the occasion of the death of the saied duke of Gloucester, whiche was the very father of the countrye, and the shield and defence of the poore cõmonaltie, and that the forenamed duke of Suffolke, onely for lucre of money, vexed, oppressed and molested the poore people, so that mens myndes were not intentiue, nor geuen to outward affayres and foren conquestes, but all theire studie was, howe

to dryue

to dryue backe and defende domesticall iniuries, and daily wrõges done at home: By reason whereof men of warre were vnpayed, and no armye for resistence was either gathered or assẽbled together: which mischiefes (while the kyng, as thynges of the worlde, and of no great moment, dyd neglect and omit, as he which preferred & extolled godly thinges, aboue all worldly affaires and mortall cures, and thought thẽ most to be phãtasied and labored: And while quene Margarete his wife, in whome the whole rule of the realme consisted, being a woman of to muche credence geuing, to euill & flattering cõsailors, them litle regarded) daily so much encreased, that by no meanes after they coulde be either ouercome or resisted: so that by this meanes, the Frenche nacion knewe in what case the state of the realme of Englande stode in, whiche elated and encouraged their hartes, and daunted and appalled the courages of the Normans & Gascoyns, so muche that for lacke of ayde and relefe, they turned to the Frenche parte, and forsoke their very souereigne lorde the kyng of Englande in shorte space, as you shall here after heare.

¶ The. xxvii. yere.

IT was not enough, the realme of Englãd this season thus to be vexed and vnquieted with the busines of Normãdy, but also a newe rebellion began in Irelande, to the greate displeasure of the kyng and his counsayll: For repressing whereof Richard Duke of Yorke, with a conuenient number of men was sent thyther, as lieuetenaunt to the kynge, whiche not onely appeased the fury of the wylde, and sauage people there, but also gat hym suche loue and fauour of the countrey and the inhabytauntes, that their syncere loue and frendly affection coulde neuer be seperated from hym and his linage, as in the sequele of this story, you shall more playnely perceyue. The Frenchemen hauyng perfyte vnderstandynge of the infirmitie and vnreadinesse of the Realme of Englande, displayed their banners, and set furthe their armyes, and in shorte space gat by yeldyng, Constance, Gysors, Castel, Gaillard Ponteau du mere, sainct Lo, Fescampe, Newchastell, Alanson, Toucque, Wanleon, Argenton, Lisiaux Argenton, and diuerse other townes in Normandy: Likewyse in Guyen was the towne of Maulissone rendered to the Erle of Foys. These townes were not yelded voluntarily by the Englysshe souldiors, but they were thereunto compelled by the cytizens and the inhabitauntes of the townes, whiche apparauntly perceiuyng, that the great flãme of the Englisshe force was extinct and consumed, rose against the Captaines, and either opened the gates to their enemies, or constrained them to render vpon a composicion. By whiche enforcement was the riche citie of Roan delyuered: for surely the duke of Somerset & the lorde Talbot Erle of Shrowesbury, had well kept and defended the citie, if they had bene no more vexed with the cytezens, then they were with their enemyes. For after the Frenche kyng had once by his Herault somoned the cytie,

eytie, the inhabitauntes not only sought ways & inuented fraudes, how to betray the same, but also put on harnes and rebelled against their capitaynes, manacyng to the death & destruccion al the Englysshe people. The capitaines perceiuing their vntrought, and trayterous demeanour retrayted them selfes into the Castell or Palaice, where they a certayne space with arrowes and handgonnes, sore molested and vexed the vnfrew citezens. But when they cõsidered the great puyssaũce of the Frẽch kyng, and that they were indispayre of all ayde or relefe, and that their victayle and artyllarye began sore to minisshe, they thoughte it better to compounde and agree with their enemies, rather then wylfully to be destroyed or dye for famyn: and so vpon condicion that they all should safely departe to Caen with all their goodes and armure, and that certain townes should be deliuered by a daye, they were permitted to departe: leauing behinde them for hostages, tyll the sayd townes (whiche were agreed to be rendered) should be deliuered, the Erle of Shzeuelbury and the lorde Butler, sonne to the Erle of Ormonde, whiche were sent to the Castell of Eureux, because they sore feared the malice of the Citezens of Roen. The Frenchemen folowyng stil the steppes of victorie, and elated with the bruite and fame of getting of Roen, determined either by force or offer, to get the Towne of Harfflew, and shortely assauted thesame, whet of was capitayn syr Thomas Conelon a man of great wytt and of no lesse force: whiche hauing knowlege of the heauy tidynges, brought from Roen, was therewith nothyng abashed, but couragiously set vpon his enemies, and them to their great hurt, manfully repulsed and draue from the walles. The Frenche men learning wit by this great perill, left their scalynge and deuysed dayly, howe to batter and breake the walles and fortificacions. This seage long continued to the great losse of both parties. When syr thomas sawe small lykelyhod of ayde or gayne, but muche apparaunce of losse and ieopardy, he toke a conuencion with his enemies, and so departed with all his goodes.

After whiche towne rendered, the fortresse of Hunflew, vpon the same compositiõ was yelded. Thus you may perceiue, ỹ fortune is euer without measure, for either she to much fauoreth or to much hateth: for beside these tounes surrendered in Normãdy, the duke of Britaine recouered againe Fongiers, sent Jhon de Buerne and diuers other townes. In the meane season, the kyng of Englãd sent into Normandy w a crew of .M.v.c.cccc. men, a valiaũt capitain, called sir Thomas Kiriel: a man of great stomack, if he had had a great army, but his power was to small, either to recouer that whiche was lost, either to saue that, whiche yet remayned vngotten: But surely in hym lacked neither good wyll nor courage, for with his small number, he recouered agayn the townes of Lyseaux and Valongnes. After whiche

After which feate, he ioyned hymself with sir Henry Nozbery, sir Robert Ueere, Matthew Gough, and other capitaynes, so that they were aboue fiue thousande men, of valiaunt hartes and haute courages, After long consultacion, they determined to fight with the Frenchmen, whiche wer goyng to the siege of Caen, but in their iourney they were encountered at a place called Fozmigny, betwene Carentyne and Bayeux, by the erle of Cleremont, lieuttenaunt foz the Frenche kyng, the Stewarde of Poytou, and the lozde of Rays admirall of Fraunce, with sixe hundzed men of armes, and sixe thousand other, whiche skirmished with the Englishmen a greate season. Duryng whiche skirmishe, there arriued Arthur erle of Richemond, high Constable of Fraunce, James of Luxenbozough. erle of Lauall, with a greate numbze of hozsemen and freshe fotemen. After his commyng, he and all the Frenchmen set on thenglish men, beyng faint and wery with the long skirmishe. This battaill was soze fought, but in conclusion, the Englishmē wer discomfited, and put to flight, and of theim slayn aboue. iiij. M: and. viij. C. taken pzysoners, where of, sir Thomas Kiriell, sir Henry Nozbery, & sir Thomas Dzeue wer the chief, sir Robert Uere and Matthewe Gough saued themselfes. This was the first foughten feld, that the Frenchmen gatte on the Englishmen in many peres, wherfoze, I blame theim not, though they of a litle, make muche, and set furthe all, and hide nothing, that maye sounde to their glozy. They declare what nūbze thei slew, but thei wzite not how many of them wer slayn noz destroyed.

AFTER this victozy obteined, the Frenche kyng hearyng that the Duke of Somerset was in the toune of Caen, thought that he had nothyng doen, yf he permitted the duke still to tary in Nozmandy, whiche by newe aide and freshe succozs, might tozne the whele of Foztune, into a contrary parte, and peraduenture recouer all that had been loste, oz put the realme of Fraunce in ieoperdy: wherfoze lyke a wyse pzince entendyng to pzeuent thynges cummen & at hande, assembled an armye roiall, & in his awne persone, hauyng in hys campe Reyner, called kyng of Scicile, father to the Quene of Englande, the duke of Calaber and Alaunson, the erles of Cleremont, Richemōd, Mayne, Dumoys, Sent Polle, and Dampemartyne, beside many noble Barons and valiaunte knyghtes, when all thinges were ready, as oppoztunitye of tyme serued: He caused the Toune to bee enuironed on euery side, assignyng to his capitaines seuerall places of the toune to bee assauted, and there to pzoue their manhod: The erle of Dumoys, with moze losse then gain entred into a bulwarke and was beaten backe. Thenglishemen within the toune kept silence as though they knewe not of their enemyes approchyng, but euery man kept his loupe, and euery capitayn well ouerloked his ward. The Frenchemen with quarelles, mozispikes, slynges, and other engynes, began to assaut the walles: but of the Englishemen within, some shot fiercely with long bowes, other cast dartes, and rolled doune greate stones and barres of Iron: other cast doune Iauelyns,

firebrandes,hote leade, and balles with pitche and brymstone, like burnyng fire flampng:some cast doune and ouerthrewe the scalyng ladders and slewe suche as clymed vp the walles: neither courage lacked in the assault,nor manhode, nor pollicie in the defence:for on the embatelmētes of the walles wer set greate tolles of tymbre,so mouing and vnstedfaste,that neither scalyng ladder could catche any holde, nor no persone that should clyme vp,could set any sure fotyng. The French kyng,perceiuyng that this assaute litle or nought preuayled hym,sent for all hys greate ordinaunce to Paris,determinyng neuer to departe, till he had conquered the toune,either with sworde or famyn. When the ordinaūce was brought,he daily shot at the walles, and did some hurte:but to the Castle, whiche stode on a rocke, and in it a dongeon vnhable to be beaten doune, he did no harme at all. In this toune was the duke of Somerset,his wyfe and chyldren, but he was not capitain,for the Duke of Yorke owner of the toune, by the kynges gifte had appoynted there his capitayn generall,sir Dauy Halle,and of the castle,sir Robert Ueer,and of the dongeon,sir Henry Radford.Daily the shot was greate,but more terrible then hurtfull.Sauyng one daye,a stone shot into the toune, fell betwene the duches of Somerset,and her chyldren,whiche,beyng amased with this chaunce, prayed on her knees her husbande,to haue mercy and compassion of his small enfantes,and that they might be deliuered out of the toune in sauegard. The duke more piteous thē hardy,moued with the dolour of his wyfe,and loue of his chyldrē,assembled the capitaines and magistrates of the toune, declaryng to theim, the power and puyssaunce of the Frenche kyng,and their debilitie and weakenes, perswadyng theim rather to yelde and rendre vpon honest conditions, then obstinatly to resist,and foolishly to perysshe. Sir Dauy Halle, capitain of the toune, aunswered to hym, saiyng: my lorde, although you bee the kynges lieuetenaunt generall, within this countrey and dominion, and made by force of your authoritie,deliuer, sell or geue,any of the kynges townes,to suche persones,either frendes or enemies,as shall please you: yet I am sure that you cut your lether to large,to intreate or speake of the renderyng of thys toune,apperteining to my lord & master,Richard duke of Yorke, whiche thereof hath geuenme bothe the charge and custody,with other of my trusty frendes and felowes,and whiche with the helpe of almightie God,I shall well defende, bothe against the Frenche kyng and all his puissaunce,till the duke my master come to succor me: for of men,money and municious,I trust I haue sufficient. Why sayed the duke,am not I here the kynges deputie,representyng his persone, I made commaunde all thynges accordyng to my discrecion? Yea,saide the capitain,so that you geue away no mānes right,but his. whose authoritie you haue for thesame: as for thys toune, I assure you,without my lordes assent,you shall neither render nor yelde,by my consent or agrement.The duke was sore moued with this saiyng,and so departed, and after sent for the rulers of the toune, and the poorest people of thesame,

declaryng to them, that their lyfes and goodes, wer in the Frenche kynges handes, and yf they looked not shortely to their sauegard, of death they were sure, and of mercie farre vncertein: exhortyng theim to folowe his louyng monicion, rather then the hardened harte, of their to hardie capitain. The people of the toune thus perswaded (whose hartes wer rather Frenche then Englishe) began to rise against sir Dauy, boldely affirming, that yf he tooke no composicion, within three dayes thei would open the gates, and let in the Frenche kyng: and of this opinion, wer all the common souldiours. What sholud the poore Hare saie, when she is x enuironed with a hundred houndes, or the silly Larke crye, when she is in the midell of a hundred Hawkes, but take pacience, and seke awaye to escape: so this capitayn perceiuyng, that neither his woordes serued, nor his truthe toward his master preuailed, bad the duke of Somerset do what he list, for he would in no wise be named in that cõpositiõ. Thẽ the duke partely to please the tounes men, but more desirous to please the duches his wyfe, made an agrement with the Frenche kyng, that he would rendre the toune, so that he and all his, might depart in sauegard with all their goodes and substaunce: whiche offre, the Frenche kyng gladly accepted and allowed, knowyng that by force, he might lenger xx haue longed for the strong toune, then to haue possessed thesame so sone. After this conclusion taken, sir Dauye Halle with diuerse other of hys trustie frendes, departed to Chierburge, and from thence sailed into Irelande, to the duke of Yorke, makyng relacion to hym of all these doynges: whiche thyng kyndeled so greate a rancore in his harte & stomacke that he neuer lefte persecutyng of the Duke of Somersette, till he had brought hym to hys fatall poynt, and extreme confusion.

AFTER the obteinyng of this strong toune of Caen, therle of Clermont besieged the citie of Lyseux, whereof was capitain Matthewe Gough, with thre hundred Englishmen. The capitain perceiuyng that xxx when Caen was not rescewed, that poore Liseux, was in dispaire of all succor, agreed to abandon and deliuer the citee, so that he and his people might departe to Chierburge, hauyng no yron weapon nor armure, but onely their goodes, and white staues in their handes. After the deliueraunce of this toune, the Frenchmen still like good begeles, folowyng their preye, besieged the toune of Fallayse, apperteinyng to the lord Talbot, erle of Shrewesbury: whereof wer capitaines for thesayed erle, Andrewe Trollop, and Thomas Cotton esquires, whiche beyng desperate of succors, and consideryng the puissaunce of their enemies, agreed to deliuer the toune vpon twoo condicions. The one was, that the Erle xl their master, whiche remained in pledge for certayn condicions, agreed to bee performed at the deliueraunce of Roen, (as you haue heard before) should be dismissed & set at libertie. The other, that yf they wer not rescused within twelfe daies, that then they and theirs, to depart with armure, and all their godes moueable, whether it pleased them. After this agrement at the daie prefixed, no rescues came, and so the toune was rendered,and incontinent after,the fortresse of Dampfoyde was deliuered vpon lyke agrement. For the Frenchmen bragged, that they regarded neither golde nor syluer,but desyred rule,glory,and fame: With whiche lightnesse,the other tounes of Normandy beyng perswaded, voluntarily rendered themselfes, vassalles and subiectes to the Frenche nacion.

NOVV rested English,only the toune of Chierburge, wherof was capitayn,Thomas Gonuile,which surely,valiaũtly defended the toune as long as vytayl and munition serued:but when those two handes wer spent and consumed,he destitute of all comforte and aide, vpon a reasonable composicion,yelded the toune and went to Caleis,where the duke of Somerset, and many Englishemen then soiorned: lamentyng their losse,and desperate of all recouery. Thus was the ryche duchye of Normandy lost,the which had continued in thenglishmennes possession.xxx. yeres,by the conquest of Kyng Henry the fifth. In the which duchie wer a hundred strong tounes and fortresses,hable to be kept and holden,beside theim whiche wer destroyed by the warres,and in thesame was one Archebishoprike,and sixe bishoprickes. Some saye, that the Englishemen wer not of puyssaunce,either to man the tounes as they should beer to inhabite the countrey, whiche was the cause, that they could not, kepe it:accordyng to the Frencheinennes Adage,whiche sayeth: A man cannot long hold that,whiche he cannot gryppe. Other say,that the duke of Somerset,for his awne peculyer profite,kept not halfe his nombre of souldiors,and put their wages in his purse. These be mennes imaginacions and coniectures, but surely the losse of it, was the domesticall diuision within the realme,euery greate man desiryng, rather to be reuenged on his foo at home, then on hys outward enemye, as you now shall manifestely se and perceyue.

The.xxviii. yere.

FOR while these conquestes wer obteined in the partes beyond the sea,with sworde,speare,and target, by the aduersaries of the Englishmen, thre mischeuous capitaines,set the people of the Realme (aswell of the nobilitie,as of the meane sorte) in a ciuill warr and intestine diuision: For emong the high Priestes and peeres,reigned inward grudge: emong the Cleargie, adulacion, & emong the commonaltie,disdain of lasciuious souereignties whiche the Quene with her minions,and vnprofitable counsailers daily toke and vsurped vpõ them. Wherfore they (not mynding to be more charged,then their backes would beare, and perceiuyng that by the negligent prouision, and improuident pollicie of the wit wantyng gouernors within the realme,the affaires and busines in the partes beyonde the sea,daily decaied and more wer like to do, if other pollitique rulers were put in aucthoritie, and the negligent officers, sequestered and deposed,) began to make exclamacion against the Duke of Suffolke, affirmyng firming hym, to be the onely cause of the deltuety of Angew & Wayne, the chief procurer of the death, of the good duke of Glouceſter, the veris occaſion of the loſſe of Normandy, the moſte ſwalower vp and conſumer of the kynges treaſure (by reaſon whereof, the warres in Fraunce wer not maintened,) the expeller frō the kyng, of all good and vertcous counſaylors, and the bringer in and auauncer of vicious perſones, common enemyes and apparaunt aduerſaries to the publique wealthe: So that the duke was called in euery mannes mouth, a traytor, a murderer, a robber of the kynges treaſure, and worthy to bee put to moſte cruell puniſchement. By reaſon of this exclamaciō, the Quene somewhat fearyng the deſtruccion of the Duke, but more the confeſſion of her ſelf, cauſed the Parliament, before begon at the blacke Freers in London, to be adiorned to Leyceſter, thinking there, by force & rigor of the law, to ſubdue and repreſſe all the malice and euyll will, conceyued againſte the Duke and her: at whiche place fewe of the nobilitie would appere, wherefore it was agayn adiorned to Weſtminſter, where was a whole company and a full apparaunce. In the whiche ſeſſion, the commons of the neither houſe, put vp to the kyng, and the Lordes, many articles of treaſon, miſpriſion and miſdemeanoure, againſt the duke of Suffolke: theffect wherof with his aunſwers, hereafter enſueth.

FIRST they alleged, that he had traiterouſly excited, prouoked, and counſailed, Jhon erle of Dunoys Baſtard of Orleaūce, Bertrame Lorde Pzeligny, William Coſynet, enemyes to the kyng, and frendes and Ambaſſadors to Charles, callyng himſelf Frenche kyng, to entre in to this Realme, and to leuy warre againſt the kyng and his realme, to the intent to deſtroye the kyng and his frendes, and to make Jhon hys ſonne, kyng of this Realme, matyng hym to Wagaret, ſole heire to Jhō duke of Somerſet, pretendyng and declaryng her, to be next heyre inheritable to the Croune, for lacke of iſſue of the kynges body, lawefully begotten.

ITEM that theſaid duke, beyng of the kynges priuie and nere coūſayll, allured by greate rewardes, and faire promyſes, made by the forenamed Erle of Dunoys, cauſed the kyng to deliuer and ſette at libertie, Charles duke of Orleaunce, enemy to the kyng, and the kynges noble father, whiche deliuerance, was prohibited by expreſſe wordes, in the laſt will of the kynges moſte victorious father.

ITEM, that before the departure of theſaid duke of Orleaunce, the forenamed Duke of Suffolke, traytorouſly faſte cleauyng to Charles called the French kyng, counſailed, prouoked, and entiſed theſated duke of Orleaunce, to moue theſame kyng, to make warre againſt England, bothe in Fraunce and Normandy: accordyng to whiche procurement and counſayll, theſayed Frenche kyng, had recouered the whole realme of Fraunce, and all the Duchie of Normandy, and taken priſoners, the Erle of Shrewesbury, the Lorde Faucombridge, and many other valeaunt capitaines.

These thre articles, he denied either for a fact or thought.

FARTHER it was alledged, that he beyng Ambassador for the Kyng of Englande, to Charles callyng himself the Frenche kyng, promised to Reyner kyng of Scicile, and to Charles Dangiers his brother, enemies to the kyng, the relese of Angeow, with the deliueraunce of the Countie of Mayne, and the citie of Mayaunt or Mauns, without the knowledge of the other Ambassadors, whiche him accompanied: whiche promise, after his returne, he caused to bee performed, to the kynges disenheritance, and losse irrecuperable, and to the strenght of his enemies and feblishement of the Duchy of Normandye.

To this article he answered, that this commission was to conclude, and doo al thinges accordyng to his discrecion, for the obteinyng of a peace, and because without deliuery of those coũtreys, he perceiued that truce could not be obteyned, he agreed, to the relese and deliueraunce of theim.

ALSO they surmised, that thesayed duke, beyng in Fraunce in the kynges seruyce, and one of the priuiest of his counsayll there, traiterously, declared and opened to the capitaynes and conduytets of warre, appertenyng to the kynges enemyes, the kynges counsayll, purueiaunce of his armyes, furniture of his tounes, and all other ordinaunces, wherby the kynges enemyes, (enformed by hys traiterous informaciõ) haue gotten tounes and fortresses, and that kyng by that meane, depryued of his inheritaunce.

ITEM, thesayd duke declared to the Erle of Dumoys, to the Lorde Presigny, and William Colynet, Ambassadors for the frẽche kyng, lyng in London, the priuities of the kynges counsayll, bothe for the prouision of farther warre, and also for defence of the Duchy of Normandy: by the disclosyng wherof, the Frenchmen knowyng the kynges secretes, preuented the tyme, and obteyned their purpose.

ITEM that thesayde Duke, at suche tyme as the kyng sent Ambassadours to the Frenche kyng, for the entreating of peace, traiterously before there comming to the Frenche, courte certified kyng Charles of their commission, authoritie, and Instruccions, by reason wherof, neyther peace nor amytie succeded, and the kynges enheritaũce lost, and by hys enemyes possessed.

ITEM thesame Duke sayde openly in the starre chambre, before the lordes of the Counsaill, that he had as highe a place in the coũsail house of the Frenche kynge, as he had there, and was aswell trusted there as here and coulde remoue from the Frenche kynge, the pryuiest man of hys counsayll, yf he would.

ITEM when armyes haue been prepared, & souldyers redy waged, to passe ouer the sea, to resist the kynges enemyes: Thesayed Duke corrupted by rewardes of the Frenche kynge, hath restreyned and stayed thesayde armyes to passe any farther.

ITEM thesayde Duke beynge Ambassadour for the kyng, compas-

fed not in the leage, as the kynges Alies, neither the kyng of Aragon, neither the duke of Bzytayne, But suffered hym to be compzised on the contrary partye, by reason wherof, the olde amitie of the kyng of Aragon, is estraunged from this realme, and the duke of Bzitayne become enemy to thesame: and Giles his bzother the kynges suer frende, cast in strong pzyson, and their lyke to ende and finyshe his dayes.

ALL these obiections he vtterly denyed, oz faintely auoyded, but not fully excused. Diuers other crymes were layde to his charge, as, enrychyng hymselfe with the kynges goodes and landes, gatheryng together, and making a money polde of offices, fees, wardes, and fermes, by reason wherof the kynges estate was greatly mynished and decayed, and he and his kyn highly exalted, and enriched with many other pointes, whiche, because they be not notable, noz of no great foyce oz stregth I omitte and ouerpasse. The Quene, whiche entierly loued the Duke, fearyng that some cõmocion and trouble might ryse, yf he were let goo vnpunished, caused hym to be committted to the Towze, where he was kepte with as muche pleasure, as he that was at large, and oute of all captiuitie. But after that a moneth was expired, she ymagenynge the people to be pacified with this open impzisonement, caused hym bothe to be deliuered, and also to be restozed to the Kinges fauour and grace, as muche as euer he was befoze that tyme. But this doynge incensed the furye of the mutable commons, muche moze then befoze: openly demouneyng, and saiyng, that it was a shame to all the Realme, to se such a persone, infected with so many misdedes, either to rule about a pzince oz be had in honoz. Of these wozdes spzang dedes, and of this talkyng, cose displeasure, whiche had growen to greate mischiefe, yf pollitique pzouysion had not, with all celeritie resisted the fyzst fury: foz the commons in sundzy places of the realme assembled together, gathered great companynes, and elected a Capitayn, whome they called, blew berd: but oz they had attempted any enterpzyse, their headdes were apprehended and so the membzes sodainly were dispersed, without any hurte cõmitted oz perpetrated.

AFTER this litle rage was asswaged, the Parliament was adiozned to Leycester, whither came the kyng and the Quene in great estate and with them the Duke of Suffolke, as chefe counsaylor. The cõmõs of the lower house, not forgettyng their olde grudge: besechyd the king, that such persons, as assented to the telese of Angeow, and deliuerance of Mayne, might be extremely punished, and tozmented: and to be pziuye to this facte, they accused as pzincipall, the duke of Suffolke, with Jhon bishop of Salisbury, and syz James Fynes, lozd Say, & diuers other. When kyng Henry perceiued, that the cõmons wer thus stomacked and bent, against the Quenes dearlynge William Duke of Suffolke, he plainly sawe, that neither glosyng would serue, noz dissimulacion coulde appease, the continuall clamoz of the importunate cõmons: Wherefoze to begyn a shozte pacificacion in to long a bzoyle. Firste he sequestred the lord Say, beynge threasorer of Englande, and other the Dukes adherentes, from there offices, and aucthoritie, and after banyshed and put in exile the duke of Suffolke, as the abhorred tode, and cõmon noysaunce of the Realme of Englande, for the terme of.v. yeres: meaning by this exile, to appease the furious rage of the outragious people, & that pacified, to reuocate hym into his olde estate, as the Quenes chefe frende & counsailer. But fortune wold not, that this flagitious person, shoulde so escape: for when he shipped in Suffolke, entendynge to be transported into Fraũce, he was encontered with a shippe of warre

appertenynge to the duke of Excester, the Constable of the Towre of London, called the Nicholas of the Towre. The capitayne of thesame barke with small fight, entered into the dukes shyppe, and perceyuyng his person present, brought hym to Douer Rode, & there on the one syde of a cocke bote, caused his head to be stryken of, and left his body with the heade vpon the sandes of Douer, which corse was there founde by a chapelayne of his, and conueyed to Wyngfelde college in Suffolke, and there buried. This ende had William de la pole, first duke of Suffolke, as men iudge, by Gods punyshmẽt: for aboue all thinges he was noted to be the very organ, engine, and diuisor of the destruccion of hũfrey the good duke of Gloucester, and so the bloudde of the Innocente mã was with his dolorous death, recompensed and punished. But the death of this froward person, and vngracious patron, brought not the Realme quyete, nor deliuered it from all inward grudge, and intestine diuision, which to all Realmes is more pestiferous and noysome, then outward warre, dayly fampyne, or extreme pestilence. For although Richard duke of Yorke, was in pryson, (as the kynges deputie) in the realme of Ire'ãde, continually resyaunt there, yet his breath puffed and his wynde blew dayly in many partes of the Realme. For many of the nobilitie, and more of the meane estate, wysely pondetynge the estate and condicion of the Realme, percepuynge more losse then encrease, more tuyne then auancement daily to ensue: Remembryng also that Fraunce was conquered, and Normandy was gayned, by the Frenche people in shorte space, thought with them selfes and ymagined, that the faulte of all these miserable chaunces, happened, either because the kynge was not the true enheritor to the croune, or that he or hys counsayll were not able of wit, pollicye, and circumspeccion, to rule and gouerne so noble a Realme, or so famous a region. Upon this coniecture, the frendes, kinsmen and alyes of the duke of Yorke whith were of no small nũbre, began to practise the gouernaũce of his title: Infusyng and puttyng into mens heades secretely his right to the crown, his politique gouernaunce, his gentle behauior, to all the Irysshe naciõ, affirming, that he which had brought that rude and sauage nacion, to ciuile fashion, and Englisshe vrbanitie, wolde, (yf he once ruled in the Realme of England) depose euill counsailers, correct euill iudges, & reforme all matters amisse, and vnamended. And to set opẽ the fludde gates of these deuises, it was thought necessary, to cause some great commocion and rysing of people to be made against the kyng: so that yf they preuayled, then had the duke of Yorke and hys complices, there appetite and desyre. And because the Kentishmen be impacient in wronges, disdaynyng of to much oppression, and euer desirous of new chaung, and new fangelnes. The ouerture of this matter was put furthe firste in Kent, and to thentent that it should not be knowen, that the duke of Yorke or his frēdes were the cause of the sodayne rising: A certayn yongmā of a goodely stature, and pregnaunt wit, was entised to take vpon hym the name of Jhon x Mortymer, all though his name were Jhon Cade, and not for a small policie, thinkyng that by that surname, the lyne and lynage of the assistente house of the erle of Marche, which were no small number, should be to hym both adherent, and fauorable. This capitayn not onely suborned by techers, but also enforced by pryuye scholemasters, assembled together a great company of talle personages: assuring theim, that their attēpt was both honorable to God and the kyng, and also profitable to the common wealth, promisyng theim, that if either by force or pollicie, they might once take the kyng, the Quene, & other their counsaillers in to their handes and gouernaunce, that they woulde honorably entreate xx the kyng, and so sharply handle hys counsayllers, that neither fiftenes should hereafter be demaunded, nor once any impositions, or tax, should be spoken of. These perswasions, with many other fayre promyses of libertie, (whiche the common people more affect & desyre, rather then reasonable obedience, and due conformitie) so animated the Kentishe people, that they with their capitayne aboue named, in good order of battell (not in great number) came to the playne of Blackehethe, betwene Eldham and Grenewyche. And to the entent that the cause of this glorious capitaynes comyng thither, myght be shadowed from the kyng and his counsayll, he sent to him an humble supplicacion, with louyng xxx wordes, but with malicious entent: affirmyng his commyng, not to be agaynst hym, but agaynst diuers of his counsayll, louers of them selfes, and oppressers of the poore commonaltie, flatterers to the kyng and enemyes to his honor, suckers of his purse, and robbers of hys subiectes, perciall to their frendes, and extreme to their enemies, for rewardes corrupted, and for indifference, nothyng doyng. This proude byll, was both of the kyng, and his counsayll disdayntully taken, and thereupon great consultacion had, and after long debatyng, it was concluded, that suche proude rebelles, should rather be suppressed and tamed, with violence and force, then with fayre wordes or amycable aunswer:

xl Wherupon the kyng assembled a great army, and marched toward the, whiche had lyen on Blackeheath, by the space of.vij.dayes. The subtill capitayn named Jack Cade, entendyng to bryng the kyng farther, within the compasse of his net, brake vp hys Campe, and retyred backwarde to the toune of Seuenocke in Kent, and there expectynge hys pray encamped hym selfe, and made his abode. The Quene, which bare

the

the rule,beyng of hys retrayte well aduertised,sent syr Humfrey Staffozd knyght,and William his brother with many other gentelmen, to folow the chace of the Kentishmen, thinkynge that they had fledde, but verely, they were deceaued:for at the fyrst skyrmish, both the Staffordes were slayne,and all their companye shamfully discomfited. The kynges armye, beyng at this tyme come to Blackheath, hearynge of this discomfiture,began to grudge and murmure emongest them selfes some wishing the duke of Yorke at home,to ayde the capitayne his co-syne:some desiryng the ouerthrow of the kyng and hys counsayll: other openly cryeng out on the Quene,and her complices. This rumor opēly spoken,& cōmonly published,caused the kyng,& certayn of his counsayll, not ledde by fauor,nor corupted by rewardes (to the entent to appeace the furious rage of the inconstant multitude) to commit the lord Say, Threasorer of England,to the Towre of London:and yf other,agaynst whome,lyke displeasure was borne had been presente,they had likewyse ben serued. But it was necessary that one should suffer, rather then all the nobiltie then should perish. When the Kentish capitain, or the co-uetous Cade,had thus obteyned victory,and slayne the two baleaunt Staffordes, he apparreled hym selfe in their ryche armure, and so with pompe and glory returned agayn toward London: in whiche retrayte diuers ydle and vacabonde persons, resorted to hym from Sussex and Surrey,and from other partes to a great nūber. Thus this glorious Capitayn,compassed about,and enuironed with a multitude of euel rude and rusticall persones,came agayn to the playn of Balckeheath, and there strōgly encamped hym selfe: to whome were sent by the kynge, the Archebishop of Canturbury, and Humfrey duke of Buckyngham, to cōmon with hym of his greues and requestes. These lordes found him sober in communication, wyse in disputyng, arrogant in hart, and styf in his opinion,and by no ways possyble,to be perswaded to dissolue his armye,except the kynge in person woulde come to hym,and assent to all thinges,which he should requyre.These lordes,perceyuyng the wilfull pertinacy,and manyfest contumacye of thys rebellious Jauelyn, departed to the kyng, declaryng to hym his temerarious and rashe wordes, and presumptuous requestes. The kyng somwhat hearyng, and more markyng the saiynges of thys outragious losel,and hauyng dayly reporte of the concurse and accesse of people,which cōtinually resorted to hym,doubtyng asmuch his familiar seruauntes,as his vnknowen subiectes (which spared nor to speake,that the capitaynes cause,was profitable for the common wealth) departed in all haste to the castell of Ky-lingworthe in Warwyckeshyre,leauing only behind him the lord Scales, les,to kepe the Towre of London. The capitayn beynge aduertised of the kynges absence,came fyrst into Southwarke, and there lodged at the white hart, prohibityng to all men, Murder, Rape, or Robbery:by whiche colour he allured to hym the hartes of the common people. But after that he entred into Londō, and cut the ropes of the drawe bridge, strykyng his swoꝛde on london stone, saiyng: now is Moꝛtymer loꝛde of this citie, and rode in euery stiete lyke a loꝛdly Capitayn. And after a flatteryng declaracion made to the Mayꝛe of the citie of his thether commyng, he departed agayn into Southwarke. And vpon the thirde daye of Julij, he caused sir James Fynes loꝛd Say, and Theasoꝛer of Englande to be bꝛought to the Gylde halle of London, and there to be arrayned: whiche beyng befoꝛe the kynges iustices put to aunswere, desyꝛed to be tryed by his peeres, foꝛ the lenger delay of his lyfe. The Capitayne perceiuyng hys dilatorie ple, by foꝛce toke hym from the officers, and bꝛought hym to the standard in Cheape, and there befoꝛe hys confession ended, caused his head to be cut of, and pitched it on a highe poole, which was opẽly boꝛne befoꝛe hym thꝛough the stretes. And thys cruell tyꝛaunt not content with the murder of the loꝛde Say, wente to Myle ende, and there appꝛehended syꝛ James Cromer, then shꝛefe of Kent, and sonne in law to the sayd loꝛd Say, & hym without confession oꝛ excuse heard, caused there likewyse to be hedded, and hys head to be fixed on a poole, and with these two heddes, thys blody butcher entered into the citie agayn, and in despyte caused them in euery stiete, kysse to gether, to the great detestacion of all the beholders.

xx AFTER this shameful murder, succeded open rappyn and manyfest robbery in diuers houses, within the citie, and in especiall in the house of Philip Malpas, Alderman of London, and diuers other: ouer and besyde raunsonyng, & tynyng of diuers notable marchauntes, foꝛ the tuycion and securitie of their lyfes and goodes, as Robert Hoꝛne alderman, which payed. v. C. markes, and yet neither he, noꝛ no other person was either of lyfe oꝛ substaunce in a suertie oꝛ sauegard. He also put to execucion in Southwarke diuers persons, some foꝛ infryngyng his rules and pꝛeceptes, bycause he woulde be sene indifferent, other he toꝛmẽted of his olde acquayntance, lest they shoulde blase & declare hys base xxi byꝛthe, and lowsy lynage, disparagyng him from hys vsurped surname of Moꝛtymer, foꝛ the which, he thought and doubted not, both to haue frendes and fautoꝛs, both in Londõ, Kent, and Esser. The wise Mayꝛe, and sage magistrates of the citie of London, perceyuyng thẽselfes, neyther to be sure of goodes noꝛ of lyfe well warranted, determined with feare to tepel and expulse this mischeuous head, and hys vngracious cõpany. And because the loꝛd Scales was oꝛdeyned keper of ẏ Towꝛe of London: with Mathew Gough, the often named capitayne in Noꝛmandy, (as you haue harde befoꝛe) they purposed to make them pꝛyuye both of their entent and enterpꝛyse. The loꝛd Scales pꝛomised thẽ hys xxii ayde, with shoting of oꝛdinaunce, and Mathew Goughe was by hym appoynted, to assist the Mayꝛe and the Londoners: because he was both of manhode, and experience greatly renoumed & noysed. So the Capitaynes of the citie appoynted, toke vpon them in the night to kepe the bꝛidge of London, pꝛohibityng the Kentishmẽ, either to passe oꝛ apꝛoche. The rebelles, which neuer loundly slepte, foꝛ feare of lodayns chaunces,

chaunces, hearing the bryoge to be kept and manned, ran with greate haste to open that passage, where betwene bothe pattes was a fierce and cruell encounter. Mathew Gough, more experte in marciall feates, then the other cheuetaynes of the citie, perceiuyng the Kentishmen, better to stande to their talkyng, then his ymagination expected, aduised his cõpany no further to proceede toward Southwarke, till the day appered: to the entent, that the citizens hearing where the place of the ieopardye rested, might occurre their enemies, and releue their frendes and companions. But this counsail came to smal effect: for the multitude of the rebelles drawe the citezens from the stoulpes at the brigge foote, to the drawe bridge, and began to set fyre in diuers houses. Alas what sorow it was to beholde that miserable chaunce: for some desyringe to eschew the fyre, lept on hys enemies weapon, and so died: fearfull women with chyldren in their armes, amased and appalled, lept into the riuer: other doubtinge how to saue them self betwene fyre, water, and swourd, were in their houses suffocat and smoldered. Yet the capitayns nothyng regardyng these chaunces, fought on the draw bridge all the nyghte valeauntly, but in conclusion, the rebelles gate the draw bridge, and drowned many, and slew Jhon Sutton alderman, and Robert Heysande a hardy citizen, with many other, beside Mathew Gough, a man of great wit, much experience in feates of chiualrie, the which in continuall warres, had valeauntly serued the kyng, and his father, in the partes beyõd the sea (as before ye haue hearde). But it is often sene, that he, whiche many tymes hath vanquyshed his enemies in straũg countreys, and returned agayn as a conqueror, hath of his awne nacion afterward been shamfully murdered, and brought to confusion. This hard and sore cõflict endured on the bridge, till .ix. of the clocke in the morynge, in doutfull chaunce, and fortunes balaunce: for some tyme the Lõdoners were bet back to the stulpes at sainct Magnes corner, and sodaynly agayne the rebelles were repulsed and dryuen backe, to the stulpes in Southwarke, so that both partes, beyng faynte, wery and fatygate, agreed to desist from fight, and to leue battayll till the next day, vpon condition: that neyther Londoners should passe into Southwarke, nor the Kentishmen into London.

AFTER this abstinence of warre agreed, the lusty Kentishe Capitayne, hopyng on more frendes, brake vp the gayles of the Kinges benche and Marshalsea, and set at libertie, a swarme of gallãtes, both mete for his seruice and apte for his enterprice. The Archebishop of Canterbury, beyng then Chauncelor of England, and for his suerty: lyenge in the Towre of London, called to him the Bishop of Winchester, whiche also for feare, lurked at Haly well. These two prelates seyng the fury of the Kentish people, by reason of their betyng backe, to be mitigate and minished, passed the ryuer of Thamyse from the Towre, into Southwarke, bringing with them vnder the kynges great seale, a generall pardon vnto all the offendors: which thei caused to be openly proclayned & published publiſhed. Lorde how glad the poore people were of thys Pardon (ye more then of the great Jubile of Rome) and how they accepted the ſame, in ſo muche that the whole multitude, without biddyng farewel to their capitain, retired the ſame night, euery man to hys awne home, as men amaſed, and ſtrikē with feare. But Jhon Cade deſperate of ſuccors, whiche by the frendes of the duke of Yorke wer to him promiſed, and ſeing his cōpany thus without hys knowledge ſodainly depart, miſtruſtyng the ſequele of ỹ matter, departed ſecretly in habite diſguyſed, into Suſſex: but all hys metamorphoſis or tranſfiguracion, litle preuailed. For after a Proclamacion made, that whoſoeuer could apprehende the ſaied Jac Cade, ſhould haue for his pain, a.M. markes, many ſought for hym, but few eſpied hym, til one Alexander Jden, eſquire of Kent, found hym in a garden, and there in hys defence, manfully ſlewe the caitife Cade, & brought his ded body to London, whoſe hed was ſet on Londō bridge. This is the ſucceſſe of all rebelles, and thys fortune chaunceth euer to traytors. For where men ſtriue againſt the ſtreame, there bote neuer cōmeth to his pretenſed porte.

The miſerable ende of Jacke Cade.

AFTER this commocion, the kynge hymſelf came into Kent, & there ſat in iudgement vpō the offendors, and if he had not mitigated his iuſtice, with mercie and compaſſion, more then true. C. by the rigor of hys lawe, had been iuſtely put to execucion: but he cōſidered, both their fragilitie and innocencie, and how they with peruerſe people, were ſeduced and deceiued: and ſo puniſhed the ſtubburne heddes, and deliuered the ignorāt & miſerable people, to the greate reioyſyng of all his ſubiectes.

DVRYNG this commocion aboute London, Raufe biſhop of Saliſbury, was by his awne tenantes, & ſeruaūtes, murdered at Edyngton and ſo from thenſeforth daily ſucceded, murder, ſlaughter, & deſcencion.

THeſe variable chaunces in Englande, were not vnknowen to the French kyng, wherfore, he making foundacyon vpon the Engliſh diſcord, determined to get into his poſſeſſion, the duchie of Acquitayne, while the princes of Englande, wer in controuerſie, for their titles and ſuperiorite: and therfore like a ſpedy purſuior, which ſlacketh not tyme, he ſent therles of Ponthieure, and Pertigot, with many valiant capitaines, to ley ſiege to the toune of Bergerac ſet vpō the riuer of Dordone, of whiche toune was capitain, Jhō Geddyng, whyche hearyng of the yeldyng of Roen, and conqueſt of Normandy, conſideryng the puyſſaunce of the French army, vpon reaſonable condicios rendered the toune: yet all this notwithſtandyng, the lord Cameyſe, ſir George Seymour, ſir Jhon Arundell, and other valiaunt capitaines, whiche had the gouernance of the countrey, manned tounes gathered people, and animated the cold ſtomackes of thefearefull Galcons: requiryng them to beconſtant in their fidelitie, true to their natural prince and vndoubted ſouereigne lorde, ſendyng daily letters to the

kyng of England and his counsaill, declaryng to him the weakenes of his subiectes, and the strength of his enemies, assertenyng him for a suertie, that without spedy aide, and redy succors, the whole countrey wer like to be gotten frō hys possessiō. Many letters wet sent, and many faire aunswers wer brought, but relief neither appered, nor one mā of warre was thether shipped. By reason wherof, the Gascoyns perceiuyng their enemies at hand, intendyng aswell to destroy ỹ countrey as to subdue the people, began euery man for hymself, to regard nothyng, but the sauyng of their tounes, goodes & corne: neglectyng defence, and fearfull of assaultes, least by small resistence, thei might receiue more detriment, x then after thei could recouer again, either with great force, or muche labor. But thenglishmen, (whose natures are not to be faint harted, euen at the very ieoperdy of death) with al their wittes studied, bothe how to repulse & conuince their enemies, & to turne awaie the euil chances whiche thei sawe likely, (if pollicie did not helpe) sodainly to fal, and shortly to insue. But al their pollices litle preuailed in cōclusiō, because succors failed, and force wanted: For after the Frenchmen, had the toune of Bergerac to them rendered, the fortresses of Jonsac, of Bonefoy, and diuerse other places, willyngly & frely, yelded themselfes to the French subiection. Duryng whiche tyme, the lorde Dorual, third sonne to the xx lorde Delabreth, with a great numbre of men, aswel on horssebacke as on foote, departed from Basas, to conquere and destroy the isle of Madoce: wherof hearyng the Maire of Burdeaux, with a conuenīēt crewe of men, issued out of the citie, and encontered with his enemies, betwene whom was a hard fight and a dedly battaill: but the Frenchmen, more with multitude, then with force, banquished thenglishemen, and killed and toke prisoners, aboue. vi. C. Englishemen & Gascoynes, but of the Frenchemen, which wer in double numbre, aboue their aduerlaries (as writers affirme) there wer slain. viii. C. persones. For whyche cause, the capitaines folowed no farther the chace, lest the English people would xxx again returne. This slaughter of the Englishe parte, the Frenche writers set furthe with the most, but of their awne losse, thei speake not one worde. Suche indifferency, is in their Chronographiers. This discomfiture so amased the wittes, & appalled the hartes of the meane Gascōs that thei offered many toūes to the French part, before thesame wer of them demaunded.

AFTRE this, the Bastard of Orleaunce, erle of Dumoys, and Lōguile, lieuetenant generall for the Frenche king, accompanied with his brother, Jhon erle of Angulesme, whiche had been long prisoner in England, and many valiant capitaines, and expert men of warre, besieged xl the Castle of Montguyō, whiche to them was rendered. After this, the saied army besieged the fortresse of Blay, standyng on the riuer of Gyronde, whiche toune is the very keye of the porte of Burdeaux, and thys toune was besieged bothe by water and by lande, and fiersly assaulted and manfully defended, and in conclusion by very force, for lacke of resistence sistence, conquered and gayned. The bastard of Kendall capitain of the Castle, seyng the toune lost, vpon certain condicions, deliuered his fortresse, into the possession of the lord lieuetenant. After this toune gained the fortresses of Bourge and Liburne yelded, not wythout fiue Wekes besiegyng. The wittie capitaines perceiuyng fortunes fauor towardes them, thought it necessary to take the tyme, while their good planet reigned. Wherfore, to preuent the aide of the Englishmen, whom thei daily expected to come to the succor of their people: they appoynted foure armies, to make war in foure seuerall partes. The lorde Charles Delx lebreth accompainied with Jhon lorde of Tartas and Aymon, lorde of Dorual his sõnes, and therle of Foys, and the Viscount Lawtrec his brother, and many noblemen of Guyne, lated siege to the toune of Acques, in the whych be diuerse hote bathes. Therle of Arminack extreme enemy to the realme of Englande, for breakyng the mariage concluded betwene king Henry and his daughter (as before you haue heard) besiged with a greate puyssaunce, the strong toune of Ryon. Therle of Põthyeure, with many noble barons, besieged the toune of Chastillon in Perigot, and the erle of Dumoys, enuironed with a great puyssance the toune of Fronsacke. The englishemen within this toune, perceiuyng the xx greate ordinaunce on the frenche part, and the small prouision on their side, couenanted with the said erle, that if the toune wer not succored, and the Frenchemen foughten with all, before the feast of ỹ natiuitie, of. S Jhõ Baptist next ensuyng, that then the toune of Fronsacke should be yelded to them, whyche was the strõgest fortresse of all the countrey, and the very key of Guyen, and chief chamber of Burdeaux: and for performans hereof, pledges wer deliuered, and writynges aurentique sealed. This agreement once blowen through the countrey, the citie of Burdeaux, and al other tounes, (except Bayon) made like agrement, and deliuered pledges. So did all the noble men and gẽtlemen, which wer subxxx iectes and vassalas to the croune of England. Alacke alacke, euery daie was lokyng for relief, and euery houre was gapyng for cõfort, but wissyng serued not, nor hopyng nothyng helped: for the pestiferous diuision, whyche reigned in Englande, so inueglid the brames of the noble men there, that the honor of the realme was clerely forgotten, & nothing yearthly, but their priuate phantasies looked on and remembred. Now to conclude, the daie appoynted came, but succor loked for, came not: so that all the tounes in Acquitayne (except Bayon) deliuered their keyes, and became vassals to the French nacion, yet the citiezens of Burdeaux hopyng of rescous, offered themselfes to fight with the Frenchmen, and xl desired a daie of battaill to be appoynted, whyche requeste was to them graunted. But at the daie assigned, they beyng in dispaire of all refuge and succor, rendered themselfes and the toune, to their aduersaries, their lifes and goodes reserued, with licence and safeconduyte to all persons whyche would depart and saile into Englãde. When the cities and tounes of Gascoyne wer set in good ordre, the Erle of Dumoys and Foys with greate preparacion of vitaill, munition and men, came before the cite of Bayon, where with mynes and battery, thei so dismaied the fearsful inhabitãtes, that neither the capitain nor the souldiors, could kepe them from yeldyng: so by force they deliuered the toune, and their capitain as a prisoner, offred a great some of money for the safegard of their lifes and goodes. Beside theie agrementes taken with tounes, diuerse noble men made seueral compositions, as Gaston de Foys, Capdaw of Buesz, whom kyng Henry the fifth, made erle of Longuile and knight of the garter, whose auncestors wer euer true to Englãd, whiche agreed that he, and Jhon de Foys his sõne, whom kyng Henry the first, created erle of Kendale, and made also knight of ỹ garter, should enioy al their landes in Acquitayne, geuen to them by the kynges of England, or by the Duke of Acquitayn. And because their intent was still to serue the kyng of Englande, their souereigne Lorde, they agreed, to deliuer into the custody of therle of Foys, their cosyn, the sonne and heire of thesaied erle of Kendale, being of the age of three yeres, to the intent, that if he at his full age, denied to become subiect and vassaull to the Frenche kyng, or before that tyme diseased, that then after the death of his father and graundfather, all thesaid landes should wholy remain, to the next heire of their bloud, either male or female, beyng vnder the obeysance of the Frenche kyng, or his heires. Many noble men, whose hartes were good Englishe, made like compositions, and some came into Englande, and other went to Calcis, and wer great officers there: as the Lord Duras whiche was Marshall there, and Monsire Vanclere, whiche was there deputie, vnder therle of Warwick, (as after shalbe shewed.) Now haue I declared to you, the losse of Fraunce, Normandy, & Acquitayn: wherfore, hauyng no more cause yet to speake of theim, I will returne to the greate trouble, discencion, and diuision whiche long was cloked, & now openly set abrode, and burst out in the realme of Englande.

YOu haue heard before, how the duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionel Duke of Clarence, pretended priuily, a title to the Croune, and how his frendes commoned secretly, with diuerse persones of that matter, and excited theim to set forward, and auaunce that parte to the vttermoste: and how thesaied duke was sent into Ireland, where he was daily aduertised bi his assured frendes, of all thynges doen in Englande, and by thé knew in what estate he stode, bothe with the nobilitie, and cõmonaltie. Wherfore, he mindyng no lẽger to dreame in his waightie matter, nor to kepe secrete his right and title, returned out of Ireland, and came to Londõ in the parliamẽt tyme, wher he deliberately consulted, with his especial frendes: as Jhon Duke of Norffolke, Richard Erle of Salisbury, and Lorde Richard his sonne, whyche after was Erle of Warwick, Thomas Courtney, erle of Deuonshire, and Edward Broke, lord Cobham a man of a greate witte and muche experience, requiryng them, both of

aduise & counsaill, how he might without spot of treason, or colour of vsurpacion, set forth his title, and obtein his right.

AFTER long consultacion, it was thought expedient, first to seke some occasion and picke some quetell, to the duke of Somerset, whyche ruled the kyng, ordered the zealme, and moste might do with the quene: Whom, the commons, for the losse of Normandy, worse then a Tode or Scorpion, hated, disdained and execrated, in so muche that diuerse euil ruled persons, brake his house, & spoyled his goodes, within the blacke Friers of the citie of Londō: which malefactors, accordyng to their dex sertes, wer iustly executed & punished. For wel knew the duke of Yorke and his adherentes, that if the Duke of Somerset sawe or smelled, any poynt of their purposed enterprise, that he would with speare and sheld, with might and main, withstād and repell thesame, to thextreme point of death, and to their vtter confusion. Wherfore to abbridge his power, and to minische his authoritie, they determined to bryng hym into the hatred of the people, and into the disdain of the nobilitie. And to be the stronger in the settyng forth of their feate, they, what with rewardes & faire promises, & what with declaracion of great enormities, committed by the kinges counsailors, against the cōmon wealth, allected & allured xx to thē, lusty bachelars, & actiue persons, of a great number, protestyng and declaring, that thei neither meant euil, nor thought harme, either to the kinges person, or to his dignitie: but that their intēt was for the reuenging of great iniuries doen to the publique wealth, and to persecute and reforme diuerse rulers about the king, which daily cōtrary to right and equitie, vexed & pilled thenglish people, without reason or measure so ỹ no man was in suretie, either of his awne goodes, or suer of his proper lādes or possessiōs. These great enormities, they caused to be published to thintent ỹ their chief purpose should not be espied, or perceiued.

VVHEN the duke of Yorke had thus framed thentery into his long xxx intended iorney, he with helpe of his frendes, assembled a great army in the Marches of Wales, publishyng openly, that the cause of his mociō was for the publique welth of the realme, and great profite of the commons: which faire tolde tale, allured to him muche people, aswell of the chiualry as of the meane sort. The kyng muche astonnied with this sodain commocion, by the aduise of his counsail, raised a great hoste, and marched forward toward the duke: but he being of his approche, credibly aduertised, bi his espials, diuerted from the kynges waies, and toke his iorney toward London: and hauyng knowledge, that he might not be suffered with his army, to passe through London, he crossed ouer the xl Thamese at Kyngston bridge, and so set forth toward Kent, where he knewe that he had bothe frendes and good willers, and there, on brēte Heath, a mile from Dertford, and .x. miles from Londō he embattailled himself, & encamped his army very strongly, bothe with trenches and artilery. The king being therof aduertised, with great diligēce, brought his army to blacke Heath, & there pight his tētes. While both tharmies lay thus embattailed, the kyng by thaduise of his counsaill, sent the bishoppes of Winchester and Elie to the duke, both to knowe, what was the cause of so greate a tumult and commocion, and also to make a concord, if the requestes of the duke and his company, semed to them conso nāt to reason, or profitable to the people. The duke hearyng ꝑ message of the two bishops, either doubting the variable chaunce of mortal bat taill, or lokyng for a better occasiō, or a more luckey date, aūswered the prelates, that hys cōmyng was neither to dampnifie the kyng, neither in honor, nor in person, nor yet any good man, but his intent was to remoue frō hym certain euil disposed persons of his counsaill, which wer ꝛ the bludsuckers of the nobilitie, the pollers of the cleargie, and oppressors of the pore people: emongest whō he chiefly named, Edmond duke of Somerset, whom if the kyng would commit to ward, to aunswere to suche articles, as against hym should in open parliament, be both proponed and proued, he promised not onely to dissolue hys army and dis-patche his people, but also offered hymself, like an obedient subiecte, to come to the kinges presence, and to do hym true and faithful seruice, ac-cordyng to his truth & boūden duetie. When the messengers wer returned with this reasonable aunswere: The king perceiuyng, that without xx great bludshed, he could not bridle the duke of Yorke, nor without war he could not appeace, the furious rage of the cōmon people, beyng once set on fire, except he folowed their mindes, and graūted their requestes, caused the duke of Somerset, to be committed to ward, as some saie: or to kepe himself priuye in his awne house, as other write, till the fury of the people were some what asswaged and pacified. Which thyng doen, the duke of Yorke the firste day of Marche, dissolued his army, & brake vp his campe, and came to the kynges tent, wher beside hys expectaciō, and cōtrary to the promise made by the kyng, he found ꝯ duke of Somerset, set at large and at libertie, whom the duke of Yorke boldly accused, of treason, of bribery, oppression, and many other crimes. The duke xxx of Somerset not onely made aunswer to the dukes obiectons, but also accused hym of high treasō, toward the kyng his souereigne lord: affirming, that he with his fautors & complices, had consulted together how to obtein the croune and scepter of the realme. By meane of whiche wordes, the king remoued straight to Lōdon, and the duke of Yorke as a prisoner, rode before hym, & so was kept a while. The kyng assembled together a great counsail at Westminster, to here the accusaciōs of the ij. dukes, the one obiectyng to the other, facinorous actes, & detestable crimes. But the duke of Somerset, whiche now conceiued in his mynd the thyng that shortely folowed, incessantly exhorted the counsail, that xl the Duke of Yorke, by compulsion, or otherwise, might be compelled to confesse his offence, and so beyng attainted of treason, to be put to execu-cion, and his children to be taken enemies and aduersaries to their natiue countrey: to the intent that by the losse of this onely Prince and his sequele, all ciuill warre, and inward diuision might cease and be repressed:

sed:beseechyng almightie God,that so greate an enemy to the kyng and his bloud, might neuer escape punishment, nor continewe long in lyfe. The duke of Somerset set furth this matter the more vehemently, because he knew perfitely,that the duke of Yorke dayly studyed,howe to get the crowne, and obteyn the gouernaunce , and to depose and destroy bothe the kynge and him.But the necessitie of destiney, can not by any mans deuise,be either letted or interrupted: formany thynges (to common iudgementes) declared the duke of Yorke trought and innocēcye in this case.First his free and voluntary comyng to the kynge,when he x with his power was able to encoūter with the kynges puyssance,which was an open token and manifest argument, that he neither meāte treason,nor yet fraude. Secondarily,his humble submission,hys reasonable requestes,and profitable petitions,for the pore commons,were iudged no pointes of a man, that desired souereignetie,or rule aboue other which thinges he dyd onely for a cautele, (as afterward openly appeared). While the coūsail treated of sauing or losing of this dolorous duke of Yorke,Arumour sprange throughout London, that Edward erle of Marche, sonne and heyre apparaunt to the sayd duke,a yong prince of great wit and muche stomacke,accompanied with a stronge army of xx Marchemen,was comyng toward London, which tidinges sore appalled the Quene and the whole counsaill.Beside thys,thesame very daye came Ambassadours from the heades and Magistrates of the citie of Burdeaux,whereof the chefe were,the erle of Kendal,and the lorde Lesparre,whiche signified to the counsaill , that if they wolde send an armye into Gascoyne, the Gascoyns wolde reuerte & turne agayne to the English part:aduertising them, that there was in those partes no puissaunce or garrison of Frenche men, to withstand them,& therfore there was no doubte of ỹ regaynyng or recōquest: requyring thē with al diligēt celeritie, to take so fayre a prey so openly to them offered,& to mynd xxx nothyng before the regayning of so fruictful a countrey. These.ij.thinges sore troubled the heades of the kynges counsaill, whiche,leste thys discencion betwene two persones,might be the let of outward conquest set the duke of Yorke at libertie,and permitted him to returne to his faire Castel of Wigmore,in the Marches of Wales, wher he studied, both how to displease his enemies,& to obtein his purpose:And so bi meanes of the absence of the duke of Yorke, whiche was in maner banished the court & ỹ kinges presēce, ỹ duke of Somerset rose vp in high fauor w̄ the kyng & quene,& his worde only ruled,& his voyce was only heard.

xl HE counsaill of Englande,not forgettyng the offer of the Gascons,and that thei might now haue the citie of Burdeaux with the coūtrey round about, by offer and request, whiche with great charge & longe warre they coulde scant agayn recouer or repossesse, appoynted the veterane souldiour,and valiaunt Capitayn,Jhon lord Talbot,and erle of Shrewsburye, at Blay, the baſtard of Somerſet, ſir Jhon Talbot, lorde Lyſle, by his wyfe ſonne to the ſayd erle of Shrewesbury, the lorde Wolyns, the lordes Harpington and Cameus, ſir Jhon Hayward, ſir Jhon Wontgomerye, ſir Jhon Vernon with.xxii.C.mē with vatailes and munictions. Whē the erle of Shrewesbury was thus accordyng to hys entent of al thinges furniſhed and adorned: firſte he fortified Burdeaux wyth Engliſhmen & victayle: after that he rode into the countrey abrode, where he obteined cities, and gat townes without ſtroke or dēt of ſwoord: for the poore and nedy people beyng fatigate, and wery with the oppreſſiō of their new landlordes tendered their townes before they wer of them requyred, and beſide this the townes & cities farre diſtauncte frō Burdeaux ſent meſſengers to the erle, promiſyng to him both ſeruice & obeyſaunce. And emonge other the towne and caſtell of Chaſtillon in Perigotte, was to him deliuered by the Frenchemen vpon cōpoſicion, that they might with their lifes ſauely departe: which town, the erle ſtrōgly fortified both with men and ordinaunce. The Frenche kynge lyeng at Towers in Towrayne, being of the erles actes in Gaſcoyn credible enformed, was not a litle exaſperate & quickned: wherefore he mynding to reſiſt the firſt ſtorme, and repulſe the firſt furge, aſſembled a great army to the number of.xxii.M.men, and enterynge into Acquitayne came to Lulligneum, and from thence accompanyed with the erle of Ponthyure, the lordes of ſainct Seuere and Boucat, marched toward Caleys in Gaſcoyn, and wyth fayre promiſes obteyned the towne. And after that towne gayned, the Frenche kynge diuided hys army into two parties, whereof the one was gouerned by the erle of Cleremont, ſonne in law to kyng Charles, and heyre to the duke of Burbon, in the whych were.xv.M.men, in whome conſiſted the wayght and peyſe of the whole enterpriſe. This army he appointed to take the next way toward Burdeaux: the other army wherof he was Capitayn and leadar him ſelf, accompaned with the peres and noble men of his realme, he kept and retayned ſtill beſide Caleys, and ſent the two Marſhals of Fraunce with.xviii.C. men of armes, beſide archers, to beſege the towne of Chaſtylon in Perigot, and in goyng thither, they gat a fortreſſe, whyche they manned, and ſo departed to Chaſtilone, which they enuyroned with a ſtrong ſeage, & caſt highe trenches, and made depe dytches on euery ſide: and in a place where theyr enemyes muſte come, they layde ordinaunce bothe greate and ſmall, wherof ſo great a number was neuer before ſene in France. The erle of Shrewesbury hearyng of theſe newes, and perceiuing that he muſt of neceſſitie encoūter, and fight wᵗ two armies, determined with him ſelfe, firſt to aſſay the leaſt power and weeker puyſſaunce: wherfore without longer procraſtinacion, he aſſembled togither.viii.C.horſemē, wherof the lorde Liſle his ſonne, the lord Wolyns, the lord Cameus, ſir Edward Hull, ſyr Jhon Hayward, & ſir Jhon Vernon were cheſe, and ſo marched forward toward Chaſtilon, appoyntyng.v.M.fote men vnder the conduyte of the erle of Kendalle, and the lorde Leſpar to folowe

But whē the sonne had aūswered that it was neither honest noꝛ natural foꝛ hym, to leue his father in the extreme ieopardye of his life,and that he woulde taste of that dꝛaught, which his father and Parent should assay and begyn: The noble erle & comfoꝛtable capitayn sayd to him: Oh sonne sonne, I thy father, which onely hath bene the terꝛoꝛ and scouꝛge of the Frēch people so many peꝛes,which hath subuerted so many townes, and pꝛofligate and discomfited so many of them in open battayle,and marcial conflict,neither can I here dye,foꝛ the honoꝛ of my countrey, without great laude and perpetuall fame,noꝛ flye oꝛ departe without perpetuall shame and cōtinuall infamy.But because this is thy fiꝛst iourney and enteꝛpꝛise,neither thi flyeng shall ꝛedounde to thy shame, noꝛ thy death to thy glooꝛy:foꝛ as hardy a man wisely flieth, as a temeratious person folishely abidethe.

therfore ȳ sleyng of me shalbe ȳ dishonor, not only of me & my progēie, but also a discomfiture of all my company: thy departure shal saue thy lyfe, and make the able another tyme, if I be slayn to reuenge my death and to do honor to thy Prince, and profyt to his Realme. But nature so wrought in the sonne, that neither desire of lyfe, nor thought of securitie, could withdraw or pluck him frō his natural father: Who cōsideryng the constancy of his chyld, and the great daunger that they stode in, comforted his souldiours, cheared his Capitayns, and valeaūtly set on his enemies, and slew of them more in number then he had in his cōpany. But his enemies hauing a greater company of men, & more abūdaunce of ordinaunce then before had bene sene in a battayle, fyrst shot him through the thighe with a hādgōne, and slew his horse, & cowardly killed him, lyenge on the grounde, whome they neuer durste loke in the face, whyle he stode on his fete, and wyth hym, there dyed manfully hys sonne the lord Lisle, his bastard sonne Henry Talbot, and syr Edward Hull: elect to the noble order of the Gartier, and .xxx. valiant personages of the Englyshe nacion, & the lorde Molyns was there taken pryssoner with .lx. other. The residew of the Englishe people fled to Burdeaux and other places, wherof in the flight, were slayne aboue a .M. perxx sons. At this battayl of Chastillon, fought the .xiii. day of July, in thys yere, ended his lyfe Jhon lorde Talbot, and of his progenie ȳ fyrst erle of Shrewesbury, after that he with muche fame, more glory, and most victorie had for his prince and coūtrey, by the space of .xxiiij. yeres and more, valiantly made warre, and serued the kyng in the partes beyond the sea, whose corps was left on the ground, & after was found by hys frendes, & cōueyed to Whitchurch in Shropshyre, where it is intumulate. This man was to the French people, a very scorge and a daily terror, in so muche that as his person was fearfull, and terrible to his aduersaries present: so his name and fame was spitefull and dreadfull to the common people absent, in so much that women in Fraunce to feare xxi their yong children, would crye, the Talbot commeth, the Talbot commeth. After this discomfiture, diuers lordes fled to Burdeaux, but the erle of Kendall, the lordes of Montfetrant of Rosayne, and of Dadglanas, entered into the Castel of Chastilion, which they by the space of .x. dayes manfully defended, but in conclusion beyng desperate of all succors, rēdered the fortresse, and came safe to Burdeaux. After this town was yelded the townes of sainct Million, Bybourne & all other, whych therle of Shrewsbury had conquered, rendered thē selfes to the Frenche obeysaunce, Burdeaux onely except. The which citie beyng the last xxii refuge, and onely consolacion of the Englishe people in Gascoyne, the French kyng in person with all his puissaunce, strōgly beseged & dayly assauted, in the which he more lost then gayned: beside this, the Englishmen issued out, and coragiously fought with their enemies: likewise did the citizens, which loking for no fauor at the Frenche kinges hand, because of their late coniuracion againste him, manfully defended them selfes, and sore noyed and hurt their enemies. But in conclusion bothe garrisons and the inhabitãtes, oppressed with much penurye & extreme tampne were coacted to zender the citie vpon reasonable condicions, to them by the Frenche kyng sent and oblated: the effect whereof was that no offence, before tyme committed or done by any of the citezẽs shoulde hereafter be imputed, or leyd to the charge of any of them. Also that all Englishemen and Gascons myght safely departe into Englande or to Caleys with all their substance, and that the lordes Lespar, Duras and xxx. other, would neuer vpon payn of death be founde within any of the French kynges dominions, which lord Lespatre after beyng taken disguysed in Gascoyn was made shorter by the hedde. When this composicion was agreed and sealed, the Englishmen had their shippes and al thinges necessarie for their iorney, to them deliuered, which, when wynd and wether were to them propice and conuenient, were shortly transported into England, in the moneth of October this present yere. Thus was the duchye of Acquytayn, which had cõtynued in the English possession, from the yere of our Lorde. M. lv. which is. iii. C. & od yeres, by ỹ martage of Alienor, doughter and heyr to William duke of Acquitayn wyfe to kynge Henry the second, finally reduced, and brought agayne to the French obedience and seruitude. The kepyng of which duchye was neither costly nor troblesome to the realme of England but, bothe pleasant and profitable: for by the souerayngtie of that countrey, ponge gentelmen learned the experiẽce of warre, and expert mẽ wer promoted to many riche offices, & great liuinges within thesame. For within that onely Duchye, by. iiii. Archebishoppes. xxiiii. Bishoppes, xb. etledons ii. C. and. ii, Baronies, and aboue a. M. Capitaynshippes and baylywyckes. All though thys great losse chaunced, this yere to the Englishe nacion, yet a greater detryment hapned in thesame season to the whole flocke of Christen people. For Machumet, called the great Turk besieged the citie of Constãtynople in Grece, wyth an innumerable nũber of Turkes, and fiftye dayes togither gaue to it a continuall assaut, and on the. iiii day of June, toke it perforce, sleyng man, woman and chyldren, except the Enperour Palialogus, and diuers other of the blode Royal, whome he toke prisoners, and after caused them to be behedded. If I should write the detestable murder of men, the abhominable and cruel slaughter of childzen, the shameful rauishmẽt of women and virgyns, which were perpetrate and done by the vnmercifull pagans and cruel Turkes, I assure you that your eares woulde abhorre ỹ hearyng and our eyes woulde not abyde the readynge, and therfore I passe thẽ ouer. In this trobleous season on ỹ. xiii. daye of October, was ỹ quene deliuered at Westmynster of a fayre sonne, which was Christened & named Edward, and after grew to a goodely & perfight man, as after you shall heare: whose mother susteyned not a litle slaunder and obloquye of the commõ people, saiyng that the king was not able to get a chyld, and that this was not his sonne, with many slaunderous woordes, to

When forein warre and outward battayles, were brought to an ende and finall conclusion: domesticall discorde and ciuil discencion began again to renew and arise, within the realme of Englande: for when the care of outward hostilitie (whiche kept the myndes of the Prynces in the realme occupied, and in exercise) was taken awaye and banyshed, desire of souereignte, and ambicion of preeminence, sodainly sprang out so farre, that the whole Realme was deuided into twoo seuerall factions, and priuate partes. For kyng Henry, discended of the house of Lancastre, claymyng the croune from kyng Henry the. iiii. his graund father, first author of this diuision: and Rychard duke of Yorke, as heyre to Lionell, the third sonne to Kyng Edward the third: wrestled for the game, and stroue for the waget. By reason whereof, the nobles aswell as the common people, were into partes deuided, to the destruccion of many a man, and to the great ruyne and decay of this region. For while the one part studied to banquisshe and suppresse the other, all commõ wealth was set a side, and iustice and equitie was clerely exiled. For the duke of Yorke, which sore gaped and more thirsted for the superiorite and preeminence, studied, deuised, and practised al waies & meanes, by the whiche he might attain to his pretẽsed purpose, and long hoped desire. And emongest all imaginacions, one semed moste necessary for his purpose, whiche yet again was to stirre and prouoke the malice of all the people, agaynst the Duke of Somerset, who onely ruled the kynge, and ordered all thynges at hys pleasure and will: Imagening, that he beyng made out of the waye, his purpose should shortly come to a good conclusion. Wherfore, to the nobles of the realme he complayned, lamented, and detested, the miserable state and dayly ruyne, of his noble countrey: notyng and affirming, the Duke of Somerset, to be the very roote and cause of thesame, whom he named and called, an vniust man, a mischeuous persone, a tyrannicall gouernor, and a couetous counsailor: layng also great offences to kyng Henry, saying, that he was a man, neither of wit nor stomacke, neither mete to be a kyng, nor apte to gouerne a common wealth, and therfore it was the duetie of the noble men, and great Prynces, not onely to thinke on this weightie matter, but spedely to prouide a remedy, and to set the Realme in another staye. By whiche complayntes and perswasions, the duke of yorke, so altered the myndes of many persones of high estate that they liked not the worlde, as it then wauered, nor approued thactes of the kyng or his coũsail. And because, that ambicion and auarice, was newly entered into their hartes, they studied, sodainly to change al thin-ges, and to turne the worlde vpsetdoune. When the duke sawe menns appetites, and felt well their myndes, he chyefly entertained two Richardes, and bothe Neuelles, the one of Salisbury, the other of Warwycke beyng erle, the first the father, the second the sonne. Thys erle of Salisbury, was second sonne to Raufe Neuell, erle of Westmerlande, whose daughter the duke of Yorke had maried, & the said Richard was espoused to Lady Alice, the only chyld and sole heire of Thomas Montacute erle of Salisbury, slain at the siege of Orleaunce, (as before I haue declared) of whiche woman he engendered, Richard, Jhon, and George. Richarde the eldest sonne espoused Anne, the syster and heyre of the entire bloud, to lorde Henry Beauchamp Erle, and after duke of Warwicke, in whose right and title, he was created and named Erle of Warwicke, and not by hys awne progeny or parentage. This Rychard was not onely a man of maruelous qualities, and facundious facions, but also from his youth, by a certayn practise or naturall inclinacion, so set them forward, with wittie and gentle demeanour, to all persones of high and of lowe degre, that emong all sortes of people, he obteyned greate loue, muche fauour, and more credence: whiche thinges daily more increased, by his abundant liberalitie, and plentyfull house keppynge, then by hys ryches, aucthoritie, or hygh parentage: By reason of whiche doynges, he was in suche fauour and estimacion, emongest the common people, that they iudged hym able to do all thinges, and that without hym, nothing to be well done. For whiche causes his aucthoritie, shortly so fast increased, that whiche waie he bowed, that waye ranne the streame, and what part he auaunced, that syde gat the superioritie.

The. xxxiii. yere.

WHē the duke of Yorke had fastened his chaine, betwene these twoo strong and robustious pillers, he with his frendes, so seriously wrouth, and so pollitiquely handled his busines, that the Duke of Somerset, was arrested in the Quenes great chamber, and sent to the Towre of London, where he without great solempnitie, kept a dolefull Christmas: agaynst whom in open parliamēt, were laied diuerse and heinous articles of high treason, as well for the losse of Normandy, as for the late mischance, whiche happened in Guyen. The kyng at this time was sicke at Clarendon, and so conueyed to London, by reason whereof, no finall determinacion proceded, in this greate and waightie cause, but it was put in suspence, til the next assemble of the hygh court of parliament. During whiche tyme, the kyng either of his awne mynde, or by the Quenes procurement, caused the duke of Somerset, to be set at libertie: by whiche doyng, grew great enuie and displeasure, betwene the kyng and diuerse of his lordes, and in especiall betwene the duke of Yorke, and the kynges linage. And to aggrauate more the malice newe begon, the Quene, whiche then ruled the rost and bare the whole rule, caused the duke of Somerset, to bee preferred ferred to the captainshyp of Calice, where with, not oncly the commons but also many of the nobilitie, wer greatly greued and offended, saiyng: that he had lost Normãdy, & so would he do Calice. The duke of Yorke and his adherentes perceiuyng, that neither exhortacion serued, nor accusemẽt preuailed against the duke of Somerset, determined to reuẽge their querell, and obteine their purpose, by open warre and marciall aduenture, and no lenger to slepe in so a waightie a busines. So he beyng in the Marches of Wales, associate with his especiall frendes, the erles of Salisbury and Warwicke, the lorde Cobhã, and other, assembled an x army, and gathered a greate power, and like warlike persones, marched toward Londõ. The Londoners hearing of so great a multitude, commyng toward their citie, were greatly astonnied and muche abashed: for euery persone considered his awne parte, that either with holdyng with the one syde, or beyng contrariant to the other, or medeling with no part he should incurre indignacion or displeasure. The kyng being credibly informed, of the great army commyng toward hym, assembled an hoste, intendyng to mete with the duke in the Northe parte, because he had to many frendes about the citie of London, and for that cause, with greate spede and small lucke, he being accompanied with the Dukes of So-xx merset, and Buckyngham, therles of Stafford, Northumberlande, and Wilshire, with the lorde Clifford, and diuerse other barõs, departed out of Westmister, the. xx. daie of May, toward the toune of S. Albons: of whose doynges the duke of Yorke being aduertised, by his espials, with all his power costed the countreys, and came to thesame toune, the third daie next ensuyng. The kyng hearyng of their approchyng, sent to hym messengers, straightly chargyng and commaunding hym, as an obedient subiect to kepe the peace, and not as an enemy to his naturall countrey, to murdre and slay his awne countrimen and propre naciõ. While kyng Henry, more desirous of peace then of warre, was sendyng furthe xxx his orators, at the one ende of the toune: the erle of Warwicke with the Marchemen, entered at the other ende of the toune, and fiersly set on the kynges forewarde, and theim shortly discomfited. Then came the duke of Somerset, & all the other lordes with the kynges power, whiche fought a sore and a cruell battaill, in the whiche, many a tall man lost his lyfe: but the duke of Yorke sent euer freshemen, to succor the wery, & put new men in the places of the hurt persons, by whiche onely pollicie, the kynges armie was profligate and dispersed, & all the chieftaines of the field almoste slain and brought to confusion. For there died vnder the lygne of the Castle, Edmond duke of Somerset, who long before was warned xl to eschew all Castles, and beside hym, lay Henry the second erle of Northumberland, Humfrey erle of Stafford, sonne to the Duke of Buckingham, Jhon lorde Clifford, and. viii. M. men and more. Humfrey duke of Buckyngham, beyng wounded, & James Butler erle of Wilshire & Ormond, seyng fortunes loweryng chaunce, left the kyng poste a lone & with a great numbre fled away. This was thend of the first battaill at S.

The first battaill at saincte Albons.

 Albons,

Albons, whiche was fought on the Thursdaie, before the feast of Pentecoste, beyng the. xxiii. date of Maie. In this xxxiii. yere of the kynges reigne, the bodies of the noble men, were buried in the Monastery, and the meane people in other places. This Edmond duke of Somerset, left behynde hym thre sonnes, Henry, Edmond, and Jhon, whiche to the extremitie of death, toke part with the line of kyng Henry.

AFTERE this victory obteined, by the Duke of Yorke and his compaignons, he remembred, that often tymes he had declared and diuulged abrode, the onely cause of his warre to be, for thauauncement of the publique wealth, and to se the realme in a more commodious estate, and not a better condicion. Wherfore, he vsing al lenitie, mercy, and bountefulnes, would not once touche or apprehend the body of kyng Henry, whō he might bothe haue slain, & vtterly destroyed, consyderyng, that he had hym in his ward and gouernaunce. But with great honour and due reuerence, conueyed hym to London, & so to Westminster, to whiche place was somoned and appoynted, a great assemble of the thre estates, commonly called a parliament, whiche began the. ix. day of July, in the whiche session, the Duke of Glouc̄ester, was openly declared a true Prince, bothe to the kyng & the realme. Beside this, it was enacted, that no persone, should either iudge or reporte, any poynt of vntruth, of the duke of Yorke, the erles of Salisbury and Warwycke, for comynyng in warlike maner, against the kyng at S. Albons, consyderyng, that their attempt and enterprise, was onely to se the kynges persone, in safegard and suer kepyng, and to put and aliene from hym, the publique oppressors of the common wealth: by whose misgouernaunce, his life might be in hasard, and his aucthoritie hang in a very small thred. In whiche Parliament also, the duke of Yorke was made protector of the Realme, and therle of Salisbury, was appoynted to be Chauncellor, and had the greate seale to hym deliuered: and the erle of Warwicke, was elected to the office of the capitayn of Calice, and the territories of thesame. As this deuise was politiquely inuented, so was the sequele thereof to the firste aucthors, bothe honorable and profitable, if fortunes ship had sailed all one way. For by this practise, the whole rule and regiment of the whole Realme, consisted onely in the hedde and orders, of the duke and the Chauncellor, and all the Warlike affayres and busynesse, rested principally in the erle of Warwicke, and so emongest them, it was agreed, that king Henry should styll reygne, in name and dignitie, but neyther in deede, nor in aucthoritie: not myndyng eyther to depose or destroy thesaid kyng, least they might sodaynly prouoke and stirre the fury and ire of the common people against theim: whiche for his holynes of lyfe, and abundant clemencie, was of the symple sort, muche fauored, and highly estemed. After whiche aucthoritie geuen, these three persones ruled the realme, and dyd all thynges after their awne discretions, (whiche without battaill or manslaughter, might haue easely depriued thesaied kyng, bothe of lyfe and lande). And first they amoued from the priuie counsaill, all suche

persones as the kyng loued, or the quene fauored, puttyng in their places, men of their secte and confederacie, & changyng officers throughout the realme, at their will and disposicion: so that tholde spoken prouerbe, here toke place: New Lordes, new lawes: suche lippes, suche lettice. And yet in all their rule, I finde no mencion made, of differryng Justice, or of their pollyng, or their bribery, as was openly proued by such as gouerned before their tyme: Sauyng that they tooke out of the sanctuary of Westminster, Jhon Holland, duke of Excester, beyng repugnant to the ordre taken and concluded, in the last parliament, and conueyed hym to Pountfred castle. Whiche takyng out, was accompted an execrable and a dampnable offence, of diuerse of the spiritualtie, and especially of the Abbot of Westminster and his Monkes, and this is the most spot that was (as I could rede) euer moste to be caste in the Dukes fame, durying his Protectorship, or of his counsaill.

BUT that venemous worme, that dreadfull dragon called disdain of superiorite, whiche hath consumed the bloud of so many noble Princes, and destroyed the Image of so many gouernors in all Realmes and kyngdomes, aswell pagan as Christian, could not abstem frō incensyng the hartes of lorde Henry Beaufort, newly come to the Duchy of Somerset, by the death of duke Edmond his father, whiche at the battaill of sainct Albons, (as you haue heard before rehersed) lost his lyfe, and of Humfrey duke of Buckyngham, (whose sonne and heyre named Humfrey, erle of Staffort, tasted thesame cuppe, at the forenamed conflict) and of other lordes and men of aucthoritie, fauoring and folowing the part of kyng Henry, whiche not onely bewailed and had compassion of the vnsure condicion, and wauerying estate of his rule and lordshyp, perceiuing openly, wherunto the cloked gentlenes, and suborned fashiō of the duke of Yorke tended and crept vp: but also thought it necessarie and cōuenient, to puruey for a remedy, or the mischief happened. Wherfore with open mouthes and fierce courages, thei came to Quene Margaret, informing her, that it was not honorable, but a reproche and infamy to the kyng. to haue one to bee a Protector and gouernor of hym and his Realme, as who would say: that he was either a childe, whiche had nede of norice, to fede hym with pappe, or an innocent creature, whiche muste be ruled by a tutor, asserteining her farther, that the Duke of Yorkes only intent was, vnder the colour of this protectorshyp, sodaynly to destroy & depose the kyng, when he least thought of it. and therfore willed her in so quicke a mischief, to prouide a hasty remedy if she loued the safegard of her husbande, or the tuicion of her selfe. The Quene hauyng a wit, more then the common sort of women haue, and considerying the estate of her husbande, the condicion of her selfe, and the perill of her onely sonne, thought it necessary to plucke the sworde of auctr, or the out of their handes, whiche vnder colour of rulyng vnder others, desired to be gouernors, and superiors themselfes. Wherfore, a greate counsaill was called at Grenewhich, where the duke of Yorke, was discharged of his Protectorship, and the erle of Salisbury also, was dismissed of hys office: whiche malicious mutacion emongest the nobilitie, caused sodain alteracions and seditious commocions, to ryzyng and aryse in the commonaltie, and in especiall within the citie of London.

FOR a young Marchaunt, whiche before tyme had bene in diuerse cities within the countrey of Italy, and there prohibited by the Magistrates and rulers, to vse or weare any weapon, either inuasiue or defensiue, chalenged an Italian in Chepe syde, for wearyng of a dagger, confutyng hym with the lawes of his awne countrey, whiche, lyke a Colericke knaue and presumptcous persone, so disdaynfully and with suche tauntes and checkes, answered the marchant, that he not willing to suffre so open a reproche, in so publique a strete, and that of so proude a villain, toke by force from him his dagget, and with thesame, a litle cut his croune and cracked his pate. This Italian in greate haste, complayned to the Mayer, of this offence, whiche at the nexte Courte, holden at the Guyldhaule, by the consent of the whole senate, sent for the offendor, and declaryng to hym his crime, commaunded him to ward, wherof diuerse other light marchantes within the citie, sore abhorryng the Italian nacion, for lickyng the fat from their beardes, and takyng from them their accustomed lyuing, by reason that thesaid estraungers inporte & transported into and out of this Realme, all suche marchandyses, commodities, and necessaries, as the englishmen onely were accustomed to do, assembled together in greate plumpes, and by force compelled the Maire to deliuer the prisoner out of Newgate: and yet this multitude, with this doyng nothyng satiate nor appeased, like madde persons and frantique fooles, ranne to the seuerall houses, of diuerse Venecians, Lucases, and Florentynes, and them spoyled, robbed and ryfled, without reason or measure. The Mayre perceiuing this great enormitie, assembled a great numbre of substanciall and graue citezens, whiche, not without greate bloudshed, and maymyng of sundery persones, fynally appeased their rage, and caused the people to departe to their houses. The beginner of this temeratious commocion, and sodain vprore, either perswaded by his frendes, or fearyng his chaunce, whiche for his firste facte might sodainly insue, departed to Westminster, and there Registred hymselfe as a sanctuary man. The Quene whiche ruled all thynges, hearing of this greate riote and vnlawfull misdemianours, sent the Duke of Excester and Buckyngham, accompanied with many other noble men, to London, with a commission of oyer and determiner, for the punishement of this outragious offence & seditious crime. When the Maire of the citie the two dukes, and the two chief iustices, were set in the Guyldhaule for the performance of their commission, & began to call the empanelles, for thenquiry, as the vse and order is, diuerse light witted, and lesse brayned persons of the citie, prtuely armed them, and by the ringing of bow bell thought to assemble together a great multitude of their minde and opinion, and so by force and might to take from the kepers, all suche prisoners, as were before apprehended, for the late committed robbery & riot, as they were goyng to their triall or arreignment. But this great tumult and sodain fury, was by discrete & sage citizens, a litle & litle appeased & finally quenched, but in the meane season, the dukes & other commissioners, being vntrwly aduertised, that they were in ieoperdy of their lyues, sodainly departed from Guyldhaule, and left their inquirie for that day.

THE Frenche nacion, hearyng of this domesticall diuision and ciuile dissencion, within the realme of England, muche desiryng to be reuenged of olde displeasures and great damages, which they had so many yeares born and susteined by the English people, appoynted two Nauyes to inuade xxx and depopulate the tounes & portes, adioynyng to the ryuage of the sea. The capitayn of the one army, was Willia lord Pomiers, and of the other, syr Piers Bressy, a great ruler in Normandy. These two capitains, when opportunitie of wether serued, sette vp their sayles at the mouthe of Sayne, and there seuered them selfes, the one Westward, and the other Eastward, whiche was syr Peter de Bressy. This lusty Capitain saylyng al the cost of Sussex and Kent, durst not once take lande, til he arriued in the downes, and there hauing by a certayn espiall, perfit notice, that the towne of Sandwyche was neyther peopled nor fortefyed, because that a lytle before, the chefe rulers of the toune were from thence xl departed, for to auoyde the pestylenciall plage, which sore there infected and slew the people, entered the hauen, spoyled the towne, and after such pore stuffe as he there founde, ryfflyde and taken, he fearynge an assemblie of the contrey, shortly returned. The lord Pomier likewise toke his course Westward, and by night brent certain houses in Tounay, & with a litle pillage retired into Britayn. These two aduentures and fortunate chaunces, whiche to them in cõparison of their great expẽses, in their torneys were scant worthe one poore mite, or syngle farthyng: The French writers dylate, set furth and paynt with pẽne, as though they had gottẽ Cresus ryches, and Alexanders kyngdomes: forgettyng how many hũdred thousande poundes, they had lost in few yeres before prcedynge, as to all menne, beyng indifferent readers of this Historie, playnly ap-pereth. But verely some bread is better to the hungry persone, then no bread, and a small gaine of him, which desired recouerie, is a great pleasure, and therfore the Frenche authors make of a litle muche, & yet their much (all thynges consydered) is in effect nothyng at all. The Scottes also not degenerating frõ their olde mutabilitie, nor alteryng their aun-cient condicions, from their accustomed perfidie and vsuall vntrought entered into Northũberland, kyng James the second, then being there in person, and burned small houses, and litle cotages: But in the very myddes of their greate enterpryse, they hearyng of the duke of Yorke, marchyng toward thẽ, with a great army, with muche payne, & no gayn, in all haste reuerted to their countrey. Let vs passe ouer for a tyme all outward inuasions, and returne to our awn domesticall debate, & dayly discorde. First not forgetting, that while foren enemies inuaded the out-warde partes, and extreme confynes of this troubelous Realme, a great xx conflict was attempted betwene the lorde Egremond, and the sonnes of the erles of Salisbury: in the which fray, many persons were slayn, and a greater number hurt. The lord Egremõd, in this great tumult could not escape, but by force was taken and brought before the kinges coũsaill, and there the kyng and the quene to shew them selfs to all persons indifferẽt, adiudged him to pay to the erle of Salisbury a great summe of money, and for his heynous offence, done against the kynges lawes, he was committed to the gayle of Newgate, within the citie of London out of the which prison, by helpe of his fautors, he secretly escaped, & so-daynly departed, to the great vexacion of the shrieues of London, at that xxi tyme being. *In whiche season, the craft of Prynting was first inuented

Although the bodies of these noble personages, were by this sedicious and fraudulẽt meanes a sonder separated as ye haue heard: yet their hartes were knitte and coupled in one, neuer foꝛgetting, but dayly studyeng, bothe how to be reuenged of the olde dispites and malicious attẽptes, against them cõmitted and imagened, and also how to compasse their purposes, and to get the superioritie and ouerhand aboue their cuill willers, and

Because you haue bene long troubled with readyng of diuers diuisions, sedicions, operacions, and greate disturbance within the Realme, emong the tempoꝛalitie, I wyll now a litle digresse from my contynued purpose, to declare to you an ouerthwarte iudgement giuen emong the fathers xxx of the spiritualtie, agaynst Reynold Pecocke, then Byshop of Chichester. This man, somwhat learned, but better stomacked, began to moue questions, not pꝛiuatly, but openly in the Uniuersities, concernyng the annates, peterpens, and othet iurisdicions and aucthoꝛities, appertaynyng to the sea of Rome, and not onely put foꝛth the questions, but declared his minde and opinion in thesame: wherfoꝛe he was foꝛ this cause abiured at Paules crosse, and all his bookes bꝛent, and he hym selfe kept in his awne house duryng his naturall lyfe. Some saye that hys opinion was, that spirituall persons, by Godes lawe, ought to haue no of Englande implicate and troubled with ciuile dissencion, and mutual discord was not afeard to send his admirals on the costes of Kent, and Deuonshyre, and there to spoyle townes, burne houses, and murder the Englishe people: whiche cause also anymated the Scottes to make Rodes and Incursions, into the confines and marches of the Realme, to the great losse and detriment of the kynges leege people: whiche twoo nacions were set cõtinually to greue and vexe this his realme of England, tyll they perceiued a perfite concorde, and an vnfayned amitie to be concluded and knitte together, betweene hym and his cõsanguinitie, and the other sorte of the contrary part, and confederacie. And to the entent that he woulde be the chiefe author of peace, and pryncypall styrter of thys vertuous concorde, he promysed so gently to entertayne the duke of Yorke, and his fautors, that all olde grudges beyng not only inwardly forgottẽ, but also outwardly forgeuen, should be the cause of perpetuall loue, betweene them and their frendes: of whiche concorde should ensue, familiaritie emonge the lordes, and concord emong the commons, which to all vtter enemies should be an inward grudge, and to this Realme a great glorie and profite. This deuise was of all men present well taken and adiudged, both honorable to the kyng, & profytable to his realme. Wherupon diuers graue & sad persons were sent to the duke of Yorke and all other the great estates of the realme, whiche sins the battayle of sainct Albons neuer met, came, nor commoned together, commaundyng them for reasonable causes, and greate considerations, to resorte to the kynges palayce, without procrastinacion or delay. At this commaundement came to London, Rychard Duke of Yorke, and Rychard, Erle of Salisbury, accõpanied with a great number of meigniall seruauntes & frendes, lest peraduenture they for lacke of ayde, myghte haue bene betrapped or they had knowlege, or were warned. After them came frõ Caleis to London, the erle of Warwycke, whose seruitours were apparreled in rede cotes, embroudered with white ragged stakes. These. iii. lordes were lodged within the citie: the duke at Baynardes castell, the erle of Salisbury, at the Herber, and the erle of Warwycke at his place, beside the Graye friers. About thesame season, with no lesse cõpany of men came to the citie, the yong duke of Somerset, the Erle of Northumberland, & the lord Clyfford, whose fathers were slayn at sainct Albons: and after them resorted the dukes of Excester, and Buckyngham, the lorde Egremond, and al most all the nobilitie of this Realme. The Duke of Yorke and his mates, were lodged within the citie, and the duke of Somerset, and all his frendes, sojourned without Temple barre, Holborne and other places of the suburbes: As who sayd, that as the Iewes disdayned the company of the Samaritans, so the Lancastrians abhorred the familiaritie of Yorkish lynage. After the commynge of these lordes to the citie, the kyng, the Quene with all their familie, shortely folowed, and were lodged in the Bysshoppes palayce of London. These Lordes had suche great companies, attendyng on them (for one had. v. C. other

The lozdes, whiche lodged within the cytie, kept a daily counsaill at the Blacke friers, within the citie. The other parte sojozning without the walles, assembled likewise in the chapter house of Westminster. Thus euery part both studied his awn pzofite and aduauncement, and also how to reuēge thynges done to them, by their foes and aduersaries. But the Archebyshop of Canterbury, and other vertuous pzelates, so exhoxted, applied, & perswaded both the parties (although a great whyle they were neither heard, noz regarded) that in cōclusion, they brought them to a communicacion, where after long alteracion, aswell of olde Iniuries, and of new displeasures, by the one faccion, against the other committed, the feare of outwarde hostilitie, and forein inuasion, so mollified their indurate hartes, that they outwardly pzomysing, to forget all olde rancoys, & auncient displeasures, sealed and sygned writinges, the one euer after to be frend to the other, and all together to be obedient to the kyng, and fauoxers to his frēdes & enemies to his enemies. This cōcoxd was so ioyfull to the superiozs, and so embzaced of the common people (who euer beare the burden, when pzinces be at controuersie) that foz the open appearaunce, and demonstracion of this godly concoxde, publique pzocessions were appointed, to be solempnely celebzate, within the Cathedzall church of sainct Paule in the citie of London, on the day of the Conception of our Lady, in the mouth of Marche. At which solempne feast, the Kyng in habite royall, and his dyademe on his hedde, kept his estate in pzocession, befoze whom, went hand in hand, the duke of Somerset, the erle of Salisbury, the duke of Exceter, and the erle of Warwike, and lo on of the one faccion, and an other of the other sect, and behynd the kyng the duke of Yoxke ledde the Quene with greate familiaritie to all mens sightes: but wo woxth dissimulacion, and false flatteryng countenaunce: fye on doble entendiment, and cloked adulacion, whiche hath bene the common seruytours in all palaces, bothe Imperiall and Regal, and by their only pestiferous venime, and secrete malyce, hath ben the destruccion of many a noble man, and the confusion of a great number of trew meanyng and faithfull persons: But the wyseman, whiche saieth: wo be thou that hast a doble hart, meant, that dissimulacīō once espied, should be the arrowe wherwith the dissembler should be wounded. As by this cloked pageant, and dissimulyng pzocession, hereafter shall playnely be declared. Foz their bodies were ioyned by hand in hand, whose hartes were farre a sonder: their mouthes louyngly smiled, whose corages were inflāmed with malice: their tounges spake lyke suger, and their thoughtes were all inuenimed: but all these dissimulinge persons, tasted the vessell of woo, as the Wyseman sayde: and few oz none of this company were vnblotted, oz vndestroied by this doloxous pzynke of dissimulacīō. Well let vs now leue the cloked collusion, that remained in Fraunce, and returne to the open dissimulacion, whiche now appeared in England.

Sier being enclosed in a straite place, wil by force bter his flãme, & as the course of water astricted & letted will flowe and burst out in cõtinuaunce of time: so this cãcard crocodyle, & subtile serpent, could not lõg lurke in malicious hartes, nor venemous stomakes, but incõclusion she must (accordyng to her nature) apere & shew her self. For after this apparaunt concord, & intrinsical discord, according to the very nature of dissimulacio, diuers noble mẽ of byrth, but not stable of worde, putting from them honor, trougth & honestie forgat their othe, & brake their promisse, & aduaunced forth ỹ banner of displeasure, and the flagge of malice. So a man may se, that suche persones, regard neither their awne peculiar profite, nor the publique wealth of their native countrey, nor yet passe of an othe, or promise breking, to whom discord is pleasant, & discension is delectable. For not long after this dissimuled amitie, a certain fray, either by chaũce, or of a thing prepensed, was made vpon a yoman of the erles of Warwike, by a seruiteur of the kynges, in the which the Assaylant was sore hurte, but the erles mã fled. The kynges meigniall seruaũtes, seing their felow hurt, & the offendor escaped, assembled in a great number, & watched the erle returnyng from the counsayll toward his barge, and sodaynly set on hym the yomen with swordes, and the Blacke garde, with spittes and fyre forkes. After long fyght, and many of thee Erles men maymed and wounded, by helpe of his frendes, he toke a wherry, & so escaped to London: whome the Quene incontinent commaued to be apprehended, and as a captiue and prisoner, to be sent to the Towre of London, where (if he had bene then taken) he had shortly ended his dayes, and made hys ende. By this vnhappy fraye, and sodain chaunce of malice, there arose suche dayly and terryble warre, that euery man was in trouble, and no person was in quiet. For after this displeasure doen to the erle, and the quenes good mynd toward hym, by his secret frendes priuilye reueled, he with all diligence, toke his iorney to Warwicke, and after into Yorke-shire, where he found the duke of Yorke, and the erle of Salisbury, declating to them, the assaute of the kynges seruauntes, and the pretensed purpose of the fraudulent Quene. After which complaynt made, he fearing lest by long absence, he might be deposed or defrauded of his capitain ship of Calice, with greate spede embarked hymself, & sailed thither dayly expectyng and lokyng, what way the duke of Yorke would take for achyueing hys long intẽded purpose. After whose departure, ỹ duke of Yorke and therle of Salisbury, somwhat exasperate and moued with this doble dealyng, beganne to grudge and murmure: affirming that in the Quene rested nothyng, but fraude and feminine mallice, whiche ruled the kyng at her pleasure and wil, studied nothyng somuche, as the destruccion of the nobilitie, and pees of the Realme. After long consultacion had it was agreed, that therle with a warlike company, shoulde marche toward the kyng, and complain to him, bothe of the manifest iniury doen to his sõne, and also of the vnkind breach, of the swoyne amytie and late agremẽt, in whiche suite if he did preuaile, he thẽ should not omyt the occasion to hym geuen, in reuengyng the displeasures to hym doen by the quene and her sinister counsailors, whiche euell & vngodly, ordered the Subiectes of the whole Realme. After this deuise made and concluded, therle of Salisbury remoued from Middelham castle, accõpanied with .iiii. or .v. M. men, and toke his waie through Lancashyre, and Shropshire, toward London. In the meane season the quene, whithe was assisted and ruled, by the dukes of Somerset and Buckyngha hauyng the bigilant ye and circumspect brayne, of a pollitique gouernor: imagened that the erle of Warwicke had kindeled this fire, and begon this tumult, to thentent (accordyng to his pretensed purpose) to set the duke of Yorke in the siege royall, and high trone of the realme: For which causes, she beyng a woman of no smal wit, nor litle pollecye, conceuung in her opinion, that it was no bote to make any farther concord or league with her aduersaries, & hearyng of therle of Salisburies setyng forward, w a cõpany of armed men and archers: assẽbled together a greate counsaill, to puruey a remedy, for that imminent mischief, and (as in a multitude often times it happeth, so many heddes so many wittes) so diuerse wer in opinion, that neither people nor weapon sholde be stirred, tyl the erle aproched, doubtyng, whether he came to demaunde warre or peace, or to aske Justice, & to reforme wrong. Other, otherwise thought, and wer of a contrary opinion, makyng the foundacio of their argument, that the raising of people, and assemble of souldiors by hym could signifie no peace, nor treaty of concord: except a man shoulde saie, that intreatyng for fauor with naked sworde in hande, were an humble submission and a meke request: which onely consideracion, moued them to saie, ỹ as force with force, ought to be repelled, so he w a great power, or he came into the middest of the Realme, shold of necessytie be encountred and (if fortune would serue) vtterly destroyed. This sentence toke place, & without delay, syr James Twichet lorde Awdeley. because his seigniory and power lay in those pattes, wher the erle should passe, was appoyncted to mete with hym, and to geue hym battayl, if he sawe cause or place conuenient, and the quene folowed after. The lord Aude ley, accordyng to his commission, assembled aboue. x. M. men, and know yng by his espials whiche way therle kept, approched nere to hym on a faire plain called Bloze Heath, within a mile of the toune of Drayton, in the countrey of Salope, commonly called Shropshire. The erle per-ceiuing by the liuery of the souldiors, that he was circumuented and likely to be trapped with the quenes power, determined rather there to abide the aduenture, with fame and honor, then farther to fly, with losse & reproche: & so encamped himselfe all the night. on ỹ side of a litle brooke not very broode but sumwhat depe. In the morning earely. beyng the day of. s. Tecle, he caused his souldiors to shote their slightes, towarde the Lorde Awdeleys companye, whiche laie on the otherside of the said water, and then he and all his companye, made a signe of retraite. The lorde Awdeley, remembring not onely the trust that he was put in. But also the Quenes terrible commaundemente, (whiche was to bring to ẽ her presence, therle of Salisburie, quicke or dead) blew vp his trumpet, and did set furth his bowarde, & sodainli passed the water. Therle of Salisburie, whiche knew the slaightes, stratagemes, and polliceis of warlike affaires, sodeinly returned, and shortly encountered with the Lorde Awdeley and his chiefe Capitaines, or the residewe of his army coulde passe the water. The fight was sore and dreadfull. Therle desyring the sauing of his life, and his aduersaries coueting his destruccion, fought sore for the obteyning of their purpose, but in conclusion, the erles army as men desperate of aide and succor, so egerly fought, that thei slewe the lorde Audeley, and all his capitaines, and discomfyted al the remnaunt xxx of his people. In this battail, wer slain. xxiij. C. persõs. but the greatest plague lighted on the Chesshire men, because one halfe of the shire, was one the one part, and the other, on the other part, of whiche numbre wer sir Thomas Dutton, sir Jhon Donne, & sir Hugh Uenables, But there-les twoo sonnes, the one called Sir Jhon Neuel, and the other sir Thomas wer sore wounded, whiche soberly iorneng into the Northcountrey thinkyng there to repose theim selfes, wer in their iorney aprehended. by thequenes frendes, and conueyed to Chester: but their kepers deliuered them shortly, or elles the Marche men had destroyed the Gayles. Such fauor had the commons of Wales, to the duke of Yorkes band and his affinitie, that thei could suffre no wrong to be doen, nor euil word to be spoken of hym or his frendes.

FTER this battail, the duke of Yorke not onely perceiuing ỹ the destruccion of him & hys frēdes, was intēded (as by ỹ last conflict, was apparaūtly declared) but also remembryng, ỹ all hys coūsailes & priuy intēctes were now opened to ỹ king & the quene which studied to diuert & turne frō thē all mischief or infortunitie, which might chaunce eyther to thē or their frēdes, thought it mete neither long to dissimuie, nor farther to kepe his bil vnder wing: & therfore with a corragious harte, aswell for ỹ obteinyng of ỹ croune, as for ỹ tuitiō & sauegard of him & his frēdes, he detetmined no lenger to slepe in hys den, but with all diligince, to set furth his busines and auaunce his banner. And therefore sending for therle of Salisbury his felow and compete in all his doynges, counsailes, and fortunes (after long communicacion had, of the Quenes misgouernaunce, and how she without their assent, did all thynges at her wil and pleasure) determined to raise a greate army, and by fine force, either to die or win their purpose. What should I saye, men were assembled, frendes wer sent for, and a puissaunt armie was gathered, bothe of Northren men and Welshemen whiche in good ordre came into the Marches of Wales, adioynyng to Shropshire, whete they determined, either to abyde their enemies or to mete them if thei marched forward. The king was not ignorant of this assemble, nor yet vnaduertised of the dukes intēt: wherfore to resyst the mischief at the beginnyng, he caused commissiōs to be made, and sent into euery part of ỹ realme, where he suspected either to haue assured frendes, or indifferēt fauorers, for men and money. By reason of whiche commaundemēt, a great numbre was assembled. Many for the loue they bare to the king, but more for ỹ feare that thei had of ỹ quene whose countenaunce was so fearfull, and whose loke was so terrible that to al men, against whom she toke a smal displeasure, yet frouning was their vndoyng, & her indignacion, was their death. The king accōpanied with the dukes of Somerset & Excester, and other of the Line of Lancaster determined clerely, to set on the Duke of Yorke, & his confederates, & them by force either vtterly to vanquish, or by pollecy to attrap and bring to confusion: wherupon in hope of good lucke, the kyng with his armi by long marching, came nere to the duke of Yorke, which was strōgly encāped, a litle frō ỹ toune of Ludlow, nere adioyning to ỹ cōfines of Wales, to whom not long before, was come hys trusty frend Richard Erle of Warwicke, with a greate numbre of expert men in martiallfeates, whome he had brought with him frō Calice, wherof two wer mē of approued pollecie, in ỹ warres of Normaādy, & Guyē the one called Andrew Trowlop, & the other Jhō Bloūt. These armies thus lieng ỹ one in ỹ cōspect & vew of ỹ other. studied al meanes & pollecies, how to take aduaūtage eche of other, & how wt lesse ieoperdy, ỹ one might set on ỹ other, the duke perceiuig by reasō of his expert capteines, & wai how he might easely dāpnify & discōfite his enemies, thought no lenger to his purpose but manfully to geue the onset, & so with his secret frendes and capitaines, determined the next morning early, with dreadfull blastes of the terrible trompet, to begin the battaill, and set on the kyng and his army, or he wer redy or in aray. But of this deuise succeded nothing nor of this imagination proceded any effect. For Andrewe Trolop and other the Calicians, which were men of great knowledge and muche experience, & had liued by the kynges wages, more then a few yeres, perceiuing now, that they should fight against their souereigne lorde hymself (whose frend thei esteemed before that tyme, therle of Warwick euer to haue ben taken and reputed, and not his enempe or destroyer) in the dedde of the night, before the day of battaill, secretly departed from the dukes campe, and submitted themselues to the kyng, admonishing him of all thynges prepared and deuised, for his losse & destruccion. If these auncient capitaines wer welcome to the kyng, or if he ioyously theim receiued, I referre that to all men, whiche haue relief in their distresse or haue a sodeyn good chaunce, when thei thinke least vpon it. When the duke of Yorke was aduertised of their departyng, no matuail though his senses wer moued, and his wittes disturbed, as a man that sodainly riseth out of a traunce, woteth not what to do or sate: For he first considered the Power and Authoritie of the kyng, and sawe that Andrewe Troloppe, of his frend was sodeinly transformed, into the Image of his extreme enemy, whose force and pollecie, asmuche now discõforted hym, as by the truste whiche he put in hym, he was before incouraged: wherefore he euidently perceiuing, that all his counsaill and purpose, was by the forenamed Andrew, reueled and disclosed, thought it better for hym and his, to departe in suretie, then to abyde the chaunce, of mutable Fortune, which turneth the wheele at her wil & pleasure: wherupon he with his younger sonne Edmond erle of Rutland, secretly departed into Wales and so passed into Ireland, where he was with al ioy & honor gladly receiued. Therle of March sonne & heire apparant to the forsaid Duke, accompanied with therles of Salisbury, and Warwicke, and sir Jhon Wenlocke, stale away thesame night, & came into Deuonshire: wher by the meanes of Jhon Dinham Esquire (which after was high treasurer of England, in the time of kyng Henry the vij.) thei bought a ship, whiche cost C.x. markes at Exmouth, & sailed to Gernsay, and after came to Calice, & wer let in at the posterne, & ioyfully welcomed of their frendes.

THE next day in the morning, the kyng beyng aduertised of the departyng of the Duke of Yorke and his partakers, caused al his horsemen to follow them by euery passage, but thei were neither seen nor espied, as they that folowed, made report. The kyng perceiuing that therl lordes were escaped, pardoned all the poore souldiors, sauyng certayn Kyng leaders, wherof some he punished and fined, and some he hanged and quartered. After this he remoued to Ludlowe, and there dispatched his hoste, and spoyled the toune and the Castle, and sent the Duches of Yorke, with her two ponger sonnes, to be kept in ward, with the duches of Buckyngham her suster, where she continued a certain spate After this, he proclaymed these lordes, traitors to hym, enemies to their countrey, and rebelles to the Crowne: confiscating al their landes, goodes, and offices, committing the gouernaunce of the Northe partes, to the Erle of Northumberlande, and the Lorde Clifford, as to hys trusty and moste faithfull frendes: and of his towne of Calice, he made Captain, Henry the newe Duke of Somerset: but the Olde Husbande man saieth, that as to hasty sowing, often time deceiueth, so to late, neuer well proueth. For in this businesse, protractyng of tyme onely, hurted & harmed the Kyng & his sequele. For if he at the beginning, had dispossed his aduersaries of that refuge and hold, no doubte but he had either tamed, or vanquished theim with litle labor and smal daunger.

x THE Duke of Somersette, reioysyng much in his new office, elected diuerse hardy and valiaunt souldiours, and with greate pompe sayled toward Calice: and when he thought surely to haue entered into the Hauen, the artillary shotte so tierslye, bothe oute of the towne and Risebancke, that he sufferyng there a sore repulse, was fayn to land at whitsandbay, and sent woorde to the capitaines of the towne, to receiue hym, as the Kynges lieuetenaunt, and shewed to them his letters Patentes, xx but neither he nor his Wrytyng, was once regarded or looked on: so of necessitie he resorted to the Castle of Guysnes, daily Skirmishing with the Garrison of Calice, more to his losse then gain. After his arriual, as is aforesayd, diuerse of the Marriners, owing more good will to therle of Warwicke, then to this young Duke, conueyed their shippes into the Hauen of Callice, and in theim diuerse of the Earle of Warwickes enemies, as Ianyn Fendill, Jhon Felowe, and diuerse other, and presented theim to thesaied Erle, whiche incontinet, caused their Heddes to bee striken of. This dayly Conflict, still continuyng betwene the Lordes, whiche soiorned at Calice, and the Duke of Somersette, lieng at Guysxxx nes, no small numbre of the Commonalty, dayly resorted to the Erle of Marche and his confederates: by reason whereof, all though they dayly lost people and had many slain, yet their numbre was restored, and the gappe was euer filled, which was the continual losse, & daily detriment to the Duke of Somerset. Yet he like a valeaunte Prince, nothyng lesse myndyng then for lacke of ayde to be expelled from the great office and renoumed aucthoritie, whiche the kyng had to him geuen, in the partes beyond the sea, sente Letters to the Kyng, and messengers to the Quene desiryng them of ayde and succor, in defence of the querell, and lawfull assistence. His postes were not vnheard, nor his requestes vnprouided.

xl For without delay, Richard lorde Riuers, & sir Anthony Wooduile, his Valiaunt Sonne whiche after was Lorde Scales, accompanied with foure hundred warlike, personnes, were appoynted to passe the seas, and to be Coadiutors to the Duke of Somerset. These marcial capitaines, endeuouryng theim selues to the point, for the which thei were assigned, came to the Porte of Sandwyche, and there abode the Winde and the wether, whiche obeyeth neither kyng, nor serueth Emperoure.

THE Earles of Marche and Warwicke, and other beyng at Calice, had knowledge of all these doynges, and secret conuenticles: wherefore to anticipate and preuent the Dukes purpose, they sent Jhon Dynham the valiaunt esquire, with a small numbre of men, but with a multitude of courageous hartes, to the toune of Sandwiche, whiche soaynly entered the same, and toke the Lorde Riuers in hys bedde, and his sonne also robbyng houses, & spoylyng shippes of great riches and marchandise, and besyde this, they toke the principall shippes, of the kynges naue then lyng at the Port, well furnished with ordenaunce, and artillarie, but not without the fauour of the Marriners, whiche fauored more the one part then the other. But although Jhon Dinham, Capitain on the Lordes parte, was sore hurte and maymed on hys legge, by reason wherof, he euer after halted and somewhat limped: yet his courage and policey was so much, that he banquished his enemies, and broughte the shippes royall laden with praye and prisoners, to the toune of Calice, and theim presented to the Erle of Marche, not knowing then, that the Lorde Riuers doughter shoulde bee the Erles wife, whiche then had an husbande lyuing, nor thinkyng that her father for her sake, should after be destroied. But who can know the secretes of GOD, or without him declare the chaunce that after shall insue.

AFTER this booty gotten, and good lucke obteined, diuerse of the beste shippes, taken in the Hauen of Sandwiche, wer well vitailed, and manned, and with theim the Erle of Warwicke, transfreted and sayled into Irelande, to common, with the duke of Yorke, of his greate affayres and businesse. The wether was so faire, and the Wynd so fauorable to the Erles purpose, that within lesse then .xxx. daies, he passed and repassed from Calice to Deuelyne, and assertayned the Erles of Marche and of Salisbury, what was the Duke of Yorkes deuise and intent, bothe for his entry and theirs, into the Realme of Englande. The erle of Warwicke had come to short home, to tel these tidynges, if the Duke of Excester, whiche beyng Admirall of the sea, lay in the West countrey to stop the erles passage, might haue had his awne will, but the capitaynes of his Nauy murmured against him, and the marriners dispraysed and disdained him, glad to here of the erle of Warwickes good successe by which occasion, he neither would nor durst once medle or coupe with the erles nauie

DVRYNG this tyme, the kyng called a Parliament, in the Citee of Couentre, in the whiche, the Duke of Yorke and al his confederates were attaynted of high treason, and their goodes and landes confiscate and forfeted: and to prohibite their landyng in all partes, hauen tounes were watched, and the sea costes, were garnished with Bekons. And sir Simon Mondford with a great crew, was appoynted to kepe the dounes, and the fiue Portes, and all menne passyng into Flaundres, were vpon payne of death, prohibited to passe by Calice, lest the lordes there

shoulde borow of them any money, as they did prest of the marchauntes of the staple. xviij. M. l. late before which was a great displeasure to the kyng, & a more corasey to the quene. The lordes lieg at Caleys, wer not ignorant of al these doynges and prouisiõs, but dayly were asserteyned what was done in the kynges priuie chambre, wherefore firste they sent a company to Sandwiche, which conquered the Toune, and apprehended syr Symon Mõtford, and brought hym with all his mates to the hauen of Calice, where incontinent, he with. xij. of his chief fellowes lost their heddes on the sandes before Rysebanke. After the kynges Nauye x gayned, and his capitayns on the arriual of the sea taken and destroied, the lordes lyeng at Caleys, hoppyng in their frendes within the Realme determined to passe the sea, and to land in England. And after they had put the Castell and Towne of Calice, in sure and safe Custody to theyr onely vse, they passed the sea, and landed at Sandwich. And so passyng through Kent, there came to them the Lord Cobham, Jhon Guldeford, William Peche, Robert Horne, and many other Gentelmen, which conueyed them to the citie of London. But the fame of their landyng once knowen, gentelmen repayred, and yomẽ resorted out of all the Southe-xx partes of the realme: vpon which rumor, Thomas lord Scales, a man in great fauour with the Kyng and Quene, accompanied with the Erle of Kendale, a Gascoyn, and the Lord Louel, resorted to London, with a great company of armed men: declaryng to the Mayre of the citye, that theyr repayre was onely to defend, and kepe thee citie from the spoyle & robbery of such traytors, as the kyng was credibly enformed woulde thether make accesse: to whome the Mayre aunswered, that he wel knew both his awn oth, and bounden duety toward his souereigne Lord and Prince, & neded neither of Prompter, nor yet of Coadiutor, either to defend or gouerne the citie, to him committed in charge. With which aunswere, the Lord Scales and his associates not a litle displeased, entered xxx into the Towre of London, dayly with new inuentions, doyng displeasures and domages to the Citizens of the citie, whome they lore suspected rather to fauour then to hate, the erles of Marche, & Warwicke and other of their band and affinitie. Which Erles with a great army came shortely to London, and were of the Mayre and citizens ioyously receiued, to whome resorted the Archebyshop of Canterburie, the Bishops of London, Ely and Excester, with many Prelates and religious persons. These Lordes nothyng slackyng the purpose, that they came for, dayly consulted and assembled together in the house of the friers Franciscane within the citie. AND after long debatyng, and secret consul-xl tacion hadde it was agreed, that they with their whole Puyssaunce should Marche forward, toward thee kynge: determining either by force or fayre meanes, to bring their purpose to a conclusion. When this counsaill was dissolued, the erles of March and Warwicke, Thomas Lord Fawcõbridg, Henry Lord Borchier, called erle of Ewe, w a great numbre of men, which came out of Kent, Esser, Surrey, and Sussex to the nombre as some Writers affirme, of.xxv.M.person departed from London, toward the kyng, beyng at Couentre, then called the Quenes secret arboz, leuing behynd them, to kepe the Londoners in their fidelytie from reuertyng from their part, the erle of Salisbury, the lozd Cobham, and syz Jhon Wenlocke: which lozd Cobham, with certayn Aldermen of the citie, so kept the West side agaynst the Towze, and syz Jhon Wenlocke, with other so vigilantly watched the East Parte towarde sainct Katherynes, that no person either could issue oute, oz enter in, to ꝑ greate displeasure of the lozd Scales and his companye, whiche dayly shotte theiz ozdenaunce out, and had likewise great ozdenaunce shott at ꝛ them to the hurt and no pleasure of both partes. The kyng not ignozãt of all these doynges, assembled a great army, and accompanied with the duke of Somerset, which was lately come from Guysnes, and the duke of Buckyngham, and diuerse other great lozdes of his parte and facciõ came to the Coune of Nozthampton, where the Quene encouraged her fyendes, and pzomised greate rewardes to her helpers: foz the kyng studied nothyng but of peace, quiet and solitary lyfe. When the kinges host was assembled, and that the Quene perceiued that her powze was able to matche with the fozce of her aduersaries, she caused her army to issue out of the towne, and to passe the Riuer of Nene, and there in the newe ꝛꝛ Felde, betwene Harsyngton and Sandiffozd, the Capitaynes, strongely emparked them selfes, with high bankes and depe trenches. The erle of Marche beyng lusty, and in the flower of his cozagious youthe, lyenge betwene Towceter and Nozthampton, determined to set on the kynges army, without longer pzotractyng of tyme. And in the nighte season remoued his campe toward Nozthampton, and in marchyng fozward set his men in good ozdze of battaill, wherof the bawegarde was cõducted by the erle of Warwicke, which eyther by strengthe oz stealth maugze ꝑ lozd Beamond, which kept a strayt, goyng toward the kynges Campe, entered freshly, and began the battayle aboute .vij. of the clocke, the.ix. ꝛꝛꝛ daye of Julij. After whome followed the erle of Marche, with the bãner of his father. This fight continued in doubtfull iudgemente, tyll the houre of nyne, at whiche tyme the kynges army was pzofligat, and discomfited, and of thesame slayn, and dzowned in the ryuer, few lesse then x.M. talle Englishmẽ, & ꝑ kyng hym selfe left alone disconsolate, was taken and apprehended, as a man bozne, and pzedestinate to troble misery and calamitie. At this battyll were slayne, Humfrey Duke of Buckyngham, Jhon Talbot erle of Shewesbury, a valeaunt person, and not degeneratyng frõ his noble parent: Thomas lozd Egremond, Jhon vis-

me to parte of the fight, and at his first apprzoche was stryken in the hed ẅ an axe. Diuers other gentelmẽ wer slain in this ciuile batail, whose names were not remembzed noz published, by any aucthoz that I haue redde. Beside these dead persons, many were taken przisoners, because thei left their hozses, & discẽded to fight on fote. The duke of Somerset

and other, which narowly escaped, fled with the Quene and prince Edward, into the Bishoprycke of Durhame, in whiche place they determined to congregate, and gather a new Army and power, and if no hoope were of recouerey, then they agreed to fly into Scotland: there to expect better lucke, and happiez chaunce, by foztunes fauour. The erles beyng victozious in this blody Battayll conueyed the kyng that night agayn to the toune of Northampton, and the next day with greate solempnitie and smal comfozt, they set fozward the king, & by easy iozneys brought him to Lodon the.xvi. day of July, where he was fayntly receiued, and x feebly welcomed, and was lodged in the Bishops palace. After whose commyng to the citie, the Towze of London was deliuered to the Erle of Marche vpon a certayn composicion. But the Lozde Scales, suspectyng the sequele of the delyuery of thesame, toke a wherry priuily, entendyng to haue fled to the Quene. But he was espyed by diuerse watermē belongyng to the erle of Warwicke, whiche wayted foz his fozthecommyng on the Thamse, and sodaynly takē, and shoztly slayne with many dartes and daggers, and his body left al blody and naked at ỹ Gate of the Clyncke, whiche after was buried in the churche adioyning. Thē xr were diuers persons appzehended, and endyted of treason, wherof some were pardoned, and some executed: but Thomas Thozpe, second Barō of therchequer, greate frende to the house of Lancaster, and extreme enemie to the Famylie of Yozke, was taken disguised in a Monkes apparell, with a shauen croune, & so brought to therle of Warwicke, whyche sent hym to the Towze of London, where he long remayned. Duryng this troble, was a Parliamēt sommoned to begyn at Westmynster, in ỹ moneth of October next folowing. Befoze which tyme, Richarde Duke of Yozke, beyng in Ireland, by swyft currers, & flieng Postes, was adxxrtised of the great victozy, gained by his parte, at the felde of Northhampton, and also knewe that the kynge was in case to be kepte, and xxr ozdered at his pleasure and wil: wherfoze losyng no tyme, noz slugging one houre, he sayled frō Deuelyne to Chester with no small companye, and by longe iourneys, came to the Citie of London, which he entered the Fryday nexte befoze the feast of sainct Edward the confessoz, with a swoutd bozne naked befoze hime, and toke hys lodgynge in the kynges awne palayce wherupon the cōmō people babbeled, that he should be kyng, and that kyng Henry should no lōger reigne. During the time of this Parliament, the duke of Yozke, with a bolde countenaunce, entered into the chambze of the peres, and sat doune in the Trone royal vnder the clothe of estate (which is the kynges peculier seate) & in the pzesxl sēce aswel of ỹ nobilitie, as of ỹ spiritualty (after a pause made) said these wozdes in effect. My singulet good lozdes, and bety indifferent frendes, in whose powet & authozit cōsisteth ỹ peyse and the stay of this noble Realme of Englande, the whiche aswell befoze ỹ tyme, that Christe, our sauiour and redemer, toke vpon hym our fraile flesshe, and humain nature, as euer since, hath ben a Realme renoumed, a kingdom famous, he wrongfully vsurped and entruded vpon the royall powet and high estate of this Realme and region, takyng on hym ỹ name, stile, & autho rite of kyng and gouernor of the same. And not therwith satisfied and contented, compassed and accomplyshed, the death & destruccion of hys naturall prince, and most worthy souereigne Lord, not as common ho mycyde, and bocherly murdre, but as a regicide & destroyer of his king.

After whose piteous death, and execrable murder (alas my hatte pan teth to remembre the abhominable facte) the right & title of the crowne, and superiorite af this Realme was laufully reuerted and returned to, Rogiet Mortimer erle of Marche, sonne and heyre to Lady Philippe, the onely child of the aboue rehersed Lyonel, duke of Clarẽce, to which Rogiers daughter called Anne, my most derest and welbeloued mother, I am the very trew and lineall heyre, whiche discent, all you cannot tu tely agayn say, nor yet truly deny. Then remembre this, if the title be, myne, why am I put from it: if I be trew heyre to the Croune (as I am, in dede) why is my right witholden: if my clayme be good, why haue I, not tustice: for surely learned men of great science and literature, saie & affirme, that lyneall discente and vsurped possession, can nothyng pre uayle if continuall clayme be lawfully made, or openly publyshed. For auoydyng of whiich scruple and ambiguitte: Edmond erle of Marche, my moste welbeloued vncle, in the tyme of the first vsurpar, in dede, but, not by right, called kyng Hẽry the. iiij. by his cosyns, the erle of North humberland, and ỹ lord Percy, he beyng then in captiuitie, with Owen, Glendore, the rebell in Wales, made hys title, and righteous clayme, to, the destruccion of both the noble persons. Likewise my most derest lord, & father, so farre set furth that right and title that he loste his life, and, worldely wele, at the toune of Southampton, more by powte then indif ferent tustice. Syth whose death, I commyng to my full age, haue ne uer desisted to pursew my title, and requyre my tyght, which by meanes, of sinister counsaill, and intust detencion, I can neither obteyne nor re couer. So that of fine force, I am compelled to vse power in stede of, prayer, & force in stede of request (not as I sayde before) for my priuate, emolument, and peculier profite, but to restore peace loue, and quietnes, to this our naturall region: which euer sith the fyrst vngodlye vsurpa cion of the forenamed Henry vntruly called kyng Henry the. iiij. hathe, ben clerely banished, and out of thesame inustly exiled. What murders, and manslaughters hath bene perpetrated, and committed within thys, countrey, sithe the begynning of that vngracious vsurpacion: what, numbre of noble men haue ben slayn, destroyed and executed, sithe that, vnfortunate day: what manifest iniquitie hath ben openly borne, and, maintened in euery countreye and citie, sithe the dolefull death of king, Rychard: or what person darre sue for hys right at this dai, cõtrary to ỹ, will of the counsailors, which now beare the swynge and rule the roste.
Well, well, although almighty God slackely & slowly do procede, to ỹ, punishment of synners: yet the differryng of his scorge, is recompensed, with

„ with the greater payne, when his rod striketh, yea, and oftentimes he rea„ ueth the very malefactors, apparauntly vnpunished, and scorgeth their „ bloud, and punisheth thē in their heyres, by worldely aduersitie. Suche „ is his mercy, when it pleaseth him to shewe it, and so sharpe is his whyp „ when he list to strike. For although Henry of Lancashire, erle of Derby „ tokt vpon hym the sceptre, and the croune, and wrongfully bare the na„ me and stile of a king, and was not much tickeled with myne Vncle, the „ erle of March, at that tyme beyng within age: Yet was he neuer in su„ rrtie of hym self, nor had any, or enioyed any perfyt quietnes, either in „ mind or in body: for surely a corrupt conscience feleth neuer rest, but lo-„ keth when the sword of vengeaunce wil descend & strike. His sonne also „ called king Henry the. v. obtayned notable victories, and immortall „ prayses, for his noble actes, doen in the realme of Fraunce: yet God for „ the offence of his vntrew parente, sodaynly touched hym, vnbodynge „ his soule in the flower of his youthe, and in the glory of his conquest.
„ And although he had a fayre sonne, and a yong apparāt heyre: yet was „ this Orphan such a one, as Preachers say, that God thretened to send,
„ for a punishment, to his vnruly and vngracious people: saiyng by hys „ prophet Esay: I shall geue you children to be your princes, and enfan„ tes without wysedom, shall haue the gouernaunce of you. The Pro„ phet lyed not, if you note all thinges in an order: For after this Henry v.
„ v. (whose fame no mā can iustly reproue or deface) succeded his sonne „ whome all we haue called our naturall prince, & obeyed, as his heyre: in „ whose tyme, and wrongfull reigne, I require you diligently to cōsider, „ with what great tormentes & afflictions God hath whypped & scorged „ this miserable Isle, yea, with such and so many scourges and plagues, „ as no nacion (the Egyptians onely excepte) were euer tormented, or af„ flicted withall. I will not speake of rebellious murders and oppressiōs, „ which of late hath ben done, and exercised here emong vs: but I wil de„ clare and manifest to you, how the croune and glorye of this Realme, is „ by the negligence of this silly man, and his vnwise counsaill, minished, „ defaced and dishonored. Is not Normandy, whiche his father gat, re-„ gayned, and Conquered agayn, by the insolencye of hym, and his coue„ teous counsaill? Is not the whole duchy of Aquitayn by .u.C. and odd „ yeres, peaceble possessed by the kynges of this Realme, in one yere and „ a litle more gotten out of our handes and seigniorie? what should I „ speake of Angeow and Maine or the losse of the Isle of Fraunce, & the „ riche citie of Parys? Alas my hart sobbeth, myne eyes water, and my „ toungue foltereth, eyther to speake or thynke of the losses and misfortu„ nes, that this our natiue cōtrey, hath of late susteyned. But as ỹ Pro„ phets saie: euell gotten gooddes, do not long continue, nor vsurped po„ wer, hath no prosperous successe. I will not molest you, with the reherthe Romaines, when Julius Cesar toke vpon hym, without lawe or auctoritie, the name and stile of Emperor: but I put you in remembraūce of our owne nacion, what mischiefe, strife and misery succeded in this realme, by the iniurious vsurpaciōs, of Herrald sonne to Godwyn erle of Kent, and Stephē of Bloys, erie of Bulleyn, the one beyng the cause of the conquest of this realme, and the other the occasion of infinite trobles, and domesticall discencion within thesame: yet all these vexations and scourges, be but a shadowe or counterfeit light, in comparison of the great calamities and miseries, which al we here present, haue seen and x experimented. Yet in the middes of this afflicciō, and to make an end of thesame, God of his ineffable goodnes, lookyng on this countrey, with his yes of pitie, and aspect of mercie, hath sent me in the truth, to restore again this decayed kyngdō, to his auncient fame & old renoume. Wh-che here in open parliament, accordyng to my trust and true title, I haue and do take possession, of this royall throne, not puttyng diffidence, but firme hope in Gods grace, that by his diuine ayde, and the assistence of you, the peeres of this Realme, I shall decore and maintein thesame, to the glory of hym, honor of my bloud, and to the publique wealth, alwell of you all here present, as of all the poore commons and subiectes, of xx this kyngdom and regiment. When the duke had thus ended his oracion, the lordes sat still lyke Images grauen in the wall, or dōme Gods, neither whispering nor spekyng, as though their mouthes had been sowed vp. The duke perceiuing none aunswer, to be made to his declared purpose, not well content with their sobre silence, and taciturnitie, aduīsed them well, to digest and pondre the effect of his oracion and saiyng, and so neither fully displeased, nor all pleased, departed to his lodgyng in the kynges place.

VVHILE he was thus declaryng his title, in the chābre of the peres, there happened a straunge chaunce in the very same tyme, emongest xxx the cōmons in the nether house, then there assembled: for a Croune whiche did hang in the middell of thesame, to garnische a branche, to set lightes vpon, without touche of any creature, or rigor of wynd, sodainly fell doune, and at thesame tyme also, fell doune the Croune, whiche stode on the top of the Castle of Douer: as a signe and prognosticacion, that the Croune of the Realme should bee diuided and changed, from one line to another. This was the iudgement of the cōmon people, whiche wer neither of Gods priuite, nor yet of his priuye counsail, and yet they wil say their opinions, whosoeuer saye nay.

THE lordes of the realme, forgat not the dukes demaunde, nor long xl protracted the tyme, to se some good ende, in so waightie a cause: wherefore diuerse lordes, alwell spirituall as temporal, with many graue and sage persones of the commonaltie, daily assembled at the Blacke Friers and other places, to treate and common of this matter, beyng of no smal importaunce. Duryng whiche tyme, the Duke of Yorke, although he and the kyng, wer both lodged in the palace of Westminster, yet for no prater or intercession, he would once visite or se the kyng, till some perfit conclusion wer taken, in this greate and wayghtie purpose: saiyng and affirmyng, that he was subiect to no man, but onely to God, and he was his lord and superior, and none other. ¶ will a litle space leue the lordes consultyng together, and speake of outward attemptes & foren doynges

THIS ciuill discension within the realme of Englande, did muche animate and incorage James the secõd of that name, kyng of Scottes to make warre on the Englishe nacion, partly for the displeasure which he conceiued, for the death of Edmond duke of Somerset, his mothers brother, and partly to shew hymself emõgest his people, to be bothe valiaunt and coragious. This kyng James from his firste rule, began to entre into suspicion with William Erle Douglas, a man both of great kynne and more power, euer mistrustyng, that he nothyng more desired, then to depriue hym from his aucthoritie, and to vsurpe the same. This cancard suspicion was so rooted in the kynges harte, that sodaynly it branched out in so muche that the Kyng sendyng for the Erle, (whiche trustyng on his awne innocencie, humbly came to his presence) caused hym shamefully to be slayn and murdered with whiche iniury, his twoo brethren, Archibald Erle of Murrey, and Hugh Erle of Ormount, not alitle pricked and incoraged, with the Erles of Angus and Morthone, beeyng all of one lyne and surname, made open warre on thesayed kyng James: but inconclusiõ he preuayled, and suppressed the great power of the Douglasses. And then thinkyng hymself a kyng without either peere or fere, assembled a greate army, and entered into the Marches of Northumberlande, and besieged the Castle of Roxborough, and there caused his newe Bombarde, lately cast in flaunders, called the Iron and diuerse other peces, to be shot against the Castle, wherof one beyng weake and slender, brake in peces, and with one of the fragmentes slewe the kyng, standyng emongest a greate company of his people, and wounded the erle of Angus. The Scottes not dismaied with the death of their kyng, seyng the Castle easy to be wonne, manfully assauted and with muche payn gat it, and thesame long defended, till Richard Duke of Gloucester it conquered and destroyed. This kyng James, of quene Mary his wyfe left three sonnes, James whiche succeded hym. Alexander duke of Albany, and Jhon. This youg kyng James was put vnder the tuicion of James Kenede, bishoppe of sainct Andrewes, whiche duryng his noneage, ruled the realme to the kynges greate honor, but more to his awne profite and peculier gaine: For he made sumpteous houses, and buylded Colleges, whiche his young pupill kyng James, neither could nor was hable to do.

ABOVTE this very season, and duryng this vnatural crõtrouersy within the Realme of Englande, Charles the Frenche kyng, whiche only by trouble and calamitie, gat to him a perpetuall name, and emongest his nacion aboue the sterres exalted, ended the poynt of his fatall fine whiche Prince in his youth, neuer regarded wanton pastyme, nor lasciuious

lasciuious dailiaũce, for his wittes were set, and his industrie onely applied to recouer agayn his paternall patrimony, and Princely inheritaunce: So that more plainly then in a mirror, all menne maie perceyue that payn often profiteth, and labor commõly auaileth, but idelnesse syldome, and dalliaunce, neuer. To this Charles, succeded kyng Lewes, of that name the.xi. of whose dooynges you shall heare after: & shal both studie and maruell, for the straungenes of his demeanour, & the craftie pollecie of his secrete compasses. Now I wyll returne to the great counsaill of the lordes celebrated about Lõdõ, for the duke of Yorkes claime

The.xxxix yere.

After long argumentes made, & delibrate consultacion had emong the peeres, prelates, and commons of the realme: vpon the vigile of all sainctes, it was condescended and agreed, by the three estates, for so muche as kyng Henry had been taken as kyng, by the space of.xxxviij. yeres and more that he should inioye the name and title of kyng, and haue possession of the realme, duryng his life naturall: And if he either died or resigned, or forfeyted thesame, for infringing any point of this concorde, then the sayed Croune and auctoritie royall, should immediatly bee diuoluted to the Duke of Yorke, if he then liued, or els to the next heire of his lyke or linage, and that the duke from thensefurth, should be Protector and Regent of the lande. Prouided alwaye, that yf the kyng did closely or apertly, studie or go aboute to breake or alter this agrement, or to compasse or ymagine the death or destruccion, of thesayede Duke or hys bloud, thẽ he to forfet the croune, and the duke of Yorke to take it. These articles with many other, were not onely written, sealed, and sworne by the twoo parties: but also wer enacted, in the high court of Parliament. For ioye whereof, the kynge hauyng in his company thesaied Duke. rode to the Cathedrall Churche of sainct Paule within thee citee of Lõdon, and there on the daye of all Sainctes, went solẽpnely with the diademe on his hed, in procession, and was lodged a good space after, in the bishoppes Palace, nere to thesaied Churche. And vpon the Saturdaye next insuyng Richard Duke of Yorke, was by the sounde of a trumpet, solempnely proclaimed heare apparãt to the Croune of Englande, and Protector of the realme.

Artícles of agrement betwene kyng Henry the vi. and Richard duke of Yorke

AFTER this the parliamẽt kept at Couentre the last yere, was declared to be a deuilishe counsaill, and onely celebrate for the destrucciõ of the nobilitie, and no lawfull Parliament, because thei whiche wer returned, wer neuer elected, accordyng to the dew ordre of the lawe, but secretly named by theim, whiche desired more the destruccion, then the auauncement of the publique wealthe, and common profite. When these agrementes wer doen and enacted, the kyng dissolued his Parliament, whiche was the laste Parliamente that euer he ended. Suche was the pleasure of almyghtie God, take kyng Henry beeyng a good and vertuous manne, whiche had tasted innumerable aduersities and calamities of the worlde, should be depryued of his terrestriall Croune to be recompensed with an heauenly garland, and a ioyfull place: For surely a perfite good man, although he be plagued with a thousande displeasures cannot be but blessed, and haue a good soule toward God.

THE Duke of Yorke well knowyng, that the Quene would spurne and impugne the conclusions agreed and taken in this parliament, caused her and her sonne, to be sent for by the kyng: but she beyng a manly woman, vsing to rule and not to be ruled, & therto counsayled by the dukes of Excester and Somerset, not onely denied to come, but also assembled together a great army, intēding to take the kyng by fine force, out of the lordes handes, and to set theim to a new skoole. The Protector lyng in Londō, hauyng perfite knowledge of all these doynges: assigned the Duke of Norffolke and the Erle of Warwicke, his trustie frendes, to be about the kyng, and he with therles of Salisbury, and Rutlande: with a cōuenient company, departed out of London, the second daye of Decembre Northward, and sent to the Erle of Marche his eldest sonne to folowe hym with all his power. The Duke by small iorneis, came to his Castle of Sandall, beside Wakefelde, on Chrystmas eue, and there began to assemble his tenauntes and frendes. The quene beyng thereof asserteined, determined to couple with hym while his power was small and his ayde not come: And so hauyng in her company, the Prince her sonne, the Dukes of Excester and Somerset, the Erle of Deuonshire the Lorde Clifford, the Lorde Rosse, and in effecte all the Lordes of the Northe parte, with eightene thousande men, or as some write twentie and twoo thousande, marched from Yorke to Wakefelde, and bad base to the Duke euen before his Castle he hauyng with hym not fully fiue thousande persones, determined incontinent to issue out, and to fight with his enemies, and all though sir Dauy Halle, his old seruaunt and chief counsailer, auysed him to kepe hys Castle, and to defende thesame with his smal numbre, till his sonne the Erle of Marche wer come with his power of Marchemen and Welshe souldiours, yet he would not be counsailed, but in a great fury sated, a Dauy, Dauy, hast thou loued me so long, and now wouldest haue me dishonored: Thou neuer sawest me kepe fortres when I was Regent in Normandy, when the Dolphyn hymself, with his puissaunce came to beliege me, but lyke a man, and not like a birde included in a cage, I issued and fought with myne enemies, to their losse euer (I thanke God) and to my honor: If I haue not kepte my self within walles, for feare of a great and strong prince, nor hid my face from any man liuyng, wouldest thou that I for dread of a scolding woman, whose weapon is onely her toungue, and her nayles, should incarcerate my self, and shut my gates: then al men might of me woundre and all creatures maye of me report dishonor, that a woman hath made me a dastard, whō no man euer to this daye could yet proue a coward:

And surely my mind is rather to die with honor then to liue with shame for of honor commeth fame, and of dishonor riseth infamy. Their great numbre shall not appall my spirites, but incorage theim, for surely I thinke that I haue there, as many frendes as enemyes, whiche at ioyning, will either flye or take my part: therfore auaunce my banner, in the name of God and sainct George, for surely I will fight with thē though I should fight a lone. Therle of Salisbury and other his frendes, seing his corage, resolued thēselfes to his opinion, & ordered their men, and set them furth in warlike fashion, for their moste aduauntage. The Duke of Somerset and other of the quenes part, knowyng perfitly, that if the Duke gat the victory, their dayes wer minished, and their liuynges left bare, lyke men quickened and exalperate, for the safegard of their lifes, and defence of their goodes, determined to abide the chaunce, and to espie their moste aduauntage, and so appointed the lorde Clifford, to lye in the one stale, and the Erle of Wilshire in the other, and thei theimselfes kept the mayne battaill. The duke of Yorke with his people discended doune the hill in good ordre and array & was suffered to passe forewarde, toward the mayne battaill: but when he was in the plain ground betwene his Castle and the toune of Wakefelde, he was enuironed on euery side, like a fish in a net, or a deere in a buckestall: so that he manfully fightyng was within halfe an houre slayn and ded, and his whole army discomfited, & with him died of his trusty frendes, his two bastard vncles, sir Jhon, & sir Hugh Mortimers, sir Dauy Halle his chief cōsaylor, sir Hugh Hastynges, sir Thomas Neuel, William and Thomas Apparre, bothe brethren, and twoo thousande and eight hundred other, wherof many wer young gentelmen, and heires of greate parentage in the Southe parte, whose linages reuenged their deathes, within foure Monethes, next and immediatly insuyng. In this conflicte was wounded and taken prisoner, Richarde erle of Salisbury, sir Richard Lymbrike, Raufe Stanley, Jhō Harow, Capitain Hauson, and diuerse other. While this battaill was in fighting, a prieste called sir Robbert Aspall, chappelain and schole master to the yong erle of Rutland. ij. sonne to the aboue named duke of Yorke, scace of the age of. xii. yeres, a faire gētelmā and a maydēlike person, perceiuyng that fight was more sauegard, then tarying, bothe for hym and his master, secretly conueyd therle out of the felde, by the lord Cliffordes bande, toward the towne, but or he coulde entre into a house, he was by the sayd lord Clifford espied, folowed, and taken, and by reson of his apparell, demaunded what he was. The yong gentelman dismayed, had not a word to speake, but kneled on his knees imploryng mercy, and desiryng grace, both with holding vp his handes and making dolorous countinance, for his speache was gone for feare. Saue him sayde his Chappelein, for he is a princes sonne, and peraduenture may do you good hereafter. With that word, the lord Clifford marked him and sayde: by Gods blode, thy father slew myne, and so will I do the and all thy kyn, and with that woord, stacke the erle to the hart with with his dagger, and bad his Chappeleyn bere the erles mother & brother wo3de what he had done, and sayde. In this acte the lo3d Clyffo3d was accompted a ty3aunt and no gentelman, fo3 the p3opertie of the Lyon, which is a furious and an vnreasonable beaste, is to be cruell to them that withstande hym, and gentle to such as p3ostrate o3 humiliate them selfes befo3e hym. Yet this cruel Cliffo3de, a deadly bloudsupper not content with this homicyde, o3 chyldkylling, came to the place wher the dead co3ps of the duke of Yo3ke lay, and caused his head to be stry-ken of, and set on it a croune of paper, & so fixed it on a pole, & p3esented it to the Quene, not lieng farre from the felde, in great despite, and much derision, saiyng: Madame, your warre is done, here is your kynges ransone, at whiche p3esent, was muche ioy, and great reioysing, but many laughed then, that so3e lamented after, as the Quene her self and her sonne! And many were glad then of other mens death, not knowyng that their awne were nere at hande, as the lo3d Clyffo3d, and other.

But surely, mans nature is so frayle, that thinges passed be sone fo3-gotten, and mischiefes to come, be not fo3sene. After this victory by the Quene and her parte obteyned, she caused the erle of Salisbury, with all the other p3ysoners, to bee sente to Pomfret, and there to bee behed-ded, and sent all their heddes, and the dukes head of Yo3ke to be set vpon poles, ouer the gate of the citie of Yo3ke, in despite of theim, and their Image: whose chyldren shortly reuenged their fathers querell, both to the Quenes extreme perdition, & the vtter vndoynge of her husband and sonne. This ende had the valeaunt lo3de, Rychard Plantagenet, duke of Yo3ke, and thys fyne ensued of his to much hardines. The erle of Marche so commonly called, but after the death of his father, in dede and in tyght very duke of Yo3ke, lyeng at Glocester, heryng of the death of his noble father, and louyng brother, and trusty frendes, was wonderfully amased, but after cõfo3t giuẽ to him, by his faithful louers and assured alyes, he remoued to Shrewsbury, and other townes vpon the ryuer of Seuerne, declaring to them the murder of his father, the ieopardye of him selfe, and the vnstable state and ruyne of the Realme.
The people on the Marches of Wales, which aboue measure fauored lynage of the lo3de Mo3timer, mo3e gladly offred him their ayde & assi-stence, then he it either instantly requyred, o3 hartely desired, soo that he had a puyssant army, to the number of .xxiii. M. redy to go agaynst the quene, and the murderers of his father. But when he was settyng fo3-ward, newes were bro3ught to him, that Jaspar erle of Penbroke, halfe brother to kyng Hẽry, and James butler, erle of Ormond & Wylshyre had assembled together, a great number, both of Welshe and Irysh peo ple, sodaynly to surprise and take him and his frendes, and as a captiue to conuey him to the quene. The duke of Yo3ke, called erle of Marche, somwhat spurred and quyckened with these noueltyes, retired backe, & met with hys enemyes in a fayre playne, nere to Mo3timers crosse, not farre from Herfo3d east, on Candelmas day in the mo3nyg, at whiche

time the sunne (as some write) appered to the erle of March, like. iij. sunnes, and sodainly joyned all together in one, and that vpō the sight therof, he toke suche courage, that he fiercely set on his enemie, & thē shortly discōfited: for which cause, men imagined, that he gaue the sunne in his full brightnes for his cognisaunce or badge. Of his enemyes were lefte dead on the ground. iij. M. & viii. C: The erles of Penbroke and Wilshyre fled, and syr Owen Tewther, father to thesayd erle of Penbroke, which Owen had maried kyng Henries mother (as you haue heard before) with Dauyd floyde, Morgan ap reuther, & diuers other were takē and behedded at the citie of Herford. During this season, the quene was greatly encouraged with the victory, obteined late at Wakefeld, partly because the duke of Yorke, her vtter enemy was tyd out of the worlde, & partly because she perceyued, the lordes of the North countrey to adhere and cleue to her parte and facciō: wherfore with a great multitude of Northrē people, she marched toward London, of whose approche the Londoners were nothing glad: for some affirmed, that she brought that rusty company, to spoyle and robbe the citie: other saide, that she would be reuenged, of suche as fauored the duke of Yorke. So the pore cittzēs hāgyng betwene the water and the fyre, were much amased, but the magistrates and gouernors caused great watches to be kept and good order to be obserued. The Quene, still came forwarde with her Northren people entendyng to subuerte and defaict all conclusions and agrementes, enacted and assented to, in the last Parliamēt. And so after her long torney, she came to the town of sainct Albōs: wherof the duke of Northfolke, the erle of Warwycke, and other, whō the duke of Yorke had lefte to gouerne the kyng in his absence, beyng aduertised, by the assent of ỹ kyng, gathered together a great hoste, and set forward towarde saincte Albons, hauyng the kyng in their company, as the head and chefetayn of the warre, and so not myndyng to differre the tyme any farther, vpon shrouetuesday early in the mornyng, set vpon their enemyes. Fortune that day so fauored the Quene, that her parte preuayled, & the duke and the erle were discomfited, and fled: leauing the king accompained with the lord Bonuile, and syr Thomas Kyrell of Kent, whiche vpon assurance of his promise taried still and fled not, but their trust, them deceyued. For after the victorie obteyned, and the kynge broughte to the Quene, they two were deteyned as prysoners, and so continued till the kynges departing from that towne. In this battaill were slayn. xxiij. C. men, and not aboue, of whome no noble man is remēbred, saue syr Jhon Gray, which thesame day was made knight, with. xii. other, at the village of Colney. Happy was the Quene in her two battayls, but vnfortunate was the king in al his enterprises, for wher his persō was presente, ther victory fled euer from him to the other parte, & he cōmōly was subdued & vanquished. Whē quene Margaret had thus well sped, first she caused the kyng, to doubbe prince Edward his sonne, knyght, with. xxx. other persons, which in the morning fought on the quenes side, against his parte. After she sent to the Mayre of London, commaundinge him without delay, to send certain Cartes, laded with lenten victayle, for ỹ refreashing of her and her army. The Mayre, incontinent made prouisiõ, laded cartes, and sent them toward the quene. But the moueable cõmõs, which fauored not ỹ quenes part, stopped ỹ cartes at Crepulgate and boldely sayde, that their enemies, which came to spoyle & robbe the citizens, should neither be releued, nor victayled by them. And not withstanding gentell aduertisement to them gyuen, of the mischefes, whych might ensue of their doynges: yet they remayned still in one obstinate mynd and wilful will, not permittinge the cariages, to passe or go forward. During which cõtrouersie, diuers of the Northen horsemẽ, came and robbed in the suburbes of the citie, and would haue entered at Crepulgate, but thei by the commoners wer repulsed, and beten backe, and iii. of them slayn wherupon the Mayre sent the recorder to the kynges counsaill to Barnet, to excuse the matter, and the duches of Bedford, & the lady Scales, with diuers sad fathers of the spiritualtie, went to the quene to mollifie her rancore, and asswage her melãcolie, whiche she had conceiued against the citie. At this humble request, the quene and her counsail appointed certayn lordes and knyghtes, with .iiii.C. tall persons, to ryde to the citie, and ther to bewe, & se the demeanoure and disposicion of the people: & diuers Aldermen wer appointed to mete them at Barnet, and to conuey them to London. But what soeuer man purposeth, God disposeth: for all these deuises were shortly trãsmuted into another forme, because trew report was brought, not onely to the citie but also to the quene, that the erle of Marche had vanquesshed the erles of Penbroke and Wilshyre, and that the erle of Warwycke, on whome rested the chefe trust of that faction, after the last conflict, had at sauncte Albons, had mete with the sayd erle of Marche at Chippyng Norton by Cottesold, and that they with both their powers were comynge toward London. These trew tales turned the quenes purpose, & altered all her long deuised ententes, in so muche that she litle trustinge Essex, and lesse Kent, but London least of all, with her husband and sonne, departed from sainct Albons, into the Northcountrey, where the roote, & foundacion of her ayde and refuge, onely consisted. But at the daye of her departyng, she caused the heddes of the lord Bonuile, and syr Thomas Kyriel, to be cut of, in the presence of her sonne, contrary to ỹ mynd and promise of her husbãd, but emõgest men of warre, faith or othe, syldome is perfourmed.

THE duches of Yorke, seyng her husband and sonne slayne, and not knowyng what should succede of her eldest sonnes chaunce, sent her .ii. yonger sonnes, George & Richard, ouer the sea, to the citie of Vtrechte in Almayn: where they were of Philippe, duke of Bourgoyne, wel receyued and fested, and so there thei remayned, till their brother Edwarde had obteyned the Realme, and gotte the regiment. During which time diuers merchantes mistrusting the mutacion of the world, fled out of ỹ realme, Realme, emõgest whom, one Philippe Malpas, a man of greate riches, sayling into Flaunders, was taken by Jhon Columme, a French man and payed.iiij.M. markes for his raunsone. The erles of Marche and Warwycke hauyng perfite knowledge, that the kyng and quene with their adherentes, were departed from sainct Albons, determined first to ryde to London, as the chefe key, and common spectacle to the whole Realme, thinkyng there to assure them selfs of the East and West parte of the kingdome, as kyng Henry and his faction nesteled and strẽgthed him and his alyes, in the Nozth regions and boreall plage: meanynge x to haue a buckelar agaynst a swourd, and a southerne byl, to cõtenaple a Nozthren bastard. And so these two great lozdes, resoluinge them selfs vpon this purpose, accompained with a great numbet of men of warre, entred the citie of London, in the first weke of Lent. What should I declare how the Kentishmen resozted: how the people of Essex swarmed, & how the counties adioynyng to Londõ, dayly repaired to se, ayd, & comfozt, this lusty pzince and flower of chiualry, as he in whome the hope, of their ioy, and the trust of their quietnes onely then consisted. Thys wise and pzudent noble man, perceiuing the mooste patte of the Realme, to be to him frendly and adherent, mynding to take tyme when tyme serxx ued, called a great counsayll, both of lozdes spirituall and tempozall, & to them repeted the title, and right that he had to the Realme, & dignitie royall: rehersing the articles of the agrement, not onely concluded betwene kyng Henry, & his noble father, Richard duke of Yozke, by theyz writinges signed and sealed: but also cozrobzated, and cõfirmed by aucthozitie of the high court of Parliament: the bzeaches whereof, he neythet fozgat, noz omitted vndeclared. After the lozdes had considered, & weyghed his title and declaracion, they determined by aucthozitie of the sayd counsayl, foz as much as kyng Henry contrary to his othe, honoz and agrement, had violated and infringed, the ozder taken and enacted xxx in the last Parliament, and also because he was insufficient to rule the Realme, and mutile to the common wealth, and publique pzofite of the poze people, he was therfoze by the fozesayd aucthozitie, depziued and deiected of all kyngly honoz, and regall souereigntie. And incontinent, Edward erle of Marche, sonne and heyze to Rychard duke of Yozke, was by the lozdes in thesayed counsayll assembled, named elected, & admitted, foz kyng and gouernour of the realme: on which day, the people of the erles parte, beyng in their muster in sainct Jhons felde, & a great number of the substanciall citezens there assembled, to behold their ozxl der: sodaynly the lozd Fawcõbzidge, which toke the musters, wylely declated to the multitude, the offences and bzeaches of the late agremente done and perpzetrated by kyng Hẽry the.vi. and demaunded of the people, whether they woulde haue the sayd kyng Henry to rule and reigne any lenger ouer them: To whome they, with a whole voyce, aunswered nay, nay. Then he asked thẽ, yf they would serue, loue, and obey the erle of March as their earthly pzince and souereign lozd. To which questiõ they aunſwered,yea,yea,crieng, kyng Edward,with many great ſhowtes and clappyng of handes.The lozdes were ſhoztly aduertiſed of the louyng conſent,which the commons franckely and frely of their fre will had geuen,wherupon incontinent,they all with a conuenient number of the moſt ſubſtanciall commons,repaired to Baynardes caſtel,makyng iuſt and trew repozt to the erle of their election and admiſſion, and the louyng aſſent of the faithfull commons. The erle after long pauſynge, firſt thanked God of his great grace and benefite, then to him declared and ſhewed, and the lozdes and commons alſo, foz their harty fauour, and aſſured fidelitie,and notwithſtandyng that like a wyſe pzince,he alledged his inſufficiencie foz ſo greate a roome and weyghty burden, as lacke of knowledge,want of experience & diuers other qualities,to a gouernour apperteyninge: yet in concluſion he beynge perſwaded by the Archebiſhop of Cãterbury,the biſhop of Exceſter and other lozdes,then beyng pzeſent,graunted to their petition,and toke vpon him the charge and vpon the next day,beyng the.iiii.day of Marche, he as kyng, rode to the church of ſainct Paule,and there offered.And after Te deum ſong, with great ſolempnitie, he was conueyed to Weſtmynſter, and there ſet in the hawle,with the ſcepter royall in his hand,where,to all the people which there in great number were aſſembled,his title and clayme to the croune of England, was declared by.ii.maner of wayes: the firſte, as ſonne and heyze to duke Richard his father,right enheritoz to theſame: the ſecond, by aucthozitie of Parliament and fozfeyture commited by kyng Henry.Wherupõ it was agayne demaunded of the commons, yf they would admitte,and take the ſayd erle, as their pzince & ſouereigne lozd,which al with one voyce cryed yea,yea,Which agremẽt cõcluded, Kyng Edward the iiii. proclaymed king of Englande.

He entered into Weſtminſter church vnder a canapy, with ſolẽpne pzoceſſion,and there as kyng offered,and after the homages taken of al the nobles there pzeſent,he returned by water to London, and was lodged in the biſhops palace: Dayly makyng pzouiſion to go Northwarde agaynſt his aduerſe faccion and open enemyes,and on the mozow he was pzoclaymed kyng,by the name of kyng Edward the.iiii.thozoughout ỹ citie While theſe thinges were in doyng in the Southpart,kyng Henry beyng in the Nozth countrey,thinking becauſe he had ſlayn the duke of Yozke the cheſe Capitayn of the contrary lynage, that he had bzought all thyng to purpoſe and concluſion as he would, aſſembled a great army, truſting with lytle payne and ſmall loſſe, to deſtroy the reſidew of his enemyes,whome he eſtemed to be of no fozce,oz of a ſmall validitie. But he was ſoze deceyued:foz out of the dead ſtocke,ſpzang a ſtronge & mightie bzaunche, which by no meanes could either be bzoken, oz made ſere:which was this kyng Edward the.iiii.whiche was ſo beloued and fauoured of the people,that no man was ſpokẽ of,no perſon was remẽbzed,but only he:foz he was ſo much eſtemed, bothe of the nobilitie and commonaltie,foz his liberalitie, clemencie, integritie, and cozage, that aboue all other,he was extolled and pzayſed to the very heauẽ. By reaſon son whereof men of al ages & of all degrees to him daily repayred, some offeryng theym selfes and their men to reopard their lifes with him, and other plenteously gaue hym money, to support hys chatges and maynetayne his warre. By reason wherof, he assembled together a puyssant army, to thentent to gyue to his enemyes a fierce and sharpe battayle, & so in one day to obteyn his purpose and make an ende of all hys troble. When his army was redy, and all thinges prepared, he departed out of London the.xii. day of Marche, & by easy tourneys came to the castell of Pomfret, wher the rested, appointyng the lorde Fitzwater, to kepe the x passage at Ferybridge, with a great number of talle personages, Let no man thinke or yet imagine, that either the counsayll of kynge Henry, or his vigilant quene, either neglected or forgat to know or searche what their enemyes did, but that they prepared to their power al the men, that they either could perswade or allure to their purpose to take their part. And thus thinking them selfes furnished, committed the gouernaūce of the armye to the duke of Somerset, the erle of Northumberlād, and the lord Clyfford, as men desiring to reuēge the death of their parētes slayn at the first battayle of sainct Albons. These noble capitaynes, leauyng kyng Henry, his wyfe, and sonne, for their most sauegard in the citie of xx Yorke, passed the ryuer of Wharfe, with all their power, entendynge to prohibite kyng Edward to passe ouer the tyuer of Ayree, and for the more expedicion and exployt of their purpose (after many comparaisons made betwene the erle of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, bothe beynge in lusty yought, and of francke corage) the lord Clifforde determined with his light horsemen, to make an assaye to suche as kepte the passage of Ferybridge, and so departed from the great army, on the Saturday before Palmsondaye, and early or his enemyes were ware, gat the bridge, and slew the kepers of thesame and al such as woulde withstand him. The lord Fitzwater hearyng the noyse, sodaynly rose out of xxx his bed, & vnarmed, with a pollax in his hande, thinking that it had byn a fray emōgest his men, came doune to appeace thesame, but or he either began his tale, or knew what the matter meant, he was slayne, and with him the bastard of Salisbury, brother to the erle of Warwycke, a valeaunt yong gentelman, and of great audicitie. When the erle of Warwycke was enformed of this feate, he lyke a man desperate, mounted on his Hackeney, and came blowyng to kyng Edward saiyng: syr I praye God haue mercy of their soules, whiche in the beginning of your enterprise hath lost their lyfes, and because I se no succors of the world, I remit the vengeaunce and punishment to God our creator and redemer, xl and with that lighted doune, and slewe his horse with hys swourde, saiyng: let him flye that wyl, for surely I wil tary with him that wil tary with me, and kissed the crosse of his swourde.

THE lusty kyng Edward, perceiuing the courage of his trusty frēd the erle of Warwycke, made proclamacion that all men, whiche were afrayde to fighte, shoulde incontinent departe, and to all men that tar-

ried the battell, he promised great rewardes with this addicion, that yf any souldiour, which voluntarily would abide, and in ordre before the conflict flye, or turne his backe, that then he that could kyll hym, should haue a great remuneracio and double wages. After thys proclamacio ended the lord Fawconbridge, syr Water Blont, Robert Horne with the forward, passed the ryuer at Caltelford.iij. myles from Ferebridge, entending to haue enuironed and enclosed the lord Clyfford and his copany, but they beyng therof aduertised, departed in great haste toward kyng Henries army, but they mete with some that they loked not for, and were attrapped or they were ware. For the lord Clyfforde, eyther for heat or payne, putting of his gorget sodainly with an arrowe (as some say) without an hedde, was striken into the throte, and in continent rendered hys spirite, and the erle of Westmerlandes brother, and all his company almost were there slayn, at a place called Dintingdale, not farr fro Towton. This ende had he, which slew the yong erle of Rutland, kneling on his knees: whose yong sone Thomas Clifford was brought vp with a shepperd, in poore habite, & dissimuled behauior euer in feare, to publish his lignage or degre, till kyng Henry the.vii. obteyned the croune, and gat the diademe: by whome he was restored to his name and possessions. When this conflict was ended at Ferebridge, the lord Fawcō- bridge, hauyng the forward, because the duke of Northfolk was fallen sicke, valeātly vpon Palmsunday in the twylight, set furth his army, and came to Saxton, where he might apparantly perceyue the hoste of his aduersaries, which were accompted.xl.M. men, and therof aduertised kyng Edward, whose whole army, they that knew it, and payed the wages, affirme to.xlviii.M.vii.C.& ix. persos, which incōtinēt with the erle of Warwycke set forward, leuyng the rereward vnder the gouernāce of syr Jhon Wenlocke, and syr Jhon Dynhā and other. And fyrst of all he made proclamacio, that no prisoner should be take, nor one enemye saued. So thesame day about.ix. of the clocke, which was the.xxix. day of Marche, beyng Palmsundaye, bothe the hostes approched in a playn felde, betwene Towton and Saxtō. When eche parte perceyued other, they made a great shoute, and at thesame instante time, their fell a small snyt or snow, which by vyolence of the wynd was dryuen into the faces of them, which were of kyng Hēries parte, so that their sight was somwhat blemeshed and minished. The lord Fawnconbridge, whiche led the forward of kyng Edwardes battail (as before is rehersed) being a man of great polycie, and of muche experience in marciall feates, caused euery archer vnder his standard, to shot one flight (which before he caused them to prouyde) and then made them to stād still. The Northrē mē, feling the shoot, but by reason of the snow, not wel bewyng p̄ distaūce betwene thē and their enemies, like hardy men shot their scheke arrowes as fast as they might, but al their shot was lost, & their labor vayn for thei came not nere the Southernmē, by.xl. taylors yerdes. Whē their shot was almost spent, the lord Fawconbridge marched forwarde with his his archers, which not onely shot their awne whole sheues, but also gathered the arrowes of their enemies, and let a great parte of theim flye agaynst their awne masters, & a nother part thei let stand on the ground which sore noyed the legges of the owners, when the batayle ioyned. The erle of Northumberlād, and Andrew Trolope, which were chiefetayns of kyng Hēries bawgard, seynge their shot not to preuayle, hasted forward to ioyne with their enemies you may beleue the other part nothing retarded, but valeauntly fought with their enemyes. This battayl was sore foughtē, for hope of life was set on side on euery parte and takynge of prisoners was protlaymed as a great offence, by reason wherof eury man determined, either to conquere or to dye in the felde. This deadly battayle and bloudy conflicte, continued.x. houres in doubtful victorie. The one parte some tyme flowyng, and sometime ebbyng, but in conclusiō, kyng Edward so corragiously comforted his mē, refreshyng the wery, and helping the wounded, that the other part was discomfited and ouercome, and lyke men amased, fledde toward Tadcaster bridge to saue thē selfes: but in the meane way there is a litle broke called Cocke, not very broade, but of a greate depenes, in the whiche, what for hast of escapyng, and what for feare of folowers, a great number were drent and drowned, in so much that the common people there affirme, that men alyue passed the ryuer vpon dead carcasis, and that the greate ryuer of Wharfe, which is that great sewer of the broke, & of all the water coming frō Towton, was colored with bloude. The chace continued all night, and the most parte of the next day, & euer the Northren men, when they saw or perceyued any aduantage, returned agayn and fought with their enemyes, to the great losse of both partes. For in this.iii. dayes were slayn (as they that knewe it wrote) on both partes xxvi.M.vii.C.lx.and.xvi.persons, all Englishmen and of one nacion, wherof the chefe were the erles of Northumberland, and Westmerland and the lord Dakers the lord Welles, syr Jhon Neuel, Andrew trolop, Robert Horne, and many other knyghtes and Esquyers, and the erle of Deuonshyre taken prysoner, but the dukes of Somerset and Excester fled from the felde and saued them selfes. This conflict was in maner vnnaturali, for in it the sonne fought agaynst the father, the brother agaynst the brother, the nephew against the vncle, and the tenaūt agaynst his lord, which slaughter did not onely sore debilitate and much weken the puyssance of this realme, consideryng that these dedde men, whē thei were liuyng had force ynough to resist the greatest princes power of all Europe: But also gaue a courage to outward enemyes and foren potētates, to inuade and make warre in this realme, which thinge was not vnlikely to haue ensued, if either Lewes the French kynge had bene at this tyme quiet in his realme, or James kynge of Scottes had bene of age and master of him selfe, yet thanked be God, for although the gate of a conquest were opened, yet it was shut agayn, or it was espied.

A great slaughter of Englishmen.

After this great victorie, kyng Edward rode to Yorke, where he was with all with all solempnitie receyued : and first he caused the heddes of his father the erle of Salisbury, and other his frendes to be taken from the gates, and to be buried with their bodyes. And there he caused the erle of Deuonshyre and.iii.other to be beheded, and set their heddes in the same place. After that he sent out men on light horses, to espye in what parte kyng Henry lurked, which hearinge of the irrecuperable losse of his frendes, departed incontinent with his wyfe and sonne, to the towne of Barwycke, and leauynge the duke of Somerset there, came to the kynges courte of Scotland, requiring of hym and his counsayll, ayde succor, relief & cõfort. The yong kyng hauyng compassiõ on the miserable fate and great mischaunce of this sorowfull man, not onely cõforted him with fayre woordes and frendly promyses, but also assigned to him a competent pencion to lyue on, duryng the tyme of hys abode within the realme of Scotland. Kyng Henry considering the great humanitie, shewed to hym by the Scottish kyng, in whome onely now consisted the whole hope and especiall trust of his ayde and succor, thought to bynd and oblige the sayd kyng with some great benefite to hys parte, and for that cause, deliuered to hym the toune of Barwycke vpon twede: which towne the Scottes many yeres had desired, but yet thei neither by force nor fayre promyses, could obteyne their desire or purpose before that time, Some writers affirme, that he not voluntarily, but coacted by ne-cessitie, rendered thesame towne, or els he could not be permitted once to enter, or haue any succor in the realme of Scotlande. But whatsoeuer the cause was: after kyng James had taken possession of the towne, he frendly entertayned and faithfully supported the parte and faccion of kyng Henry, and concluded a mariage betwene his syster and the yong prince of Wales, whiche mariage, Philippe duke of Burgoyne, enemy to quene Margaretes father, labored much to infringe and interrupte: but by the consent of both the frẽdes, the mattimony was agreed, but it was neuer solempnised, as after you shall heare. When kynge Henry was somwhat setteled in the realme of Scotlande, he sent his wyfe and hys sonne into Fraunce, to kynge Rene her father, trusting by his ayde and succor, to assemble a greate army, and once agayne to possesse hys Realme and dignitie, and he in the meane season determined to make hys abode in Scotland, to se and espye, what way his frendes in Eng-lande woulde study or inuent, for his restitucion and aduauncement.

But whether it were his destinye or his folye, he so imprudẽtly demeaned hym selfe, that within shorte space, he came into the handes of hys mortal enemyes. Quene Margaret thus beyng in Fraũce did obteyn & impetrate of the yong Frenche kynge, that all fautors and louers of her husbande and the Lancastreall band, might safely and surely haue resorte into any parte of the realme of Fraunce, prohibiting all other of the contray faccion, any accesse or repayre into that countrey.

Kyng Henry the vi. deliue-red the towne of Barwicke into the han-des of James kyng of Scot lande.

THVS you haue hearde the variable chaunce and tragedicall hystory of kynge Henry the sixte, whiche had reigned ouer this realme.

eight and thirthie yeres and odde monethes, whiche the tenthe yere after hys depoſicion, was agayne erected to hys throne and eſtate royall, as after ſhalbe declared. Nowe leuynge kynge Henry with the princes of his faccion conſultynge to gether in Scotlande, and Quene Margarete hys wyfe gatherynge men together in Fraunce, I wyll returne to the actes of kyng Edwarde.

The prosperous reigne Fol. xl of Kyng Edward the fourth.

ROsperous foztune and glozious vi= The first pese ctozy, happely lucceding to this yong Pzince and couragious Capitayn, in the mortall battaill fought at Towton, (as you haue heard) he beyng incozaged and set vp, partly becaule he had obteined so great a conquest, and partely, because he perceiued, that aswell the nobles as the commõs of the Realme, began to dzawe to hym, and to take his part, after the fashion and maner of a triumphaunt conquerox, and victozious champion, with great pompe returned to London. Where (accozding to the old custome of the realme) he called a great assemble of persons of all degrees: and the .xxix daie of June, was at Westminster with all solempnitie crouned and anoynted kynge, and called kynge Edwarde the .iiii. after Willyam the Conquerox, which was in the yere of Chzistes incarnaciõ. M.iiii. C.lxi.

xx IN the whiche yere, he called his high Court of Parliament, where-with the estate of the Realme was wholy set in good ozdze, and specially such thynges as apperteined to the cõmon wealth, which were to muche neglected and decaied. Duryng the tyme of the ciuill and intestine war, he caused all statutes and ozdinaunces made by kyng Henry the syxte, (whiche either touched his title oz his profite) to bee adnihilate and frustrate. In the whiche Parliament, the Erle of Oxford farre stricken in age, and the Lozd Awbzey Ucer, his sonne and heire, whether it were foz malice of their enemies, oz thei were suspected, oz had offended the kyng, they bothe and diuerse of their counsailozs, were attainted & put to execucion, whiche caused Jhon erle of Oxford, euer after to rebell. And af-xxx terward he created his twoo younger bzethzen Dukes, that is to saye: Lozde George, Duke of Clarence, lozde Richard, Duke of Glouceste, and lozde Jhon Neuell, brother to Rychard Erle of Warwicke, he first made Lozde Mountacute, and afterwardes created hym Marques Mountacute. Beside this, Henry Burchier, brother to Thomas Archebyshop of Cantozbury was created Erle of Esser, and Willyam Lozde Fawconbzige, was made Erle of Kent. To this Lozde Henry Burchier beyng a noble man in marciall actes, hyghly appzoued and renoumed, Richard Duke of Yozke, long befoze this tyme, had geuen his suster Elizabeth in mariage: Hauyng a firme hope, and sure confydence, that xl he and his generacion, should be a perpetuall ayde to the Duke and his sequele, aswell in pzosperitie as aduersitie, associate together in al chances of foztune, which trust he did not defraude. as afterward appered to Kyng Edward the fourth, sonne to the said duke Rychard, which for his assured fidelitie, made hym Erle of Essex: to thende that bothe he the father, and his sone, should euer be to hym, bothe an aide and a bulwarke. This Erle Henry, begat of lady Elizabeth his wife, foure sonnes William, Thomas, Jhon, and Henry, and one daughter named Isabel, whiche liued but a small season. In the whiche sonnes, in compassyng and bryngyng great thynges to passe, there lacked no industrie, nor prouydence: in graues and waighte affaires, there wanted neither labor nor diligence: in all iooperdies, they were hardy, strong, and corragious: and finally, in forseyng of thinges, they neither lacked policie, nor were destitute of counsaill. But in lorde Willyam, the eldest sonne of Henry, all these vertues were surely planted and ingrauen: which William espoused lady Anne Woodwile, descended of an high paretage, whose mother Jaquet was daughter to Peter of Luxenborough, erle of sainct Paule by whom he had Lorde Henry, afterward Erle of Essex, and Cicile, and Isabel, whiche died vnmaried: Cicile was maried, to Water lorde Ferreis of Chartley. But now to returne to the purpose.

The. ij. yere.

When al these chaūces, thus luckely happened to kyng Edward, and all thinges in maner were framed, as he would haue them: Henry duke of Somerset, Sir Raufe Percie, and diuerse other, beyng in dispayre, and out of hope of all good chaunce, that might happen to kyng Henry the sixt, came humbly and submitted theimselfes, whom he gently interteined, and louingly receiued. Of whiche deede, the duke shortly repented hym and so did some of the other.

ALL this season was kyng Henry the. vi. in Scotlande, whiche to haue the more aide and comfort of the Scottysh kyng, he deliuered vnto hym the toune of Barwicke, (as you before haue heard) whiche had bene continually, in the possession of Englishmen, from the tyme of kyng Edward the firste, whiche, with hardy corage, manfull assautes, slaughter of many thousandes of Scottes, valiauntly conquered the same. This same season also, quene Margarete beyng in Fraunce, by the meanes of her father and frendes, found suche frendship at the Frenche kynges handes, that she obteined a crewe of fiue hundred Frenchemen, whiche was but a small numbre, for her purpose, and yet a greater number then her husbande or she, were able to interteine in wages, of their awne coffers. She thus beyng accompanied, with these bostyng Frenchemen, of whom sir Piers Bracy, a Bryton knight was Capitain, a man more fierce in the house, then in the fielde, and yet more fierce in flyyng from the feld to the house, then hardy to set forward from the house to the feld, set vp her sailes, and with a prosperous wind, arriued in Scotlande. If she and her company, were welcome to her husband and sonne, I report me to suche as languish, and would haue succor, and to suche as lacke aide,

and would be conforted. The Quene and her company, thought to doo some greate enterpryse, (as the nature of the Frenchemen is, to bee more busy then bold) sayled with her gallant band, toward Newe Castle, and landed at Tynmouthe. But whether she were a frated of her awne shadow, or that the Frenchemen cast to many doubtes, the truthe is, that the whole army returned to their shippes, and a tẽpest rose so sodainly, that if she had not taken a small Caruell, and that with good spede, arryued safe at Barwicke, she had neither vexed kyng Edwarde after, as she dyd with a newe inuasion, nor yet she had not lyued all her old age, in mysery wretchednes, and calamitie, as she did, leasyng bothe her husbande, her sonne, her Realme, and her honour. And although fortune was so fauorable to her, yet her company were with stormy blastes, driuen on the shore before Bamborough castle, where they set their shippes on fire, and cowardly fled to an Iland, called holy Iland, where they were so assailed by the bastard Ogle, an Esquire called Jhon Manners, with other of king Edwardes retinue, that many of them were slain, and almost.iiii C. taken prisoners, and put to raunsome. But the capitain Bracy more coward then coragious, happened by chaunce of a fisharman, & so came to Barwicke, to Quene Margaret his mastres: whether she gaue hym thankes or no, I doubte, but sure I am he none deserued, yet she made hym capitain of Alnewike Castle, which he with his fresh men kepte tyll they were relcowed. This chaunce litle amased the Quene, nor in any thyng abated her haute corage. For incontinently she obteined a greate company of Scottes, and other of her frendes, and so bryngyng her husband with her, and leauing her sõne called pryncc Edward, in the toun of Barwicke, entered Northumberlande, and toke the castle of Bamborough, and stuffed it with Scottes, and made therof capitain syr Raufe Gray, and came forward towarde the Byshoprike of Durham. When the Duke of Somerset hearde these newes, he without delaye refused kyng Edward, and rode in poste to his kynsman, kyng Henry the syxte: verefiyng the old prouerbe: kynne wil crepe, where it may not go: Refusyng the surety of his estate, whiche kyng Edward did promise hym, for the vncertayn gaine whiche he hoped to get, by supporting kyng Henry. With hym fled also sir Raufe Perce, and many other of the kynges frẽdes, but many mo folowed hym, for couetcousnes of spoyle and rapyne: in so muche that the puissaunce of kyng Henry, was thought to bee of as muche force, as the strength and army, of his enemy kyng Edward. The which army was iudged to be the greater, because he spoiled, & burned tounes, & destroied fieldes, whersoeuer he came. Kyng Edward (as you could not blame hym) was with these dooynges nothyng content, wherfore lyke a wyse prince, intendyng to stop the gut of kyng Henries power, or it made any farther issue: Prepared al municions, conuenient for the warre, rigged and appareled, a great naue of shippes, of whiche some were vitailed at Lyn, and some at Hull, and they were furnished with souldiors. When his army by the sea, was thus warlykely set forward, ward: he sent the lorde Montacute, (whom bothe for his hardinesse and sage conduyte in marciall affaires; he muche trusted and beleued) into Northumberlande, there to raise the people, to withstande his enemies. And after this, he in his royall persone, accompanied with his brethren, and a great part of the nobilitie of his Realme, not without a great and puyssaunt armye, marched toward his enemies, and came to the cytie of Yorke, sendyng a great quantitie of his faythfull subiectes, to the ayde of the lorde Montacute, least paraduenture he geuyng to muche confidence, to the men of the Bysshoprike and Northumberlande, might by theim be deceiued and surprysed. The Lorde Montacute, forgat not ther office of a good Capitain; nor beyng well furnyshed with suche as he knewe would neither flie backewarde, nor stande stylll lookyng, and not fyghtyng, thought no leger to tract the tyme, but with a baliant corage, marched forward toward his enemies, and in his iorney, he was incountered, with the lorde, Hungerford, the lorde Roos, sir Raufe Percy, and diuerse other, at a place called Hegely Moze. Where sodaynly thesaied lordes, in maner without stroke strikyng, fled, and onely sir Raufe Percy abode, and was there manfully slayn, with diuerse other, saiyng, when he was dyng: I haue saued the birde in my bosome: meanyng that he had kept, both his promise and othe, to kyng Henry the. vi: Forgettyng yt that he in kyng Henries moste necessitie, abandoned him, and submitted hym to kyng Edward, (as you before haue heard.) The lord Mõtacute seyng fortune thus prosperously leadyng his sayle, was auaunced with hardy corage toward his enemies, & then in passyng forward, he had by his espialles perfite intelligence, that kyng Henry with all his power, was incamped in a faire plain called Lyuels, on the water of Dowyll in Exham shire. It was no neede to byd hym hast hast, as he that thought not to lese the occasiõ, to him so manifestly geuen, and to leaue the good porte of fortune, to hym opened and vnclosed: and therfore, in good ordre of battail, he manfully set on his enemies, in their awne campe, which yt like desperate persones, withe no small corage receiued hym. There was a sore fought feld, and no partie by a long tract, could get any aduauntage of the other, till at the last, the lord Montacute, cryng on his men to do valiauntly, entered by playn force, the battaill of his enemies, and brake their array, whiche like men amased fled hether and thether, desperate of all succor. In whiche flight and chase, were taken, Henry duke of Somerset, whiche before was reconciled to kyng Edwarde, the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Wolyns, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Wentworth, sir Thomas Huse, sir Jhon Fynderne, & many other. Kyng Henry was this day, the beste horseman of his company: for he fled so faste yt that no man could ouertake hym, and yet he was so nere persued, that certain of his henxmen or folowers were taken, their horses beyng trapped in blew veluet: whereof one of thẽ had on his hed, thesaid kyng Henries healmet. Some say his high cap of estate, called abococked, garnished with twoo riche Crounes, whiche was presented to kyng Edward, at at Yorke the fourth daie of May. The Duke of Somerset, was incontinently, for his great mutabilitie and lyghtnes, behedded at Exam, the other lordes and knightes, were had to new Castle, and there after a litle respite, were likewise put in execuciō. Beside these persons, diuerse other to the numbre of. xx b. were executed at Yorke, and in other places: wherby other fautors of kyng Henries partie, should be out of all trust of all victory, consyderyng that their capitaines, had hopped hedles. Frō this battaill escaped kyng Henry the. vi. sir Humfrey Neuell, Williā Taylbois, callyng hymselfe erle of Kent, syr Raufe Grey, and Richard Tunstall, and diuerse other, whiche beyng in feare of takyng, hyd themselfes and lurked in dēnes and holes secretly. Thei were not so closly hid, but they were espied: for the erle of Kent was taken in a close place in Riddesdale, and brought to new Castle, and therewith an axe lost his lyfe, Sir Humfrey Neuell, after long lurking in a Caue, was taken in Holdernes, and at Yorke beheaded. Thus euery man almoste that escaped, was after taken and scorged: so that it should seme that God had ordeined, all suche persones as rebelled against kyng Edward, to haue in cōclusion, death for their reward and guardone.

AFTER this battaill called Exham field, kyng Edward came to the citie of Dureme, to the intent to bee more neret to his enemies, if they would make any farther attempte: and sent from thence into Northumberlande, the erle of Warwicke, the lorde Montacute, the lordes, Fawconbrige and Scrope, and diuerse other, to recouer suche Castles and fortresses, as his enemies there held, and with force defended. These lordes first besieged the Castle of Alnewike, which sir Piers Bracy and the Frenchemen, by force and strong hande kept, and in no wise would yeld, sendyng for ayde of the Scottes, wherupon syr George Douglas, erle of Angus, with. xiii. M. men well chosen, in the daie tyme rescowed the Frenchemen out of the Castle, the Englyshemen lookyng on, whiche thought it muche better to haue the castle, without losse of their mē, then to tele bothe the castle and their men, consideryng the great power of the Scottes, and their final numbre: and so thei entered the castle and manned it, and after thesaied lordes, besieged the castle of Dunstanborogh, and by force toke it, and Jhon Goys seruaunt to the duke of Somerset capitain of thesaid castle, was taken and brought to Yorke: where, with a hatchet he receiued his reward. These Lordes also tooke by force, the strong castle of Bainborough, and in it sir Raufe Gray, whiche was before sworne to kyng Edward, for the whiche periurie to bothe the princes, he was disgraded of the high ordre of knighthode at Dancastre, by cuttyng of his gylt spurres, rētyng his cote of armes, and breakyng his sword ouer his hed: and finally, there his body was shorted, by the legth of his hed, and had no more harme, thus was he rewarded for his doble deceipt and manifest periurie.

The disgradyng of a knight.

AFTER this victory, kyng Edwarde returned to Yorke, where, in despite of therle of Northumberlande, whiche then lurked, in the realme of Scotland, he created syr Jhon Neuell, lord Montacute, erle of Northumberland, & in reprose of Jaspar erle of Penbroke, he created William lord Herbert, erle of thesame place: but after when by mediacion of frendes, the erle of Northumberland, was reconciled to his fauor, he restored hym fully to his possessiõs, name and dignitie: and not intending therby, to diminisshe the honor of his frend, he preferred sir Jhon Neuel, to the stile of Marques Montacute, and so by that meanes, he was in estate and degre higher, then the erle of Warwike his elder brother, but in power, polecie, and possessions, farre baser and lower.

Although that kyng Edward might now thynke, all thynges to be in a good case, & hymselfe also to be of puyssaunce sufficiẽt against all his enemies, (for ỹ he had obteined so great a victory): yet did he prouide with all diligence, that neyther kynge Henry, nor quene Margaret his wyfe, should by any meanes remain in Englande: least the sight with the perswasions of them, and especially with olde frendes & alies, might alter and change the mindes, & also win the hartes of the mutable cõmonaltie. Wherfore he edified bulwarkes, and buylded fortresses on euery syde & parte of his realme, where might be any place propice and mete, for an armie to arriue or take lande. Beside this, he wrote to all them in the South partes of his realme, that in no wise they should receiue the said quene, nor in any thyng should help or minister to her: and if any did presume or attempt, priuatly or openly to infringe his will and commaundemẽt, the offendors should be taken as his aduersaries, & punished as his vtter enemies. And on that parte that marched vpon Scotlande, he laied watches and espialles, that no persone should go out of the realme, to kyng Henry and his company: whiche then laye soiornyng in Scotlande. But what so euer ieoperdy or peryll might bee construed or demed, to haue insued by the meanes of kyng Henry: all suche doubtes, were now shortly resolued and determined, and all feare of his doynges, were clerely put vnder and extinct. For he hymselfe, whether he were past all feare, or was not well stablished in his perfite mynde, or could not long kepe hymself secrete, in a disguysed apparell, boldely entered into Englande. He was no soner entered, but he was knowen and taken of one Cantlowe, and brought towarde the kyng, whom the erle of Warwicke met on the waie, by the kynges commaundement, and brought hym through London, to the Toure, and there he was laied in sure holde. Quene Margarete his wyfe, hearyng of the captiuitie of her husbande, mistrustyng the chaunce of her sonne, all desolate and comfortles, departed out of Scotlande, and sayled into Fraunce, where she remained with Duke Reyner her father, til she toke her infortunate iorney into Englande agayn: where she lost bothe husband and sonne, and also al her wealth, honor, and worldly felicitie. The newe Duke of Somerset and his brother Jhon, sailed into Flaunders, where they also liued in greate misery.til duke Charles, because he was of their kyn,and discended of the house of Lancastre by his mother,succored them with a small pencion, whiche to them was a greate comfort. Therle of Penbroke went from countrey to coũtrey not alwaies at his hartes ease.nor in securitie of life,or suretie of liuing. Such an vnstable and blind goddes is fortune:for whē he that sitteth highest on the whele falleth to the ground,al that be vnderneth fal also,and can neither haue aide nor helpe of her,nor yet of theimselfes.

AFTER the takyng of kyng Henry the.vi.and the departyng of his x wife,this realme was in more quietnes & tranquilitie, because that men of the contrary part and faccion,durst not once attẽpt nor yet moue,any newe tumulte or conspiracie,consyderyng that bothe the hed was fallen, and the chief membres fled and vanquished. Wherfore kyng Edward, beyng clerely out of doubt of all hostilitie and danger, set all his mynd the whole foure yeres folowyng, for bothe amending thinges preiudiciall to the common wealthe, and also for stablishyng of thynges, mete and necessary,for the people of his Realme and dominion. And firste of all,folowyng the old auncient adage which saith, that the husbandman ought first to tast of the new growē frute:he distributed the possessions, xi of suche as toke parte with kyng Henry the. vi. to his souldiors and capitaines,whiche he thought had well deserued it. And beside,he lefte no poynt of liberalitie vnshewed, by the whiche he might allure to hym, the benecuolence and louyng hartes of his people:and in especiall to his nobilitie,he gaue bothe large and precious giftes and rewardes. And because that he would gladly haue ỹ loue of all men,aswel noble as ignoble,aswell of ryche as of poore, he shewed hymselfe more familiar, bothe with the nobilitie and the commonaltie,then(as some mẽ thought) was conuenient,either for his estate, or for his honour:whiche gentilnes and frendly familiaritie,he euer after vsed. The lawes of the realme,in part xxx he reformed,and in part he newly augmented. The coyne both of golde and of syluer, whiche yet at this date is curraunt, he newly deuised and diuided:for the gold he named royals and nobles, and the siluer he called grotes and halfe grotes. After this,he caused open Proclamacion to be diuulged, that all persones whiche were adherent to his aduersaries part,& would leaue their armure, & submit thẽselfes wholy to his grace and mercy should bee clerely remitted,pardoned,and relessed: and they that obstinatly would so refuse,should haue such paines, as by the law, to suche transgressors,was assigned and appoynted. What profite this gentle interteinyng of his people brought hym to: What good will and xl fixed hartes of the people, he obteined by this kynd and frendly handelyng,all mẽ may with their yes manifestly perceiue. For only by the fauor and ayde of the people,euer after in all his warres, he was a victor and a conqueror:so that all enterprises afterward against hym attempted,had either euillsuccesse,or were sone rebelled, as afterward you shall perceiue. When he had brought his Realme into this estate, he surely thynkyng,and no lesse trustyng,but that he was set in the sure stall, stable throne,and vnmoueable chaire,of the croune of his realme and kyngdom,was not only desirous of hymselfe,being a prince of haut corage, young,lusty,,and sanguyne of complexion, to haue a wyfe,but was also daily sollicited, required, and mocioned of the peres and nobilitie of the Realme, to ioyne with suche a make, as should bee bothe to his honoure and contentacion,and also for the securitie & establishment, of the royall succession,and continuaunce of his progeny, in his newe possessed countrey,and late recouered kingdom. Wherupon, like a wise and a circum-specte Prince, very desirous of a Quene, but more thirstyng for suche a make, by the aide of whose parentes, alies and confederates, He beyng ioyned with theim in perfite affinitie,might lytle or nothyng doubte the attemptes of his aduersarie kyng Henry,nor yet the malice of his secret frendes and priuy fautors.This matter(as it was of great waight and importance)hangyng long in consultacion:Emongest other it was moued,to send to James the.iiii.kyng of Scottes, for the obtenyng of the faire lady Margaret his suster,to thintent,that on that syde,kyng Henry his aduersary,should be destitute of all aide,refuge, succor, and comfort:but whether it were for a priuie sickenes,or an open impediment,to hym and his counsaill declared, or by them spied, this mocion vanished and toke no farther effect.Then(as many men haue saied, & few or none haue written)it was farther consulted, that the lady Elizabeth, suster & heire apparant,to Done Henry kyng of Castle,(whiche afterward was his heire in deede,and maried to Done Fernãdo,kyng of Arragon) was a mariage for hym moste conuenient, and not so conuenient, as profitable bothe to hym and his realme, and theim that should lineally succede hym, consydering that if he might obtein the kyngdom of Castle, of the whiche his greate graund mother, was one of the indubitate heires, as daughter to Done Peter,late kyng of Castle,(by the valiaunt knyght, Edward prince of Wales,restored to his seignyory, realme & kyngdom) then were he in case,not only hable to defend hymselfe,and his realme of Englande, against all forein enemies, and vtter inuasions, but also he should be of puyssance sufficient to inuade,and likely to recouer the duchy of Guyen,yea,and whole Acquitain,beyng his awne true and lawefull inheritance, with the ayde onely of the Caltilians, puttyng the En-glischemen to litle trauaill,& lesse charge. This mocion thus set forward semed highly to redounde,bothe to the honor of the kyng, and the hygh auauncement of the state of the realme:Considering first,the high pare-tage of the woman,and secondly, the indubitate expectacion of thinhe-ritaunce,of the realmes of Castel and Lion.And this mariage agreed vppon,(whiche semeth more likely to be entreated of, then cõcluded as the tale tellers sate). The erle of Warwicke was sent into Spayn, well instructed,and no lesse accompanied, for the cõclusion of thesaid mariage.

But who so will diligently consider, and in egall balaunce ponder, the youth and appetite of kyng Edward, and the tender age and minorite of this noble damosell: may euidently perceyue, that it was neither decent noz conuenient, foz hym noz his Realme, to expect and tary the maturitie and ful age of this noble pzinces, noz that he beyng a pzince, well cherished, of lustie courage, and apte to generacion, would oz could liue sole and vnmaried without a wyfe, till she were of age, mete & conuenient foz his bed. Foz it appereth on her goodly sepulture, in the cytie of Granado (where she is buried) and also diuerse famous and notable Historiographers, bothe of Spain and other regions, wzite and affirme, that she changed this transitozy lyfe, in the yere of our lozde. The treatie of whiche mariage although it be not vnpossible, yet foz the causes afozesaid, it seemeth not a litle vnlikely. But admit that this mariage was moued, as it peraduenture might be, and that the erle of Warwycke sayled into Spain, (as he did not in deede) of likelihode his legacion was frustrate, & came to none xx effect: but sure it is that thesame yere, he came to king Lewes the.xi. then beyng French kyng, lyng at Tours, and with great honour was there receiued, and honozably interteined: of whõ, foz kyng Edward his master, he demaunded to haue in mariage the lady Bona, daughter to Lewes duke of Sauoy, and suster to the lady Carlot, then French Quene, beyng then in the Frenche court. This mariage semeth pollitiquely deuised, and of an high imaginacion to be inuented, if you will well consider, the state and condicion of kyng Edwardes affayzes, which at this tyme, had kyng Henry the.vi. in safe custody, in the strong toure of London, and the moste parte of his adherentes, he had as he thought, either xxx pzofligated oz extinct, Quene Margarete onely except, and Pzince Edward her sonne, whiche were then soioznyng at Angiers, with old Duke Reiner of Aniow her father, wzityng hymselfe kyng of Naples, Sicile, and Jerusalem, hauing as muche pzofites of the letters of his glozious stile, as rentes and reuenues out of thesaid large and riche realmes and dominions, (because the kyng of Arragon toke the pzofytes of thesame, and would make no accõpt therof to duke Reiner). Kyng Edward therfoze thought it necessary, to haue affinitie in Fraunce, and especially by the Quenes suster: whiche Quene, although she ruled not the kyng her husband, (as many women do) yet he of a certain especial humilitie, was xl moze cõtent to haue her fauoz & folowe her desire, (foz wedded men often tymes doubt stozmes) rather then to haue a lowzyng countenaunce, and a ringing peale, whẽ he should go to his rest and quietnes: trusting that by this mariage, Quene Margarete (whom thesame Quene Carlot litle oz nothyng regarded, although her father was called a kyng and she a quene, & none of both hauing subiectes, pzofites, noz dominions) should

England, for the clerely finishyng of thesame. After these thynges thus concluded the erle of Warwycke was dimissed and highly rewarded, & for the great and noble courage that was in hym, he obteyned suche fauour of the kyng, the Quene & the nobles of Fraunce, that when he fledde out of England, he was there honourably receiued, frendly maynteined, and lounglyly succored, as you shall perceyue hereafter.

BVT now consider the old prouerbe to be true that saieth: that mariage is destinie. For during the time that the erle of Warwicke was thus in Fraunce, concludyng a mariage for kyng Edward: The kyng beyng on huntyng in the forest of Wychwod beside Stonystratforde, came for his recreacion to the mannor of Grafton, where the duches of Bedford soiorned, then wyfe to syr Rychard Woodvile, lord Ryuers, on whō then was attending a daughter of hers, called dame Elizabeth Greye, wydow of syr Jhon Grey knight, slayn at the last battaill of sainct Albons, by the power of kyng Edward. This wydow hauing a suyt to the kyng, either to be restored by hym to some thyng taken from her, or requyryng hym of pitie, to haue some augmentacion to her liuyng, founde suche grace in the kynges eyes, that he not only fauoured her suyte, but muche more phantasied her person, for she was a woman more of formal countenaunce, then of excellent beautie, but yet of suche beautie & fauor, that with her sober demeanure, louely lokyng, and femynyne smylyng, (neither to wanton nor to humble) beside her toungue so eloquent, and her wit so pregnant, she was able to rauisshe the mynde of a meane person, when she allured, & made subiect to her, the hart of so great a kyng.

Kig Edward falleth in loue with the duches of Bedfordes daughter, & after marieth her.

After that kyng Edward had well considered all the linyamentes of her body, and the wise and womanly demeanure that he saw in her, he determined first to attēpt, if he might prouoke her to be his souereigne lady, promisyng her many gyftes and fayre rewardes, affirming farther, that if she would therunto condiscend, she might so fortune of his paramour and concubyne, to be chaunged to his wyfe & lawfull bedfelow: whiche demaunde she so wysely, and with so couert speache aunswered and repugned, affyrmyng that as she was for his honour farre vnable to bee hys spouse and bedfelowe: So for her awne poore honestie, she was to good to be either his concubyne, or souereigne lady: that where he was a littell before heated with the darte of Cupido, he was nowe set all on a hote burnyng fyre, what for the confidence that he had in her perfyte constancy, and the trust that he had in her constant chastitie, & without any farther deliberacion, he determined with hym selfe clerely to marye with her, after that, askyng counsaill of them, whiche he knewe neither would noȝ once durſt impugne his concluded purpoſe.

BVT the duches of Yoȝke hys mother letted it as muche as in het lay alledgyng a pȝecontract made by hym with the lady Lucye, and diuers other lettes: all which doubtes were reſoluꝺ, & all thynges made clere & all cauillacions auoyded. And finally by this mariage, the quenes bloud was cõfounded, and vtterly in maner deſtroyed. So that men did afterward diuyne, that either God was not contented, noȝ yet pleaſed with this matrimony, oȝ els that he puniſhed kyng Edward in his poſteritie, foȝ the diepe diſſymulyng and couert clokynge, with hys faithfull frende the erle of Warwicke. But when the Erle of Warwicke had perfit knowlege by the letters of his truſty frendes, that kyng Edward had gotten hym a new wyfe, & that all that he had done with kyng Lewes in his Ambaſſade foȝ the cõ- ioynyng of this new affinitie, was both fruſtrate & vayne, he was earneſtly moued and ſore chafed with the chaunce, and thought it neceſſarye that kyng Edward ſhould be depoſed from his croune and total dignitie, as an inconſtant prince, not worthy of ſuche a kyngly office. All men for the mooſt part agre, that this mariage was the onely cauſe, why the erle of Warwycke bare grudge, and made warre on kynge Edwarde. Other affirme that there were other cauſes, which added to this, made ꝑ fyre to flamme, which before was but a litle ſmoke. For after that kyng Edward had obteyned his kyngdome (as it was then thoughte) by the onely helpe and meane of the erle of Warwicke, he began to ſuſpect yea, and to doubt hym, fearing leaſt he being in ſuch aucthoritie and eſtimacion of the people, as he well might worke hym pleaſure or diſpleaſure, when he therunto were minded, wherfore he thought it cõuenient a litle and a litle to plucke awaye and myniſhe the power and aucthoritie, whiche he and his predeceſſors had gyuen to the erle, to thentent that he then might do at his pleaſure, bothe at home and in outward parties, without feare or dread, without checke or taunt, whatſoeuer to his awne minde ſemed moſt cõuenient. By this a man may ſe that often it chanceth, that frendes for one good turne will not render another, nor yet remember a great gratuitie and benefite in time of neceſſitie, to thẽ ſhewed and exhibited: But for kyndnes they ſhew vnkyndnes, & for great benefites receyued, with great diſpleaſure they do recompenſe. Of this the erle of Warwycke was nothyng ignorant, which although he loked for better thankes & more ample benefites at kyng Edwardes handes: yet he thought it beſt to diſſimule the matter. tyll ſuch a tyme were come, as he might find the king without ſtrength, and then to vnbraide him with the pleaſure that he had done for hym. And farther it erreth not from the truthe that kyng Edward did attempt a thyng once in the Erles houſe whiche was muche againſt the erles honeſtie (whether he woulde haue deflowred his daughter or his nece, the certaintie was not for both their honors openly knowen) for ſurely ſuch a thyng was attempted by kyng Edward, whiche loued well bothe to loke and to fele fayre dammoſels. But whether the injury that the erle thought he had taken at kyng Edwardes handes, or the diſdayne of aucthoritie that the Erle had vnder the kyng, was the cauſe of diſſolucion of their amitie and league, truthe it is that the priuie intencions in their hartes brake into ſo many ſmall peces, that England, Fraunce, and Flaunders, coulde neuer ioyne them agayn, duryng their naturall lyfes.

THE erle of Warwycke beyng thus moued, inflãmed, and ſet againſt the kyng, leſt in his fury, his purpoſe might be eſpied and broughte to nought, determined hym ſelf, couertly diſſymulynge, ſo long to ſuffer all ſuch wronges & iniuries, as were to hym done, till he might ſpye a tyme conuenient, & a world after his awn appetite, for the ſetting furth of his enterpriſe, and accompliſhing of his purpoſe: wherupon he ſayled into England, and with reuerence ſaluted the kyng as he was wont to do, & declared his Ambaſſade and therploye of theſame, without any ſpot of

And when he had taryed in the courte a certayn space, more for to shewe that he was thesame person, and of thesame good mynde towarde the kynge, as he was before the tyme of hys legacion, then for any great affeccion that he bare, either to the kyng or the quene, he obteyned licence of the kyng, to depart to hys Castel of Warwycke, both for hys health and recreacion, whither with great honour he was accõpanied with diuers of the kynges familier seruitors, as thoughe none inward grudge or couert dissimulacion had ben hydden betwene theim, xx where he remayned tyll all hys priuie imaginacions were made open, and all hys enterprises were ready to be set forwarde. Duryng whiche tyme, the quene was deliuered of a ponge and fayre lady, named Elyzabeth, whiche afterward was wyfe to the noble prince kynge Henry the vii. and mother to kyng Henry the. viii.

The lāde of Luke also hath in recent memorie his sore scorge & cruell plage. Thys erle Charles was at thys tyme a wydower, hauyng onely a sole doughter, and no sonne, wherfore both by hys father and hym selfe and the companions of the order of the goldē fleece, beyng of their counsail, it was thought not onely expedient but much more necessary, that he should take a wyfe, yea and in such a place as they might by that matrimony haue both aliance and ayde agaynste all their outwarde enemyes, and especially agaynst the Frenche kyng, whome they knew dayly to wayte & watche lyke a serpente, how he by fraude might swalow or catche them or ther possessions: vpon which cōmunicacion it was declared by certayne, there beynge present, that kynge Edward of Englande had a fayre virgyn to hys syster, called lady Margarete, a lady of excellent beautie, and yet more of womanhode, then beautie, and more of vertue then womanhode, whose innumerable good qualityes, beside the giftes of nature, grace and fortune, were so seriously setfurth to duke Philip, and the erle of Charoloys hys sonne, that bothe the father & the chyld iudged that mariage to be the moste meteest matrimony in Chrystendon, not onely for the excellent qualities and manyfold vertues emprynted in the person of the noble virgyn, but also for the great profite, allyance and continuall frendshyp that should growe and ryse betwene the realme of Englande, and the dukes landes.

The.vi. yere.

After that thys poynte was clerely resolued on, the Duke appoynted his bastard sonne, lorde Anthony, commonly called the bastarde of Burgoyne, chefe Ambassadoure for this purpose: a man of great witte, corage, valyantnes and liberalitie, whiche beyng rychely furnyshed of plate & apparel, necessary for his estate, hauing in his cōpany gētelmen & other expert in all feates of chiualry, and mercial prowes, to the nūber of .cccc. horses (as the Brabanders wryte) toke hys ship, and with prosperous wynde arryued in Englande, where he was of the nobilitie receyued and with al honorable entertainment, conueyed to the kynges presence which like a prince, that knew what appertened to his degre, louingly welcomed, and familiarly embraced the bastard & other nobles that came with hym. And after hys commission seene, and hys message declared, the kynge gaue to hym a gentell answere for that tyme, and so the ambassadours departed to their lodgynge, where they kept a greate housholde, and made triumphāt chere. You may thinke that kyng Edward was not so vnwyse, nor yet so vnpurueyed of counsail, to forsake thys beneficiall alliaunce, amicable consanguinitie and louynge frendshyp, thus frankely to hym profered and graunted, but that he and all hys counsaill with fote and hande endeuoured theym selfes to bryng too passe, and fynally to conclude thesame, the Erle of Warwycke onely excepte, whyche berynge hys harty fauoure too the Frenche kynge by x yll reportes, dyd asmuche as in hym laye to hynder thys mariage and affinitie, of whose good wil duke Charles was well informed.

But for all hys opinion at a certayne daye, the kynge sente for the Ambassadours, and there declared too theym howe he gladlye dyd bothe accept and graunte their louynge request, and demaunde, promisyng them in the word of a Prynce, that he should be duryng his life frend to the frēdes of the Duke and the Erle, and ennemies to their aduersaries and ennempes, which wordes not a littel pleased the Burgonyons. After this he caused the lady Margaret his syster to be sent for which beyng richely appareled, accompanied with a great multitude xx of ladyes and greate women, entred into the kynges great chāber, with so sober demeanure, so faire a visage, so louyng a countenaūce, & so princely a port, that she was esteined for her personage and qualities, bothe of the Burgonnyons and other, not to be vnworthy to matche in matrimony, with the greatest prynce of the world. And after the kynge, she & the ambassadours had cōmoned a good tract of tyme, the lorde Anthonye bastard of Burgonnye, contracted openly the sayde lady Margaret, for and in the name of his brother the erle Charles, and there in the name of the duke his father, and the Erle hys brother, he presented to ỹ lady Margaret a ryche and a costly Juell, whiche she ioyously receyxx ued gith great thankes and many gratulations geuen, bothe to her father in lawe and her new contracted husband.

After thys mariage, was thus concluded and contracted to speke Achalenges, what bankettes, festes, disguisynges, pastymes & pleasures were made and shewed to the ambassadours, it were to longe to wryte the matter, beyng no more serious, & much more tedious to her: But one thyng was very honorable, and not mete to be put in obliuiō. The bastard of Burgoyne, a man of a haute corage, chalenged Anthony lorde Scales, brother to the Quene, a man bothe egall in hart, and valyantnes with the bastard, to fight with hym bothe on fote & on horsbacke, the lorde Scaxl les gladly receyued hys demaunde and promised hym on the othe of a gentelman, to aunswere hym in the felde, at the daye appoynted: lyke chalenges were made by other Borgonyons, to the gentelmen of Englande, which you maye surely beleue were not refused. The kyng entēdyng to see this marciall sport and valiant chalenge performed, caused lystes royall for the champions, and costly galleries for Ladyes, to loke on, to be newly erected and edified in West Smythfelde in London. And at the day by the kyng assigned, the.ii. Lordes entered within the lystes, well mounted, richely trapped, and curiously armed. On whiche daye they ran together, certayne courses with sharpe speres, and so departed with egall honor. The next daye, they entered the felde, the bastarde sitting on a bay courser, beingesomwhat dymme of sight, and the lord Scales had a gray courser, on whose shaffron was a long and a sharpe pyke of stele. Whē these.ii. valeaūt persones coped together at the tornay, the lord Scales horse by chaunce or by custome, thrust hys pyke into the nostrelles of the horse of the bastarde, so that for very payne he moūted so hygh, that he fell on the one syde with hys master, & the lord Scales rode round about hym with his sworde shakyng in hys hand, tyll the kyng cōmaunded the Marshall to helpe vp the bastarde, whiche openly sayed, I can not holde by the cloudes, for though my horse fayled me, surely I wyll not fayle my coūtercōpaignions. And when he was remounted, he made a countenāce to assayle hys aduersarie, but the kyng either fauorynge hys brothers honor then gotten, or mystrustyng the shame, whiche mighte come to the bastarde, if he were agayne foyled, caused the Heraldes to cry, a l'hostell, and euery mā to departe. The morow after, the two noble men came into the felde on fote, with two Poleaxes, and there fought valiantly lyke two corragious champions, but at the laste, the poynt of the axe of the lord Scales happened to enter into the sight of the healme of the bastard, & by fyne force myght haue plucked hym on hys knees, the kynge sodaynlye caste doune his warder, and then the Marshalls them seuered. The bastard not content with this chaunce, very desirous to be reuenged, trustinge on his cunning at the Poleaxe (the whiche feate he had greatly exercysed, & there in had a great experiment) required the kyng of iustice, that he might perfourme his enterprise: the lord Scales, not refused it. The kyng sayd he wolde aske counsayl, & so calling to hym the Cōstable and Marshall with the officers of armes, after longe consultacion had, and lawes of armes rehersed, it was declared to the bastarde for a sentence diffinitiue by the duke of Clarence, then constable of Englande, and the duke of Northfolke Erle Marshall, that yf he woulde prosecute farther his attempted chalenge, he muste by the lawe of armes, be deliuered to his aduersarye in thesame case and lyke condicion, as he was when he was taken from him, that is to saye, the poynt of the lord Scales axe to be fixed in the sighte of his healme, as depe as it was when they were seuered. The bastard hering this iudgemēt, doughted much the sequele, yf he so should procede agayne, wherfore he was content to relinquyshe hys chalenge, rather then to abyde the hasarde of hys dyshonour: Other chalenges were done, & valiauntly acheued by the Englishmen, which I passe ouer. When all these corragious actes were thus with ioy accomplished, sorowfull tidynges were broughte to the bastard, that duke Philip his father was passed thys transitory lyfe, of

whyche tidinges he was not a litell sorowfull, and there vpon takynge his leue of kynge Edwarde and his syster, the newe Duches of Burgoyne, liberally rewarded with plate and Juels, with all celeritie he returned to the new duke Charles his nephew, accõpting to him what exployt he had made in his Ambassade & message, which answere was to the great contentacion and accomplishement of the desire of the sayd Duke, and thereof most hartely thanked the lady for her consent, as for the thinge that he most desired, not forgettynge to gratefie kynge Edwarde for his preferment and furtherance in his louinge request.

This contract was made, and duke Philip dyed in the yere of our salvacion. M.CCCC.LXVIJ. and in the.vi. yere of kynge Edwarde the.iiii. in whiche yere kyng Edward more for the Marques Montagewes loue, then for any fauour he bare to the erle of Warwycke, promoted George Neuel their brother, to the Archebishoperyke of Yorke.

NOw to returne to Charles duke of Burgoyne, whiche was with greate victory, and victorious triumphe returned from the conquest of the lande of Luke to Bruseles, he not forgetting the contract, which his bastard brother the lord Anthony had made in hys name, with the noble princesse lady Margaret, syster to Edward kyng of Englande, deuised alwayes how he might with all honor and royaltie, haue her receyued into his countrey. And first he wrote to the kyng of Englande, to sende her ouer the sea with all diligence, accordinge to the pact and leage betwene them concluded, which beynge nothinge slacke, and especially in suche a cause, as so highly magnified his blonde, prepared shippes and all thinges necessary, for the honorable conduyte of her and her cõpany and so accompayned with the dukes of Exceter and Southfolke and their wyfes, beynge bothe her systers, and a great companye of lordes and ladies and other to the number of. CCCCC. horsses, in the beginninge of June departed out of Londõ to Douer, & so sayled to Sluys, how she and her companye were there receyued, and from thence conueyed to Bruges, where the mariage was celebrate and solempnized, what abundaũt fare and Delicate bland was serued at the feast, with how riche hanginges the house was garnished and trimmed, with how many Cupperdes of golde & siluer the palace was adourned, with how many garnyshe of siluer vessell the companyes were serued, what Justes, what Tourneys, what bankettes, and what disportes were at this Nupciall feast. I neither dare nor wil write, accordinge to the Brabanders Cronicle, lest perauenture some mẽ might thynke that I flattered a litle, as perchance I thynke they saye not trew in a greate dele.

But now to let go ỹ matters of yoy & solace, & to returne to the pestilent serpent, whiche so longe had sucked vp his poyson, and now began to vomit and cast it so abrode, that all the.iii. peres folowing the whole

Realme was continually infected with thesame, whiche infection, neuer ceased till the ayre was purified with the bloudde and deathe of hym selfe at Barnet felde: for yf you call to youre remembraunce the depe dissimulunge of the Erle of Warwycke at hys retorne from beyonde the sea, and the continuall grudge that lurked in his stommack, toward kyng Edward syth that tyme, ye must thinke that of very necessitie it woulde at length either burste the vessell, and by some meanes issue out, as it did now euen at this tyme: he beyng at his towne of Warwycke, accompanyed with his two brethern the Marques Mountacute, and the Archebishop of Yorke, framed communicacion too make them merye and to passe furth the time two or thre dayes, and at the last haupnge an occasion to speake of the kyng & his doinges and proceedinges, he then first moued and excited them by all wayes possible to helpe and ayde, & to restore kyng Hēry the sixte, to the Croune and royal dignitie againe, saiyng to them after this wyse. My dere & welbeloued brethern, the incredible faythefulnes, the secrete sobernes, and the politique prudence that I haue euer by long cōtinuāce of tyme experimented in you both, doth not onely encourage my harte, yea and setteth me in great hope of obteyninge my purpose, but also putteth me out of all dreade & mistrust, fyrmely beleuyng, & surely iudging, that you both will with tothe and nayle endeuer youre selfe, to the vttermost of your power to bring to effect & purpose that thyng that I now shall declare vnto you. Surely, I woulde in nowise that you shoulde thynke that, that which I shal speake to you, of king Edward & kyng Hēry, should rise of any lightnes or phantasie of my mynd, or any trifelyng tope, lately fallen into my imagination, but the true experience and iuste iudgement, that I haue of them bothe, their qualities and conditions, in maner cōpell and constrayne me to saye as I saie, and to doe as I doo. For surely kyng Henry is a Godly, good, and a verteous persone, neither forgettyng hys frendes, nor puttyng in obliuion any benifite by hym, of a meane persone receyued, nor yet any payne for his causes susteined, he hath lefte vnrewarded: To whom God hath sent a sonne called Prince Edward, borne to bee of great worthynes and prayse, of muche bountefulnes and liberalitie, of whom men maie, many laudable thynges conjecture, considerynge the peyn, labor, and trauayll, that he taketh to helpe his father out of captiuitie and thraldome. Kyng Edward on the contrary side, is a man, contumelious, oppробrious, and iniurious person, to them that deserue kyndnes, he sheweth vnkyndnes, and to theim that loue him, he dedly hateth, now detestyng to take any peyn, for the preferment or maintenance, of the publique wealth of this realme, but all geuen to pastime, pleasure, and daliance. Sonet preferryng to high estate, men discended of lowe bloud, and basse degree, then men of old and vndefiled houses, whiche hath bothe supported hym, & the common wealth of his realme: So that now I perceiue, that it is euē come to this poynt that he will destroye all the nobilitie, or els the nobilitie must shortly, of very that wer first hurt, should first reuẽge our cause: for it is not vnknowen to yow bothe, how that he immediatly after he had obteined the croune, began first secretly, and then openly, to enuye, disdain, and impugne the fame, glory, and renoune, of our house and familie, as who saied, that al the honor, preferment, and authoritie that we haue, we had onely recei-ued at his handes, and that we had neither obteined, dignitie nor rule by our great labor, aide and trauaill. Whiche to all men maye seme vntrue, whiche consider that our name, chief title, and principall authorix tie, was to vs geuen by kyng Henry the sixte, and not by hym. But if e-uery man will remembre, who firste toke parte with his father, when he claimed the Croune: who at that tyme, for that cause was in greate ieoperdie, and almost slayn by the kynges menial seruauntes, and who neuer lefte this man in prosperitie nor aduersitie, till he had the garlande, and the realme in quietnes, shal manifestly perceiue, that wee and oure bloudde, hath shewed our selfes more like fathers to hym, then he like a frend to vs. If we haue receiued any benefites of him, surely thei be not so muche, as we haue deserued, nor so muche as we looked for, and yet they bee muche more, then he would wee should inioye, as ye bothe well xx perceiue and knowe. Let these thynges ouerpasse, and speake of the vn-gentle vntrue, and vnprincely handelyng of me in the laste ambassade, beyng sent to the French kyng, for to treate a mariage for hym, hauyng full authoritie to bynd and to lose, to contracte and conclude. Whiche thyng when I had finished and accomplished: how lightly hys mynde you knowe better then I. So that by this meanes, I was almoste out of all credence, in the Courte of Fraunce, both with the kyng and quene as though I had come thether like an espiall, to moue a thyng neuer mynded, or to treat of a mariage determined before neuer to take effect.

These faire wordes allured the Archbishop shortly, to his intent and purpose, but the Lorde Marques could by no meanes bee reduced, to take any parte against kyng Edward, till the erle had bothe promised hym great rewardes and high promocions, and also assured hym of the aide and power, of the greatest princes of the realme. Euē as the Marques vnwillyngly, and in maner coacted gaue hys consent, to thys vnhappy conturacion, at the intisement and procurement of therle, so with a fainte harte and lesse courage, he alwaies shewed hymself enemie to kyng Edwarde, excepte in his laste daie: whiche luke warme harte, and double dissimulacion, wer bothe the destruccion of him and his brethrē. The erle of Warwicke beyng a man of a greate wit, farre castyng, and many thynges vigilantly forseyng, either perceiued by other, or had perfect knowlege of himself, that the duke of Clarence bare not the best will to kyng Edward his brother (as he did not in deede) thought first to proue hym fart of, as it wer in a probleme, and after to open to hym (if he sawe hym flexible to his purpose) the secrete imaginacions of his stomack: thynkyng that if he might by pollicie or promise, allure the duke to his partie, that kyng Edward should be destitute, of one of hys best Hawkes, when he had moste nede to make a flight. So at tyme and place conuenient, the erle began to complain to the duke, of the ingratitude and doublenes of kyng Edward, saiyng: that he had neither handled hym like a frende, nor kepte promise wyth hym, accordynge as the estate of a Prince required. The erle had not halfe tolde his tale, but ỹ duke in a greate fury answered, why my lorde, thynke you to haue hym kynd to you, that is vnkynd, yea, and vnnatural to me beyng hys awne brother, thynke you that frendshyp will make hym kepe promise, where neither nature nor kynred, in any wise can prouoke or moue him, to fauor his awne bloud? Thynke you that he will exalte and promote hys cosin or alie, whiche litle careth for the fall or confusiō, of hys awne line and lignage: This you knowe well enough, that the heire of the Lorde Scales he hath maried to his wifes brother, the heire also of the lorde Bonuile and Harpyngton, he hath geuen to his wifes sonne, and theire of the lorde Hungerford, he hath graunted to the lorde Hastynges: thre mariages more meter for hys twoo brethren and kynne, then for suche newe foundlynges, as he hath bestowed theim on: But by swete saincte George I sweare, if my brother of Gloucester would ioyne with me, we would make hym knowe, that wee were all three one mannes sonnes, of one mother and one lignage discended, which should be more preferred and promoted, then straungers of his wifes bloud.

When therle of Warwicke had hard the dukes wordes, he had that whiche he bothe sore thrusted and lusted for, and then began boldy to disclose to the Duke,his intent and purpose euen at the full,requiryng hym to take parte with hym, and to be one of the attempted confederacie. And least the duke might thynke that the matter was lightly,and vncircumspectly begon, he declared to hym, how warely, howe secretly, how spedely al thynges concernyng this purpose, had been compassed, studied, and forsene, requiryng hym in so greate and vrgente a cause, bothe to take pein & trauaill, and also to studie with al circumspection and forseyng,how these thynges thus begon,might be brought to a certaintie and a finall conclusion. And the rather to wynne the dukes hart x the erle beside diuerse and many fayre promyses made to the duke,offered hym his eldest daughter(beeyng of ripe age and elegant stature) in mariage,with the whole halfedele of his wyfes inheritaunce. The duke at the perswasion & requeste of therle,promysed to do al thynges whiche he would or could,in any maner require or deuyze. After that the Duke and the erle had long consulted, concernyng their straunge and dangerous affaires:thei first determined to saile to Caleis,of the which toune the erle was chief capitain where his wife and twoo doughters then sojorned,whom to visite, the duke of Clarence beyng in amours, had no small affection. But the erle continually remembryng the purpose that xx he was set on, thought to begyn and kindle the fire, of his vngracious conuiracion (whiche so many yeres vexed and vnquieted the realme of Englande) before his departure, wherfore he appoynted his brethren, the Archebishop and the Marques, that they should by some meane in his absence, stirre vp newe commocion or rebellion, in the Countie of Yorke and other places adiacente:so that this ciuill warre should seme too all men, to haue been begon without his assent or knowlege (he beeyng in the partes of beyond the sea.)

The.viii.yere.

xxx When all these thynges were thus determined, and graue counsayll allowed,the erle and the duke sayled directly to Caleis:where thei were solempnely receiued,and ioyously interteined of the Countesse and of her twoo daughters. And after that the duke had swore on the Sacrament to kepe his promyse and pacte inuiolate made and concluded with the erle of Warwycke,he maried the Lady Isabell,eldest daughter to thesayed erle,in our Lady Churche at Caleis, with greate pompe and solempnitie. After whiche mariage so solempnized, the duke and therle consulted sadly together,by what meanes they should continue the warre (which xl as it was by theim appoynted) was recently and within fewe dates begonne in Yorke shire,not without great rumore and disturbaunce,of al quietnes in that countrey. The.viii.yere.

The mother of thys pernicious commocion, was vncharitie, or very impietie, for there was in the citee of Yorke, an olde and riche Hospitall, dedicated to Saincte Leonarde, in the whiche Almosehouse

the poore and indigente people were harbored and refreshed, and the sicke and impotente persones were comforted and healed. For thys good purpose and charitable intent, all the whole Province of Yorke, geue yerely to thys Hospitall certain measures of corne: in maner as an oblacion of the first fruites of their newe grayne, thynkyng their gyfte geuen to so holy a place, for so holy an expence, should bee to theim meritorious, and before God acceptable. Certain euill disposed persones of the erle of Warwickes faccion, intendyng to set a bruill in the countrey, perswaded a great nombre of husbande men, to refuse and deny to geue any thyng to thesaied Hospitall, affirmyng and saiyng: that the corne that was geuen to that good intēt, was not expended on the pore people, but the Master of the Hospitall wexed riche with suche almose and his prestes wexed fat, and the poore people late leane without succour or comfort. And not content with these saiynges, thei fell to dooynges, for when the Proctors of the Hospitall, accordyng to their vsage, went aboute the countrey, to gather the accustomed corne, they wer sore beaten, wounded, and very euil intreated. Good men lamented this vngodly demeanure, and the peruerse people much at it retorsed, and toke suche a courage, that they kept secrete conuenticles, and priuie communicaciōs, in so muche, that within fewe dates, thei had made suche a confederacie together, that thei wer assembled to the nombre of .xv. thoulād men, euen ready prest to set on the citie of Yorke. When the fame of this commocion and great assemble, came to the eares of the citizēs of Yorke they were firste greatly astonied: but leauyng feare aside, they were in a great doubt and vncertaintie, whether it wer best for them to issue out of their walles, and to geue battaill to the rebelles, or to kepe their citie, and repulse the violence of their enemies, by the manfull defendynge of their walles and portes. But the Lorde Marques Montacute, gouernor and presedent of that countrey for the king, did shortly put the citizens out of al feare and suspicion of inuasion, for he takyng spedy coūsaill, and considerynge the opportunitie of the tyme, with a small nombre of menne but well chosen, encountered the rebelles, before the gates of Yorke: where after long conflicte, he toke Robert Hulburne their capitain, and before theim commaunded his hed there to bee striken of, and then he caused all his souldiours (because it was darke, to entre into the citie of Yorke) and after their long labor to refreshe them.

Here is to be maruelled, whi the Marques thus put to death the capitain and ruler of the people, stirred and reised vp by hym, and the fellowes of his conturacion and conspiracie: Some saie he did it to the intent, that he would seme frutles and innocent, of all hys brothers doynges, and priuie imaginations: But other affirme and saye, that he for all his promise made to his brother, was thē deliberatly determined to take parte with kyng Edward, with whom (as it shall after appere) he in small space entered into greate grace and high fauor. The people beyng nothing abashed at the death of their capitain, but rather the more eger.

eger and fierse, by faire meanes and craftie perswasions: found the meanes to get to theim, Henry sonne and heire to the lorde Fitz Hughe, and sir Henry Neuell, sonne and heire of the Lorde Latimer, the one beeyng nephew, and the other cosin germayn to therle of Warwicke. Although that these young gentelmen, bare the names of capitaines, yet they had a tutor & gouernor called sir Jhon Coneyes, a man of liche coutage & valiauntes, as fewe was in his dayes, in the Northe partes. And firste considerying that they could not get Yorke, for want of ordinaunce and artilery, whiche they did lacke in dede, they determined with all spede to marche toward Londō, intending by the waye to reise suche a phantasie in the peoples hartes, ỳ they should thinke that kyng Edward was neither a iust prince to God, nor profitable to the cōmon welth of ỳ realme.

When kynge Edwarde (to whome all the dooynges of the Erle of Warwicke, and the Duke his brother, were manifest and ouerte, and were come to that poynt, that he expected and loked for) was by diuerse letters sent to him, certified that the great armye of the Northren men, wer with all spede commyng toward London. Therefore in greate hast he sent to Wyllyam lorde Herbert, whom, within twoo yeres before, he had created erle of Penbroke, that he should without dealye encountre with the Northren men, with the extremitie of all his power. The erle of Penbroke, commonly called the lorde Herbert, was not a litle toyous of the kynges letters, partly to deserue the kynges liberalitie, whiche of a meane gentelman, had promoted hym to the estate of an erle, partly for the malice that he bare to the erle of Warwicke, beyng the sole obstacle (as he thought) why he obteined not the wardship of the Lorde Bonuiles daughter & heyre, for his eldest sonne. Wherupon he accompaignied with his brother sir Richard Harbert, a valiaunt knight, and aboue.vi. or.vii. thousande Welshemenne well furnished, matched forwarde to encountre with the Northrenmen. And to assiste and furnishe hym with archers, was appoynted Humffray lorde Stafford of Southwike (named, but not created) Erle of Deuonshire, by the kyng, in hope that he valiauntly would serue hym in that iorney, and with hym he had eyght hundred archers. When these twoo Lordes wer met at Cottishold, they made diligent inquiry, to here where the Northren were, and so by their explorators they were asserteined, that they were passing towarde Northampton, wherupon the lorde Stafford, and sir Richard Harbert with twoo thousande wel horsed Welshmen, saied: they would go bewe and se the demeanor and nombre of the Northren men, and so vnder a wooddes side, thei couertly espied thē passe forward, and sodainly set on the rerewarde: but the Northren men wyth suche agilitie so quickly turned aboute, that in a moment of an houre, the Welshemen wer clene discomfited and scatered, and many taken, and the remnaunt returned to the armye with small gayn.

Kyng Edwarde beeyng nothyng abasshed of thys small chaunce, sente good woordes to the Erle of Penbroke, animatyng and

byddyng hym to bee of a good courage, promysyng hym not alonely ayde in shorte tyme, but also he hymself in persone royall, would folowe hym with all hys puyssaunce and power. The Yorke shire menne, beyng glad of hys small victory were well cooled and went no farther Southward, but toke their waye toward Warwicke lokyng for aide of therle, whiche was lately come from Caleys, with the Duke of Clarẽce his sonne in lawe, and was gatherynge and reysyng of men, to succor his frendes and kynsfolke. The kyng lykewyse assembled people on euery side, to aide and assist therle of Penbroke and his compaygnie. But before or any part receiued comfort or succor, from his frend or partaker, bothe the armyes met by chaunce, in a fayre playn, nere to a toune called Banbery feld Hedgecot, three myle from Banbery, wherin be three hilles, not in equall distaunce, nor yet in equall quantitie, but lyyng in maner although not fully triangle: the Welshemen gat firste the West hill, hoppyng to haue recouered the East hyl: whiche if thei had obteined, the victory had been theirs, as their vnwyse Prophesiers promised thẽ before. The Northren men incamped themself on the Southe hill. The erle of Penbroke and the lorde Stafford of Southwike, wer lodged at Banbery the daie before the feld, whiche was sainct James daye, and there the erle of Penbroke, putte the Lorde Staffordе out of an Inne, wherein he delighted muche to be, for the loue of a damosell that dwelled in the house: contrary to their mutuall agrement by them taken, whiche was that whosoeuer obteined first a lodgyng, should not be deceyued nor remoued. After many greate woordes and crakes, had betwene these twoo capitaynes, the lorde Stafford of Southwyke, in greate dispite departed with hys whole compaignie and band of Archers, leauyng the erle of Pembroke almoste desolate in the toune, whiche, with all diligence returned to his host, lyyng in the feld vnpurueied of Archers, abidyng suche fortune as God would sende and prouyde. Syr Henry Neuell sonne to the Lorde Latimer, tooke with hym certayn light horssemen, and skirmished with the Welshemen in the euenyng, euen before their Campe, where he did diuerse valiaunt feates of armes, but a lytle to hardy, he went so farre forward that he was taken and yelded, and yet cruelly slayn: whiche vnmercifull acte, the Welshemen sore rued the next daye or nyght. For the Northrenmen beyng inflamed, & not a litle discontented, with the death of this noble man, in the mornyng valiauntly set on the Welshemenne, and by force of archers, caused theim quyckely to descende the hyll into the valey, where bothe the hostes fought. Therle of Penbroke behaued hymself lyke a hardy knight, and expert capitain, but his brother sir Richarde Herbert so valiauntly acquited hymself, that with his Polleare in his hand (as his enemies did afterward reporte) he twise by fine force passed through the battaill of his aduersaries, and without any mortall wounde returned. If euery one of hys felowes and compaignions in armes, had doen but halfe thactes, whiche he that daye by his noble prowes acheued, the Northrẽmen had obteyned neither sauetie nor victory.

Besides this, beholde the mutabiltie of foztune, when the Welshmen were at the very poynt to haue obteyned the victozy (the Nozthernmen beyng in manner (discõfited) Jhon Clappam Esquire, seruaunte to the Erle of Warwicke, moũted vp ẏ side of the East hyl, accompanied onely with. CCCCC. men gathered of all the Rascall of the towne of Nozthampton, and other Villages about, hauing bozne befoze theym the standard of the Erle, with the white Beare, Cryenge a Warwicke a Warwycke. The Welshmen thinkyng that the Erle of Warwicke had come on theim with all hys puyssaunce, sodaynlye as men amased fledde: the Nozthernmẽ, them pursued and slewe without mercy, foz the cruelty that they had shewed to the lozd Latimers Sonne. So that the Welshemen there wer slayn aboue. v. M. besyde them that were fled and taken

The erle of Penbzoke, syz Richard Herbert his bzother, and diuerse Gentelmen were taken, and bzought to Banbery to be Behedded, muche lamentacion and no lesse entreaty was made to saue the life of Syz Rychard Herbert bothe foz his goodely Personage, whiche excelled all men there, and also foz the noble Chiealry, that he had shewed in the Felde the day of the Battayll, in so muche that his Bzother the Erle, when he should lay doune his hedde on the Block to suffer, said to syz Jhon Conyers and Clappam, Masters let me dye foz I am Olde, but saue my bzother which is yonge, Lusty and Hardy, Wete and Apte to serue the greatest pzince of Chzistendoume. But syz Jhon Conyers and Clappam, remembzyng the death of the yong knight Syz Henry Neuel, Colyn to the erle of Warwicke, coulde not here on that side, but caused the Erle of hys bzother with diuerse other Gentelmen to the number of. x. to be there behedded. The Nozthamptonshzire men, with diuers of the Nozthernmẽ by them pzocured, in this fury made theim a Capitayne, and called hym Robyn of Riddesdale, and sodaynly came to the Banner of Grafton, where the erle Riuers, Father to the Quene then lay, whome they loued not, and there by fozce toke the sayde erle and syz Jhon his Sonne, and bzoughte them to Nozthampton, and there without Judgemente strake of their heddes, whose Bodyes were Solemply enterred in the Blackefreers at Nozthampton. When kynge Edward was aduertised of these vnfoztunate chaunces, he wzote in all hast to the Shziefes of Somerset shyze and Deuonshyze, that if they coulde by any meane take the Lozde Staffozd of Southwyke, that they vpon payne of their lyues, shoulde without delay put hym in execution, whiche accozdyngly to the Kynges Commaundement after longe Explozacion made, founde hym hyd in a village in Bzentmarche, called, wher he was taken and bzought to Bzidgewater, and there cut shozter by the hed. Thys was the Ozder, manner and end of Hegecot felde, comonly called Banbery felde, foughten the Mozow after Saincte James day, in the viij. yeare of kynge Edwarde the fourth, ẏ which battayle euer synce hath bene, and yet is a cõtinuall grudge betwene the Nozthernmen and the Welshemen. After thys Battayle Nozthernmen resozted towarde Warwicke, where the erle had gathered a greate multitude of people, whiche erle gaue hyghe commendacions to sir Jhon Conyers and other capitaynes of ỹ North. much reioysyng, that they had obteyned so glorions victory, requiryng theim to continew as they had begon. The king likewise sore thrusting to recouer his losse late sustayned, and desirous to be reuenged of the deathes and murders of hys Lordes and frēdes, marched toward Warwycke with a greate Armye, and euer as he wente forwarde, hys company increased, because he commaunded it to be noysed and publysshed to the common people, that hys onely entent was to destroy, and vtterly to confounde the vnhappy stocke and yll grafted generacion, of suche pernicious persons, as would disturbe and bring in thraldome, ỹ quiet commons and peaceable people. The erle of Warwycke had by his espyalles perfyt knowledge how the kyng with his army was bent toward him, and sent in all hast possible to the duke of Clarence (which was not far from him with a greate powre) requiryng him that both their hostes myghte ioyne in one for as farre as he couide imagyne, the tyme of battayle was very nere. The duke hearynge these newes, in good ordre of battayle, came and encamped him selfe with the Erles host. When all thynges were redy prepared to fight: by the meanes of frendes, a meane was founde how to common of peace, for the whiche, letters were writtē frō from eche parte to other, declaryng their griefes and the very bottomes of their Stomakes: Heraldes spared no Horsefleish in rydyng betwene the kyng and the erle, nor in returnyng from the Erle to the kynge: the kyng conceiuing a certayn hope of Peace in hys awn imaginacion, toke bothe lesse hede to hym selfe and also no lesse fered the outward attemptes of his enemies, thynkynge and trustynge truelye that all thynges were at a god poynte, and shoulde be well pacified. All the kynges doynges were by espyals declared to the Erle of Warwicke, which like a wyse and politique Capitayne entendyng not to lese so greate an auantage to hym geuen, but trustyng to bringe all his purposes to a fynall ende and determinacion, by onely obteyning this enterprise: in the dead of the nyght, with an electe company of men of warre, as secretly as was possible set on the kynges felde, kyllyng them that kept the watche, and or the kyng were wate (for he thought of nothyng lesse then of that chaunce that happened) at a place called Wolney. iiij. mile from Warwycke, he was taken prisoner, and brought to the Castell of Warwicke. And to the entent that the kynges frendes myght not knowe where he was, nor what was chaunced of hym, he caused hym by secrete iourneys in the nyght to be conueyed to Middelham Castell in Yorkeshire, and there to be kept, vnder the custody of the Archebishop of Yorke hys brother, and other his trusty frendes, whiche entertayned the kyng, like his estate and serued him lyke a Prince. But there was no place so farre of but the takyng of the kyng was shortely knowen there, with the wunde whiche newes made many men to feare, and greatly to dread, and many to wonder, and lament the chaūce. Kyng Edward beyng thus in captiuitie, uttie, spake euer fayre to the Archebishop and to the other keepers, (but whether he corrupted them with money or fayre promises) he had libertie diuers dayes to go on huntinge, and one day on a playne there mett with hym syr William Stanley, syr Thomas of Borogh, and dyuers other of hys frēdes, with such a greate bende of men, that neither his keepers would, nor once durst moue him to retorne to prison agayn. Kyng Edward escaped out de prison.

Thus as you haue harde was kyng Edward deliuered: Some saye that he was set at large by the erles consent and commaundemente, as who sayd, I had hym in my kepyng, and myght haue destroyed hym, I had hym in captiuitie, and so might haue deteyned him, but yet of myne awne fre will and gētelnes, without pact or raunsom I am contēted to set him at libertie & to deliuer him. This doing myght seeme to be some countenaunce of treuth, if the Erle after this had desisted from persecutyng the warre by hym newly begonne: But for a trueth this good chaunce happed to kynge Edward, by the yll luck of kynge Henry, for surely by this yll fortune a man may plainly cōiecture, that the extreme poynt of decay of his house and Estate was apparauntly at hande, considerynge that neither by mannes pollecie, nor by worldly riches his vnhappy predestinate chaunce coulde not by any pollecy be put by, nor by any instrument scraped away (wel suche was Gods pleasure) for if you consider how that the erle of Warwycke and his frendes, only to thentent to ayde, conserue and defende kynge Henry the. vj. haue dispended their substances, aduentured their liues, and taken paynes intollerable, hauyng a sure determinacion, fixed in their mindes, that as long as kyng Edward lued, that kyng Henryes faction should neuer prosper & yet when he was by the Erle taken prisoner, & in captiuitie, he by fortune escaped, or was wilfully deliuered. By thys you may playnly perceyue that the lucke of kyng Henry was vnfortunate, and that all that was done for hym, and in his querell, euer redounded to his misfortune and detriment, euer notyng this, that when thynges contriued & Imagened come to an vnlucky successe, all the senses of our bodies be then by anger, feare or madnes, vanished, and in maner distracte from themselues. But to come to the purpose, when kyng Edward had escaped the handes of his enemies, he went strayghte to Yorke, where he was with greate honor receiued of thee Citizens, and there taried two daies to prepare some small army to accompany hym in his iorney, but when he perceyued that he could haue no hoste mete and conuenient to passe to London, thorough the middes of his enemies (as he was appoynted to do) he turned from Yorke to Lancaster, where he founde the lord Hastynges hys Chamberlayne, well accompanyed. He then wyth the ayde of the lord Hastynges, and suche other as drew to hym, beyng well furnished with spedy iorneys, came safe to his citie of London.

When the erle of Warwike & the duke of Clarēce, had knowlege how the kyng by treason of them y they put in trust, was escaped their handes, & that in one moment of tyme, all their long studyes and forcastes were brought to none effect or conclusion, they were angrye, & chafed without measure, & by and by callynge together al their chief frendes, began to consult agayn, of new, & to enquire the estate of their enemies, to the entent that they myght make a begynning of a new warre, which they coiectured to haue taken an ende when the kyng was broughte in to captiuitie. The mindes of these Princes were much satisfied, & their corage greatly kindeled, by reason that a great numbre of men hauing more pleasure in discorde then in concorde, louing better strife then vnitie, offered them selfes to beginne newe warre of their awne desire & request. Kyng Edward toke euen like study for the warres as hys ennemyes dyd, mynding either to bring them to conformitie or reason, by dent of sworde, or els by powre of battayle vtterly to destroye & extirpate them and their affinitie, to the entent ỹ all men might lede a more quiet life, & liue in more securitie & rest: for by the seditious rebellynge of these persons, the state of the Realme was brought to greate misery, for Churches and Temples were euery where robbed & spoyled, houses burnte, and men slayne in euery place, all the Realme was replenished with bloud, slaughter, sorow & lamentacion, Cornefeldes wer destroied Cities and Townes were made desolate and languished with famyn & dearthe, besyde many other thinges, which happen by the crueltye and fury of warre and rebellyon. This tumult and trouble in thee common wealth of this Realme sore vexed and troubled many, but in especiall ỹ nobilitie muche lamented and pitied the state of the commonalty which with all diligence rode betwene the Kyng, the Erle and the Duke to reconsile them eche to other, & to cõclude a perfect peace & amitie, requiring them rather more to remẽbre the benefites, that euery of them haue receiued of other, then to set forthe thee vngratitude or iniury, whiche one hath done to the other, which is rather the occasion of discord, then the meane to come to amitie. Further they exhorted theym rather to deserue the loue of all men, by kepyng of peace & vnitie, then by fightinge and intestine warre to destroy the Realme, and wynne the hatred & malice of al the nacion: for as he is vnkynde and vnnaturall, that will not cherishe his naturall parentes and procreators, much more vnnaturall and wicked are they, which will suffer their natiue coũtrey, beyng theyr common father and mother, by their contencion & stryfe to be brought to decay and vtter perdycion. The auctoritie first of the nobilitie of the Realme, and secondarily their charitable mocion, so mitigated the myndes bothe of the Kyng the Duke and the erle, that eche gaue fayth to other to go and come, sauely without ieopardy. In which promise the Duke and erle, hauing perfight trust and cõfidẽce, came both to London, accompanied with to small a numbre of men, in comparison to the great dangier that they were in. And at Westminster, the kyng, the Duke and the Erle had a longe communication together, for some end to be taken or made betwene them: But they fell at such greate wordes with such exprobracions, and openyng: either of olde benefites shewed or of

oz of olde ingratitudes receyued, that in a great furye, without any cō-clusion they departed, the kyng to Canterbury, and the Duke and the Erle to Warwycke, where the Erle of Warwycke prepared a new hoste to ryse in Lyncolnshire, and made there of captayne syr Robert Welles, sonne to Rychard lozd Welles, an experte man in armes, and very pollitique in warre.

These newes sodaynly brought to the kyng, did not a litell vexe and tykil hym, because he euer feruently hoped, that his aduersaries wolde rather come to some honest condicios of cōcozd, then so temerariously x and so sodaynly renouate the warre. And the moze rumoz ỹ was spzede (contrary to his expectacion) of this new begonne battall, the soner he gathered together an host foz the resistence of thesame, and out of hand he sent to Richard lozd Welles, willing hym vpon the sighte of his letters with all hast to repayze vnto him, whiche oftentymes he had excused by sicknes and debilitie of his bodie. But when that excuse serued not, hee thinking to purge hym selfe sufficiently before the kynges pzesence, toke with him syz Thomas Dymocke, whiche had maried his syster, and so together came to Londō. When he was come vp, his frēdes certified hym that the kynge was with hym not a lytell displeased, but xx highly discontented. Wherefoze foz verye feare, he with his brother in law toke the Sentuary at Westminster, entendynge there to abyde tyll the pzinces Ire were somwhat asswaged and mitigate. King Edwarde which thought to pacifie all thys busy tumulte, without anye farther bloudshed, pzomisyng both those persons their pardons, caused theim vppon his pzomise to come out of Sentuary to hys presence, and cal-lynge to hym the lozde Welles, willed hym to wzite to syz Robert his sonne to leaue of the warre, and not to take the Erles parte. And in the meane season, he with hys armye went fozward towarde his enemyes, hauyng with hym the lozde Welles, and Syz Thomas Dymocke, and xxx beyng not past two dayes iozney from Stafforde where hys enemyes, Hamp. ford had pitched their felde, had perfyght knowlege that syz Robert Welles nothyng moued with hys fathers letters, styl kept hys campe, abydyng the kyng with his power. The kyng hauyng hygh indignacion at hys presumpcion and mynded to be reuenged in parte, cōtrary to hys faith and pzomise caused the lozd Welles father to the saide syz Robert, and syz Thomas Dymocke to be behedded there, to the terrible example of other, which shall put their confidence in the pzomise of a pzince. Whe syz Robert Welles hard that the kyng drew nere, and that his father x xl syz Thomas Dymocke ware behedded, he stode firste in a greate perplexitie, studieng whether he shoulde geue battayl oz no, because it was both perilous and doughtfull to fyght with so great an armye, before the erle of Warwicke with hys power were assembled, but yet hauynge a yonge and a lustye courage, and with manly boldnes stimulate, and pzicked fozward, he set on hys enemies.

The battayle was soze fought on bothe partes, & many a man slayne

And in conclusion, whyle Syr Robert was exhortyng and prouokyng hys men to tary, which were in manet discomfit, and redy to flye, he was enuironned and beset aboute with his enemies, and so was taken, and with hym syr Thomas Delaund knyght and many mo. After hys takyng, the Lincolnshyre men amased, threw away their coates, the lyghter to runne away, and fled, and therfore thys battayl is yet there called Lofecote felde. The kyng glad of this victory, commaunded out of hand syr Robert Welles and diuers other, to be put to execution in the same place. The same was, that at thys battayll were slayne. x. M. men at the least.

The erle of Warwicke lay att this time at his Castell of Warwicke, and was commynge with a houge host the next day towarde hys army in Lyncolneshyre, but when he hearde saye that they had foughte soner then he thought either they could or woulde, and that hys partye was ouerthrowen and vanquished: Although he might now be discouraged, yet he thought it necessary to dissimule the cace, because often tymes in battayles, vain thinges be regarded before trew, and to thentent to confort certayne of his company (beyng in dispayre and redy to flye) both in woorde and dede, he conscribed and prepared a newe host, and with all the studye and industrye, that he could practyse or vse, he imagened how to compasse Thomas lord Stanley, which had maried hys syster, that he might be one of the confederacy and conturacion: whyche thynge when he coulde not bryng to passe, for the lord Stanley hadde aunswered hym plainly, that he would neuer make warre against king Edwarde, he thought to spende no lenger tyme in waste, and mistrustyng that he was not able to mete with hys enemyes, he with the Duke of Clarence hys Sonne in lawe, departed to Excester, and ther taryeng a few dayes, and perceiuinge that all thynges lacked, whiche were apt and necessary for the warre, determined to sayle to kyng Loys the French kyng, to renew the familier acquaintaunce, which he had wyth him when he was there of Ambassade, for the mariage of kyng Edward as you haue hard, hauing a sure cõfidẽce & hope, either to haue a greate aide of the French king, or els to incence him ernestly to make battail against king Edward. And restyng vpon this opinion, thei hyred shippes at Dartmouth in Deuonshyre, well armed, and at al poyntes trymmed and decked. And when the wynde and wether serued theym, the duke and the Erle with their Wiues, and a great number of Seruauntes, plucked vp the Sayles, and toke their way fyrst toward Caleys, wher the erle of warwicke was chefe capitayn, and thought there to haue left hys wyfe and doughters, tyll he had returned out of Fraunce.

WHen the erle of Warwicke thus fled out of England, the yere of our Lorde was iust. 1470. and the yere of kyng Edwardes reigne was then. 9. This sodain departynge of kyng Edwardes aduersaries, did not onely vexe and bite hym at the very stomacke, but also did stimulat and quicken hym to loke the more diligently to his affaires, and busines, and especially, because that the absence of ỹ erle of Warwicke, made the common people daily more and more, to long and bee desirous to haue the sight of him, & presently to beholde his personage. For they iudged that the Sunne was clerely taken from the worlde, when he was absent. In such high estimacion emongest the people, was his name, that neither no one manne, thei had in so muche honor, neither no one persone, thei somuche praysed, or to the cloudes so highly extolled. What shall I sate? his onely name sounded, in euery song, in the mouthe of the common people, and his persone was represented with greate reuerence, when publique Plaies, or open triumphes should be shewed, or set furthe abrode in the stretes: which hartie sauor, was the apparaunt occasion why his faction and compaignie, within a fewe dayes, merueilously increased and augmented. For the which cause, the kyng was vexed with a doble mischiefe, for he doubted muche, whome he should moste feare of twoo, either the familier enemies abydyng at home, or the extrauagant fooes, lyngeryng beyond the sea: But thiefly he prouided, but very slackly, to withstande the erle of Warwickes landyng. And first he wrote to Charles duke of Burgoin, whiche had maried the lady Margaret his suster, to helpe that therle nor his compaignie, should haue neither ayde nor refuge, in any part of his, nor his frẽdes territories or dominions. These tidynges wer ioyfull to the duke of Burgoyne, as to hym whiche (accordyng to the olde prouerbe) hated the erle of Warwicke, worse then the curre dogge, or serpent: partly, because he was the ouerthrower and confounder, of the house of Lancastre, of the which, the erle was lineally descended, by the Duches his mother, partly because therle had suche high offices, and was so renoumed in Englande, that king Edward the Dukes brother in lawe, might not do liberally all thinges in his realme, as he hym selfe would (which the duke esteemed to be a greate bondage.) And partely, because therle withstoode with all his power and might, the conclusion of the mariage betwene the kynges suster and thesaid duke. But the chief rancor was because the erle of Warwicke, fauored the Frenche kyng, whom the duke loued not, for at hys laste beeyng in Fraunce, he promised the Frenche kyng, to be frende to his frendes, and vtter enemye to his fooes and aduersaries. This roted hatered, and cankarde malice, whiche the Duke bare to the Erle, caused him to attempte mo displeasures, and to inuent mo mischiefes agaynst therle, then eyther kyng Edward could imagin, or was of the Duke required, as you shall playnly perceiue, by the sequele of this Historie.

Now let vs speake of the erle of warwickes doynges, whiche muste nedes play a pagiaunt in this enterlude, or els the plaie were at apoint. Therle as you haue hard before, sailed from Dartmouth towarde Caleis, where he was capitain generall, and with a prosperous wind came before the toune, in whiche fortresse was deputye for the erle the Lorde Uawclere a Gascoyne, besyde dyuers of therle of Warwickes seruaun-tes, which bare great offices and aucthorities in the toune. This Uaw-clere, whether he dyd it by dissimulacion, or bearyng his good mynde to kyng Edward (as by the sequele hereof, I doubt whether he dyd or no) In stede of receiuing of his master with triumphe, he bent and discharged against hym, diuerse peces of ordenaunce, sendyng him worde that he should there take no land. This naule lieng thus before Caleis ar-ryued, the duches of Clarence, was there deliuered of a fayre sonne whi-che chyld, therles deputie vnneth would suffre to be chrystened within the toune, nor without great intreaty, would permitt twoo flagons of wine to be conueighed aborde, to the ladies lyeng in the Hauen. This was a greate rigor and extremitie, for the seruaunt to vse agaynst the Master or the inferior to vse against the superior, wherefore the erle hoped and nothyng lesse mistrusted, then to be assured and purueyed in that place, whiche is the greatest treasure, that belongeth to England, and the fai-rest capitainship of the worlde, at the least in Christendom. But he was fain to kepe the seas, without comfort or aide, of any of his seruauntes. The kyng of Englande was quickly aduertised, of the refusall that Mõsire de Uauclere, made to hys capitain therle of Warwicke, whiche manfull doyng somuche pleased the kyng that incõtment he made hym chief capitayn of the toune of Calcis, by his letters patentes, whiche he sent to him out of hand, and therof discharged clerely therle, as a traitor and a rebell. Duke Charles of Burgoyne, lyng at sent Homers (which would nedes haue an owet, in the erle of Warwickes boate) beyng ad-uertised also, of Monsire de Uaucleres refusall made of his Master, sent to hym hys trusty seruaunt, Philip de Commines (whiche wrote all these doynges in a Chronicle) and gaue to hym yerely a thousand crou-nes in pencion, (a small reward God wotte, for so highe a seruice, as bu-truly to kepe his Master from his office) prayng and requiryng hym, to continew in truth and fidelitie toward kyng Edward, as he had shew-wed and begonne. The messenger founde hym so towarde and of suche confornitie, that he was content to swere in hys presence, truly to take kyng Edwardes part against all men, and onely to hys vse to kepe and defende the strong toune of Calice. But thesayed Philip de Commines sore mistrusted Monsire de Uauclere, because he sent worde to the erle of Warwyck priuily, lyeng at Whitsandbay, that if he landed he should be taken and lost: for al England (as he said) toke parte agaynst hym & duke of Burgoyn and al thinhabitantes of the toune, wer his enemies, the Lorde Duras the kynges Marshall, and all the retinue of the gar-rison wer his aduersaries: so that for a final conclusion, his onely saue-

garde and comforte, were to withdrawe hym and his compaignye into Fraunce, where he knewe he should bee highly receiued & better welcomed, & as for the toune of Calice, he should take no thought for the said Monsire de Vaudere, promised thereof to make hym a good recompyng, when tyme and opportunitie should serue. This counsaill was profitable to the Erle of Warwicke, but not to the kyng of England, and lesse pleasant to the duke of Burgoin: which princes might very well think, bothe the office of the Capitaynship of Calice, and the pēcion of the. M. crounes (if it wer paied) on such a depe dissimuler, to be euil employed.

x The Erle of Warwicke, as he was both before his departure out of England determined, and also nowe by Monsire de Vaudere, newly counsailed and aduised, with his naupe sailed toward Normandy, and in the meane way, robbed, spoyled, and tooke many riche shippes, of the Duke of Burgoyns countreys (whiche sore netteled the duke, and caused hym to prepare a strong and a greate armye on the sea, to take therle prisoner, as he returned homeward) & at the last with all his naute and spoyle, he toke lande at Depe in Normandy, where the gouernor of the countrey for the Frenche kyng, frendely welcomed hym, and louinglye hym entertained, certifieng king Lewes of his landing and arriuall.

xx Kynge Lewes a greate season before, had so muche marueiled at the publique fame and common renoune, of the noble actes and hygh prowes of the Erle of Warwicke, that hee thoughte nothynge myghte more pleasauntly happe, or chaunce toward hym, then to haue a cause or occasion to him ministred, whereby he myght do the Erle some profite or pleasure. Which long lust accordyng to his desire, was now likely to take effecte, to his contentacion, and therles great commodity: wherfore beyng ioyous of his landyng in Fraunce, he sent vnto him certain princes which declared to hym on the kynges behalf, that as the kyng had long time sought waies and meanes, how to do him pleasure, aid & comfort: So seyng that now the tyme was come, that the Erle had necessitie of al those thinges, he assured him that he would neither forget him, nor yet desist to do for him any thing, which might be cōsonāt to his louing request, or frendely desire: requiring him with the duke his sonne in law to take pein to come to his castle of Amboys, set on the riuer of Leire: affirming that thei should neither lose their labor, nor think their iorney to haue euil successe in the conclusion.

xxi Whē duke Charles knew that therle was landed in Normandie, he sent in al hast a poste to king Lewes, with whom he was then ioyned in a league, requiringe him neither to help with men nor money, the erle of Warwike, nor the duke of Clarence, open enemies to king Edward, his felow, frend, and brother in law, & his perpetual alie & trusty cōfederate, adding therto sharp wordes and minatory saienges, if he would in any case be to them a refuge or succor

The Frenche king did not onely contempne his proude wordes, and laughed at his manacyng and bolde braggyng, but soberly answered, that that without enfringyng of any league or treatye, he lawfully might & would helpe his frendes, and mespeciall suche, whiche by their desertes, be aboue other renoumed and extolled: Of whiche nombre, he affirmed therle of Warwicke to be one, whiche thyng if he dyd, he sayd: it should be neither cost, charge, nor burthen to the Duke of one blancke, nor put hym to the pein of a moment of an houre. When the duke had certified the kyng of Englande of thys answer, he was sodainly in a doumpe, and began seriously to immagine, who were his frendes, and who were his foes, and apprehended some, whom he thought gilty, & began with them to question, who were frendes to his enemies: and of their coniuracion, & (which was ỹ occasion that many fearing themselues went vnto Sanctuary) and many trustyng to the kynges pardon, submitted and yelded theimselfe to the kynges clemencye, Emongest whome, Jhon Marques Montacute, humbly yelded hymself, and vowed to bee euer true to thee kyng (as he had doen before tyme) whom he with muche humanitie and faire wordes, did receiue and intertaine, to thentent to flecte and allure the hartes of other men, to ioyne and knit with him, agaynst all hostilitie and vtter enemies

While these thynges were thus treated in Englande, therle of Warwicke and the Duke of Clarence, rode with greate pompe toward Amboyse, where the Frenche kyng laie, and by the way the people gathered and in greate nombre flocked, to se and beholde with their eyes, the person and visage of hym, of whose valiaunt actes and wonderfull dooynges, their eares haue many tymes been fulfilled and replenished, Whē he came to the kynges presence, he was with all kyndes of curtesie and humanitie receiued and welcomed: To whome by long tracte of tyme, he declared the causes & considerations, of his comming into Fraunce. Kyng Lewes aswell hauyng nowe delectacion, with the presence of hys frende as he was accustomed to reioyse and be ioyous, when he harde either laude or prayse of him in his absence: promised him his power, his riches, and al thynges that he might or could do, to helpe him in his trouble, and to refreshe him in his aduersitie.

When Quene Margarete, whiche soiorned with Duke Reyner her father, called kyng of Scicile. &c. Harde tell that the erle of Warwicke and the Duke of Clarence, had abandoned Englande, and wer come to the Frenche Courte: hopyng of new comfort, with all diligence came to Amboyse, with her onely son Prince Edward. And with her came Jasper erle of Penbroke, and Jhon erle of Oxenford, whiche after diuerse long imprisonmētes lately escaped, fled out of Englande into Fraunce and came by fortune to this assemble. After that, thei had long cōmoned & and debated diuerse matters, concernyng their surety and wealthe, they determined by meane of the Frenche kyng, to conclude a league and a treaty betwene them: And first to begin with all, for the more sure foundacion of the newe amitie, Edwarde Prince of Wales, wedded Anne second daughter to therle of Warwicke, which Lady came with her mother into Fraunce. This Mariage semed very straunge to wise men, consideryng that, that the erle of Warwicke, had first dilherited the father, and then to cause his sonne, to mary with one of his daughters, whose suster the duke of Clarence before had maried, whiche was euer extreme enemye to the house of Lancastér: wher vppon they diuined that the mariage of the Prince, should euer be a blott in the Dukes eye, or the mariage of the Duke, a mote in the eye of the Prince, eche of them lokyng to be exalted when therle on hym smiled: and eche of them agayn thinkyng to be ouerthrowen, when the erle of hym lowred. After this mariage, the x duke and therles toke a solempne othe, that they should neuer leaue the warre, vntyll suche tyme as kyng Henry the sixt, or the prince his sonne, were restored to the full possession and Diademe of the realme: and that the Quene and the Prince, should depute and appointe the Duke and the erle to be gouernours, and conseruators, of the publique wealth, till suche tyme as the Prince were come to mannes estate, and of habilitie meete and conuenient, to take vpon hym so high a charge, and so greate a burden. Ther wer many other condicions concluded, which booth reason, and the weightines of so great a busines, required to be set forward.

While these Lordes were thus in the Frenche Courte, there landed at xx Caleys a damosell, belongyng to the Duches of Clarence (as she saied) which made Monsire de Vawclere beleue, that she was sent from kyng Edward to the erle of Warwicke, with a playn ouerture and declaratiō of peace. Of the which tidynges, Vawclere was very glad for the Erles sake, whom he thought (by thys peace) to be restored to all his olde possessions, tomes and dignities. But he was sore by this damosel deceiued for her message (as it after proued) was the begynnyng of the erles confusion. For she perswaded the Duke of Clarence, that it was neither naturall, nor honorable to hym, either to condiscende or take parte, against the house of Yorke (of which he was lineally descended) and to set vp a-xx gain the house of Lancaster, whiche lignage of the house of Yorke, was not only by the whole Parliament of the realme, declared to be the very and indubitate heires of the Kyngdome: but also Kyng Henry the sixte and his bloude affirmed the same and there vpon made a Compolicion, whiche of record appereth. Furthermore she declared, that the mariage with therles daughter with Prince Edward, was for none other cause, but to make the Prince kyng, and clerely to extinguisshe all the house of Yorke, of whome the duke hymself was one, and next heire to the croune, after his eldest brother and his children. These reasons, and the mariage of the Prince to the Erles daughter, so sancke in the Dukes sto-xl macke that he promised at his returne, not to be so an extreme enemie to his brother, as he was taken for, whiche promise afterwarde, he did not forget. With this answere the damosell departed into Englande, therle of Warwicke therof being clerely ignorannt.

When the League was concluded (as before you haue heard) the Frenche kyng lent them shippes, money, and men, and that they might

the surer saile into Englande, he appoincted the Bastard of Burgoyn, Admirall of Fraunce with a greate Naule, to defende theim against the armie of the Duke of Burgoyn, which was stronger then bothe the Frenche kynges nauy, or the Englishe flete. Kyng Reyner also did helpe his daughter to his smal powre, with men and munitions of warre. When this army (whiche was not small) was conscribed and come together to Harflete, at the mouth of the riuer of Seyne, expectyng Winde and wether. The Erle of warwicke receiued letters out of Englande, that men so muche daily and hourely, desired and wished so sore his arriuall and returne, that almost all menne were in harneys, loking for his landyng: wherefore he was required to make hast, yea, hast, more then hast, although he brought no succor with him. For he was farther assured, that assone as he had once taken lande, there shoulde mete hym many thousandes, (as after it proued in deede) to do hym what seruice or pleasure thei could or might: al this was the offer of the common people. Beside this diuerse noble men wrote, to help hym with mē, harneis, money and all thynges necessary for the warre: beside their awne persones, whom thei promised to aduenture in his querell. When therle had receiued these Letters, he not a litle regardyng suche an Offer, and so many greate Benefites to hym euen at hande apparauntly proffered, fully determined with the Duke, and the Erles of Oxenford and Penbroke (because Quene Margaret and her sonne, were not fully yet furnished for suche a iorney) to go before with parte of the naule, and part of tharmye, and to attempt the firste brunte of fortune and chaunce, whiche if it well succeded, then should Quene Margarete and her Sonne, with the residue of the Naule and people follow into Englande. The Erle of Warwick thinking this weighty matter, not worthy to be lingered, but to be accelerate wt al diligence possible, takyng his leue of the Frenche kynge Lewes, geuing him no smal thākes, both on the behalfe of king Henry & also for his awn part, and so being dismissed, came where his nauy lay at Anker, commaunding his men to go on ship bord, mynding to take his course toward england.

The duke of Burgoin which was not content that therle of Warwick and his company, was succored and ayded of the French kyng agaynst his brother in lawe kyng Edward of England, to withstand that army, and to take therle of Warwicke prisoner, if it were possible. He prepared suche a greate Nauy, as lightely hath not bene sene before, gathered in maner of all naciōs, whiche army lay at the mouth of Seyne, ready to fighte with the Erle of Warwicke, when he shoulde set out of his hauen.

Se the worke of God, thesame nighte, before therle departed, ther rose such a sodain winde and a terrible tempest, that the dukes shippes were scatered one from an other, some drowned, som wether driuen into Scotland, so that twoo of them wer not in compaigny together, in one place. In the Morning next folowing, the Wether waxed faire, and the Winde prosperous prosperous,wherbpō in hope of a bone voiage, the erle and his company halsed vp their sayles ,and wyth good spede landed at Dartmouth in Deuonshire,from whiche place he passed into Fraūce,almost the.vi. moneth,last passed.

Before this tyme the duke of Burgoyne Charles,which more hated the Erle of Warwycke,and enuied his prosperitie,then he loued kinge Edward,sauyng for his ayde ẏ he trusted of in time of necessitie,wrote to kynge Edwarde , bothe of the doynges of the erle of Warwycke in Fraunce,and of hys armye and power, and also certefyed hym by hys x trusty seruaūtes of the place, where the erle purposed with all his people to take lande, kynge Edward passed litle on the matter , trustynge to much to the mouable comunons of his Realme,and wythout any army layd,eyther to kepe the Erle from landinge,either to encountre wᵭ hym at the first arryuall,to the entēt that hys frendes should not draw in hepes to him for his strength,left al purueiance for defence alone, & rode on huntyng,haukyng and vsyng all maner of pastimes,wyth La-dyes and Damosels,for hys dispoyt and solace that could be imagened or inuented. When the Erle of Warwycke had taken lande, he made a Proclamacion in the name of kynge Henry the sixt vpō hygh paynes xx commmaundyng and chargyng al men apt,or able to beare armour,to prepare thē selfs to fyght against Edwarde duke of Yorke,which contrary to al ryght, Justice and law,had vntruely vsurped the Croune & Imperial dignitie of this realm. It is almost vncredible to thinke how sone the fame of the Erles landyng was blowen ouer, thorowe all the whole realme,and how many thousand men of warre, at the very first tidinges of hys landing,were sodainly assembled and set forwarde to welcome him. When he was thus,accordyng to his desire, fully furnished on euery syde wyth his kinred & frendes, he toke his way toward London,where he iudged and faythfully beleued, to fynde more open xxx frendes then priuie enemies,or cancard hartes.

When kyng Edward knew of the Erles landynge,and of the great repayre of people , that to him incessantly without intermission dyd re-sorte,he then began to thinke on his busynes,and studied how to fynde a remedy for a mischief, (but this was to late) And first he wrote to the Duke of Burgoyne , requiringe hym to haue a vigylant eye to the sea, and so to se the stremes kept and scoured with his nauie, that the Erle neither should nor might returne againe into Fraunce,yf he shoulde be agayne propulsed out of the Realme . And as for the doynges in Eng-lande he bad let hym alone , for he was bothe of puissaunce and abilitie, xl sufficient to ouercome,and defend al his enemies and rebelles, within hys own Realme and countrey. This saiyng littel or nothing pleased the duke of Burgoyns messengers , for they thought that it had bene muche more profitable to kyng Edward,to haue circumspectly forsene afore,and prouyded to stoppe hys landyng,then now sodainly to abide the fortune of battayll,which is euer dubious and vncertayne . Kynge

Edward accõpanied with the duke of Glocester his brother & the lord Hastynges his Chamberleyn, which had maried the Erles sister, & yet was euer true to the kynge his maister, and the lord Scales brother to the Quene, sent out curriers to al his trustie frendes, for the furniture of able persones, mete for the warre, and conuenyent for the defence of hys owne royal person, entendinge yf he might by any pollecy or subtil engyn to circumuent or trappe the erle of Warwycke, knowyng perfitly that yf he had ones maistred the chief belwether, the flocke woulde sone be dispercled.

Of them that were sent for, fewe in effect came, and yet more came p then were wylling, and more came willingly then were betrusted, some came for feare, and some muche doughted to come, but the greatest heddes wynked and sayd thei could not, but they ment they would not come. Kyng Edward beyng in this perplexitie, and in diffidence of reisyng any army, with such trusti frendes as he had, departed into Lyncolnshire, consultyng what was best to be done, but sodainly or he was fully determyned on any certayn purpose, newes were brought to him that al the tounes and al the coũtrey adiacent was in a great roze, and made fiers and sange songes, criyng king Henry, kyng Henry, a Warwycke, a Warwycke. Kinge Edwarde was muche abashed wyth these pr new tidinges, and more and more his espialles and explorators declared and accõpted to hym, that al the Realme was vp, and by open Proclamacion commaũded to make warre agaynst him, as enemy to kinge Henry and the Realme, wherfore his nere frendes aduised and admonished him to flie ouer the sea to the Duke of Burgoyne, his brother in lawe, there to tary tyl God and fortune should sende him better luck and chaunce, he beyng somwhat ruled by this counsail, but much more quickened by hauing knowelege, that some of the Erle of Warwyckes power was wythin a halfe daies iorney, and lesse of his tayle, wyth all hast possyble passed the washes (in greater ieoperdye then it besemed a pr Prince to be in) & came to the towne of Linne, where he founde an Englysh shyp .x.ij. Hulkes of Holland redy (as fortune wolde) to make sail and take their iorney, wherupon he beyng in a meruelous agonye and doughting the mutabilitie of the tounes menne, takyng no farther leysure for his sure succor & sauegard, with hys brother the duke of Glocester, the lord Scales, & dyuers other hys trusty frendes entred into the shyp without bagge or bagage, without cloth sack, or male, and perchaunce with a great purse, & littel treasure, for he nor his had no leiser to prouyde, according to their degrees & estates. The lord Chamberlayne taried a while after exhortyng al his acquaintaunce, that of necessitie should tarye behinde, to shew thẽ selfs openly as frendes, to the parte aduerse for their owne sauegard, but hartly requiring them priuely to cõtinewe in their hartes trew to kyng Edward & frẽdly to him & his: this persuasion declared he entered, the shyp with ỹ other, which wer redy to depart. This was in the yere of our lords blessed incarnacion tion.M.v.C.lxx.& in the.ix.yere of kyng Edward: When he with one smal ship of his own, & two Hulkes, & vij.or.viij.C.persones, with him hauyng no rayment, but apparell for warre, & small store of money, sailed toward Holland. At whych time the Esterlinges were mortal enemyes, aswel to the Englishmen as to the Frenche nacyon, & had done ỹ last yeres past much preiudice & domage to the Englishe marchantes, both in takyng and spoyling of shippes.

And as the kyng with sayle and ower was makynge hys course as fast as could be possible, the Easterlynges, whych had many shyppes of x warre on the sea, him espied (according to the olde prouerbe) one yll cõmeth neuer alone, and with.vij.or.viij.gallant shippes, began to chace the king and his company. The kinges ship was good with sayle, and so much gat of the Easterlynges, that she came on the coast of Holland, and so discended lower, before a toune in Holland, called Alquemar, and there cast Ancker as nere the toune as was possible, because they could not enter the hauen at an ebbyng water. The Esterlynges also approched the Englysh ship as nere as their great shipppes could come at the lowe water, entending at the flud to haue obteyned their pray, and so they were likely to do, yf Monsieur de Gronture, gouernour for duke xx Charles in Holland had not at that season bene personally presente in those parties.

O what a miserable chaunce & straunge lucke was thys to happen so sodainly to a kyng, and in especial to suche a king, as by his owne valyantnesse & prowes had ouercome his foes, & destroied his enemies in more then.v.or.vj.great & mortal battayles. First to be persecuted, exiled, & expulsed hys owne Realme & kyngdõ, by hys owne seruauntes, subiectes and kynsmen. Secondarely, beyng destitute of all helpe and consolacion, flyng to his onely frende & brother in law duke Charles, for refuge and comfort, to be chased on the sea by hys mortall enemies xxx and deadly foes, & lyke to be taken prysoner, and brought into the captiuitie, which thyng yf it had happened (as God woulde that it should not) he had lien long vnraunsoned (kyng Henry being restored to hys pristinate estate and dignitie royal) or els he had dyed prisoner in great wretchednes & misery. These soure sauces he tasted as a penaunce for his wanton liuyng, & negligent ouerseyng of thynges that he myghte well haue forsene & preuented, but his mynd was so geuen to pastyme daliaunce, & sensual pleasure, that he forgat the olde adage, saiynge, in tyme of peace prouyde for warre, & in the time of war prouide for peace which thing yf he either had wel remẽbred, or politiquely prouided for xl he had not beue chaced & expulsed hys Realme within.xi.dayes, as he was in dede. The onely excuse of his foly is to say, that he so much trusted fortunes flatteryng, that he thought neuer to see her chaunce, nor yet to haue at dyce any yl chaunce, or at chestes any checke mate.

King Edward thus lyeng at Ancker in great feare of the Easterlinges, was by good chaũce cõforted, & of his great perplexitie releued, or he wist how, for the same tyme laye in the towne of Alquemare the lord Gronture, chief gouernour of Hollande, for duke Charles of Borgoyn which beyng incontinent aduertised of the kynges arryual, and also of the great ieoperdy that he was in, prohibited fyrste the Easterlynges in no wyse on paine of death, to intermit or medle with any Englishmē which were both the dukes frendes & alies: which commaundemēt so vexed and troubled the Easterlynges, makyng sure reconyng to haue had for their pray & pyrse, a kyng, a Duke, diuerse Barons & ryche gē-telmen, that they cryed out of God, rayled & cursed the duke & hys officer, and in a rage halsed vp their sailes, & without any more expectacio of good lucke, departed home to the countreye. The Lorde Gronture came a bord the shyp, where kyng Edward was, & him honorably saluted & required him to come to land, offering him his seruice wt all pleasure that he coulde do or imagine to be done. The kyuge hym hartelye thāked, & was wel reuiued & cōforted with his wordes, & so he with al his company were set on land, and wel refreshed. The lorde Gronture lyke a noble man, considering in what poore, estate and necessitie ỹ king & his people were in, ministred to them habundantly al thinges conuenient & necessary, according to euery mannes estate and degre, at ỹ dukes charge & cost. And after they had bene wel refreshed & newly apparreyled, he conduyted them to the Hage, a ryche toune in Hollande, where they arryued on the churche holy daye, not longe after Michelmas. The lorde Gronture, of al this aduenture wrote to the duke hys master, which thereat, was at the first so abashed & amased to se ỹ earle of Warwycke, whome he hated more then a Cocodrille, to haue the vpperhande of hys brother, that he had rather haue heard of kinge Edwardes death, then of his discomfiture, & especially by the erle of Warwycke, whom he more feared and disdayned, then any one man liuyng yet he willed the lorde Gronture to se hym & hys company, wel enterteyned at the Hage, tyll he sent for them.

Now let al Englyshmen consider (as before is rehersed) what profyt, what commoditie, & what helpe in distresse, the mariage of the lady Margarete, kyng Edwardes syster to the duke Charles, did to him in hys extreme necessitie: & but by that mean vncurable extremitie, for his alies & cōferates in Castel & Arragon, were to farre from hym, eyther spedely to flye to, or shortly to come fro wyth any ayde or armye. The French kyng was his extreme enemie, and frende to kynge Henry, for whose cause in the kyng of Scottes (for al the leage betwene them) he did put littel confidence & lesse truste. The stedes & all Eastland were wyth him at open warre, & yet by thys mariage, God prouyded hym a place to flie to, both for refuge and for releue.

When the fame was spred of kynge Edwardes flyynge, innumerable people resorted to the Erle of Warwycke to take hys parte, but all kyng Edwardes trusty frendes went to diuers sentuaries, dayly looking, and howerly harkening, to hear of his health, & prosperous retorn

who afterward serued hym manfully & truly. Emongest other, Quene Elizabeth hys wyfe, al moste desperate of all comfort, tooke sentuarye at Westminster, & their in great penury forsakē of all her frendes, was delyuered of a fayre sonne called Edwarde, whych was with smal pōpe lyke a poore mans child Christened & Baptised, the Godfathers being the Abbot & Prior of Westmynster, & the Godmother ỳ lady Scrope.

Kyng Edward ỳ fyfth borne in sanctuarye.

The Kentyshmen thys season, whose wittes be euer mouable at the chaunge of Prynces came to the subberbes of London, & spoyled houses, robbed berehouses, and by the counsayll of Sir Geffray Gates & x other sentuary men, they brake vp the kynges Benche, & deliuered prisoners, which fel at Radclefe, Limehouse, & S. Katherines to burning of houses, slaughter of people, & rauishing of womē: which smal sparcle had growen to a great flame, yf the erle of Warwycke wyth a greate power had not sodaynly quēched it, and punished ỳ offendors: whyche benefite by him done, caused him much more to be praised and accepted emonges the commons then he was before. When he had setteled and put an order in al thinges, accordynge as he thought most conuenient, Upon the.xij. day of October he rode to the towre of London, whyche was to him wt out resistence deliuered, and ther toke king Hēry the.vj xx out of ỳ ward, wher he before was kept, and was brought to the kings lodging and there serued, according to his degre. And the.xxv. day of the said moneth, ỳ duke of Clarence accompanyed wt the erles of Warwycke, Shrewsbury, and ỳ lord Stanley, and other lordes & Gentlemen, some for fear, & some for loue, and some onely to gase at the wauering world, resorted wt a great company to the towre of London, and from thence with greate pompe brought kyng Henry the.vj. appareld in a longe gowne af blew veluet, through ỳ high streates of London, to the cathedral church of sainct Paule, the people on the right hand, and on the left hand, reioysing & crying God saue the kynge, as though all xxx thyng had succeded as they would haue it, and when he had offered as kynges vse to do, he was conueyed to the palleys of the byshop of London, and there kept hys housholde lyke a kynge.

Kyng Henry ỳ.vj. agayne restored to hys kyngely estate.

King Henry the.vj. thus readepted (by that meanes, onely of ỳ erle of Warwycke) his croune & dignitie Royal, in the yere of oure Lorde 1471. newly, after so many ouerthrowes beginnynge to reygne, likely within short space to fal agayn, and to tast more of hys accustomed captiuitie and vsuall misery. This yll chaūce & misfortune, by many mēs opiniōs happened to him, because he was a man of no great wyt, such as men comonly call an innocent man, neyther a foole, neyther very wyse xl whose study alwayes was more to excel, other in Godly liuing & vertеous example, then in worldly regimente, or temporall dominion, in so much, that in cōparison to ỳ study and delectatiō that he had to vertue, and godlynes, he litle regarded, but in maner despysed al worldlye power & temporall authoritie, which sildome folow or seke after such persons, as frō them flye or disdayne to take them. But his enemies ascry-bed all this to hys coward stomack, affermyng that he was a man apt to no purpose, nor mete for any enterpryse, were it neuer so small. But who soeuer despiseth or dispraiseth, that which the cõmon people, allow and marueyl at, is often taken of them for a mad & vndiscrete persone, but notwithstandynge the vulgare opinion, he that foloweth, loueth & embraseth the contrary, both proue doth sad and wyse (verifying Salomons prouerbe) the wisedom of this world, is folishnes before God. Other ther be that ascribe his infortunitie, onely to the stroke & punishment of God, afferming that the kingedome, whiche Henry the.iiij. his grandfather wrongfully gat, and vniustly possessed against kinge Rychard the.ij. & his heires, could not by very diuine iustice, longe contynew in that iniurious stocke: And that therfore God by his diuine prouidence, punished the offence of the grandfather, in the sonnes sonne.

When kyng Henry had thus obteyned again, the possession & dominion of the realme, he called his high court of Parliament to begin the xxvi. daye of Nouember at Westminster, in the which kynge Edward was declared a traytor to his coũtrey, & vsurpor of the realme, because he had vniustly taken on him, the Croune knd Scepter, & al his goodes were cõfiscate & adiudged, forfayted: & lyke sentence was geuen against all his partakers & frẽdes. And beside this, it was ther enacted that extreme punishment should be done wythout delay ouer such persons, as for his cause were taken or apprehended, & were either in captiuitie, or went at large vpon trust of their suerties, emongest whõ lord Jhon Typtoft, erle of Worcester leuetenaunt, for king Edward in Ireland exercising ther more extreme crueltie (as the fame wẽt) then princely pity, or charitable cõpassyon, & in especial on.ij. enfantes, being sonnes to the erle of Desmõd, was either for treason to him layed or malice agaynst hym conceyued, atteinted & behedded. Beside this, all estatutes made by king Edward, were clerely reuoked, abrogated, and made frustrate. The Crounes of the realmes of Englãd & Fraunce, was by ỹ authoritie of the same Parliament entayled to kyng Henry the.vj. and the heyres males of hys body lawfully begotten, & for default of suche heire male of hys body begotten, then ỹ sayd crounes & dignities were entayled to George duke of Clarence, & to heires males of hys bodye lawfully engendred, and farther the sayd duke was by authoritie aforsayd enabled to be next heire to hys father, Richard duke of Yorke, & to take by dyscent from him al hys landes, dignities & preheminences as though he had ben his eldest sonne & heire, at the time of his death. Jasper erle of Penbroke, and Jhon erle of Oxenford, and diuers other by kyng Edward attaynted, were restored to their old names, possessions, and auncient dignities (kepe them euen as longe as they myght) Besyde thys, the erle of Warwycke as one to whome the cõmon welth was much beholden, was made Ruler & Gouernor of the Realm, wyth whome as felow and compainion was associated, George duke of Clarence hys sonne in law. So that by these meanes the whole estat, both of the realme, and the publique wealth of the same, wer newly altred & chaunged, yea, and in maner clerely transfigured and transmuted. To thys Parliament came the lorde Marques Montacute, excusyng him self that onely for fear of death, de declined to kynges Edwardes part, whych excuse was so accepted, that he obteyned his pardon, which, after was the destruccyon, of him and his brother: For if he had manfully and apartly taken king Edwardes parte, surely he beyng an open enemie, had much lesse hurted, then beyng a fayned, false and a coloured frende: for such thyngs as we se before our iyes, we be wel ware of, and x seldome thinges before knowen, do vs any hurt or preiudice.

Quene Margaret, after that the erle of Warwycke was sailed into England, euer forcastyng and doubtyng, the chaunce that might happen, did neuer cease to praye to God, to sende victory to her frendes, & confederates: whiche, when she knew by her husbandes letters to bee obteygned, she wyth Prince Edward her sonne, and her trayn, entred their shyppes, to take their voyage into Englande: but ỹ Wynter was so sore, the wether so stormie, and the wynde so contrariant, ỹ she was fayn to take land agayn, and defer her iorney til another season. Her enemies sayed, that it was Goddes iuste prouision, that she whyche had xx bene the occasion of so many battayles, and of so muche manslaughter in Englande, should neuer returne thether agayn, to do more mischief. Her frẽdes on the other syde, sayd, that she was kept away, and her iorney empeched by Sorcerers and Necromanciers: thus as mennes imaginacions ranne, their toungues clacked.

In thys season Jasper erle of Penbroke, went into Wales, to visite hys Countie of Penbroke, where he found lord Henry, sonne to his brother Edmond Erle of Richemõd, hauyng not fully ten yeres of his age complete, which was kept in maner like a captyue: but well and honorably educated, and in all kynde of Ciuilitie brought vp, by the Ladye xxx Harbert, late wyfe to William Erle of Penbroke, behedded at Banbery as you before haue heard. This lorde Hẽry was he, that after king Richard, brother to kyng Edwarde, was banquyshed and ouerthrowen, obteyned the croune and regalitie of thys realme, whom we oughte to beleue, to be sent from God, and of hym onely to bee prouided a kynge, for to extinguish both the faccions and partes, of kyng Henry the. vj. & of kyng Edward the fourth (which had almost brought the nobilitie of thys realme, to a final destruccion and an vtter decaye) consyderinge, that he once exalted to that dignitie, nothing more mynded, nor to any one thynge his study more applied: This Henry was borne of Margaret, the onely doughter and heire, to Jhon the first Duke of Somerset xl then not beyng fully of. xiiij. yeres of age. The whych Lady Margaret, although she were after conioyned in mariage, with Lorde Henry sonne to Humfrey duke of Buckyngham, and after to Thomas Stanley erle of Darby, bothe beynge lusty, and of age mete for generacio: yet afterward she broughte furth no more fruite, as thoughe she had done her part sufficiently, for to haue borne one man child, and the same to be a kyng. Jasper erle of Penbroke toke thys child being his nephew, out of the custody of the Lady Harbert, and at hys returne, he brought the childe to London, to kinge Henry the sixt, whome, when the kyng had a good space by him self, secretly beholden and marked, both hys wit, & his likely towardnes, he sayed to suche princes, as were then w hym: Lo, surely this is he, to whom both we and our aduersaries leuyng the possession of all thinges, shall hereafter geue rome and place. So thys holy man shewed before, the chaunce that should happen, that thys erle Henry so ordeyned by God, should in tyme to come (as he did in deede) haue and enioye the kingdome, and the whole rule of the realme.

Thys was kyng Henry the seuenth.

As I haue shewed to you before, what thynges were done in Englād after that kyng Henry obteyned the newe possession, of hys old kyngedome, thinkynge surely to haue possessed, and enioyed the same lenger season then either he did, or coulde by his aduersaries, be permitted, or suffered to do: so must I of congruent necessitie declare vnto you, what greate perplexitie, what sodain trouble, what multiplicitie of immaginacions, the landing of kyng Edward in Friseland, brought to and encombered wyth all, Charles duke of Burgoyn: and how fraudulently for hys owne aduantage he dissimuled, first with king Edward, and after wyth his partie aduerse, and how that he openly denied aid to king Edward, when he priuely ministered, ample and large succors to hym and his. I thinke you would not, that these thinges shoulde be forgotten: wherfore you must call to remembraunce, how that duke Charles had before this (as you haue hard) great intelligence with Mõsire the Uawclere, as he list him self to be called, either chief Capitain of Caleis or els deputie Capitayn, to the erle of Warwycke, which had promised to hym by the Duke, a pencyō yerely of a thousand Crounes, to the intent to stande stil true to king Edward, and to relinquishe kyng Henry but in especiall to abandon therle of Warwycke. The Duke althoughe that he had final confidence, but rather great diffidence in the othe and promise of Mõsire de Uawclere: thought it necessary to know, in what case Caleis stode, & what mutaciõs were there, because it was his next neighbor, (for that tyme Bulleyn and Bullenoys, and al Artoys, were in the handes of Duke Charles) as a pledge deliuered to his father, as is before rehersed. Wherfore in al hast (before he sent for king Edward or spake with him) he sent his trustie counsayler Phillip de Commines accompaignied wyth two gentlemen to Caleis, which two gentlemen fauored more the partie of Lancastre then of Yorke. The lord of Argēton met with ꝑ people of the countrey of Bullenoys, flyng from euery parte lyke wylde dere. For the erle of Warwycke, had now lately sent to Caleis, four hundred archers on horsbacke, which forraied and spoiled al the countrey of Bullenoys. The Dukes messengers, whych had not sene so sodain mutacion of worldly thynges, durst not kepe on their iorney, but the same nyght taryed at Turneham, and sent to Mõstre de Uawclere

Uawclere for a saueconduite, and also wrote to the Duke, of the feare that they were in. The Duke sent worde to Phillip de Comines, that he and his with al spede, shoulde passe toward Caleis, and if they there wer taken, he would shortly for a raunsom, bye or redeme them agayn. For he passed litle, either of the peyn of his seruaunt, or of his charge & expence, so that his purpose might be serued. When thys woorde was brought to the messengers at Turnehan, at thesame time thei receiued a letter, from Mõsire de Uawclere, with louyng wordes and gracious termes, declarynge that they might sauely come, and frely departe, as x before they wer liberally accustomed: so that sir Phillip and his cõpaygnions came to Caleis, without any meting or solempne entertainmẽt contrary to tholde fashyõ that he had sene. Whẽ thei entered the toune they might perceyue euery man, did wer therle of Warwickes badge & on euery dore wer set whit Crosses, and ragged staues, with rimes and poyses, which purported the French kynge, and the erle of Warwycke wer al one. These thinges semed very straunge, and nothyng pleasant to the Burgonions. The lorde Uawclere sent for them to dîner ỹ next day, beyng wel accompaignied, and did were on his cap, a whit ragged staffe of gold enameled, and so dyd many other, and he ỹ coulde haue it, xx neither of gold nor of siluer, had it of silke and cloth: this badge was takẽ vp within one quarter of an houre, after the newes came out of England: suche is ỹ mutacyõ of the cõmon people, lyke a rede wyth euery wind is agitable and flexible. Whil these Burgoniõs lay thus in Caleis thei had knowledge that therle of Warwicke had prepared. iiij. M. valiaunt men, to make frontier warre on the dukes countreyes, whereof by poste they certified the Duke, whych so fumed and smoked at ỹ matter, that he wyst neyther well what to do, nor of whõ to aske cõfortable or wholsome counsayl. For warre he was compelled to haue wyth the French kyng, which had taken from him certayn tounes: and yf he succoured king Edward, he was sure that wyth the Erle of Warwicke he xxx shoulde haue no peace: and yf he lefte kyng Edward his confederate & alie, in the tyme of hys tribulacion, disconsolate, and destitute of aid and succoure, al the worlde of him might speake shame, vnfaithfulnesse and dishonor. When the duke had well aduised this matter, he wrote to his messengers, that thei should require to haue the league made, betwene the two realmes, kept and obserued, with diuerse other priuie instrucions. Phillip de Comines, beynge wyse and wel learned, declared to the counsayl of Caleis, that the Duke hys maister not a litle marueiled why the Englyshmen should ouer runne, and destroye the countreyes, xl hauyng a league so sure, so strong, and with so many wordes of efficacy enforsed, lately made betwene the two countreyes, their territories & dominions, affermyng that the mutacion of the Prince, is no dissolucio of the league: For although the Princes be named, as chief contractors in euery treatie and amitie concluded, yet the Countreyes are boundẽ, and the subiectes shal make recompence, yf anye thynge bee altered wrong-

wrongfully out of his course. And the rather to obtein their desire, thei caused all the merchauntes goodes of Englande, beyng in the Dukes Countreies, to be attached for the redresse of the spoyle, that ỹ Englishmen had done in the Dukes Countrey. Whyche sore greued the Merchauntes, and muche hindered their voiages: beside this, the Merchãtes of the Staple of Caleis, wrote to the king, and to the erle of Warwicke: how, if their Wolle and fell at Caleis, were not sold and vttered as it was wont to be (the greatest part wherof, was brought by ỹ Dukes subiectes and vassals for redy money) the souldiers of the garrison should lacke their wages, the kyng shoulde not be payed hys custome, & the Merchaunt in conclusion shoulde stande in aduenture, both of losse of stocke and credence. These perswasions mollified therle of Warwickes mynde, and especially, because the kyng had no greate store of money, to furnishe Caleys withal, which store if he had had, surely ỹ duke of Burgoyne for al the league, had bene a litle disturbed, and greuously molested. But consyderyng that al things were not, correspondent at thys time to therles appetite: he was content that it should be thus cõdescended and agreed, that the alyaunce made betwene the Realme of Englande and the Dukes dominions, should stil remain inuiolated, sauyng in the stede of Edwarde, shoulde be put, for the kynge, thys name Henry. Thys conclusyon thus brought to an ende, came (euen as a mã would wishe) to passe, for the Duke of Burgoyns purpose, for at thys same tyme, the Frenche kyng had wonne from hym, the faire toune of Amias, and sainct Quintines, so that if the Duke should haue had war both with Fraunce and Englande, he had bene likely to haue bene shortely a poore duke, and els vtterly vndone and brought to destruccyon. And to pacifie and please the Erle of Warwycke, whom he neuer loued and lesse fauoured: he wrote louingly to hym, declaring that as he was lineally descended, and naturally procreated, of the noble stocke and familie of Lancaster, by his grand mother, beyng daughter to the hyghe and mighty Prince Jhon of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster: so was he by nature obliged, and by aliance enforsed to support, honor, maintein and defende, thesayd noble house & lignage, during his lyfe, as euer he hath done, both in worde and dede, agaynst all maner of persones and estates: furthermore, promysyng to beare hys good harte, louinge mind, & frendly fauor, to kynge Henry the syxt and hys sequele, before al other Princes and Potentates, wyth many other flatteryng termes, & glosyng wordes: whych faire promises, I thynke neither the duke hymself inwardly mynded, nor yet outwardely beleued.

Now to returne to king Edward, beyng in the Duke of Burgoins land, which although he were out of his countrey, yet did he neuer dispaire, but had a ferme hope, to haue a mature and redy occasion to hym geuen, how to obteyne his kingdome and dominion, and that in shorte space. For partly, he hoped of a greate helpe, of his brother in lawe the Duke of Burgoyn, and partly, he was daily solicited by the letters and messages of men of his faccion in Englande, to returne with all spede, promising him company and comforte. Many other there wer, which eyther for fear of the rigor of the law, which they had offended, or elles disdayning that the worlde was so altered: or els being brought into kyng Edwardes favor, had hope to exercyse their pollinge romes, as they did before his fliyng out of England, dayly came to him from England, and prouoked him more and more, to take his iorney homward kyng Edward in maner ravished with their golden promyses, came to the Duke of Burgoin, to the toune of Sent Pol, and there declared to x hym what great intelligẽce he had in the realme of Englãd, and what assured frendes he had in thesame, requiring him to aide hym w̃ spede as his onely truste, and sole hope of relife was in him, beinge not onely his brother in law, but ech beyng compaignion of others order: for the kyng ware the golden Flees, and the duke wer the Gartier. The duke of Somerset, which was cosin germain, remoued to the Duke of Burgoyn, and brought vp, and had a pencyõ in the Dukes house. (For surely the Duke of Burgoyn loued better the house of Lancastre, thẽ the house of Yorke) sore labored to the cõtrary, affirming that is was both vngodly, vnpryncely, and vnnaturall, to exalte and set vp a straunger, xx hauing no ryght, and to depose and depryue hys naturall kynsman, hauing a iust title discended to him, from the king hys father, & the kyng his grandfather, from his scepter and regalitie. Duke Charles was in a great perplexitie, not knowyng wel what to say, whether consanguinitie shoulde preuayle more, or affinitie, or nature before favor, not willyng yf he might, to displease any of bothe the parties. But because the warre was ouert at hys very nose, with the French king: he cõcluded openly (but entending another thyng secretly) to aide the duke of Somerset, and other that were with hym, takyng of thẽ certain promises, for thynges to be done against the erle of Warwicke: when they should xxx espie their tyme, moste propice and conueniẽt: The Duke of Somerset ioyous of these newes, sailed into Englande, and made report to kyng Henry. Kyng Edward was present, and heard al this determinacyon, which brought him into greate heauines, and a depe perplexitie: howe beit, he was priuely aduertysed by a frende, that these cloked dissimulacions, were onely for thys cause, that Duke Charles would in no wyse haue warre with both the realmes at once, and further, yf the said duke were put to the worse, or vanquyshed by the French kyng, then he wer not able, neyther to aide, nor to succor king Edward. Wherfore to blind with al the French kyng, which sore desired, that the duke myght haue xl warre wyth England: for then he knew that his enterpryse, wer more then halfe gotten. The Duke declared opẽly, that he would in no wise minister any succors to kyng Edward, straightly chargyng & commaũdyng, vpon peyne of the harte, that no man should once passe the sea w̃ hym, or in hys army. But al this proclamacion notwythstandyng whẽ the duke saw that kyng Edward, vpõ hope of his frendes, would nedes

repaire into England again (he hauing compassyon of his vnfortunate chaunce) caused priuily to be deliuered to him fiftie. M. Florence, of the crosse of saynct Andrewe, and further caused foure great shyppes to be appoynted for him, in the hauen of Vere in zelaude, whiche is fre for all men to come to, and the duke hired farther for hym. xiiij. shyppes of the Esterlynges, well appoynted, and for the more suretie, toke bond of thē to serue him truely, till he were landed in Englād, and. xv. daies after. Of which returning, the Esterlynges were glad, trustyng that by that meane, yf he obteyned agayn the possession of the realme, they shoulde the soner come to a concord and a peace, and to the restitucion of their liberties and franchises, which they claymed to haue within England. The duke of Burgoyn as men reported, cared not much on whose side victory fel, sauing for paiment of his money. For he would oft saye, that he was frende to both partes, and eche part was frendly to hym.

KInge Edward beynge thus furnyshed, thoughte nothynge more peynful and wretched, then the taryng of one day lenger, nor nothynge more too be desired, then wyth al celeritie to sayle toward his countrey: wherupon hauyng wyth hym xx onely two. M. men of warre, besyde maryners, in the spring of ỹ yere. In the yere of oure Lorde. 1. 4. 6. 1. at the same verye season, that the Duke of Burgoyn, went to fight wyth the French kyng at Amias. He sayled into England, and came on the cost of Yorke shire, to a place called Rauenspurr, and there settyng all hys men on lande, he consulted with his Capitaines, to knowe to what place, they should first for succor resort vnto: for he imagened that no way could be for hym sure, hauing so small a company of souldiours.

Kynge Edwardes landynge.

After long debatyng, it was cōcluded, that diuerse persones hauing light horses, should skoure the coūtrey on euery side, to se yf by any perxxs swasions, they mighte allure the hartes of the rusticall and vplandyshe people, to take kyng Edwards part, and to were harnes in his querel: which, with al diligence, folowed their commission. It semeth somwhat to leane to the trueth, that kyng Edward beyng a wise and a circūspect Prynce, woulde not haue bene so foolishe hardy, as to enter Englande with halfe a handful of men of warre, excepte he had bene sure of spedy succor and faythful frendshyp: In whyche argument is no doubte, but that the duke of Clarence and he, were secretly agreed before, and that the Marques Mouncacute, had secretly procured hys fauor, of which priuie signes and cloked worckynges, open tokens, & manifest doynges, xl afterward appered. The lyght horsemen which were sent about, after they had felte the mindes and ententes, of the rude people (as much as they myght) they returned to kyng Edward ỹ next day, making relacion that all the tounes rouud about, were permanent and stiffe on the parte of kyng Henry, and could not be remoued: and that it was but a folye farther to solicite or attempt them, considerynge that when they were moued and exhorted to be trew to kynge Edwarde, not one man durste speke for feare of the Erle of Warwycke.

Which aunswere, when kyng Edward had perfitly digested, of very necessitie he chaunged hys purpose: for where before his clayme was to be restored to the croune and kyngdome of England, nowe he caused it to be published that he onely claymed the Duchie of Yorke, to ỹ entent that in requyring nothyng, but that which was bothe trew and honest, he might obtayne the more fauor of the common people. It was almost x incredible to se what effect this new imaginacion (all thoughe it were but fayned) sorted and toke immediatly vpon the fyrst openinge (Such a power hath Justice euer emõgest all men) whẽ it was blowen abrode that kyng Edwardes desyre was farther from nothyng, then from̃ the couetyng or desyre of the kyngdome and royall dominion, and that he no erthelye promocion desyred before hys iuste patrimony, and lyneall enheritance: All men moued with mercye and compassion, began out of hande either to faour hym or els not to resiste him, so that he mighte obteyne his duchie of Yorke, when he had founde these meanes to pacifie mens myndes, and to reconcile their hartes, he determined to take his xi iorney toward Yorke, and so went to Beuerley. Therle of Warwycke which then lay in Warwyke shyre, beyng enformed that kyng Edward was landed, and goyng toward Yorke, with al hast wrote to the Marques Montacute hys brother, whiche had lyen at the Castell of Pomfret all the laste wynter, with a great company of Souldears, geuynge hym warnyng, and aduertesyng hym in what perill their whole affayres stode in, if their enemy should obtayne ỹ possession, or entre into the citie of Yorke, willyng and commaunding him to set on kyng Edward with all expedicion, & byd hym battayle, or els to kepe the passage, that he should passe no farther, tyll he hym self had gathered a greater host, xii which with all diligence, he was assemblynge to come and ioyne wyth his brother the Marques. And because that the erle knew not by what way hys enemies wolde take their iorney, he wrote to al the townes of Yorkeshyre, and to the citie also, commaundyng all men on the kynges behalfe, to be redy in harnes, and to shutte their gates against the kynges enemyes. Kyng Edward without any wordes spoken to hym, cam peaceably nere to Yorke, of whose commynge, when the citiezens wer certefied, without delay they armed them selfe, and came to defend the gates, sendyng to hym two of the chiefest Aldermen of the citie, whych ernestly admonished hym on their behalfe to come not one foote nerar, xi nor temerariously to enter in to so great ieopardy, considerynge that they were fully determined, and bent to cõpell hym to retract with dẽt of swourd, kyng Edward markyng well their message, was not a littel troubled and vnquietee in hys mynde, and driuen to seke the furtheste poynt of hys wit, for he had both two mischeuous and perilous chaunces, euen before his eyes, which were hard to be euaded or refelled, one was if he should go backe agayn, he feared leste the rurall and common people for coueteousnes of pray, and spoyle, woulde fall on hym, as one that fled away for feare & dreade. The other was, if he should procede any farther in hys iorney, then myght the citiezens of Yorke issue out with all their power, and sodaynly circumuent hi n & take hym, wherfore he determined to set forward, neither with army nor with weapõ: but with lowly wordes, & gentel entreatynges, requyryng moste hartely the messengers that were sent, to declare to the citizens, ỹ he came neither to demaunde the realme of Englãd, nor the superiorities of the same, but onely the duchie of Yorke his olde enheritance, the which duchie, if he might by their mæanes readept and recouer, he would neuer let passe out of hys memorie so great a benifite, and so frendly a gratuitie to hym exhibited. And so with fayre wordes and flatterynge speche he dismissed the messengers, and with good spede he and his folowed so quickly after, that they were almost at ỹ gates as ione as the Ambassadors. The citezens heryng his good answere, that he ment, nor entended nothynge preiudiciall to kynge Henry, nor his royall authoritie, were muche mitigated & cooled, & began to cõmen with him from their walles, willyng him to conuey hym selfe into some other place without delay, which if he did they assured hym, ỹ he should haue neither hurte nor damage, but he gently speakyng to all men, and especially to suche as were Aldermen, whome he called worshipfull, and by their proper names them saluted, after many fayre promises to thẽ made, exhorted & desyred them that by their fauorable frendshyp, & frendly permission he might enter into his awne towne, of the which he had both his name and title. All the whole daye was consumed in doutful communication & ernest interlocution. The citiezens partely wonne by hys fayre wordes, & partly by hope of hys large promises, fell to this pact & conuention, that yf kyng Edward woulde swere to entertayne his citiezens of Yorke after a gentell sorte & fashyon, and here after to be obedient, and faythfull to all kyng Henryes commaundementes and preceptes, that then they woulde receyue hym in to their citie, & ayde and cõfort hym with money. Kynge Edward (whome the citizens called onely Duke of Yorke) beyng glad of this fortunate chaunce, in the next mornyng, at ỹ gate where he should enter, a Priest beyng redy to say masse, in ỹ masse tyme, receyuyng the body of our blessed Sauior, solemply swearyng to kepe and obserue the two Articles aboue mencioned, and agreed vpõ, when it was far vnlike, that he either entended or purposed to obserue any of them, which plainly afterward was to all men manifest, cuidẽtly perceyuyng, that he toke nomore studye or diligẽce for any one earthly thyng, thẽ he dyd to persecute kyng Henry, & to spoile hym of his kingdome. So it is dayly sene that alwel princes, as men of lesser reputatiõ led by blynd auarice and deuelishe ambicion, forgettynge the scruple of conscience, & the ende of all honestie, vse, to take an othe by ỹ immortall God, which they know perfitly, shalbe brokẽ & violate hereafter, before

the othe be first made or sworne: yet these persones (as exãples thereof be not very straunge to fynde) at one time or other be worthely scorged for their periurie, in so much often tymes that the blot of suche offence of the parentes is punished in the sequele & posteritie: of this thynge I maye fortune to speke more in the lyfe of Rycharde the.iij. as the cause shall arise where it may euidently appeare, that the progeny of Kynge Edward scaped not vntouched for this open periurie.

When kyng Edward had appesed the citiezens, and that their fury was past, he entred in to the citie, & clerely forgettinge his othe, he first x set a garrison of souldiers in the towne, to the entent ỹ nothyng should be moued agayst hym by the citezens, & after he gathered a great host, by reason of his money. Whẽ all thing was redy, accordyng as he desyred, because he was enformed that his enemyes did make no great preparacion to resist hym, he thought it necessarie therefore with the more spede and diligence to make hast toward London: and as it were for ỹ nones, he left the right way toward Pomfret, where ỹ Marques Mõtagew with his army lay, and toke the way on the right hand, not fully iiij. myle from the cãpe of his enemies. And whẽ he saw that they made no stirryng, nor once shewed thẽ selfe in sight, he returned in to ỹ cõmen xx hygh way agayne, a littel beyonde their campe, and came sauely to the towne of Notingham, where came to him syr William Parre, syr Thomas a Borogh, syr Thomas Montgomerie, and diuers other of hys assured frendes with their aydes, which caused hym at the fyrst cõming to make Proclamacion in hys owne name, kynge Edward the.iiij. boldely sayng to hym, that they would serue no man but a Kynge. Thys Proclamacion cast a great shame and dolor in to the hartes of the citezens of Yorke, for that they might apparantly perceyue, that they wer fraudulently seduced, and for their good will vnhonestly (yf it might be sayde) deluded and mocked. But when the fame was blowyn abrode, ỹ xx kyng Edward, without any detriment, was in sauetyme come to Notyngham, Princes and noble men on all sydes began to fall to hym, fermely beleuyng that either the Marques Montacute, beryng fauor to kynge Edwarde, woulde not once with hym encounter, or that he was afrayde to set ouer or to geue battayl, knowynge not to what parte his souldiers would enclyne. But what soeuer the occasion was, the moste parte thought it more for their securitie & auauntage of them selfs, to take parte and ioyne with kyng Edward, beyng at all poyntes furnisshed with men of warre, rather then to cleue to kyng Henry, & to be alwayes in ieopardy, both of lyfe and lande. Kynge Edward (as you can x not blame hym) beyng with these good fortunes animated, & with hys armye furnished at all poyntes, came to his towne of Lecester, & there heryng that the erle of Warwycke, accompanied with Jhon erle of Oxford were together at Warwycke with a great power, & were both determined to set on him, he politiquely imagening to preuent their inuẽsion, determined in great haste to remoue his whole army, hopyng surely, either to geue them battayle, or elles to allure & bryng to his side hys brother George duke of Clarence, and to comen with hym in some priuie place, before he came to his confederates: leste paraduenture he should be by them, illaquiated & compased, knowing that the duke was in nothyng constant, nor in one mynd long permanent.

In this very season to tell you how the erle of Warwycke was displeased, and grudged agaynst his brother the Marques, for lettynge kyng Edward passe, it ware to long to write: for where he hym self had bigilantlye prouided & politiquely forsene, for all thinges, ỹ Marques neuertheless where the power of their enemies firste began to gather neuer moued fote, nor made resistence as he was cõmaunded, but beside thys suffered them with a so small nomber of souldiers, before hys eyes & in his open sight, without any battayle to passe by: wherfore the erle considerynge that kyng Edward did dayly encrease hys power (as a runnyng ryuer by goyng more & more augmenteth) thought it moste necessary for hym, to geue him battayle with spede, and therupõ accersed & called together hys army, and in all haste sent for the duke of Clarence, to ioyne with hym, which had conscribed, & assembled together a great host about London. But when he perceiued that the duke lyngered, & dyd al thinges negligẽtly, as though he were in doubt of warre or peace, he then began somwhat to suspect, that the Duke was of hys bretherne corrupted & lately chaunged, & therfore without delay marched forward toward Couentry, to thentent to set on his enemyes. In the meane season, kyng Edward came to Warwycke, where he founde all the people departed, and from thence with al diligence auaũced hys power toward Couentre, & in a playn by the citie he pytched his felde. And the next daye after ỹ he came thither, hys men were set forwarde, and marshalled in array, & he baliãtly bad the erle batttayle: which mistrustyng that he should be deceaued by the duke of Clarẽce (as he was in dede) kept hym selfe close within the Walles. And yet he had perfect worde ỹ the duke of Clarence came forward toward hym with a great army, kyng Edward beynge also therof enformed, raysed, his campe, & made toward ỹ duke. And leste that there might be thought some fraude to be cloked betwene them, the kyng set hys battailes in an order as though he would fight without any lẽger delay, the duke did likewyse. When eche host was in sight of other, Rychard duke of Glouceste, brother to them both, as though he had bene made arbitrer betwene thẽ, fyrst rode to the duke, and with hym commoned very secretly: frõ hym he came to kyng Edward, and with lyke secretnes so vsed hym, that in conclusion no vnnaturall warre, but a fraternall amitie was concluded & and proclaymed, and then leuyng all armye and weapon a syde, bothe the bretherne louyngly embraced, and familierly commoned together. It was no maruayll that the duke of Clarẽce, with so small persuasion and lesse exhortynge, turned from the erle of Warwyckes parte, for as you haue hard before, thys marchandyse was labored, conduyted and concluded by a damsell, when the duke was in the French court, to the erles vtter confusion.

After this, kyng Edward caused to be proclaymed, that the duke & al that came with hym, should be taken as hys true frendes, wythoute fraude or yll suspicion. But this notwythstandinge, it semeth that god dyd neyther forgeue nor forget to punishe the duke with condigne punishment, for violating and brekyng his othe solempnely, and aduysedly taken and made, to the erle of Warwycke, for God not manye yeres after, suffered hym lyke a periured persone to dye a cruell & a straunge x death.

Then was it concluded emongest the. iij. brethrē to attempt therle of Warwicke, if by any fayr means he might be recōciled or by any promise allured to their parte: To whom the duke of Clarence sent diuers of hys secrete frendes, first to excuse him of the act that he had done, secondarely to require him to take some good ende now, whyle he might, with kyng Edward.

When the erle had hard pacientlye the dukes message, lorde, how he detested & accursed him, crienge out on him, that he contrary to his oth promise & fidelitie, had shamefully turned hys face from his confederaxx tes & alies: But to the dukes messengers he gaue none other answere but thys, ẏ he had leuer be alwayes lyke him selfe, then lyke a false and a periured duke, and that he was fully determined neuer to leue war, tyll eyther he had lost hys owne naturall lyfe, or vtterly extinguished & put vnder hys foes and enemies.

From thence kyng Edward thus beyng furnished of a strong hoste, went without any maner of diffidēce or mistrust toward Londō: wher after that it was knowen that the duke of Clarence was come to hys brethrē, and that all they came together in one knot to the citie, suche a feare rose sodaynly emongest the citezens, that they wer driuē to their xxx wittes ende, not knowing either what to do or to say, but at ẏ last very feare compelled them to take kynges Edwardes parte. The selfe same season, the erle of Warwycke sent letters to king Henry, to the duke of Somerset, tharchebishop of Yorke, & other of hys counsayll, that they should kepe the citie from their enemies handes, by the space of. ij. or. iij dayes after the comming of their enemies, and that he shortly woulde be at hande wyth a puyssant army. They as they were cōmaunded defended the citie strongly, but it was to smal purpose, for the citezens in thesame tyme began naturely to consult, what part they should folow for their most indempnite: and in conclusion when they considered that xl kynge Henry was suche an innocent person, as of hym selfe he was not most apte to moderate and gouerne the publique wealth of the realm. And that on the other syde, kyng Edward by no other mens documēt but onely by hys owne pollicie and wit was wont to order the Realme and gouerne the kyngdom. And farther that kyng Edward was such a person, as was able bothe to defende him selfe and also al hys, from iniurie and hostilitie, wherupon al men were glad to leane to hym, and to take hys parte. They concluded to take hys part & to receyue hym into the citie: whiche determinacion beyng blowen abroade (as the nature of ỹ people is euer to delyte in nouelties) the communaltie coulde not be compelled by no cõmaundemẽt to tary at home, but ranne in hepes out of the citie to mete him, and saluted him as their kyng, and souereygne lord. When the duke of Somerset and other of kynge Henryes frendes, saw the world thus sodaynly chaunged, euery man fled, and in haste shifted for hym selfe, leuinge kyng Henry alone, as an hoste that shoulde be sacrificed, in the Bishops palace of London adioyninge to Poules churche, not knowyng of whom, nor what counsayll to aske, as he which wyth troble and aduersitie was clerely dulled and appalled, in whych place he was by kyng Edward taken, and agayne committed to prison and captiuitie.

Kyng Henry ỹ. vi. agayne taken and cõmitted to prison.

Thys was a sodayne chaunge, for the same day, the Archebyshop of Yorke, to the entent that the people myght more fermely stycke on his syde, caused him to ryde about London, appareled in a gowne of blewe veluet, with a great company cryeng kyng Henry, kyng Henry (which sight asmuch pleased the citezens as a fyer paynted on the wall, warned the olde woman) not knowynge that or nyght, hys triumphynge shoulde be torned to trimblinge, and his solempnitie conuerted into mourning, such chaũce was to him prouided. King Edward returned to London agayn the. xi. day of Apryl, sixe monethes after that he had sayled into Flaunders: and fyrste callynge before hym a great assemble of people, highly commended the fidelitie of the citezens, whyche they constantly bare vnto hym, rendring to the Aldermen, most harty thankes for that, that they had kept, and caused the people to continew, and be permanent in their good mindes and loyaltie toward him, blaming farther and rebuking aswell Marchaunt straungers, as Englyshemẽ, whome he knew to haue prested, and lente money to kynge Henry for the arrayenge and settynge forth of a new armye agaynst hym. But when he had greuously wyth terryble wordes declared to them their sedicious crime & traiterous offence, he bad them to be of good comfort & to expel al feare, for he released to them both the punishment of theyr bodies and losse of gooddes, and graunted to them Pardon for theyr faultes & offences, by whyche gentle meane and easy indulgencye, he reconciled to him the hartes of the whole multitude, obteyninge that, by the fayr and louyng wordes, which he could not haue acheued with sharpe strokes and bloudy woundes.

Therle of Warwyckè pondering, that the gain of the whole battail stode in makyng hast, with al diligence, followed his enemies, hoppynge (that yf they wer neuer let so lytle, wt any stop or tariyng by ỹ waye) to fight with thẽ before thei should come to Londõ: the which he thought should be muche to his auauntage, cõsideryng that he perfyghtly knew the citie to be destitute of men of warre for Defence, and to haue no ma-

ner of municions, to set on the walles or towers, so that they were not able to abide a siege, and for that cause, euer they enclined to the victorious & stronger parte. But whē he following his enemies, had passed a great part of his iourney, he was enformed that kyng Edward, peaceably was entered into London, & had taken, and sent kyng Henry to prison agayne. Whiche thinges depely considered, he saw that al cauillacions of necessitie, were now brought to thys ende, ỹ they must be cōmitted to thasard and chaunce of one battayl, wherfore he rested wyth his army, at the toune of sainct Albons, partly, to refresh his souldiers, x and partly, to take counsayl what was best to do. In the erles armye were Jhon duke of Excester, Edmond Erle of Somerset, Jhon erle of Oxenford, and Jhon Marques Montacute, whom ỹ erle his brother wel knewe, not to be well mynded (but sore agaynste hys stomacke) to take part with these lordes, and therefore stode in a doubt, whether he at this tyme, might trust him or no, but the fraternal loue betwene thē, washed awaye and diminished all suspicion: But what soeuer opinion therle conceyued of him or any other, the erle as a man past al feare, determined coragiously to set on his enemies. And from saynct Albones, he remoued to a village, in the meane waye, betwene London & saynct xi Albones called Barnet, beyng tenne myle distaunt from bothe the tou- Barnet felde nes. This toune standeth on an hill, on whose toppe is a fayre plain, for two armyes to ioyne together: on the one part of this plain, the erle of Warwycke pytched hys feld, tarying for his enemies. The rumor of ỹ erles cōmyng, was spred in an instant in all London, whyche quyckened kyng Edward not a litle, wherfore wyth all spede be adioyned to that hoste, that he brought wyth him firste to London, a compaigny of elect, picked, and chosen persones, strōg, young, and mete for all assaies, xxx beside other new aydes, that wer then come to him: Harnesse, weapōs horse, and all other engines, instrumētes mete for the warre, he neither forgatte, nor slackly furnished. What shall I saye more, he determyned clerely to spende all his ryches, yea, and all that he coulde ymagin vpō the chaunce of this battayl: Firmely beleuyng, that this conflict, should knit vp the knot of al his labor, and bryng him to quyetnes. So wyth a puyssant army, he marched forwarde, and to put hys people in vre, ỹ they might be the more readye to fyght, when soeuer they shoulde encoūter with their enemies, he deuided thē in foure partes. He brought wyth him also kyng Henry the syxte, of al likelihold for this entēt, that either hys aduersaries, seyng their kyng stand as a prisoner in captiuitie, should be abashed and discomfyted by hym, or elles yf the fortune of xl the battayl should turne agaynst hym, that then kyng Henry should be to hym, both a sauegarde and a protection. On Easter euē at after none he came to Barnet, and there not farre from hys enemies, he encāped his army, and least his enemies should compell him to fight that night, he enuironed his campe, with new fortificacions and trenches: For tarying that night, was to hym a synguler profyte, and to hys enemies a greate detriment: Conſideryng the longer he taryed, the moze people came to his ayde, the moze ſtronger was his power, and the ſtronger ỹ his power was, ſo much weaker was ỹ part of the aduerſaries, whiche was farre from al ſuccoure, and hoped of no newe reliefe noz comfoꝛte. Thus both the aꝛmies lodged that night on the plaine, but not oute of their harneſſe, foꝛ their tentes were ſo nere together, in the which that foꝛ neighing of hoꝛſes, and talkyng of menne, none of bothe the hoſtes could that night, take any reſt oꝛ quietnes. At the breakyng of the day the erle of Warwicke ſette his men in a raie, in this maner: In the right wyng, he ſet the Marques Mountacute, and the erle of Oxenfoꝛd, wt certain hoꝛſemen, and he wyth the duke of Exceter, toke the left wing, and in the middes betwene bothe, he ſet archers, & to them he appointed the duke of Somerſet to be captayn. And when he had ſet his men in an oꝛder, he encoꝛaged hys men to fyght, with many cõfoꝛtable woꝛdes, willing thẽ to ſtryke with a good and fierce toꝛage, and to remembꝛe that they fight, not onely foꝛ the libertie of the countreye, agaynſte a tiraunte, which wꝛongfullye and againſte all right, had inuaded and ſubdued thys realme, but they fyght in the querel of a true, and vndubitate king, againſt a cruell man, and a toꝛcious vſurper, in the cauſe of a Godly, and a pitiful Pꝛince, againſt an abhominable manqueller and bloudy boutcher: In the title of a gentle, liberal, and bountifull king, againſt an extreme nigard, and a coueteouſe extoꝛcioner. In which cauſe beyng ſo good, ſo godly & ſo iuſt, God of bery iuſtice muſt nedes be their ſhilde and defence. Kyng Edward lykewiſe oꝛdꝛed hys battayls. In ỹ foꝛward he ſet the duke of Glouceſter, the midle ward, he him ſelf with the duke of Clarence, hauynge wyth them kyng Henry, dyd rule & goueꝛne, the loꝛd Haſtynges led the reꝛeward, and beſides theſe thꝛe battales, he kept a company of freſhe men in ſtoꝛe, whiche dyd hym greate pleaſure, and this done, he encoꝛaged his men, ſaying: that their aduerſaryes wer only traitoꝛs to ỹ realme, ſpoylers of the pooꝛe commonaltie and people deſtitute of al grace, good foꝛtune & good liuing. Which miſcheuous perſones, if they ſhoulde pꝛeuayle thꝛoughe the fayntneſſe of your hartes, al you gentlemen and rychmẽ, wer in yeoperdy of your lyfes, all meane men in doubt of robbyng and ſpoylyng: and all inferioꝛ perſones, in haſard of perpetual bondage and ſeruitude.

When the daye began to ſpꝛyng, the trompettes blewe vp coꝛagyouſly, and the battayl fierſly began, Archers firſte ſhot, & bill nẽ theim folowed, kyng Edward hauing the greater nomber of men, valiauntly ſet on his enemies. The erle on the other ſyde, remembꝛyng his auncient fame & renoune, manfully wythſtode him. Thys battayl on both ſides was ſoꝛe fought & many ſlayn, in whoſe romes ſucceded euer freſh and freſhmen. In the meane ſeaſon whyle all men were together by ỹ eares, euer lokyng to whychway foꝛtune would encline. The Erle of Warwycke after lõg fight, wyſely did perceiue hys men to be ouerpreſſed, with the multitude of his aduerſaries: wheꝛfoꝛe he cauſed new mẽ

to relief theim, that fought in the forward: by reason of whiche succors, kynge Edwardes parte gaue a litle backe (whiche was the cause that some lokers on, & no fighters, galoped to London, sayinge: that therle had wonne the feld) which thyng when kyng Edward did perceiue, he with all diligence, sent freshe men to their succors.

If the battail wer fierce and dedly before, now it was crueller, more bloudy, more feruent and firie, and yet they had fought from mornyng almoste to noone, without any part gettyng auauntage of other. Kyng Edward beyng wery of so long a conflict, and willyng to se an end, caused a greate crewe of freshe men (whiche he had for this onely pollicie, kepte all daie in store) to set on their enemies, in maner being wery and fatigate: but although ỹ erle sawe these newe succors, of freshe & newe men to entre the battaill, beyng nothing afraied, but hoppyng of the victory (knowyng perfitly that there was all kyng Edwardes power) cõforted his men beyng wery, sharpely quicknyng, and earnestly desiring them with hardy stomackes, to bere out this last and finall brunt of the battaill, and that the felde was euen at an ende. But whẽ his souldiers beyng sore wounded, weried with so long a cõflict, did geue litle regard to his wordes, he beyng a manne of a mynde inuincible, rushed into the middest of his enemies, where as he (auentured so farre from his awne compaignie, to kill & slay his aduersaries, that he could not be rescued) was in the middes of his enemies, striken doune & slain. The marques Montacute, thynkynge to succor his brother whiche he sawe was in greate ieoperdy, & yet in hope to obtein the victory, was likewise ouerthrowen and slain. After the erle was ded, his parte fled & many were taken, but not one man of name, nor of nobilitie.

Some authors write, that this battaill was fought so nere hande, that kyng Edward was constrained to fight his awne person, & fought as sore as any man of his partie, and that the erle of Warwicke, whiche was wont euer to ride on horsebacke, from place to place, from ranke to ranke comfortyng his men, was now aduised by the Marques his brother, to relynquiche his horse, & trie the extremitie by hande strokes, which if he had been on his horsebacke, might fortune to haue escaped.

This ende had Richard Neuell erle of Warwicke, whose stoute stomacke, and inuincible corage, after so many straunge fortunes, and perilous chaunces by him escaped, caused death before he came to any old age priuilie to stele on hym, and with his darte to take from hym, all worldly and mundain affeccions: but death did one thynge, that life could not do, for by death he had rest, peace, quietnes, and tranquillitie, which his life euer abhorred, and could not suffre nor abide. On bothe partes wer slain at this battaill, more thẽ tenne. M. men. Of prisoners the nomber could not be certainly knowẽ: on the kynges partwer slain sir Humfrey Burchier, soonne to the Lord Barnes, els no man of estimacion. The occasiõ of this greate slaughter was, because that where kyng Edward was wont, after the battaill obteined, to crie; saue ỹ cõmons, mons,and kill the capitaines,now he spared them not,because they not onely so highly fauored therle of Warwicke, but also because thei came with the erle,against hym in battail. After this feld ended,the Duke of Somerset,with Jhon erle of Oxenford, wer in all poste hast,fliyng towarde Scotlande,but feryng the ieoperdies, that might chaunce in so long a iorney,altered their purpose,and turned into Wales, to Jasper erle of Penbroke:euery man fled whether his mynde serued him. The duke of Excester with muche difficultie, escaped into Westminster disguised,and there toke Sanctuary. Kyng Edward after this victory although he wanne it not without greate effusion of bloud,alwell on his awne parte,as the parte of his enemies, was greatly reioyled & comforted,after the maner of a victorious conqueroure,leadyng with him kyng Henry like a captiue,in moste triumphant maner, on Easter daye at after noone, made his entery solempnly,into the citie of London,& at the Churche of sainct Paule, he offered hys standerd, & rendered to almightie God,for his greate victory, moste hũble and hartie thankes. The ded bodies of the erle and the Marques,were brought to Londõ in a coffin,and before thei shoulde be buried,by the space of three dayes, thei laie open visaged,in the Cathedral Church of S. Paule,to thintẽt that al men might euidently perceiue, that thei vnfamedly were dedde least perauẽture the cõmon people hereafter, here of some dissimulyng persone,to take on hym the name of therle of Warwicke,thynkyng him to be liuyng,might stirre a newe sedicion,& excite an vnware rebellion.

The common people saied, that the kyng was not so iocounde nor so ioyous,for the destruccion of therle,but he was more sorowfull and dolorus,for the death of the Marques, whom both he knewe and it appered to other,to be inwardly his faithfull frend:For whose onely sake he caused both their bodies,to be with their auncesters, solempnly entered at the Priory of Bissam. In ỹ meane season, quene Margaret hauyng knowlege,that all thynges in Englande, were now altered and brought into trouble and broyle, by reason of kyng Edwardes late returne into the realme:gathered together no small coopaignie,of hardy and valiaunt souldiours, determined with all haste and diligence,with Prince Edwarde her soonne,to saile into Englande,but yet once again (suche was her destinie)beyng letted for lacke of prosperous wynde,& encombered with to muche rigorous tempeste, a daie after the faire,as the common prouerbe saieth,landed at the Port of Weymouth,in Dorset shire. When she had passed the sea and taken lande,it was to her declared,how that kyng Edward had gotten again the garlande, & that kyng Henry her husband,was desolately left post alone,and taken prisoner,how the Erle of Warwicke and his brother were bothe slain and ded,and all their armie destroyed, scatered or taken, and in conclusion that her parte had sustened,the moste bitter plague and scorge,cõsideryng bothe the chaunce & the tyme,that in many yeres before,had been red or sene. When she harde all these miserable chaunces and misfortunes, nes,so sodainly one in anothers necke,to haue taken their effect,she like a woman al dismaied for feare,fell to the ground,her harte was perced withsorowe,her speache was in maner passed,all her spirites were tormented with Malencoly. The calamitie and misery of her time, she detested and abhorred,her vnstable and contrariant fortune,she stedfastly blamed and accused,her peinfull labor, her care of mynde, turned into infelicitie she muche lamented, and bewailed the euill fate and destenie of her husband, whiche iminently before her iyes, she sawe to approche she accused,reproued,and reuiled,and in conclusion, her senses were so ¶ vexed,and she so afflicted,and caste into suche an agony, that she preferred death before life,rather desiryng soner to die, then lenger to liue,¶ perauenture for this cause,that her interior iye sawe priuily, and gaue to her a secrete monicio of the greate calamities and aduersities,which then dyd hang ouer her hed,and were likely incotinent to fall ¶ succede whiche other persones,neither loked for nor regarded.

This quene Margarete might well consider and thynke,that these euill aduentures,chaunced to her for the moste parte,for the vnworthy death of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, vncle to her husbande: Of the whiche mischaunce,although she wer not the very occasion and prouo-¶ ker,yet she greately offended in that she concented thereto,and did not saue his life,whyen she rulyng all other,might conuenientely haue staied and letted it. For surely he beyng a liue,and hauyng the moderacion ¶ gouernaunce of the cõmon wealth,kyng Henry had neuer wauered in so many hasardes,¶ ieoperdies of his life as he did. I woulde desire of God,that all men woulde in egall balance, ponder ¶ indifferen tly consider the causes,of these misfortunes and euill chaunces, the whych beyng eleuate in aucthoritie,dooe mete and measure, Justice and iniury, right and wrong,by high power,blynd aucthoritie,and vnbridled will.

But nowe to the purpose,when quene Margarete sawe, that to bid ¶¶ battail was to no purpose,and in maner in dispaire,of the wealth of her self ¶ her sonne:she with the Prince and her compaignie, departed to a Sainctuary there by,called Beaulieu in Hamshire (where was a monastary of Monkes,of the ordre of Cisterciens) ¶ registered her selfe ¶ hers,as persones there priuileged. Whē it was knowen ỹ she was landed,Edmond duke of Somerset,with lord Jhon his brother Thomas Courtney erle of Deuonshire, the which before euer toke the contrary part,whose sodain chaungyng,shortly turned to his awne cõfusiõ, Jasper erle of Penbroke, Jhon lord Wenlocke (a man made onely by kyng Edward) ¶ Jhon Lõgstrother,Prior of S. Jhones in England,came ¶ in great hast to Beaulieu,¶ presented themselfes to ỹ quene: Although that she wer almoste drouned in sorowe,¶ plunged in pein,yet whyen she sawe and beheld, these noble and princelye personages, to resort vnto her presence,she was somewhat comforted, ¶ greatlye reuiued agayn.

And firste,lest it shoulde be laied to her charge,that she had doen any thyng misauisedly:she declared ¶ shewed the cause, why she coulde not come

come to them in time, as she gladly would haue doen, and for what purpose and intent, she had then taken the immunitie of Sanctuary: Beseechyng them all to studie, and prouide with all diligence, for the wealthe and conseruacion, of her onely iuell the Prince her sonne, and where for this tyme, she dispaired to doo any thyng by force of armes, that might bee to her profite, she thought it moste conuenient for her (if the tyme of yere and her enemies, dyd not let or stop her) to saile again into Fraũce and there to tary till God would sende her better lucke, and more pleasaunt fortune, and to bryng her long purposed busines, to a good conclusion and ende.

After that the Duke and other with comfortable wordes, somewhat had eased the dolorus harte of this vnfortunate quene: The said Duke began with a long processe, to enter communicaciõ of warre to be renewed, and with all haste possible, and extreme diligence, least their compaignie by taryng might bee diminished, and kynge Edwardes power encreased and augmented consideryng that all this time, he had no armie gathered together, for so muche, that at the laste battaill, the very strength of his chief souldiours, was weaked and appalled: And that notwithstandynge, that fortune shone on hym, in obteinynge the victory against the erle of Warwicke, yet now she might turne her saile on the otherside, causyng him to tast eger vineger, as she before had geuen hym to drynke dilicate Ypocrace, when all men se daily, that of warlike affaires at the poynt, there happeneth not seldome tyme, sodain cõmutacions and vnloked variaunce: affirmyng farther, that the more nomber of the nobilitie, bare towarde kyng Henry her husband, their good myndes and fixed hartes, & woulde help hym bothe with men and money. And of his awne free will, yf she would take vpon her, the name of capitain against her enemies, as she before that often tymes had enterprised: he offered a greate power of able men, at his awne expence and charge, promisyng that the two erles, should assure her of a farre greater nomber, of valiant & expert warriers, then she woulde esteme. And whẽ he had shewed that, the victory was now (yf thei liste) in their handes, he merily required theim all, to bee of hardy harte and good chere, and because the matter, required great expediciõ, he thought it not necessary, farther to reason the cause of battail, but determine out of hand how the battaill should be geuen and ordered.

The Quene whose mynde gaue her, that this mociõ, should come to no good conclusion, answered: that she could well allowe this sentence, if she thought that there might happen, no greater losse to some other, then the losse of her awne life. But she suspected that while thei would help thynges, that thei moste phantesied and affected, the life of prince Edward her soonne, in whom, all the whole hope of that familie stoode and remained, should be in perell and ieoperdie: and therfore, she either though it necessarie, to defer the battaill till another time, or els to conueigh her sonne into Fraunce again, there to lie sure and secrete, till the chaunce of the first battayle were tryed and assayed. And no marueyll although the naturall mother, much minded and studied for the sauegarde and tuicion of the lyfe of her sonne, pondering that next her husband, whome she reputed for clene vndone and vtterly caste awaye, she had nothyng more to be beloued, nothing more derer, nor nothynge to be made more of.

Thus this prudēt and politique Quene requyred the cheuetaines expert in marciall feates, that they shoulde before hande premeditate with them selfes, maturely and deliberatly these thinges by her moued x and after that done, yf they thought it conuenient to geue battayle she woulde to their agrement with al her hart be comformable. But there was no longer disputacyon of the matter, for the duke sayd that there was no nede to waste any more woordes, for all they were determined (while their lyues lasted) stil to kepe warre against their enemies, and therfore that thinge which with greate counsayll and deliberacyon is concluded, ought to be auaunced and set forward with a whole consent and agrement.

Thus euery man together clerely bent and encouraged to ỹ battail gathered his power by him selfe. The duke thorough all hys dominix ons, raysed a chosen company of men of warre: likewise did the earle of Deuonshire. The erle of Penbroke went into Wales to his erledome to prepare his people w al diligence. The quene, at ỹ last was brought into this hope of good fortune that she sayd, well be it, & so as the Duke had aduised her, she with her company departed to Bathe, entendyng there to make her abode, tyl more of her affinitie were together assembled. But whether soeuer she went, few or none had therof knowlege, mistrustynge lest her counsayl should by some titiuille, be publyshed and opened to her aduersaries, before she came to the place prefyxed.

When kyng Edward knew that Quene Margaret was landed in xxx England, and that the duke of Somerset with her complices had prepared a new armye, out of hand he dispatched certayn currers on light horses, into euery part to see what nomber hys enemies were, & what way they entēded to take. The explorators, according to their instruccions, serched and sought the partes by West, and made relacyon dilygently at their retorne, what they had knowen and sene. The kynge beyng in a great agony, because he knewe not what waye his enemies toke, determined, surely to encounter thē at some, one place before they came to London. And vpon this conclusion, wyth such an armye as he had gotten about London, he set forward into Oxford shire, and there xl sekynge a place apte and mete to pitche hys tentes, was conducted to Abyndon, where he encamped hym selfe, cōmaunding all men appoynted for the warre, wyth al celeritie to folowe hym to that place. All the kynges host there beyng assembled and reduct into one company, newes were brought to hym, that hys enemies were come to Bathe, and there dyd soiorne and tary purposely to augmēt and encreace their nū-ber of such, as dayly to them did resort, wherfore the kyng without delay remoued straight to Marleborough, being distant from Bathe.xv miles, making hast and great diligence, yf by any possibilitie he myght to geue theim battaile before they diuerted into Wales, whether he thought (as they entended in dede) that they would take their iorney to ioyne them selfe with the erle of Penbroke, whiche had gathered a great host in those parties.

When the Quene knew that kynge Edwarde was come so nere to her, she taryed not long at Bathe, but remoued in greate haste to Bristow: and sent out certayn horsemen to espie, whether she might sauely passe ouer ỹ of Riuer Seuerne by Glouceſter into Wales, whether she determined first to go to augment her armie, and then without any delay wyth spere and shylde, corragiously to set on her enemies, where soeuer they would abide. They that were sent, retorned to her again, declaryng that the toune of Glouceſter was vnder the obeysaunce of Richard, duke of Glouceſter the kynges brother, and that although they had sollicited the lord Beauchampe of Powike, whiche lay there in the Castel, and had the rule of the toune, and the Tounesmē, fyrst by rewardes, after by menacyng, either to take their parte, or peasably to suffer her to passe ouer their bridge, they were therewithal, neither once moued, nor ones wold speake cōfortably to the messengers. Whē she hard these newes, she shortly departed frō Bristow wyth her army, to a proper towne on seuerne syde, called Tewkesbury, leuyng Glouceſter vnassauted, lest peraduenture she might ther spēd her tyme wt much losse & littel gayne, but in her passage towarde Tewkesbury, the lord Beauchāpe toke from her rereward, more ordinãce then she might haue well spared, which did to her no smal preiudice. Whē the Quene was come to Tewkesbury, and knewe that kyng Edward folowed her wyth hys horsemen at the very backe, she was abashed, & wonderfullye amased & determyned in her selfe, to flye into Wales to Jasper erle of Penbroke: But the Duke of Somerset, willynge in no wyse to flye backewarde, for doughtes that he casted might chaūce by the way, determined ther to tary, to take such fortune as God shoulde sende, beynge in hys owne mynde, & so fyxed in a fayre parke, adioynyng to the toune, he pytched hys felde agaynst the wyll and consente of manye other Capitaynes, which would that he should haue drawen a syde, for a whyle til therle of Penbroke wyth his armye were wyth him associate, but his wil serued for his reason, and so the chaunce followed. The duke of Somerset entendyng to abyde the battaile lyke a politique warrior, trenched his campe round about of suche an altytude, & so strongelye that hys enemyes, by no meanes facylie, coulde make any entrye, & farther perceyuynge ỹ his part coulde neuer escape wythoute battayle, determyned there to se the fynall ende of his good or yll chaunce, wherfore he marshalled his host in this maner: he & ỹ lord Jhō of Somerset his brother led the forward: The middelward was gouerned by the prince vnder

the conduite of the lorde of sainct Jhons, & lorde Wenlocke (whom king Edward had highly before preferred & promoted to the degre of a baron) The rereward was put in the rule of the erle of Deuonshire.

When al these battayles were thus ordered and placyd, the Quene & her sonne Prynce Edward rode about the felde, encouragynge their souldiers, promisinge to them (yf they did shew thẽ selfes valiãt against their enemies) greate rewardes & hyghe promocyons, innumerable gayne of the spoyle and bootie of their aduersaries, and aboue all other fame and renoune thorough the whole realme. King Edward likewise which the day before was come wythin a mile to Tewkesbury, put hys brother the duke of Gloucester in the forward, and him self in the middelward, the lord Marques & the lorde Hastynges led the reregarde. The duke of Gloucester, whiche lacked no policye, valyãtly wyth hys battayle assauted the trenche of the Quenes campe, whom the duke of Somerset wyth no lesse courage defended, the duke of Gloucester for a very politique purpose, wyth all hys men reculed backe. The Duke of Somerset, perceyuyng that: lyke a knight, more corragious then circũspect came out of hys trenche, with his whole battayl, and followed the chace, not doubtyng but the Prince and the lorde Wenlocke, wyth the middelward had folowed iust at hys backe. But whether ỹ lorde Wenlocke dissimuled the matter for kyng Edwardes sake, or whether hys harte serued hym not, styl he stode lokinge on. The duke of Gloucester takynge the auãtage that he auentured for, turned agayne face to face to the duke of Somersets battayl, which (nothinge lesse thinkynge on, then of the returne) wer wythin a smal season, shamefully dyscomfited. The duke of Somerset, seyng hys vnfortunate chaunce returned to ỹ middelward, where he seyng the lorde Wenlocke stãdyng styl, after he had reuyled hym, and called him traytor, with his axe he strake ỹ braynes out of hys hedde. The duke of Gloucester entred the trẽch, & after hym the king, where after no lõg conflict, the Quenes part wẽt almost al to wrecke, for the most part were slayne. Some fledde for succor in the thyck of the parcke, some into ỹ monastery, some into other places. The Quene was founde in her Charriot almost deade for sorowe, the prince was apprehended & kepte close by sir Rychard Croftes: ỹ duke of Somerset & the lord Prior of sainct Jhons, were by force taken prisoners, and many other also. In the felde & chace wer slayn lord Jhon of Somerset, the earle of Deuonshire, syr Jhon Delues, syr Edwarde Hampden, sir Robert Wytyngham, and syr Jhon Lewkenor, and .iij. thousand other.

The battayll of Tewkesbury.

A terrible stroke.

After the felde ended, kyng Edward made a proclamacio, that whosoeuer could bryng prince Edward to him alue or deade, shoulde haue an annuitie of an. C.l. duryng his lyfe, and the Princes life to be saued. Sir Richard Croftes, a wyse and a valiant knyght, nothyng mistrustyng the kynges former promyse, brought furth his prisoner kyng Edward, beynge a good Femenine & a wel feautered younge gentleman, when Kyng Edward had wel aduysed, he demaunded of him, how he durst so pyesumptuously enter into his Realme with banner displayd. The pynce beynge bold of stomacke & of a good courage, answered saiynge, to recouer my fathers kyngedome & enheritage, from his father & grandfather to him, and fro hym, after him, to me lineally diuoluted. At which wordes king Edward sayd nothing, but with his hād thrust him from him (or as some say, stroke him with his gauntlet) whome incontinent, they that stode about, which wer George Duke of Clarence Richard duke of Glouceſter, Thomas Marques Dorſet, and William lord Haſtynges, ſodainly murthered, & pitiouſly manquelled. The bitternesse of whiche murder, ſome of the actors, after in their latter daies taſted and aſſayed by the very rod of Juſtyce and punishmente of God. His bodye was homely enterred with the other ſimple corſes, in the church of ỹ monaſtery of black Monkes in Tewkeſbury. Thys was ỹ laſt ciuile battayl that was fought in kyng Edwardes dayes, whyche was gotten the.iij. day of Maye, in the.x. yere of his reygne, and in ỹ yere of our Lord. M.cccc.lxxj. then beyng Satterday. And on ỹ Mōday next enſuynge was Edmond duke of Somerſet, Jhon Longſtrother, Pryor of sayncte Jhons, ſir Garuays Clyfton, Sir Thomas Treſſham, and.xij. other knyghtes and gentlemen beheddes in the market place at Tewkeſbury.

Quene Margaret brought pyſoner too London.

A poore kynge

Quene Margaret lyke a pyſoner was brought to London, where ſhe remayned til kyng Reiner her father raūſomed her wt money, which ſumme (as the French writers affirme) he borowed of kyng Lewes ỹ xi. and because he was not of power nor abilitie to repaye ſo greate a dutie, he ſolde to the French kyng & his heyres, the kingdomes of Naples, and both the Sciciles, wyth the coūtie of Prouince, whiche is the very tytle that kyng Charles the.viij. made when he cōquered ỹ realme of Napels. After the raunſom payed, ſhe was conueyed into Fraunce, with ſmal honor, whych with ſo great triumphe and honorable enterteynmēt was wt pōpe aboue all pryde, receyued into this Realm. xxviij yeres before. And where in the beginning of her tyme, ſhe lyued lyke a Quene, in the middel ſhe ruled lyke an empreſſe, toward thend ſhe was vexed in troble, neuer quyete nor in peace, & in her verye extreme age ſhe paſſed her dayes in Fraunce, more lyke a death then a lyfe, languyſhyng and morning in continuall ſorowe, not ſo muche for her ſelfe and her huſbande, whoſe ages were almoſt conſumed and worne, but for ỹ loſſe of Prince Edward her ſonne (whome ſhe and her huſbād thought to leue, both ouerlyuer of their progeny, and alſo of their kyngedome) to whom in thys lyfe nothyng could be eyther more diſpleaſant or greuous.

After thys battayl, kyng Edward rendered to God his moſte humble thākes, & cauſed publicke proceſſions to be wt all deuout reuerence ſolemply kept thre dayes together in euery Towne and Paryſh. And when he had viſited the townes and places, where his enemies aſſembled bled first together (to the payne and punishmente of no smal number) he wyth good diligence returned toward Londō, for he was enformed how one Thomas Neuel, bastard sonne to Thomas lord Fauconbridg the valyant capitayne, a man of no lesse corage then audacitie (who for his euel condicios was such an apte person, that a more meter could not be chosen to set all the worlde in a broyle, & to put the estate of ỹ realme on an yl hasard) had of new begonne a great commocion. This bastard was before this tyme appoynted by the erle of Warwycke, to be Vyce-admirall of the sea, and had in charge so to kepe the passage betwene Douer and Caleys, that none which either fauored kinge Edward, or his frendes should escape, vntaken and vndrowned. And when by the death of the erle of Warwycke, he was brought into pouertie, he robbed both on the sea & the lande, aswell his enemies, as also his frendes: By reason wherof he gat together a great nauy of shippes, and spoiled in euery ship, and at the last toke lande in Kent, and gathered together a great company of Kentyshmē, such as wer most mete for his purpose, and so marched toward London, where the Essex men hauinge wylde whay wormes in their heddes, ioined them with him, saiyng that their commyng and quarel was to deliuer out of captiuitie kyng Henry the vj. and to bring him to his wyfe, but what soeuer their outwarde wordes were, their inward cogitacions were onlye hope of spoyle, and desyre to robbe and pyll. For the bastarde hym selfe assaulted the drawe bridge of London, and a captayn of hys called Spilsyng scaled Algate with the Essex mē, harnesed in their wyfes Chesecloutes, which assaultes were deadly geuen and manfully resisted, in so much that on bothe partes many were slayne and hurt, but at the last the citezens then put backe the rebelles, and slew and wounded a great number of them, and draue the bastard from all his pray to his shippes, lyenge at Radcleffe, which hauing a good & prosperous wynde, made sayle with al haste, & Roued on the sea, as before he was accustomed.

This stirryng, although it were but littel to thynke on at the firste yet yf it had begonne not long afore, it had brought all kynge Edwardes busines into a doubtful difference: for kynge Edward in these hys last battailes, was twyse more thē fortunate, for that, that he at sondry and seuerall tymes (and not all at one time) was persecuted & inuaded of his enemies, for surely, at the tyme when the erle of Warwicke with his pytched army was cōmyng toward London, if quene Margarete with her company had taken land (which enterpryse she thryse in great ieoperdy coragiously attempted) Then yf she had set on behynd, whyle the erle of Warwycke gaue the ontset before both at one moment, or if Edmond duke of Somerset had not geuen battayle at Tewkesbury, before Jasper erle of Penbroke was come wyth hys train, or if bastard Fawconbridge had vexed the Londoners euen at ỹ tyme: One or ỹ other of these two thinges, should cōsequently haue folowed, that kyng Edwarde must of necessitie once agayne flye out of the Realme, or elles with shame and rebuke yelde hym selfe, either to slaughter or captiuitie: But as in all meane chaunces and small gaynes, good lucke is desyred and prayed, so much more in battayle, is good fortune and fortunate chaunce to be most made of, and chiefly to be auaunced.

Now to returne to bastard Faucõbridge, wauering hither & thither in the doubtful surges of the sea, as sure of hys lyfe on the water, as on the lande, whiche either thinking that no man would se hym, or that all men were blynd, and could not espye hym (and especially in so secrete a place) came into the open hauen of Southampton, and there toke land where he was not long vntaken, but shortlier behedded.

Whē Jasper erle of Penbroke was credibly asserteyned ỹ Quene Margarete had lost the battayl at Tewkesburye, and that there was no more trust of anye comforte or relefe to be had for the parte of poore kyng Henry, he with such men of warre as he was, bringing to his cõfederates, returned back out of the way to ỹ towne of Chepstow, wher he tarieng, deploryng and lamenting, that hast to much hasted, & that vnpurueyed & blynd wyl had at the finall conclusion, not only destroied and brought to nought al kyng Henries estate, riches & preheminence, but further had left al his frendes redy to tosse the waues of fortune, & to seke their liuing where they might sauely get them, began to thinke and prouyde, what way was best to take.

Kyng Edwarde at this season, not beyng out of feare of the earle of Penbroke, sente priuelye into Wales, Roger Vaughan, a man there bothe stronge of people and of frendes, to the entent by som gyle or engyne sodaynely to trap and surpryse the erle: but he hauyng intelligẽces of certayne frendes, how that watche was priuely leyd for him, sodainly in the same toune, toke Roger Vaughã, and without delay stroke of hys hed, so Roger Vaughan, by Gods prouidence, receiued ỹ deathe hym selfe, whych he by decrypt prepared for the other.

The erle in good hast departed thence to Penbroke, whome incõtinent Morgan Thomas, by king Edwardes cõmaundement so strõgly beseged hym, and so enuironed his castell with a ditche and a trenche, that he coulde not lightly flye or escape thence: but he was after eyghte dayes deliuered, and the seage rayled by his faythfull and trusty frendes Dauid Thomas, brother to the forsayd Morgan, and from thence conueyed to Tynbye, a hauen toune in Wales, where he gettyng cõuenient shippes, for to transporte hym and hys ouer the sea into Fraunce wyth his nephew Lorde Henry erle of Rychmonde, and a few of hys familiers toke ship, and by fortunes leadyng, landed in Britayn.

After his arryual, he fyrst wente to duke Fraunces of Britayn, and hym reuerently saluted, expounding to him the cause, the cace, and the necessitie of their thether commyng, committing the lyfes, the goodes and all the chaunces both of hym and hys nephew, wholy to the dukes discrecyon and ordinaunce. The duke receyued both the erles, wyth all benignitie, and shewed to thē no lesse honor, fauor and humanitie, wyth

suche entertainment, that if they had bene his naturall brethren, & geuyng to theim his fayth, seriously made promise that beyng wyth him, they should sustein no maner of wrong, nor no iniury should be to them by any creature offred: assuring them, that they myght within his dominions at al tymes, and in all places, go in safe and good suretie.

When kyng Edwarde had appeased, by the meanes afore rehersed his kyngdome and people, to the intent that there should insurge hereafter, no newe commocion within the realme agayn, he made a iorney into Kente, & there sat in iudgement on suche, as in the last tumulteous x busines, toke part with bastard Faucõbridge, wher many wer (not vnworthy) streyghtly punished & raũsomed, which busines once perfourmed, to thintẽt that all men might se apparantly, that indubitate peace was come into the realme, and that all feare of extreme hostilitie, was banished and exiled for euer: Poore kyng Henry the syxte, a litle before deprsyued of hys Realm, and imperial Croune, was nowe in ỹ Tower of London, spoyled of his life, and all worldly felicitie, by Richard Duke of Gloucester (as the constant fame ranne) which, to thintent that king Edward his brother, should be clere out of al secret suspicyon of sodain inuasion, murthered the sayd kyng wt a dagger. But whosoeuer was xx the manqueller of this holy man, it shall appere, that both the murtherer and the consenter, had condygne and not vndeserued punishment, for their bloudy stroke, and butcherly act: and because they had now no enemies risen, on whom they might reuenge themself, as you shal hereafter perceyue, they exercised theyr cruelty, agaynst their owne selfes: and wyth their proper blud, embrued and polluted their owne handes and membres.

kyng Henry the sixt slayn in the tower.

The ded corps of kyng Henry, with billes and gleues pompeously, (yf you call that a funerall pompe) was conueighed from the tower, to the church of sainct Paule, and there layed on a beere, where it lay the xxx space of an whole daye: and the next day, wythout Priestes or Clarcke, Torche or Taper, syngyng or saiyng, it was conueighed to the Monastery of Chertesey, beyng distant from London. xv. Mile, & there was buryed, but after he was remoued to Windsore, & ther in a new vawte newly intumilate. Thys kyng Henry reygned full. xxxviij. yeres, and xvij. dayes, and after that he had repossessed hys kyngdõ. vj. monethes he lyued. lij. yeres, hauing by his wyfe one onely sonne, called Edward Prince of Wales.

The descripcion of kyng Henry the. vi kyng Henry was of stature goodly, of body slender, to which proporcion, al others members wer correspondẽt: his face beautiful in ỹ which xl continually was resydent, the bountie of mynde, wyth whych, he was inwardly endued. He dyd abhorre of hys owne nature, al the vices, as wel of the body as of the soule, and from hys verye infancye, he was of honest conuersacion and pure integritie, no knower of euil, and a keper of all goodnes, a dispiser of al thynges, whych were wonte to cause the myndes of mortall menne to flyde, or appaire. Besyde thys, pacyence was so radicate in his harte, that of all the iniuries to him commytted, (which were no smal nombre) he neuer asked vengeaunce nor punishement, but for that, rendered to almightie God, his creator, hartie thankes, thinking that by this trouble, and aduersitie, his sinnes wer to him forgotten and forgeuen. What shall I saye, that thys good, thys gentle, this meke, this sober, and wyseman, did declare and affirme, ỹ those mischiefes and miseries, partly, came to hym for his owne offence, and partly for the hepyng of sinne vpon sinne, wretchedly by his auncetors and forfathers: wherfore, he litle or nothing estemed, or in any wise did turment or macerate him selfe, what soeuer dignitie, what honor, what ỹ state of lyfe, what child, what frend he had lost, or missed, but if it did but sound an offence toward God, he loked on that, and not wythout repẽtaunce, both mourned and sorowed for it: these and other like offices of holynes, caused God to worke miracles for him, in his lyfe tyme (as old menne sayed) By reason whereof, king Henry the seuenth not without cause, sued to July Bishop of Rome, to haue him canonized, as other sainctes be: but the fees of canonizing of a king, wer of so great a quantitie at Rome (more then the canonisyng of a Bishoppe or a prelate, although he satte in saincte Peters Cheire) that the said king thought it more necessary, to kepe his money at home, for the profite of his realme ỹ and countrey, rather then to empouerysh his kingdom, for the gaining of a new holy day of sainct Henry: remitting to God the iudgement of his will and intent. This king Henry, was of a liberal minde, and especially to such as loued good learning, and them whome he sawe profite in any verteous science, he hartely fauored and embraced, wherfore he fyrste holp his owne young scolers, to atteyne to discipline, and for the he founded a solempne schole at Eton, a toune next vnto Windsore, in the which he had stablysshed, an honest Colege of sad Priestes, with a great nombre of chyldren whyche bee there, of hys coste frankely and frely taughte, the rudimentes and rules of Grammer. Beside thys, ỹ he edifyed a Princely Colege, in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, called ỹ kynges Colege, for the further erudicion, of such as wer brought vp in Eton, whiche, at this daye so floryssheth, in all kyndes, as well of litterature, as of toungues, that aboue all other, it is worthy to bee called the Prince of Coleges.

Canonyzing of sainctes is costly.

The.xi. yere NOwe to returne to kyng Edwarde, whyche was releued of the most part, of hys prickynge feare, and inwarde suspicion, to thintent that no print or shadowe, shoulde remayne of the ỹ aduerse faccion, in hys Realme. He dylygentlye requyred and serched out, all the fragmentes and leuynges, of hys enemyes parte, intendynge to represse, and vtterly to extynguysshe theim. And fyrst to begynne wyth all, he sent George Neuel, brother to the erle of Warwycke, and Archebyshoppe of Yorke, vnder strong conduyte, to ỹ

Calle

Castle of Guysnes, there to be kept in extreme captiuitie, wher he long continued, and at the laste, by frendship deliuered: whyche of very pensiuenes and grudge of minde, shortly after deceassed, whom, Laurence Bathe, and after him Thomas Rotheram, in the sea of Yorke, did ordinarily succede. Beside this, Jhon Erle of Oxenford, whych after Barnet feld, bothe manfully gat, and valiantly kept, sainct Mighels Mount in Cornewal: either for lacke of aide, or perswaded by his frendes, gaue vp the Mount, and yelded him self to kyng Edward, (hys life onely saued) whych to him was graunted: but to be out of all doubtfull imagi-x nacions, king Edward sent him ouer the sea, to the Castle of Hammes, where by the space of.xij.yeres, he was in strong prison, miserably kept and diligently looked to. Many other beside these, in diuerse partes of the realme, beyng very litle or nothyng suspected: wer either cõmitted to prison, or grieuously fined and taxed. Beside this, lest his neighbors countrey, might be an harborough, or receptacle of his foes and aduersaries, he cõcluded a newe league, with James the third king of Scottes, for the terme of.xx.yeres. And yet, whatsoeuer he thought in his imaginacion, for all his besy diuises, and pollitique forecastinges: hys mynde and phantesy, wer not clere exonerate and dispatched of all fear xx and inward trouble: For tidings wer brought to hym, that the erles of Penbroke and Richmond, were arryued in Britayne: and there of the Duke, hyghly cherysshed, wel fostered and entertayned.

The.xij.yere.

Hys thyng nipped kynge Edward hardly at the very stomacke, as though hys mind, casting some euill to come after: did signifie before, that the Erle of Richemond, should once atteyne to the croune & diademe of the realme: which mischief, when he had well digested, he secretly sent wyse xxx and close messengers, to the duke of Brytayne, the which shoulde not sticke, to promyse the duke, great & sumpteous rewardes (knowinge ỹ mede, many thinges corrupteth) so that he would deliuer, both therles into their handes and possession. The duke gladly harde them ỹ were sent, but when he knewe, the two Erles to be a praye, of suche a greate value, he determined not to deliuer theim, but rather to entertayn thẽ with him more diligently, then thei wer accustomed. The duke answered the orators, that it stode not wyth hys honor, nor he would not deliuer the two Erles, to whom, he was bound and obliged, by hys fayth and promyse: but thys he promysed to do for the kynges pleasur, that xl they should be kept, and with such vigilant persones, cõtynually watched, that the kyng should haue no maner of cause, once to thynke, that they could or should attenipt any thing, that myght sound, either to his displeasure or preiudice. When the messengers saw, that they could not obtein, that which thei desired, like wysemen held themselfs contented wyth that, whyche by the Duke was offred, & so returned into Englãd.

The.xii.yere.

The kyng wrote to the Duke of Britayne, louingly requiringe him, to accomplishe, with al spede, that, whiche he, of hys owne mocion offered, promysynge him not onely, menne and greate rewardes, but yerely to rewarde hym, with a ful hand, and a well stuffed purse. The duke perceiuyng the swete gain, which rose to him, by the abode of the two Englisch Erles, in his Countrey: least they for any cause, shoulde abandon his dominions, and seke succors in some other forrein Region, caused the one to be segregated from the other: and remoued from them such Englishmen, as wer dayly on them attendant and came wyth them into Britayn, and in their places appoynted Britõs, to be their seruitors to minister, and contynually to attend and wayte on them.

When kyng Edward had thus pollitiquely, as he thought, compassed the Duke of Britain: he thinkinking nothing lesse, then to take a damage at the duke of Burgoynes hand, yea, and such a damage, as by all similitude, was bothe lyke, continually to greue and vexe the realme of Englande: and farther to be an occasion, of a common stop, and putting backe of the commodities, growen wythin this realme, to be transported into outward partes North Eastward, was yet eftsones, brought into a newe doubte and perplexitie. For the declaracion whereof, you muste vnderstande, that Lewes ỹ Frenche kyng, had a brother called Charles, which was not the wysest, nor yet a man of the greatest experience: and of a certayn curtesie, loued better to haue other men to rule him, then he to take vpõ him to rule other. And although that the king at thys tyme, had no sonne, nor other brother, but him, hys open heire apparant: he litle fauored, and lesse loued him, nothyng geuyng hym of his good wyll, for his parte and portion, of his fathers landes, but ỹ, to the which he was cõpelled by his counsayl, and that he gaue hym thys moneth, in ỹ next moneth, he would by flatery or by thretnyng, by war or corruption of his brothers seruauntes, obtain & bring to his handes and possession agayn. For first he gaue him the Duchy of Berry, & after that whole Normandy, wherof in no long tyme, he bereft him the possession, regimẽt & title, without any cause geuẽ, on ỹ partie of yõg Charles. And when the said Charles, had afterward departed, with the cõtreyes of Brye & Chãpaygne, by a fraudulent feat: king Lewes caused hym to relinquishe the same, & to take for hys parentage, the duchie of Guyen & so was called & named the Duke of Guien. This euil entreating of the duke of Guyẽ, by the Frẽch kyng his brother, caused diuerse other Princes, of no small puyssance, to fauor, ayde, and succor the sayde Duke (of the which the chief wer, Charles duke of Burgoin, Fraunces duke of Britaine, & Lewes Earle of sent Poll, Constable of Fraunce) This duke of Guyen, by the sollicityng of his adherentes, sore labored to haue in mariage, the sole doughter and onely heire, of Charles Duke of Burgoyne, by whom he hoped to be lorde and soureygne, of al duke Charles inheritaunce. To the furtheraunce of this mariage, holp with all his power, the Duke of Britayn, as who sayed, that, it should be only ly his acte. The Constable of Fraunce on the other parte, thought that he alone, was able able to compasse this mariage, and to haue soly the thankes, of the duke of Guyen. The French king did al that he could, to let & stoppe this mariage: for yf hys brother had obteyned the younge Lady with al her possessions, then he sawe well ynough, that the duke of Guyen, being ioyned with the Duke of Britayne, should be stronge ynough, or at the least of puissance ynoughe, to encomber the frenche kyng and his children. But kyng Edwarde of Englande, sore smoked, when he heard first tel of this mariage, and not without a cause: For he x considered, that the frēch kyng had no heire male, but one weake boy and that the Duke of Guyen, was likely to were the croune of Fraunce after his brother or nephewe. And yf this mariage shoulde procede, all Burgoyn, Brabant, Holland, zeland, Flaunders, and al the lowe countreys, where the Englyshe men, for the most parte, made their martes, and vttered there their merchaūdise, should be vnited and annexed to the Croune of Fraunce, and in the handes of the old, and auncient enemies of the realme: For so had poore England, and litle Caleis, ben cōtinually in the daunger of their enemies, & almoste with thē enuironed rounde about. These thinges considered, kyng Edward and his coun-xy sayl, tooke the matter in greate earnest, and seriously wrote to Duke Charles, that yf he would conclude, any mariage in Fraunce, to ỹ hurt and preiudice, of the realme of Englande: that he shoulde knowe ỹ he had, not onely broken his league and amitie, but also fynde, that he had bene better to haue dissimuled, wyth the best frēde that he had, thē priuily, wythout reason, to haue iuggeled with the realme of Englande. The duke of Burgoin made reasonable answeres, and honest excuses, the Counsayl of Englande, in no wyse would geue credite therto, euer surmysyng that the maryage should take effect. And certaynly at this season, the Englishmen had rather haue taken part, wth the French king xxx then wyth the duke of Burgoyne: yf it had not bene onely, to empeche and stoppe this mariage, so much the Englyshemen disdayned, to haue the house of Burgoyn, conioyned and vnite, to the Croune of Fraūce. But the Duke of Burgoyne dalyed, and dissimuled wyth all parties, in thys matter, geuinge them fayre wordes, & makyng large promises, by the whiche, first he deceyued other, & in cōclusion him self. He promysed his doughter, to Nicolas duke of Calaber, with whō he had rather haue had her buried, then bedded. Duke Philbert of Sauoy, had an outward answere assuredly, whē nothyng was so minded inwardly. Maximilian Duke of Austrice, and after kynge of Romaynes, sonne to the xl Emperor Frederycke, could neuer obtein, during the life of duke Charles, but only glosing & paynted promyses: but al wordes, wrytynges & promises, whatsoeuer they wer, clerely set a side, he was surely fixed & determined (as Argenton hys counsayler doth write) that no mariage as long as he liued, should sort to any effecte, at the least by his consent.

Now lette vs leue the Duke of Burgoyne, about his affaires for a whyle

whyle, and returne to kyng Edward: which, in y. xiij. yere of his reigne called hys high Court of Parliament, at his Palace of Westmynster, in the whyche, al lawes, and ordinaunces, made by him before that daie were corroborated and confirmed: and suche Lawes made by hym, as kyng Henry the sixt, had caused to be abrogated and adnichilated, he again reuiued and renouated. He made farther lawes, both for the confiscacion of the goodes of the rebelles, to hys persone, as also for restoryng of suche, as fled out of the realme, for his querel and occasiō: which by his aduersaries, as traitors to the kynge and Countreye, a lytle before, were of high treason attainted, and to death cōdempned. Toward his charges of late susteyned, a competent some of money was demaūded, and frankely graunted: and in conclusion, al inward grudges and open discordes, the which had long continued, in the hartes of the nobilitie, whyche, nowe were very fewe (the more part being consumed in the warres) he clerely extirped, and brought to vnitie and concorde. Kyng Edward holpe to this agrement, as much as in hym lay: And to the intent that other men, should forget iniuries to them done, and put away al rancor and malice: followyng hys good and godly example, he clerely pardoned almoste all offences, and all men then beynge wythin the Realme, he frankely discharged, although they had taken parte wt his aduersaries agaynst hym, of all high treasons and crymes.

The.xiij.pere

Whyle kynge Edward was thus setting an ordre, and pacyfiynge all thynges, whyche were oute of square: Charles duke of Burgoyn, whose spirite was neuer in quiete, whose ambicious minde, was neuer satisfyed, whose haute and hyghe stomacke, coulde neuer be tamed (till death it swaged and abated) desyrynge aswell to amplifye, and enlarge his territories and dominions, lyng on the syde of the ryuer of Ryne, toward high Burgoin as also to recouer agayn Amias and other tounes, which the Frenche kyng, more by fraude, then by feates of warre, had from him wrongfully vsurped: and further aboue all thynges, couetyng to haue the Frēch kyng, to haue some great shame, losse or hynderaunce, could not inuent no one waye, so apt and mete for his imagined purpose, as to entice and perswade the kyng of England, by his ambassadors, to make warre vpon the sayd kyng and his countrey, for the recouerynge of his old right and auncient title in the same, by the French kyng & his father, agaynst al ryght and equitie, wythholden and deteygned. King Edward begā a litle to harken on that syde, not so much for to help the Duke of Burgoyne (to whome he was much bounde, for hys ayde in the tyme of his exile, as you before haue heard) as for to be reuenged of kyng Lewes whome, he reputed for his mortall enemie. Firste, for aydinge y Erle of Warwycke and hys complyces, agaynst him: secondarely, for the long mainteynynge, and fosterynge of Quene Margarete, and her sonne prince Edward (whome for a farther affinitie, he had made Godfather to hys sone Charles the Doulphyn) within his coũtreys & Dominiõs. Whereupon, when he hadde consulted with the nobilitie and the chiefe & sage persons of the Realme (which in manner haue a certayne naturall inclination to make warre in Fraũce, either for hope of great spoyle and gayne, or of a certayne priuie canker engendered in the hartes of their forefathers, in tyme longe past, and after by lyneall succession descended in to the stomackes of their nephewes) he aũswered the Dukes messenger, that in the beginnyng of the yere, he would lande at Caleys x with such a puissant army, that the Frenche kyng should well perceyue that he lacked neither men, nor that his men lacked stomackes, bothe for to reuẽge their soueraygnes quarell, and also to recouer his right. And for a treuth, at this season there was mortall war betwene kynge Lewes & the duke of Borgoyne. And more likely to fall betwene hym and other, for kynge Lewes, of nature was harde of speche, & chorlishe in answere, froward & vngentell aswell to his frendes as to hys foes. By reason wherof many great men within the realme of Fraunce, not content with his grosse rudenesse, and rude dissimulaciõ, began to haue intelligens, and to cleue to the duke of Borgoyn, emongest whom was xi Lewes of Luxenborough, erle of sainct Poll, & Constable of Fraunce which beyng confedered with the duke and other noble men, determined so to vex & scorge kynge Lewes with some plague, by the whyche other he should be transformed into a man, clerely altered frõ hys olde qualities, or els shoulde be in ieopardye, bothe of losse of lyue & realme, for it was determined that Fraunce should be set on & assaulted, bothe with outward enemies, and inward dissimulers. All these thynges the duke of Borgoyne with kyng Edward, did communicate to the entent the soner to allure and prouoke him, to enterprise the warre, according to hys desyre. These thynges, as tokens of victorie, before animated xxx kyng Edward, and enforced hym in maner to make warre on Fraunce and so with all expediciõ prepared all thynges necessarie, bothe for water and lande. And because no small summe of money was sufficient for so great a charge, and that the money the yere before to him auaunced by the realme, was consumed in his houshold, and other necessarye affayres, he conceyued a new deuice in hys imaginacion, by the which engine he might couertly perswade and entice hys ryche frendes, to geue & graunt hym some cõueniẽt summe of money, toward his inestymable charges, and incredible costes, which thing, if they did not willingly assent to, he then would impute to them greater ingratitude, & more vnxl kyndnes, wherupon he caused hys officers to bryng to him the moste ryche persons one after another. And to them he explaned the cause, & the purpose, & the necessitie of the warre begon, & the fayntnesse & leanesse of his treasure, and the great & importune lacke of money, hartely requyring them for their loue and affecciõ, that always they had borne to hym, beyng their natural Prince, of their awne gratuitie and frewill to geue to hym some ayde or money, for mayntenance of his warre and army: what should I say more: This inuencion came to this effect, that some calling to their remẽbraunce, the benefites of hym receyued, some with shame, some with feare moued and entouraged, gaue to hym liberally bothe of their substaunce and treasure, which without grudge he coulde not haue otherwise obteyned. But here I wil not let passe a prety conceyt, that happened in this gathering, in the which you shall not onely note the humilitie of a kynge, but more the fantasie of a woman. Kynd Edward had called before him a wydow, muche aboundynge in substance, and no lesse growen in yeres, of whome he merely demanded & what she gladly would geue him towarde his greate charges. By my treuth quod she, for thy louely countenance thou shalt haue euen. xx. l. the kyng lokyng scace for the halfe of that summe, thanked her, and louingly kyst her, whether the sauor of his brethe did so cõfort her stommacke, or she estemed the kysse of a kynge, so precious a iuell, she swore incontinently, that he should haue. xx. l. more, whiche she with the same will payed that she offered it. The kyng willing to shew that this benefite was to hym much acceptable, and not worthy to be put in obliuion called this graunt of money a beneuolence, not withstãding that many with grudge & maleuolẽce gaue great summes toward that new foũde xx beneuolence. But the vsing of such gẽtill fashions toward them, wyth frendly prayer of their assistance in his necessitie, so tempted theim that they could none otherwise do, but frankely and freely yelde & geue hym a reasonable reward.

Prince

When all thynges conuenient for such an enterprise were in a redynesse. Kynge Edwarde with his army remoued to Douer, where he found. v. C. shyppes and Hoyes, redy to transport hym & hys army ouer the sea: And so he hym selfe with xxx his nobilitie warlikely accompaignied, passed ouer betwene Douer and Caleys, the. iiij. daye of July, and landed at Caleys wyth great triumphe, his armye, horses & munycions of warre, scace passed ouer in. xx. dayes (whome the Frenchmen bragged would haue ben taken, if they had wel cõsidered the chaunce before, as they knew it after) When kyng Edward with all his army royall, was without any trouble landed, and in suertie, he caused euery man, accordyng to his degre, to be ordered & lodged. This armye, by the writynge of Argentõ, was the fayrest and the strongest armye that passed out of Englande into Fraunce many yeres before, for the men were so well armed, and so surely in all thynges appoynted & prouided, that the Frenche naciõ were xl not onely amased to behold them, but much more praysed them & there oder. In this army were. xv. C. men of armes wel horsed, of the which the most parte were barded & rychely trapped, after the most galiard fashion, hauyng many horses decked in one suyte. There were farther

xb. M. archers, beryng bowes & arrowes, of the whiche a great parte were on horsebacke. There were also a great nũber of fightinge men & other, aswell to set vp Tentes & Pauilons (where of the Englishemen had great plenty) as to serue their Artilarie, and to enclose their campe or otherwise to labor. And in all this army there was not one page.

The kyng of Englande was at his arryuall highly displeased wyth the duke of Burgoyn, which in the worde of a Prince, promised hym to mete hym at his landing with .ij. M. men of armes & light horsemẽ, beside a great number of Lanceknightes & Halberdes, & that he woulde x haue begonne the warre .iij. monethes before ỹ kynges transporting, the more to ver & greaue the French kyng, & to cause him seke hys wittes. The duke of Borgoyn at this season, lay at seage before ỹ stronge towne of Nuyce, with a puissant army, agaynst whome were assembled the Emperor Frederike, and almost the whole Empire for ỹ rescow of the towne, to whome the kyng of England sent the lord Scales in post, requyringe him to leaue his boyd seage before the impregnable towne of Nuyce, and to retorne in all hast with his people and armye to make warre in Fraunce, accordyng to his promise and othe, declaring farther that the tyme passed, & the Somer woulde be lost, with this charge the xx lord Scales departed in all hast toward the duke, whome we will leue, rydinge toward Nuyce for a whyle.

O Fraunce Fraũce, how much art thou bounde to laude & prayse thy Sauior for the deliueraunce, in the tyme of thy affliccio. For if God had not permitted the cãcard hart of the duke, to be indurate, nor his weke brayne to be vexed, nor yet his ambicious affection to bee enflamed, so that he with all his power had ioyned with the armye of Englande on the one syde, hauyng on their syde ỹ duke of Brytayn with his power. These thre princes had bene lyke to haue made Fraunce, either to bow or to breke, either to yelde or to suffer the chaunces of fortune, which she xx lyke a wauering Goddes, hadde prouided for her punishment. Before kyng Edward departed from Douer, he sent to the Frenche kynge an officer of armes (whome Argenton vntrewly calleth Garter borne in Normandy, for the rome of Gartier was neuer geuẽ to no estraunger) which Herault deliuered to the French kynge with all dew reuerẽce a letter of defiance, bothe for the stile & the pennyng excellently endited, which the Frenchmen would scant beleue to be framed by an Englisheman. The letter requyred the Frẽch king to rẽder to the kyng of Englande, the realme of Fraunce to him of right, & by lyneall enheritaunce aperteyning & belonging, to thentẽt ỹ he might put agayn the church, xl the nobilitie, and the commons into their aunciẽt estates, & liberties, & to disburdẽ & exonerate them of the great charges, trauayles & labors, that they now were in. And in case ỹ he did refuse so to do, then he dyd protest the harme that should ensue, in the forme & maner, that in suche a case is requisyte & accustumed to be done. Kynge Lewes red ỹ letter secretly to him selfe, & after all alone in a great study withdrew him self into hys warderobe, & sending for the English Herault, said to hym, sir I know, & wel wot, ỹ the kyng of England your maister, is neither descended in these partes of his awne fre motion, nor yet of vs requyred, but onely entised & prouoked by the duke of Burgoyn, and somewhat enforced by the cõmons of his Realme. But now you may se that ỹ season of the yere passeth, & the duke of Burgoyn is in poore estate, returning from Nuyce all most discõforted. The Cõstable also, with whome the kyng your souereygne lord, I am sure hath some intelligẽce, for fauor that your maister hath maried his nece, is not so sure a frende as he is taken for, & if all the world knew how I haue promoted him, & what I haue done for him, they would littel thynk, that he would so vntruly handle me as he dothe, for I assure you, he is a depe dissimuler, & in continual dissimulacion, entendeth to lede his lyfe, entertayning all mẽ for his awne profit. And although ỹ kyng your maister, be vnsure of al his other promises, yet of one thing he shall be sure, that is: he shall be euer dissimuled with all, & therfore I say to you, and not to youre maister, ỹ he were better haue a peace with an old enemye, then the promises and familiaritie of a new dissimuling frẽde, which peace most pleaseth God, and is the thinge that I moste do desyre. When he had sayd, he gaue to the Herault. iij. C. crounes, promisinge hym a. M. crounes, if any good apoyntement came to passe. The Herault being more coueteous of the crounes, thẽ secret, according to the duetie of his office, promised to do all thinges that in him lay, not doubting, but that the kyng his maister would be conformable to any reasonable offer, aduisinge the Frenche kyng (after kyng Edward were once lãded) to send to him an Herault, to fetche a sauecondyte & pasport, for suche as should labor & trauayle in that treatie. And that the sayd Herault should first resort to the lord Stanley, or to the lord Hayward, for the cõducting of him to the kinges presence. When the Herault should depart, the kyng gaue him a pece of Crymosen Ueluet of. xxx. yardes long, commaundinge and strayghtly chargyng, that no man should be so hardy once to cõmen with him, but to let hym passe in all gentel fashiõ. When the Herault was gone, kyng Lewes callynge to him. vij. or. viij. of his familiers, caused the letter to be red, of the whiche he was but a littell afrayd & lesse abashed, considering the English Herault had shewed him playnly, how to enter into ỹ port of the treatie, & in maner how to gayn & conquere the fortresse, of which enformacion he was not a littel ioyous, & wisely and secretly according to thesame, when he saw his tyme, he prosecuted his purpose. In this very season, the lord Scales came to the duke of Burgoyn before Nuyce, accompting to him his message, as he was commaunded. The duke of Burgoyn, beyng so sore set to cõquere ỹ towne of Nuyce, aunswered the lord Scales, that his honor was lost, and shame shoulde be spoken of him thorough all Christendom, if he shoulde rayse his feld and breke his seage, but he hoped shortly to gayne the towne, and then with triumphãt victory, to come to ayde kyng Edward with his whole army:with this answere ỹ lord Scales departed,which onely answer was comen without any other augmentacion, to all such as kyng Edward sent,to haue the duke to kepe his promes. What a folye was this in duke Charles,to besege a towne impregnable,euen at thesame time when the Englishmen at his request had passed the sea,which thyng all the tyme of his regiment,he had bothe traueled in, and sore requyred, and neuer coulde compasse tyll this season, and also all thinges beynge well disposed for hys purpose, both in Brytayn and in other places,except he more regarded to conquere a new towne,then to defende al his x olde possessions and seigniories. But shortly after by the Byshoppe of Romes authoritie,he left Nuyce vncõquered, but lesyng a great number of his people,and the rẽnaunt he sent into Lorayne and Barroys, there to lye and trouble duke Reyner of Lorayn, whiche a littel before had defied hym,lyeng before Nuyce. And he him self with a small companye,came to kyng Edward before Calays,with whom kyng Edward at the fyrst cõming, began somwhat to be greued, laiyng to his charge that at hys mocion,request and desyre,he with all hys army had passed the seas onely to the entent with mortall warre,to plague and scourge the proude realme of Fraunce. And that he leuyng all thynges (whiche xi shoulde molest or trouble the Frenche kynge) aparte,applied hym selfe to matters of Lorayne,and externe nacions, more then to reuenge the open iniuries to him done by hys neyghbor the Frenche kynge. The duke excused hym selfe with ieopardyng the losse of hys honor,if he had returned from Nuyce,and also that of necessitie, he was compelled too leue hys armye in Lorayne,to be reuenged ouer duke Reyner, whych had hym before Nuyce with spytefull wordes and raylyng termes defied and detested:affirmyng farther,that nowe in the begynnyng with a small companye,a great enterprice might be gayned. In prose wherof he delyuered to the kynge,letters of credence,sent from the Consta xii ble of Fraunce,which willed the king to geue credite and perfait fayeth to the duke. In makinge relacion of suche secretes as were to hym geuen in charge to declare to the kynges awne person, fyrste he shewed that all though the Constable had promised to the kyng and the duke, to render vp to them the town of sainct Quintynes,yet it had not come to so good effect,if it had bene yelded,the duke beynge in Germany,as it now shall,the kynge and the duke beynge bothe personally presente, at the deliuerance. Wherfore he exhorted the kyng to set forward, & to display hys banner,and set forth hys standard. And so by hys mocion, the kyng accompanied wyth the duke,hys armye departed out of Ca-xi leys, & passed by Boleyne to Perone, where the Englishmen thought themselfes of the duke,more lyke enemyes thẽ frendes to be entertey-ned,for at the gates entered but a fewe that were apoynted, the remnant lodged in the feldes,better purueyed of their awne, thẽ of the dukes prouision.

The kyng of England,thinkyng surely, and fyrmely beleuyng that the Constable ment all treuthe, and the soner enduced to that credēce because the Constable was great Uncle to the Quene his wyfe, where in very dede, he nothing lesse minded then trouthe, remoued his campe from Peron, the Duke of Bourgoyn, beynge in his armye, and marched toward saynct Quintynes: certayne Englishmen ran before the toune, agaynst whose commyng they thought that the belles should haue ben rong, and the gates set open. But whē they approched the toune, the artillarie began to shote, and they of the toune came out bothe on fote and horsbacke, and skyrmished with the Englishemen, of whiche two or thre were slayne. This welcome semed very straung to kyng Edward & ponderynge together yestardayes promise, & this dayes doynge. The Duke woulde not that the kyng should desist from hys purpose, because the toune was not yelded at the sight of a handfull of people, whyche thynge he sayed, although the Constable woulde gladly haue done, at the first, but yet he woulde haue a couler to do it, as thoughe it shoulde appere that he did it by verye conpulsion and force: and therefore, if the kynge woulde make but semblance to besege the toune, he would warrant, that incontinent it should be rendered. The kynge of Englande, perceiuyng that he was deluded in his first enterprice, thought it more surer to heare the fayre wordes of the Constable, and the duke, then to & geue credit to theyr vntrew and disceatfull doynges. The Englishemen returned to theyr campe, very yl content, as I can not blame them murmeryng agaynst the Constable, callynge hym Traytor, periured & vntrew gentelmā. Besyde this angre, ther came the next daie another corsey, that smarted a littell sorer, for Duke Charles of Bourgoyne, by whose meanes kyng Edward had taken vpon hym this warre, either perceyued that all the Constables promises were but fayre sunne shynyng, swetely spoken, and sowerly performed, or els he saw that he him selfe lacked men or money, to procede farther with king Edward in his iorney: toke hys leaue sodaynly of the kynge of Englande, saiynge that & he must nedes visite, and se hys army in Berroys, promisinge shortlye with all puissance to returne agayne to the great auantage & commoditie of them bothe, and so in hast departed.

This departyng was bothe displeasaunt and straunge to the kynge of Englande, considering that in hope to haue the duke hys continuall felow in armes, and too haue hys counsayll in the order of hys people (whiche of late had not frequented the warre of Fraunce, nor yet perfitly knewe the force, the agilitie and the maner of the Frenche nacion) had passed the seas, raysed his standard, & by ỹ dukes procurement entered into the lande of hys enemyes, and nowe to beleft alone without & guyde or leder, without ayde or succor in the middell of hys foes, he coulde no lesse thynke, but that the duke neither vsed hym lyke a prince nor yet kept hys promes lyke a trewe man, whyche vnstable and dissimulyng worckynge, caused, ye, and rather enforced kyng Edward both to thynke that he neuer thought, & to do that he neuer entēded to do.

The Englishe men sore murmured against the Constable, and no lesse against the duke, sauyng thei determined, neuer to geue confidẽce to ỹ Constables wordes, & greatly doubted, whether thei might geue anye credite to the dukes promise. Thus laie thenglishmẽ in the feldes whẽ the cold nightes begã to waxe long, without any gain of cõquest, which caused the common people, which be not alwaies contẽt with hardnes rather to desire to returne homeward, thẽ to procede any daies iorney forward. The French kyng which was bothe wily & wittie (and especially for his awne purpose) knewe by his espials, ỹ vntrue refusall made x by the Constable, the vnfrendly departyng of the Duke of Burgoyne, and the daily murmuryng of thenglishemen, against them bothe, wherfore he thought nowe, that it was verie expedient, to folowe the counsaill of the Englishe Herault, in sendyng for a saueconduite, for metyng of Ambassadors, to common of a treatie, yf it might be well compassed. But yet to auoyde all doubtes, he reised an armie, and the more he perceiued, the power of his enemies to encrease, ỹ more he studied, how by power to resist them, and ouer that armye he made capitain, Monsire Robert de Estoteuile a baliaunt man, whom, he sent into Artoys, to defende the Frountiers there, against the kyng of Englandes entree and xx inuasions: and he himself taried still at Senlis. The Frenche kyng beyng thus priuilie desirous of peace, although he outwardly shewed the countenaunce of Mars: meanyng quietnes, and settyng furthe warre, caused a barlet to be suborned, in a cote armure of Fraũce (whiche for haste, was made of a trũpet banner) because kyng Lewes was not much desirous, nor greatly passed on honor, and seldome had in his Courte, either officer of Armes or Trompet; which barlet was well animated, and no lesse instructed, how to do his message (whiche was deliuered to hym in writyng) bothe with a bolde countenaunce, and a sober demeanure. This coũterfeight Herault, although he was but a berlet in dede xxx was bothe wittie and wel spoken, and so rode in sad maner, nere to the Englishe army, and there put on his cote of Armes. The Englishe outskourers perceiuyng by his cote, that he was an officer of armes, gẽtly saluted hym, and enquired of hym, whether his iorney laie: he sadly answered, that his message was from the French king, to the kyng of Englande. Then was he conueighed to the tent, where the lord Haward, and the lord Stanley, with other wer at dinner, where he was highly entertaigned, and no lesse welcomed. And after dinner he was brought before the kynge, in whose presence, with a bolde audacitie, & no fearfull speche, he declared first his credence, because he was an officer of armes xl (to whom, credite by the lawe of all nacions, ought to be geuen) and secondarely, he published the thynges, to hym geuen in charge and commaundement, saiyng: Right high & mightie Prince, right puyssaunt & noble kynge, if your excellent wisedõ did perfectly knowe, or your high knowlege did apparantly perceiue: what inward affeccion, and feruent desire, the kyng my Master hath alwaies had, to haue a perfecte peace, a sure vnitie, and a fraternall concord, betwene your noble persone, and your Realme, and his honorable personage, and his Dominions, you would (and for truthes sake) should confesse and saie, that neuer Christian Prince, more thrusted for an amitie, nor yet no louer hath more sought, to attain to the fauour of his paramor, then he hath soughte, to haue with you, a perpetuall frendship, amitie, and alliance: to the intent that the subiectes of bothe the realmes, quietly liuyng vnder two princes, confederate and combined together, in an indissoluble cõfederacie & league, maie mutually embrace eche other in their hartes, maie personally haue resort, and frequent eche others princes territories & dominions, with their Merchaundises & wares: And finally, the one to liue with the other, as frende with frende, brother with brother, cõpaignion with compaignion in continuall loue, reste, and tranquilitie. And for his parte he dooth affirme and saye, that sithe he receiued firste the Croune of his kyngdome, & was anoynted with the holye Ampulle, he neuer attẽpted, nor yet once imagined, any warre or thyng preiudiciall toward your royall persone, your realme, or your people. If you peraduenture will saie, that he supported, & maintained the Earle of Warwicke, against your maiestie, he surely that dooth and will denie: For he aided hym against the Duke of Burgoyne, whom, he knewe not onely to be his extreme enemie, but also to laie in waite, bothe by sea and land either to take hym, or vtterly to destroye hym. Whiche Duke of Burgoyne, onely for his awne cause, hath excited and sollicited youre highnes, to come ouer the troubelous and tempestious seas, to the intent to cause (yea, in maner to compell) the kyng my Maister, to cõdescende to such treatie and appoyntment, as shoulde bee to his onely profite, and neither to your honor, nor yet to your gain. For if he and such other, as daily flatered hym for their peculier profites (as he had many in deede, that daily sucked at his elbowe) had once obteined the thyng, that thei breathed for, all your affaires wer put in oblition, and lefte at large for them, or their assistence, euen as thei be at this daie. Hath not the Duke of Burgoyne caused you, first to come into Fraũce: after to set forward your armie, & inconclusion, for lacke of his promise, to lese the faire season of the yere, and to lye in the feldes in Winter? Whyche warre, yf it cõtinue, shall neither be profitable to you, nor yet your nobilitie, nor yet pleasaunte, but painfull to your commonaltie: And finally to bothe the realmes, and especially to Merchaunt menne, shall bryng both misery, pouertie, and calamitie. Came the Duke of Burgoyne from Nuce to Caleis, onely to visite you? Rode he all that poste haste, onely to blynd you? Returned he backe into Lorayne again for any cause, but onely to releue you desolate, and to abandon you? Did he or the Constable kepe any one promise with you? Why do you then beleue, & yet still trust thẽ in whom, you neuer founde faithe nor fidelitie? But if God will it so ordain, that you and my master, maie ioyne in a leagues and amitie, I dare bothe saie and swere, that the fine stele neuer cleued faster to the Adamant stone, then he will sticke and claspe with you, bothe in wealth and woo, in prosperitie and aduersitie: And if it shall please you, to harken to any reasonable treatie, I beyng a poore man, shal on ieoperdie of my life (whiche is my chief treasure) vndertake, that this communicacion shall sorte, and come to suche an effect, that bothe you and youre nobilitie, shalbe glad and reioyse, and your commons, shalbe contented and pleased, and they that haue deceiued you, shalbe bothe abashed & ashamed: Moste humbly beseechyng your highnes, yf your pleasure shal encline this waye, that I maie haue a sure saufe conduyte, for one hundred x horses, for suche personages, as the kyng my Master, shall send to you, with farther intimacion of his mynd and purpose. And if your pleasure shalbe, to haue the communicacion in anye place, indifferent betwene bothe tharmies, then I shall warraunt you, a like sauecõduite for your men, as you do sende for oures. When he had accomplished his message and instruccions, the kyng of Englande and his counsaill, highly commended his audacitie, his toungue, and his sobernes, geuyng to him in reward, a faire gylte cuppe, with a hundred angelles: deliuering him a saueconduite, accordyng to his request and demaunde, with the which he with spede departed, hauyng with him an English herault, to bryng xx a like sauecõduite, from the Frenche kyng. After both the Princes had maturely consulted on this matter, & that the saueconduites, wer deliuered on bothe partes: The ambassadors mette, at a village beside Amias, where were sent by the kyng of Englande, the Lord Hawarde, sir Thomãs Wentliger, Doctor Morton, after Chaunceler of England. For the Frenche kyng were sent, the Bastarde of Burbon, Admirall of Fraunce, the Lorde of sainct Pierre, the Byshop of Eureux called Heberge. It maie of some be not a litle marueiled at, why the French king thus labored, and sought for peace, and did make so humble, and large offers as he did: But if thei considred in what case, the realme of Fraũce xxx stode in, at that tyme hauyng the kyng of Englande, the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Britayne, their enemies, and all furnished to set vpon them at one instaunt: They maie saie, that the Frenche kynge was bothe wise and circumspecte, to humble hym self for auantage, or els yf God had not holpen, the realme of Fraunce had been troubled, and tossed in greate ieoperdie, & daungerous extremitie. The Ambassadors met at the place appoynted, the Englishemenne demaunded, the whole realme of Fraunce, or at the least Normandy, and whole Aquitaine, the allegacions were well proued by the Englishmen, and pollitiquely defended by the Frenche men, so that with argumẽtes, without conclusiõ xl the daie passed, and the Commissioners departed, and made relacion to their Maisters. The Frenche kyng and his counsaill, would in no wise consent, that the kyng of England, shoulde haue any parte, or parcell of lande, within the realme of Fraũce: but rather fully determined, to put hymself & his whole realme, in hazard and aduenture, so lothe, ye more aferde, then lothe, he was to haue the Englishmẽ, to be his next neighbors.

boys. The commissioners at the next metyng, concluded & agreed certain articles, which were by bothe the Pynces, accepted and allowed. It was first couenaunted & agreed, that the Frenche kyng should paie to the kyng of England without delaie. lxxv. M. Crounes of ỹ sunne, & yerely. l. M. crounes, to be paied at London, duryng kynge Edwardes life. And farther it was agreed, ỹ Charles the Dolphin should mary the lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter to kyng Edward, & thei twoo to haue, for the mainteinaunce of their estates, the whole Duchie of Guyen or. els. l. M. crounes, yerely to bee persolued & paied within ỹ toure of London, by the space of. ix. yeres: & at the ende of thesaied terme. The Dolphin & his dolphines, peaceably to enioye the whole duchie of Guyē and of that charge the French kyng, against the kyng of England, then to be clerely exonerate. And further it was agreed & appointed, that ỹ ij. pynces, bothe for thencreace of loue, & for the continuaunce of amitie should enteruew eche other, in some place moste expediēt, & mete for so great a purpose: & after their meting, eche of thē to take a corporal othe in presence of thother. This peace to endure. ix. yeres betwene bothe ỹ realmes inuiolate, to obserue & kepe al thinges, cōcluded, agreed, & appoynted, & on the kyng of Englandes part, wer cōprised as allies in the league, the dukes of Burgoyn & Britain, if thei would assent. And ỹ after ỹ whole some aforsaid, was to king Edward paied: he shoulde leage in hostage the lord Haward, & sir Jhō Cheyny Maister of his horses, til he with al his army, was passed ouer the sea. This peace much reioysed the French kyng, to whō, nothing could be either more plesaūt, or more exceptable, thē to haue thenglishmē in short space (how shortly he cared not) clerely auoyded, & trāsported out of his realme: immaginyng euer that by their tariyng, thei would so like the holesome & swete aire of his fruitful country, that a great nomber would be cōtinually sicke & vexed till thei returned, & sought for their health in the same delicious climate again, wherfore, to rid thē with al hastie spede, he borowed ỹ saied some of. lxxv. M. croūes, of euery man ỹ might lend a porciō. King Edward likewise, although he was of puissance strong inough, to acheue a great enterpryse on his enemies, & farther encoraged, because he was renomed for ỹ famous actes, by him before tyme perpetrated, & brought to passe, in so many battailes: Desiryng also, rather to haue war, with the Frēch nacīō beyng ỹ old & auncient enemie, to thenglishe name & bloud, yet whē he called to his remēbraunce, ỹ the ciuill warre, had so exhausted and consumed his substaunce and treasure, that if vrgent necessitie should expostulate, he wer of scant abilitie, to conscribe and set furthe a newe armie: knowyng his treasorie at home, to bee so voyde and faint, that it was not able, long to wage his souldiers, thought it bothe reasonable and profitable, to obeye to necessitie, and to abstein from battail seyng bothe honorable offers, to him oblated and agrementes of auantage to hym mocioned. Considery ng chiefly beside all this, that neither the Duke of Burgoyne, nor the Constable of Fraunce, did, nor woulde

obserue or perfourme the promises by them made & swourne. Wherupon he and the moste of his counsaill, (and specially suche, as loued better peace thē warre, & their wifes soft beddes, better then hard harnesse, or a stony lodgyng) agreed to his conclusion and concord. But the Duke of Gloucester and other, to whom the French nacion, was more odious then a tode, whose swordes thrusted for French bloud detested, abhorred, and cried out on this peace, saiyng: that all their trauaill, pain, and expences, were to their shame loste and employed, and nothyng gained but a continuall mocke, and daily derision of the Frenche king, & all his x minions: this immaginacion tooke effecte without delaie. For a gentle manne of the Frenche kynges chamber, after the peace was concluded, did demaunde of an Englisheman, how many battailles kyng Edward had banquished, & he answered, nyne: wherein he hymselfe, personally had been. A greate honor saied the Frenche man, but I praie you sy he, smilyng: How many hath he lost, the Englishman perceiuyng what he ment, saied: one whiche you by pollicie, and by no strength, haue caused hym to lese. Well said the Frenche manne, you may ponder in a paire of balance, the gain of the nyne gotten battailes, & the rebuke of thys one in this maner loste: for I tell you, that we haue this saiyng, the force of xi Englande hath and doth, surmount the force of Fraunce: but the engenious witte of the Frenchemen, excell the dull brayns of Englishmen. For in al battailes you haue been the gayners, but in leagues and treaties, our wittes haue made you losers: so that you may content youre selfes, with the losse in treaties, for the spoyle that you gatte, in warres & battailes. This communication was reported to the French kynge, which priuely sent for the Englishmen to supper, & not onely made him good chere, but also gaue him a thousande Crounes, to praise the peace and to helpe to maintain thesame: yet neuertheless, he beyng not a litle moued with these bragges, declared all the communicatiō, to the Duke xii of Gloucester, which sware, that he would neuer haue sette foote out of Englande, if he had not thought, to haue made the Frenchmen, once to assaied the strength and puyssaunce, of the Englishemen: but whatsoeuer he thought, all thinges were transmuted, into another kynde, thē he could immagin. The Duke of Burgoyne beyng enformed, that there was a peace entreatyng, betwene the two kynges: came in no smal hast from Lupenborough, onely accompaignied with sixtene horse, into the kyng of Englādes lodgyng, where of, the kyng being not a litie abashed seyng bothe his sodain commyng, and his fierse countenaunce, like one that would rather bite then whyne, demaunded of him the cause, of his xiii so sodain cōmyng. The Duke sharply answered, to knowe whether he had, either entered into any cōmunicacion, or onely had absolutely concluded a peace, betwene the Frenche kyng and him. Kyng Edward declared, how that for sondery, and diuerse greate and bygēt causes, touchyng aswell the vniuersall publique wealth, of the whole Christianitie as their awne priuate cōmoditie, and the quietnes of their realmes he and the French kynge, had concluded a peace & amitie, for terme of.ix. yeres, in the whiche were compriſed, as felowes and frendes, bothe he and the Duke of Britayne, requiryng him to condiſcende, and agree to theſame. Oh Lorde, Oh ſainct George, ỹ the Duke of Burgony, haue you thus doen in deede: Haue you paſſed ỹ ſeas, entered into Fraunce and without killyng of a poore flie, or burnyng of a ſely ſhepe cote, and haue taken a ſhamefull truce: Did your noble auncеſter, kyng Edward the thirde, euer make armie into Fraunce (as he made many) in ỹ which he did not either gain victory in battaill, or profite in conquerynge, cities, tounes, and countreys. That victorious Prince, as nere kinne to ỹ me, as you to kyng Henry the fifth, I meane whoſe bloud you haue, either rightefully or wrongfully, God knoweth, erſtirpate & deſtroyed, with a ſmal puyſſaunce entered into Fraunce, cõquered whole Normãdy, & not alonely conquered it, but peaceably kept it, and neuer woulde either commen, or agree to any league, till he had the whole Realme of Fraunce offered hym, and was thereof made, Regent & heire apparant and you without any thyng dooyng, or any honor or profite gainynge, haue condiſcended to a peace, bothe as honorable, and as profitable to you, as a Peſecode, and not ſo wholeſome as a Pomegranate: thynke you that I either moued you, or once entiſed you, to take this iorney for ỹ my peculier aduauntage, or cõmoditie (whiche of my power am able, to reuẽge mine awne cauſes, without help of other) but onely to haue you recouer, your old rightes & poſſeſſiõs, which wer frõ you both tortiouſly & wrongfully with holdẽ. And to thintent that you ſhal knowe, that I haue no nede of your aide, I will neither enter into your league, nor take truce with the Frenche kynge, till you bee paſſed the ſea, and haue been there three monethes. When duke Charles had ſaid, he furiouſly threwe doune his chayer, & would haue departed. But the kynge hym ſtaied and ſaied: Brother Charles, ſith you haue ſpoken at leaſer, what you would, you muſte and ſhall, heare again, what you would not: And ỹ firſt, as cõcernyng our entery into Fraunce, no manne liuyng knoweth that occaſion, neither ſo well, nor hath cauſe halfe ſo well, to remẽbre it as you: For if you haue not fully, put your greateſt thynges, to bee had in memorie, in your boxe of obliuion, you be not yet out of mynde, how the Frenche kyng, for all your power, tooke from you the faire toune of Amias, and the ſtrong Pile of S. Quintynes, with diuerſe other tounes, which you neither durſt, nor yet were able, either to reſcowe or defende. Sith which tyme, how he hath plagued you, how he hath taken from you your frendes, yea, of your priuie chamber, & ſecrete counſayll (by whome all youre ſecretes, bee to hym reueled and made open) you ỹ knowe or haue better cauſe to remembre, and not to forget them. And when you determined, to beſege the toune of Nuce, you thought your ſelf, in a greate doubte, whether you ſhould leaſemore at home, by your abſence, (the Frenche kyng dremyng, and waitynge like a Fore for his praie) or els gain more in Germany, by youre power and preſence, and

to kepe the wolfe from the folde, that is the Frenche kynge, from your Castels and dominions, was the chiefe and principall cause, why you so fayre prayed me, so sore laboured and entyced me to passe ouer the Sea, promysynge mountaines of Golde, whiche turned into snowe, and wasted to water, boastynge and crackynge to sende horsemen and fotemen, and yet shewynge neither lackey nor page. If we hadde made our enterprice for oure selfe soly, and in our awne quarell, thynke you that we would haue expected your commyng? If the aduenture hadde bene for to haue recouered our tyght, imagyn you that we woulde haue passed the Sea so slenderly, as we did lookyng for your aide? Nay nay, you should haue well knowen, if we had entended a conquest, that we would haue so strongly inuaded, and set on the Realme of Fraunce, that what with sauor and butnyng of townes, and infection of the ayre, corrupted by the multitude of dead carcases of our slayne enemyes, youre countreys of Flaunders and Brabant should haue had cause inough to wonder at, trusting that, that whiche we had gotten, we woulde haue kept aswell as any of our auncetours haue done: but because the very occasion of the warre was yours, and that you wilfully (I will not saye cowardly) did not prosecute thesame, the Frenche kynge, whiche neuer xx offended me nor my subiectes (except in mayntenynge the erle of Marwycke, for the displeasure that you bare hym agaynst me) offered me, beyng destitute of all your succour and ayde, bothe honourable and honest quettures of peace, whiche offers I was in maner enforced, by very reason to enclyne to and to accept, and so haue concluded a truce, which God willyng I will bothe kepe and obserue. God send you ioy quod the duke, & sodaynly toke his horse & rode agayn to Luxenborough. After this day the kyng and the duke, neuer loued, nor neuer sawe eche other, suche is the end of vntrustines and promisbrekyng. If the duke of Burgoyne were angry, when he harde how this peace was in communicatiō xxx much more angry was the Constable of Fraunce, fearynge lest, that by that conclusion he might be reputed of the Frenche kyng vntrewe, as he had well deserued it. Wherfore he sent hys confessor to kynge Edwarde, with letters of credence, requiring him hartely littel to regard the Frēch kynges woordes, and lesse to trust to his promyse, affyrmynge that the Frenche kynge woulde no lenger kepe promyse, then kynge Edwarde were on that syde of the Sea: And rather then he should agree with the Frenche kynge, for a small summe of money, he offered to lende hym. L. thousand crounes, with many other fayre profers. The kynge of Englande made aunswere that the truce was concluded, and that he woulde xl nothing chaunge concernyng the matter, and that if he had kept promise with hym, he would not haue made that appoyntement nor agrement. Then was the Constable in maner on all sydes in dispayre, but yet he wrote to the Frenche kyng by his messengers, besechyng hym to geue no credite or belefe, to any tale tolde or fayned agaynste hym, without heatyng his aunswere, affirmyng that the kynge had alwayes knowen hys truthe and fidelitie, toward the croune of Fraunce, and so should he still fynde hym till his dyeng day, promisyng and warranting him, if that it should stand with his pleasure, that he woulde so compasse the duke of Burgoyn, that they two should vtterly destroye the kyng of Englande and his army or they returned.

The counsaillers of the French kyng made aunswere, that their Master and the kyng of Englande were toyned and confedered in a sure amitie, wherfore they would in no wise know nor condiscend to any thing that might be either preiudicial, or once sounde to ỹ detrimẽt of the Englishmen: But they sayed, that the kyng their master muche trusted their Constable, and that for his sake he would talke with them in his priuy chaumber. The Frenche kyng, before their entry into his chamber, caused the lorde of Countay seruaunt to the duke of Burgoyn, accõpanied with the lorde of Argenton, one of his priuie counsaill, to stande secretly behynde a sylyng or a hangyng in his chamber, and he hymselfe sat in a chayre, directly before that place, so that what soeuer were purposed to hym, they standing behynde the clothe, might easely se, & facily heare the same. Lewes de creuell and his felow entered into the kynges chamber of nothynge thynkyng lesse then of the spyrytes enclosed: They declared what payne their master had taken for the French kynges sake, to sende ỹ moue and entice the duke of Burgoyn to leaue, and clerely to forsake the kyng of England, whiche duke they founde in suche a rage and fury agaynst the Englishemen, that at their requeste, he was not onely vtterly determined, to forsake and refuse their amitie, but also would sende out aduẽturers and Launceknightes, to robbe and spoyle them in their retoyrnyng. And in spekyng these woordes (thinkyng surely much to please the kyng) the sayd Lewes conterfeited the fashion and gesture of the duke of Burgoyn, & began to stãpe with his fote on the groũd, and bete with his fyste on the table, swearyng by sainct George that the kyng of England was not extracted of no noble house, but was a yomans sonne, and that when he was not worth one halfpeny, he was restored to his kyngdome, and made kyng onely by his ayde, reprouyng and reuilyng hym with suche yll woordes, and so shamfull termes, that all the herers abhorred it. The Frenche kyng fainyng that he was thycke of hearyng, caused him to reiterate his saiyng again, which so conterfeited the very gesture of the dukes angry countenaunce and roryng voyce, that no man hathe sene a better coũterfaytor or player in any Commedie or Tragedie. The lord of Cõtay was sore displeased to se his master made a testyngstocke but he kepte all these thynges secret, tyll his retorne to his master.

When the pagiaunt was plated, the kyng bad the messengers of ỹ Constable, to haue hym cõmended to his brother their master, and to declare to hym that as newes rose and grew, he would therof aduertise him, and so gaue them licence to depart to their master, who thought hym selfe now to bee in greate suertye of hys estate, when in dede he was neuer so nere his falle and perdicion: Estemyng the duke of Burgoyne to be hys

assured frende, whiche hated hym more then a Panym, or a Turke, accomptyng also the Frenche kyng to haue no yll suspicion in hym, which neither trusted nor yet beleued any worde, writyng or message that was either writen or sent from hym: Such ende hath all dissimulacion, such frute springeth of double dealing & crafty cõueieng: for if either the Cõstable had bene faithfull to the kyng his master, as of bounden duetie & allegeaunce he ought to be, or els had kept his promes, made to ỹ kyng of England & duke of Burgoyn, and not dalied & dissimuled with them, he had surely in his extremitie bene aided, succored & comforted of one of x these thre at the lest, where now he was of al thre forsakẽ, & yet not forsaken, but sought for, loked for, & watched for, not for his profit or promocion, but for his vndoing and destruccion: Now let vs leaue of the Constable, and returne to the cõclusion of the peace. When all thynges were appointed, writen & established, the peace was proclaimed in bothe the cãpes, and the kyng of England, the soner to consummate the amitie by othe as it was agreed, came within halfe a leage of Ampas, where the French kyng was, which to thentent to obteine the more fauour of thenglishmen, sent into their army a. C. Cartes, loden with wyne, ỹ best that might be gotten. And farther, because the Englyshemen resorted to the xx toune of Ampas, both for their pastime & busines, he ordeined at the very entrie of the gate of the toune two great & long tables, to be set on euery syde of the streat, where the Englishmen should passe, & euery table was abundantly furnished with all sortes of delicate biand, & especially of such as would prouoke an appetide to drynke, there lacked no wyne of no sorte, seruitours were redy to serue and minister al thinges necessary. And farther to accompany & familierly to entertayne the English naciõ at euery table were appoynted. v. or. vi. gentelmen, of the best compaignions of the whole countrey, not only to se them serued without lacking but also to drynke and make good chere, and kepe company with them, xxx and euer as they entered into the toune, they were taken by the drydels and in maner enforced to drynke, wheresoeuer they came they payed no money, but were set scot free, whiche chere lasted. iii. or. iiii. dayes, to the French kynges cost, and in conclusion to his no small vnquieting. For one daye there entered into the toune of Ampas. ix. M. Englishmen, well armed, so that no Frẽchman durst once forbid them to entre, their occasion of enteryng into the toune was onely to refreshe them, and to bye thynges necessary for their businesses and affayres. When the Frenche kyng was therof enformed, he was somwhat vexed, & more amased, feating either the losse of his toune, or hurt of his people: He sent to Thenglishe Capitaynes, requiring them to withdrawe their souldiers to their Campe, the capitaynes performed the kynges desire, as much as in thẽ lay, but if they sent out. xx. ten came backe again and brought more company with them. The Frenche kyng sent Monsier de Guye, Marshal of Fraunce & other into the toune to se the Englishemens behaueour, they founde some drinkyng, some singing, & some slepyng, so that they myght percepue that they ment neither disceat noz vntruthe: Yet the Frenche kyng, whiche of his nature was very suspicious, & especially toward the Englishemen, came to the gate of Ampas, strongly accõpaygned, & caused .iii. C. men of armes to be kept secretly in their capitaynes houses, & other cõpaigny he set on the poztal, where the Englishmẽ entered, a smal number God wot, to haue resisted the great company of Englishemen if they had either entended any thing toward ỹ French kyng oz his toune. The kyng of Englãd was pziuilie enfozmed of ỹ Frẽch kynges doubtfull imagination, & vntrew suspiciõ, wherfoze he sent wozde to hym that he should make a Proclamacion, that no Englishman should entre into ỹ toune vpon a peyne. The French kyng made answere, that it neither stode with his honoz, noz yet with any pzincely humanitie, that he should fozbid his frendes (as he called them) to take their pleasure in his toune but if it might please the kyng of England, to apoint certain of the youmẽ of his Croune, to stande at the gate, & to appoint, not onely who should entre, but also the nũber of theim, he thought that his moderaciõ should be both suerty and pleasure to bothe the parties. Whiche requeste the kyng of England with quicke spede, caused to be perfozmed to the great quietnes of the French kyng & his coũsaill, casting farther periles then reason then required. You, haue stil in your remẽbzaunce, how an article of the treatie was, that the two Pzinces should enteruiew, and mete in a place by bothe parties to be appoynted. The kyng of England appoynted the lozd Hayward, & syz Thomas Sentliger, & a Herault: foz ỹ Frẽch kyng were assigned the lozd Bonchace, & the lozd of Argentõ. Whẽ they had vewed the Ryuer, they agreed the most conuenient & surest place to be at Picquegnye, on the water of Some. iii. leagues fro Ampas. The toune standeth lowe, and the Ryuer passeth thozough. On that side that the French kyng should come, the countrey faire & open, and so likewise the other parte was very plesaunt: but towarde the Ryuer, there was a Cawsey of .ii. arow shot in length, whiche was enuironed with marshes & surely it was a daungerous passage to conueye a Pzince in a straunge Realme, by suche a straite, if the Frenche men had ment any fraude, but verely the kyng of England had so great trust & confidence in the honoz and pzomise of the French kyng & his nobilitie, that he would vpon their assurance aduentured farther then this, if his will might haue bene perfozmed. Then it was concluded by these .iiii. commissioners, that a large bzidge should be made ouer the Ryuer of Some, in the middel of which bzidge was made a great strong grate of tymber, like to the grate where the Lyons be kept, the holes of whiche grate did extende into no longer quantitie, then that a man might easely put thozough his arme, whiche bzidge was made and couered with bozdes, only to kepe of the wether, so that vnder the couerture, there might stand .xii persones on euery syde of the grate, whiche extended from the one syde of the bzidge, euen directly to the other, so that there was no way foz one Pzince to come to the other (as was in the grate, where Jhon duke of Burgoyn was slayn) & ouer the

the Ryuer was only one ferry bote. When the bridge and all other thynges necessary were ended & perfourmed for so great a purpose, and well & diligently vewed on bothe the sides, there were appointed.xii.noble personages, to be attendant on euery Prince to the barres, & .iiii. Englishemen were assigned to stand with the Frēch men on the bridge, to se their doyng & behauoure, & likewise.iiii. Frenchmen were limitted to the Englishmen for that same cause and policie. At the day appoynted, whiche was the.xxxi.daie of August, in the yere of Christes blessed incarnation M.cccc.lxv. eche kyng approched the Ryuers side with his army, so that eche army might se other. The Frenchemen say & write, that the army of the Englishmen, was greater and muche fayrer then their battaill, but they excuse it (in this cace as they do in all other) saiyng that the fourth parte of their army was lackyng, you may alowe their excuse if it please you. When the token of metyng by the shot of the Artilerie was knowen, the Frenche kyng with.xii. noble men entered the bridge, & came to the closure, with whome was Jhon duke of Burbon, and the Cardinall hys brother, a prelate, more mete for a Ladies carpet, then for an Ecclesiasticall pulpet and.x.other, emongest whom the lorde of Argenton was in like disguised apparel, as the French kyng ware, for so was his pleasure that daie to haue him adourned. The kyng of Englande came all alonge the causey that I haue spoken of well accompaignied, that he semed well to be a kyng, & with him was his brother the duke of Clarence the erle of Northumberland, the byshop of Elye hys Chanceler. the lord Hastynges his Chamberlain, & .viii. other lordes. Kyng Edward, and iiii. other were appareled in clothe of gold frised, hauing on his bonet of blacke veluet a floure delice of golde, set with very ryche and orient stones, he was a goodly faire and a beautyful Prince, beginning a litell to growe in flesshe, and when he approched nere the grate, he toke of hys cappe, and made a low and solempne obeysance: the French kyng made to hym an humble reuerence, but after his fashion somwhat homely.

Kyng Lewes embraced kyng Edwarde thorough the barriers saiynge: Cosin you be right hartely welcome into these parties, assuring you that there is no man in the worlde that I haue more desired to se and speake with then with you, & nowe lauded be almightie God, we be here mette together for a good and godly purpose, whereof I doubte not, but that we shall haue cause to reioyce. The kyng of England hym thanked and aunswered to his wordes so soberly, so grauely, and so princely, that the Frenchemen ther at not a litle mused.

The Chancelor of England made there a solempne oracion, in laude & prayse of peace, concluding on a prophecie, that sayed that at Pycquegny should be concluded a peace, bothe honorable and profitable to the realmes of Englād & Fraūce. Then the Chāceler opened the letters of bothe their agremētes to the treatie, demaunding of thē if they there with were cōtented, they answered ye, then eche Prince layed his right hand on the Missall, & his left hand on the holy Crosse, & toke there a solēpne othe, to obserue and kepe the treatie of the truce for nyne yeres concluded betwene them, with all their conferates and alies comprysed, mencioned & specefied in thesame, and farther to accomplisshe the mariage of their chyldren, with all thynges theron dependyng, accordyng as it was agreed and concluded betwene their Ambassadours, when the other was taken and sworne, the Frenche kynge saied merily to kyng Edwarde, brother, if you will take peyne to come to Parys, you shalbe feasted and entertayned with Ladies, and I shall apoynt you the Cardinal of Burbon for your confessor, whiche shall gladly assoyle you of suche synnes, if any be committed. The kyng of England toke these wordes pleasantly & thankefully, for he was enformed that the Cardinall was a good compaignion, and a Chapelayn mete for such a dalyeng pastime. When this communication was merily ended, the Frenche kyng, entendyng to shew hym selfe like a Master emongest his seruauntes, made all hys compaigny to draw backe from hym, meanyng to comon with the kyng of Englande secretly, the Englyshmen withdrew them without any cõmaundement, then the two kynges commoned alone secretly, I thynke not to the profite of the Constable of Fraunce. The Frenche kyng demaunded of kyng Edward, whether the Duke of Burgoyne would accepte the treuce, kyng Edwarde aunswered that he woulde once agayne make an offer, and then vpon the refusall, he would referre and reporte the truthe to them both. Then kyng Lewes began to speake of the Duke of Brytayne, whome he would faine haue excepted out of the league. To whome the kyng of England aunswered: Brother I requyre you to moue no warre to the Duke of Britayne, for on my fidelitie, in the tyme of my nede and aduersitie, I neuer found a more frendly sure and stedfast louer then he.

Then kyng Lewes called his compaigny again, & with most lowly & amiable commendacions, toke his leue of the kyng of Englãd, speaking certayn frendly wordes to euery Englishmã. Kyng Edward doyng lykewise to the Frenchmẽ, then both at one time departed frõ the barriers and mounted on horsebacke, and departed: the French kyng to Amias, & kyng Edward to his army, to whome was sent out of the Frenche kynges house all thynges necessary for a Prince, in so muche that neither Torches nor Torchettes lacked vnsent. When the Frenche kyng was departed from Picquegny, he called to him the lorde of Argentõ saiyng, by the peace of God, the kyng of Englande is an amorous and a fayre prince, he at the first becke would gladly se Parys, where he might fortune to fynde suche plesaunt or talkatyue Dames, whiche with fayre wordes, and plesaunt pastimes myght so allure hym to their fantasies, that it might brede an occasion in him to come ouer the sea agayn, which I would not gladly se, for his progenitors haue bene to long and to often bothe in Parys and Normandye (on this syde the sea) I loue neither his sight nor his company, but when he is at home, I loue hym as my brother, and take hym as my frende.

The Frenche kyng after this departyng,sore desirous to make warre on the Duke of Britayne,whiche he could not do,except he were left out of the treatie,wherfore he sent the lord of Bouchage,and the lord of.S. Pierre,to the kyng of Englande, entreating hym by alwayes and mocions possible,to leaue the duke of Britayn, for his alie,and not to haue hym comprehended in the league:the kyng of England hearing them so seriously and so feruently, speake against the Duke of Britayn,with an earnest countenaunce aunswered,saiyng: My Lordes I assure you,if I were peaceable at home in my realme, yet for the defence of the Duke of x Britayn and his countrey, I would passe the seas again, against al the that either would do him iniurie,or make warre vpon hym: the Frenche Lordes nothyng farther saiyng,muche maruciled why the kyng of Englande,so surely claue to the Duke of Britaynes partie. But they knew not (or els at the least remembred not) that Henry Erle of Richemonde, was within the power and dominion, of the Duke of Britayne, whome kyng Edwardes phantasie euer gaue hym, would make once a title too the Croune of England,and next heire to the house of Lancastre:For he knewe well, that if the Duke of Britayne, woulde transporte hym into England,where he had bothe kynsfolke and frendes,with neuer so small xx an aide(yea,although it were but a shadow of an army)then were he enforced, newly to begin again a conquest,as though he had neuer wonne the Croune, nor obteigned the possession of the Realme, whiche was the verie cause,why he stacke so sore,on the Duke of Britaynes part. The same night the Lordes returned to Amias,and reported to their Master kyng Edwardes aunswere,which therwith,was not the best pleased,but pleasure or displeasure, there was no remedy, but to dissimule the matter.This same night also,there came the lorde Hawarde, and twoo other of the kyng of Englandes counsail, which had bene coadiutors toward the peace,to the Frenche kyng to supper. The lorde Hawarde said to the xxx Frenche kyng, secretly in his eare, that if it stoode with his pleasure,he could perswade the kyng of Englande,to come to Amias,yea,peraduenture as farre as Parys, familierly and frendly, to solace hymselfe with hym,as his trustie frende and faithfull brother. The Frenche kyng, to whome this motion was nothyng pleasaunt, callyng for water,washed and rose without any aunswere makyng:but he laied to one of his counsaill,that he imagined in his awne conceipt, that this request would bee made:The Englyshe men began agayne,to common of that matter,the Frenche men pollitiquely brake their communicacion, saiyng: that the kyng with all celeritie,must marche forward, agaynst the duke of Bur-xl goyn. Although this motion semed, onely for to encrease loue,and continuall amitie betwene the Princes, yet the Frenchmen hauyng, in their perfecte remembraunce, the innumerable damages and hurtes, whiche they of late daies,had susteined by the Englyshe nacion:whereby,continual hatred encreased,against them in Fraunce, thought by policy and wisdome,with faire woordes,and frendly countenaunce, to put by thys request,and to moeton them rather,to departe homeward, then to prieke them forward to Paris,where peraduenture, they might so be entertained at this tyme,that they would at another come thether,bothe vndesired and vnwelcomed. This peace was saied to be made, onely by the holy ghoste,because that on the date of metyng, a white Doue satte on the very toppe,of the kyng of Englandes tent: whether she sat there to direct her,or came thether as a token geuen by God, I referre it to your iudgement. At this treatie & metyng, was not the Duke of Glouceſter,nor other lordes,whiche were not content with this truce,but the Duke came afterwarde to Amyas, with diuerse other Lordes of Englande, to the Frenche kyng which,bothe highly feasted them,and also presented them with plate and horses,well garnished. Kyng Lewes consyderyng, what gaine the Englyshemen had gotten, by makyng warre in Fraunce, and what miserie,what calamitie,and what pouertie, the French nacion had suffered,and many yeres susteined,by reason of thesaid warres,determined clerely, rather to pacifie and entertain the Englishe nacion,by fayre wordes, and great rewardes(although it were to his great charge)then by to muche hardines,to put hymselfe,his nobilitie and realme, in a hasard,by geuyng them battaill,as his predecessors,had vnwisely done at Poitiers,and at Agyncort,wherfore, to bye peace, he graunted to kyng Edwarde, for a yerely tribute. L. M. Crounes, to be paied at London, whiche,accoumptyng a croune at.iiii. s. amounteth to.x. M. l. And to haue the fauor and good will, of his chiefe counsailers. he gaue greate pencions,amountyng to the some of. xvi. M. Crounes a yere, that is to saie: to his Chaunceller, to the Lorde Hastynges, his chiefe Chamberlein,a man of no lesse witte then vertue,and of great authoritie with his Master,and that not without a cause:for he had aswel in tyme of aduersitie,as in the faire flatteryng worlde,well and truely serued hym,and to the Lorde Hawarde,to Sir Thomas Mountgomerie, to Sir Thomas Sentliger,to Sir Jhon Cheiney, Master of the kynges horses, to the Marques Dorset,sonne to the quene,and diuerse other,he gaue great & liberall rewardes,to thyntent to kepe hymselfe, in amitie with England while he wanne and obteined his purpose and desire in other places.

These persones had geuen to them great giftes, besyde yerely pencions: For Argenton his counsailer,affirmeth of his awne knowlege,that the lorde Haward,had in lesse then the terme of twoo yeres, for rewarde in money and plate.xxiiii. M.Crounes, and at the tyme of this metyng, he gaue to the Lorde Hastynges,the kynges chiefe Chamberlain,as the Frenchemen write,a hundred markes of siluer,made in plate, wherof euery marke is.viii.ounces sterlyng,but thenglishe writers affirme,that he gaue thesaid Lorde Hastynges.xxiiii.dooſen boulles, that is to saye, xii.dosen gilte,and.xii.dosen vngilte,euery cuppe waiyng. xvii. nobles, whiche gifte, either betokened in hym, a greate lyberall nature, or els a greate and especiall confidence, that he had in thesaid Lorde Chamberlain,Beside this,he gaue hym yerely, twoo thousand Crounes penci-the whiche some he sent to hym, by Piers Cleret, one of the Maisters of his house, geuyng hym in charge, to receiue of hym an acquitaunce, for the receipt of the same pencion, to thintent that it should appere, in tyme to come, that the Chauncellor, Chamberlayn, Admirall, Maisters of the horses, to the kyng of Englande, and many other of his Counsaill, had bene in fe and pencionaries, of the French kyng, whose yerely acquitaū-ces (the lorde Hastynges onely except) remain of recorde to be shewed, in the Chamber of accomptes, in the palaice of Paris. When Piers Cleret had paied the pencion, to the lorde Hastynges, he gently demaunded of x hym an acquitaunce, for his discharge, whiche request when he denied, he then onely required of hym, a letter of three lines, to bee directed to the kyng, testifyng the receipte of the pencion, to the intent that the kyng hys Maister, shoulde not thinke, the pencion to be imbesiled. The lorde Hastynges although he knew that Piers demaunded nothyng but reason, aunswered hym: Sir this gift commeth only, of the liberall pleasure of the kyng your Maister, and not of my request: if it be his determinate will, that I shall haue it, then putte you it into my sleue, and if not, I praie you render to hym his gifte again: For neither he nor you, shall haue either letter, acquitaunce, or scrowe, sygned with my hande, of the xx receipte of any pencion, to thintent to bragge another day, that the kynges Chamberlain of Englande, hath bene pencionary, with the Frenche kyng, and shewe his acquitaunce, in the Chamber of accomptes, to hys dishonor. Piers left his money behynd, and made relacion of all thynges to his Maister, which, although that he had not his will, yet he much more praysed the wisdome, and pollicie of the Lorde Haltynges, then of the other pencionaries, commaunding hym yerely to be paied, without any discharge demaundyng.

When the kyng of Englande, had receiued his tribute, and his nobilitie their rewardes, of the Frenche kyng: He trussed vp his tentes, and xxx laded all his bagage, and departed toward Calcis, but or he came there, he remembring the craftie dissimulacion, and the vntrue dealyng, of Lewes Erle of sainct Pole, high Constable of Fraunce, entending to declare hym, to the Frenche kyng, in very true likenes and portrature: Sent vnto hym twoo letters of credence, written by thesaied Constable, with the true report, of all suche woordes and messages, as had bene to hym sent, and declared by thesaied Constable and his Ambassadours, whiche letters, the Frenche kyng gladly receiued, and thankfully accepted, as the chief instrument, to bryng the Constable to his death: whiche he escaped no long season after, suche is the ende of dissimulers.

xl When kyng Edward was come to Calcis, and had set all thynges in an ordre, he toke shippe, and sayled with a prosperous wynde, into Englande, and was receiued by the Maior of London, and the Magistrates clad in scarlet, and .v.C. cōmoners, appareled in Murrey, the .xxviii. daie of Septembre, in the .xiiii. yere of his reigne, vpon Blacke Heathe, and so conueighed with great triumphe, through the citie of Westmyn-

ster, where after his long labour, he reposed hymselfe a while: euery date almoste, talkyng with the Quene his wife, of the mariage of his daughter, whom, he caused to be called Dolpheneſſe: thynkyng nothyng surer, then that mariage to take effecte, accordyng to the treatie. The hope of whiche mariage, caused hym to dissimule, and do thynges, whiche afterward chaūsed, greatly to the Frenche kynges profite, and finally to his.

When kyng Edwarde was arriued in Englande, the Frenche kyng thynkyng by no meane possible, to haue his will on the Constable, but onely by the Duke of Burgoyne, determined to conclude a truce. for. ix. yeres, vpon couenaunt, euery man to haue his awne: but the Ambassa- x dours, would not haue the truce proclaimed, thynkyng therby, to saue the Duke from periurie, whiche had sworne, neuer to conclude a peace, till the kyng of Englande had bene three monethes in his realme, after his retourne from Caleys. The kyng of Englande, was of all these dooynges, asserteined by his frendes: wherfore, in all hast, he sent syr Thomas Mountgomerie, a wise and a sage knight, to the Frenche kyng, beyng then at Vernyns, concludyng with the duke of Burgoyns Ambassadours, requiring him to take none other truce, with Duke Charles, then that, whiche was by theim concluded, delityng hym farther, in no wise to departe with sainct Quintines to the duke: Offeryng that if he xx would, any longer continue the warre, against the saied Duke that he would for his pleasure, and the dukes displeasure, passe the seas agayn, the nexte Sommer: so that the Frenche kyng, should paie to hym fiftie thousand crounes, for the losse whiche he should sustein, in his Custome by reason that the wolles at Caleys, because of the warre, could haue no vent, nor be vttred, and also pay halfe the charges, and halfe the wages of his souldiers, and men of warre.

The Frenche kyng, moste hartely thanked, the kyng of England, of his kinde offre, and faithfull frendshippe, excusyng hym, that the peace was al ready assented to: how be it, it was the verie same peace, that was xxi betwene theim concluded, sauyng onely, that the duke would bee, a contractor in the league, and not comprehēded in the same, as an other princes alie. This matter was thus answered, and faintly excused, and with the same, sir Thomas Mountgomerie dispatched, which was with plate conueniently rewarded: and with hym returned, the lorde Hayward, and sir Jhon Chetney, which were hostages with the Frenche kyng, til kyng Edwarde were returned into Englande. The Frenche kyng marueiled not a litle, at kyng Edwardes offres. and thought it perilous to cause the Englishemen to passe the Sea againe, and to ioyne with the French men, whom they neuer loued: conecturyng farther, that the Englyshe xl men and the Burgonyons, woulde sone agree, by reason of their old acquaintaunce and familiaritie, and by chaunce, bothe become enemies to the Frenchemen: wherfore, in auoydyng of all ambiguites, he determined to conclude the truce.

When

When kyng Edwarde had after this maner establyshed, as well his affayres of outwarde warres, as his pryuate and perticuler busines at home, notwithstandyng, that he beyng the moost valiaunt, and fortunate victor, of such, and so many terryble and bloudy battayles, myght thynke to leade his life, in perfect quietnes, and sure sauetie: Yet considerying, that Henry the young erle of Richemond, one of the offsprynges, of the bloud of kyng Henry the fyrste, was yet lyuyng and in good health, he iudged himselfe, to be farre from his purpose, and that that onely thyng dyd so vexe and trouble his ioye and felicitie, that he thought himselfe, neuer to bee in a sure estate, voyde of trouble or feare. Wherfore he determined yet once again, to solicitie and moue Fraunces Duke of Britayn, either for giftes, promises or prayers, to deliuer the erle into his handes, whom he supposed (after the faction and bande, of kyng Henries parte, by him extyncted, and clearely defeated) to bryng to his lure, and to rule at his awne mynde and pleasure. Wherfore, he sent Doctor Stillyngton, and twoo other, his Ambassadours, well laden with no small some of golde, with all hast to the Duke of Britayn: And to the intent that their desyre should appere more honest, in the open face of the worlde, he willed them to declare to the Duke, that their request, to haue the Erle deliuered to them, was onely for this purpose, to ioyne with hym aliance by mariage and so to extirpate and plucke vp, all the degrees and leuynges of the aduerse parte, and contrary faccion. Whiche enterprise (whatsoeuer they saied) was not onely by affinitie, but by the onely death, of the innocent erle Henry to be acheued and brought to passe. The Duke gently heard the Orators, and firste he began to deny, & after to excuse, why he might nor ought not agree to their request, but in conclusion, what with prayers requiring, and monyes soliciting, the Duke beyng wered and ouercome, deliuered the erle to the Ambassadours, whom, in his letters he highly commended, to kyng Edwarde, not thynkyng that he deliuered, the shepe to the wolfe, but the sonne to the father, beleuyng surely without scruple or doubt, that kyng Edward would geue in mariage to hym lady Elizabeth his eldest daughter, whom in deede he maried, after her fathers death, as you hereafter shall heare. When thambassadors had y praie, that they so muche desyred, they departed to the toune of. S. Wallo, standing on the sea syde, where, they reken ed to haue taken shipping, and so to haue sayled into Englande. The erle of Rychemond knowing, that he was goyng toward his death, for very penfiuenes, and inwarde thought, fell into a feruent & a sore agewe. In this very season, one Jhon Cheulet, so estemed emong the Princes of Britayne, as fewe were in all the countrey, and in muche credite, and well accepted with the duke, was when these thynges were thus concluded, for his solace in the countrey, but beyng thereof certified, beyng chafed with the abhomination of the fact: resorted to the Courte, and familierly came to the Dukes presence, and there stode so sadly, and so paly, without any worde speakyng, that the Duke was muche abashed, and sodaynly marueyled, at his sad and frownyng coũtenaunce, & demaunded of hym what should signifie, that dumpishenes of mynde, and inward sighyng, the whiche by his countenaunce, manifestly appered and was euident: He modestly aunswered, moste noble and redoubted lorde, this palenes of visage, and dedly loke doth prognosticate the tyme of my death, to approche and be at hande, which if it had chaũced to me, before this day, I assure you, it had much lesse hurted me. For then had I not bene preserued, to sele the dolorous panges and sorowful sighynges: which a fact by you done (that I thought impossible to be obteined) hath imprinted in my stomacke, and in my hart depely grauen. So that I well perceiue, that either I shall lese my life, or els liue in perpetuall distresse and continuall mysery. For you my synguler good lord, by your verteous actes, and noble feates haue gotten to you, in maner an immortall fame: whiche in euery mans mouth, is extolled and eleuated, aboue the hygh Cloudes, but alas me semeth (I pray you pardon me my rudenes) that now that you haue obteined, so hygh a laude and glory, you nothyng lesse regarde then to kepe and preserue the same inuiolate, considering that you forgettyng your faith and faithfull promyse, made to Henry Erle of Richemond, hath deliuered the moost innocent young gentleman, to the cruel tormenters, to bee afflicted, rente in peces, and slayn: wherfore, all suche as loue you, of the whiche nomber I am one, cannot chose but lament and be sory, whē they se openly, the fame and glory, of your moost renoumed name, by suche a disloialtie, and vntruthe against promise, to be bothe blotted and stained with a perpetuall note, of slaunder and infamie. Peace myne awne good Jhon, q the Duke, I praie thee, beleue me, there is no suche thyng lyke to happen to therle of Richemond: for kyng Edward hath sent for hym, to make of hym, beyng his suspect enemie, his good & faire sõne in lawe. Well, well, q Jhon, my redoubted lorde, geue credence to me: therle Hery is at the very brynke to perishe, whom, if you permitte once to set but one foote, out of your power and dominion, there is no mortall creature able hereafter, to deliuer hym from death. The duke beyng moued, with the perswasion of Jhon Cheynet, whiche either litle beleued, or smally suspected kyng Edward, to desyre the erle, for any fraude or deceipte, or els seduced by blynd auarice and loue of money, more then honestie, fydelitie, or wisdome would requite, did not consider, what he vnaduisedly did, or what he aduisedly, should haue done. Wherfore, with all diligence, he sent furthe Peter Landoyse, his chiefe Threasorer, commaundyng hym to intercept and slaie, the Erle of Richemond, in all hast possible. Peter not sluggyng, nor dreamyng his busines: Came to the Englyshe Ambassadors to. S. Malos, there abidyng the wynde. And first he inuented a cause of his comming, and kepte with theim a long communication, to protracte the tyme, tyll his men in the meane season, had conueighed therle (almoste halfe ded) into a sure Sanctuary, within the toune, whiche in nowise might bee violated: where he beyng delyuered, from the continual feare of dredful death, recouered hys health, and in good plight was brought to the duke.

Here a man may euidently perceyue the olde Greke prouerbe to bee very trew, whiche is that a man, to a man shall sometyme be as a God, for the yong erle Henry without desert deliuered to his death, sodaynly by the labor of Jhon Cheulet, and the fauor of the good Prince, was preserued, saued and deliuered. God graunt that such examples may be a doctrine and myrror to such as be rulers aboue other, lackyng counsaylers to monish & warne them of their duetie and office. That thei remembryng thys good acte, may learne to take into the counsayl and familie, such as will well and truly admonishe and warne them. and they likewise with good mynde and glad entent to be folowers of thesame.

The Englishe oratours complayned and murmured that they were both spoyled of their monye & marchandise, requyryng peter Landoise that they in no wise should returne, so deluded without pray or penney. The Treasorer effectuously promised them, that the Erle either should be surely kept in the Sanctuary, into the which he escaped (by their negligence as he layed to their charge) or els should be again in the dukes house put in prison, so that they shoulde not nede no more to feare hym then hys shadow. And so the kyng of England for hys money, purchased the keping of his enemye by the space of.iii. dayes, and no more.

Kyng Edward in the meane season, sore longyng to know what effect hys Ambassade toke with the duke of Britayne, and therefore was euery houre troubled and vnquieted with harkenyng & lokynge, was at the last certefied from thence, howe the erle of Rychemond was deliuered, and at a poynt to be brought home to hym as a prisoner in captiuitie, but that he escaped. Firste, he lamented his purpose, not to haue more prosperously succeded, but after beyng somwhat molified and apeased, when he hard that he should be sauely kept in prison, determined clerely hereafter to banische that care out of hys mynd and fantasye, and to employe all hys whole study and diligence for the keppynge of hys house, after a more bountyful fashion and liberall proporcion, thé before was accustomed. And when he had sufficiently stored hys cheste with treasure, remembryng his honor, leste, he peraduenture should be noted with the spot of Nygardshyp, he shewed him selfe lyke a liberall and benefectiall Prince to hys commons, and lyke a good and a profitable kynge to the cõmon wealth, & the poore people of hys Realme and dominion.

EVen as kyng Edward sought, inuented and studied dayly and howerly to bryng hym selfe to quietnesse & rest, and hys Realme to a continual amitie, and a perpetual peace, lykewyse at thesame tyme Charles, duke of Burgoyn, whose wit neuer loued peace, nor yet was wery or abhorred troble, whose intollerable paynes in warres were to hym pleasure, and especially where

where he thought any new seignorie to obteine, or els to be reuẽged of auncient enemyes, for olde greues and displeasures to him done: So ỹ desyre of rule mixt with hatred, and malice cõbined with auarice, kyndeled, prouoked and excited so hys courage thys yere (whose braggyng audacitie had more nede of a bridell to be refrayned, then of a spurre to be pricked forward) that he partly to be reuenged of ỹ duke of Lorayne and ỹ Swytchers, and partly for ỹ couetous desyre that he had to certayn lãdes lyeng betwene his lowe countreys of Brabant & Flaũders and hys Duchie of haut Burgoyn, assembled a great army & a mighty puyssance, and beseged a towne called Granson in Lorayn, which when he had receyued, without mercy, lyke a tyrant he caused all the Inhabitãtes cruelly to be put to death, wherof heryng the Switchers mãfully encoũtered with hym, and discomfited hys whole army, where the duke lost bothe honor, prayse, and such abundaunce of ryches, that few Princes in hys tyme were able to shew suche Juels, and so many, & of suche high price and value. And after not cõtent with these chaũces, but euer in hope of reuéging he fought with the Switchers agayne at Morrat, wherof. xviij. M. good mẽ of warre, he lost. x. M. besyde them that were wounded and hurt: yet this fierce & couragious Capitayne, more corragious then circũspect, gathered agayn a new army, and contrary to the mindes of his whole counsail, in the depth of Wynter, beseged ỹ toune of Nancy, belongyng to the duke of Lorayn, where he was encoũtered with the sayd duke and the Switchers, and there by thẽ agayne ouercome, discomfited, and slayne.

Thus in one yere he lost. iii. great battayles, the fyrste at Granson, where he lost honor, and all hys ryches: The second at Morrat, where he lost honor, & almost all hys men: The thyrd at Nancy, where he loste lyfe, honor, ryches, men, and all worldely felicitie, on the Vigile of the Epiphany, in the yere of our lord, after some writers. M. cccc. lxxvi. and after other. M. cccc lxxviij.

This ende had the valiant hart, and stout courage of duke Charles of Burgoyn, who in hys tyme could neuer agre with peace and cõcord, tyll death, more puyssant then lyfe maye resiste, broughte hys bodye to quietnes and perpetual tranquilite, which bodi is entered in ỹ Church of saunct George in Nancy, leuyng behynd him one sole doughter, lawfully begotten to be his heyre, whiche afterward was maryed to Maximiliaen Archeduke of Austrice.

At this battayl were taken Anthony and Bauldwyn, bastarde bretherne to duke Charles, whom the French kyng bought of the duke of Lorayne to the entent that they shoulde not withstande hys pretensed purpose in Flaunders. Yf any man wer sory of the duke of Burgoyns death, you may be sure that he was not so inwardly sory, as the French kyng was in hart ioyous and glad: For now hauyng peace with Englande, he knew no creature that was able to matche with him in earnest or in game, & because he would lese no tyme, he vnder couler that wolde

be not able to enioy any thyng, that is or hath ben, apertaynyng to the Croune of Fraunce, toke of the yong Damosel of Burgoyn the tounes of Houndedier, Perone, Abbeuyle, Monstreul, Roy, and al the tounes on the ryuer of Some: Beside thys, he wyth no great payne obteyned Hesdyng, Arras, and the toune of Bulleyn, wyth the countye of Bullonoys, wyche kyng Charles hys father had before engaged, and empledged to duke Philip of Burgoyn, as before is mencioned. But this wyly and wytty kyng Lewes, comyng to the toune of Bulleyn, perceyued that if it wer fortefied with a garrison, it should not onely be an yl neighbor to the tounes of Caleys and Guysnes, but also a port necessarie and conuenient for all hys subiectes, when they should be, either by enemies assayled, or by stormy tempestious wether driuē on the narowe seas, wherfore to cast a sure Ancker, knowyng the lorde Bartrame de la Toure, erle of Aulueric, to be the very trew and vndubytate heyre of ỹ sayd toune and countie: He first obteyned of hym hys right and title in thesame, rewarding him with a greater summe, & a more yereli value of reuenewes, in the countye of Forest, and other places. And after to the entent to haue a port euer open vpō Englād, he annexed thesame toune of Bulleyne, & the countie of Bullonoys, wyth the partes adiacent, to the croune and regalitie of Fraunce. And because, the forenamed towne and countye were holden of the erledom of Artoys, he chaunged the tenure, and solemply auowed to holde thesame toune & coūtie of our Lady of Bulleyn, and therof did homage to the Image in ỹ great Church called our Lady church in Bulleyn, offring ther a hart of gold, weiyng ii.M. Crounes, ordeinyng farther that all his heyres and successors, at their entrie into the estate and dignitie royal, by them self, or their deputie should offer a hart of lyke weight and value, as a releue & homage done, or made for thesame toune and countie. You maye be sure that the kyng of England would not haue suffered the French kīg to haue edefied such a couert nest, so nere his toune of Caleis, and the territories of thesame, except his leage had bound hym, or that he had to much affyance in the Frenche kyng, whose hart was doble, & whose wit euer inconstant, but surely the hope of the preferment of his daughter, bothe brought him to blyndnes and dotage. Let these doynges ouer passe and se how politikely the French kyng wrought for his aduantage. Duryng these gaynes in the lowe partes, he caused the duke of Lorayn to enter into high Burgoyn with a greate armye, whiche by policie & promises brought the whole Duchie vnder obedience of the French kyng, whiche then claymed to haue the order and mariage of the yonge lady, as a pupille, ward and orphane, apertayning to the croune of Fraunce, for the which title after rose no smal mischief, and trouble in Flaunders, and ỹ countreys thereabout. Let vs leaue a whyle to speke of outward busines, and retourne to our awne.

¶ The.xvii. yere.

IN ỹ.xvii.yere of king Edward, there fel a sparcle of priuy malice, betwene the king & his brother the duke of Clarẽce whether it rose of olde grudges before time passed, or were newly kyndeled and set a fire by the Quene or her blonde which were euer mistrusting and priuely barkinge at thee kynges lignage, or were he desirous to reigne after his brother: to men that haue thereof made large inquisition, of suche as were of no small authoritie in those dates, the certayntie therof was hyd, and coulde not truely be disclosed, but by coniectures, whiche as often deceiue the imaginacions, of fantastical folke, as declare truth to them in their conclusion. The same was that the king or the Quene, or bothe, sore troubled with a folysh Prophesye, and by reason therof begã to stomacke & greuously to grudge against the duke. The effect of which was, after king Edward shouide reigne, one whose first letter of his name shoulde be a G. and because the deuell is wonte with suche wytchcraftes, to wrap & illaqueat the myndes of men, which delyte in such deuely she fantasyes, thei sayd afterwarde that that Prophesy lost not hys effecte, when after kyng Edward, Glocester vsurped his kingdome.

Other allege this to be the cause of his death: That of late, ỹ olde rancor betwene thẽ beyng newly reuiued (The which betwene no creatures can be more vehement then betwene bretherne, especially when it is firmely radicate) the duke beyng destitute of a wife, by the meanes of lady Margaret duches of Burgoyn, hys sister, procured to haue the lady Mary, doughter and heyre to Duke Charles her Husband, to bee geuen to hym in matrimony: which mariage kinge Edwarde (enuieng the felicitie of his brother) bothe agayne saied and disturbed. Thys priuy displeasure was openly appeased, but not inwardly forgottẽ nor outwardly forgeuen, for that not withstandyng a seruaunte of the Dukes was sodainly accused (I cannot say of treuth, or vntruely suspected by the Dukes enemies) of poysonyng, sorcery, or inchauntment, & therof condempned, and put to taste the paynes of death. The duke, whiche myght not suffer the wrongfull condemnacion of his man (as he in his conscience adiudged) nor yet forbere, nor pacientely suffer the vniust hãdelyng of hys trusty seruaunt, dayly did oppugne, and with yll woordes murmur at the doyng therof. The kyng much greued and troubled with hys brothers dayly querimonye, and continuall exclamacion, caused hym to be apprehended, and cast into the Towre, wher he beyng was adiudged for a Traytor, and was priuily drowned in a But of Malueseye.

George duke of Clarence, drowned in a But of Malueseye in the Towre

But sure it is that although kyng Edward were consentyng to his death and destruccion, yet he much dyd bothe lamente his infortunate chaunce, and repent hys sodayn execution. In as muche, that when any person sued to hym for Pardon or Remission, of any malefactor condempned to the punishment of death, he would accustomably say and openly speake, O infortunate brother, for whose lyfe not one creature would woulde make intercession, openly spekyng, and apparauntly meanyng that by the meanes of some of the nobilitie, he was circumuented, and brought to hys confusion.

Thys duke left behynd hym two younge infantes, engendred of the body of the daughter of Richard, late erle of Warwicke, whyche chylderne by destenye, or by their awne merites, folowinge the steppes of theyr aunce tours, succeded them in like misfortune, and semblable yll chaūce. For Edward hys heyre, whome kyng Edward had created erle of Warwicke, was thyree and twentye yeres after in the tyme of kynge r Henry the.vii attaynted of treason, and on Towre hyl behedded. Margarete his sole daughter was maried to sir Rychard Pole knighte, beyng muche bounde to Kynge Henry the.vii. for her auauncemente in mariage, besyde manifolde benefites, by her of hym receiued: But most of all obliged to that excellent prince kynge Henry the eyghte, for restoryng her aswell to the name and title of countesse of Salisbury, as to the possessions of the same: she forgetting ȳ miserable chaunce of her father, and lesse remembryng the kyndnes and kyndred of her sayd souereygne lord, committed agaynst hys Maiestye, and hys Realme, abhominable and detestable treason, for the whiche she was in open Parliament, adiudged and attaynted, and two and sixty yeres after her father rr was put to death in the Towre, she on the grene within thesame place, with an Axe suffered execucion. In whose person died the very surname of Plantagenet, whiche from Geofrey plātagenet so longe in the bloud Royall of this realme, had florished and contynued. After the death of thys duke, by reason of great hete and vntemperate ayer, happened so fierce and so quyck a Pestilence, that.xv.yeris watre paste, consumed not the thyrd parte of the people, that onely foure monethes miserably and pitifully dispatched, and brought to their sepulture.

¶ The.xviii.yere

YOU haue harde not longe before, how the Frenche kynge not onely claymed the rule, gouernaunce, and mariage of the ponge Princes and Damosell of Burgoyne, but also how he, what wyth policie, and what with force had plucked from her the fayrest feathers of her tayle, that is too meane, whole haut Burgoyne, and the strouge counes of Pycardye which in tyme to come myght (as they were very lyke) happen to proue yll neyghbouts to the English nacion. All these thynges were politikely pondered, & matutely digested by the wise coūsaylers of England whiche first consydered the olde amitie, betwene the house of Englande and Flaunders, and the quotidiane entercourse, traffycke and commutacion, whiche no smal season had ben practised, frequented & exercised mutually and frendly betwene the subiectes, and all nacions hauynge resort to either of the sayd countreys, saw it open before their eyes, that if the Frenche kynge, either by force or by communccion of mariage to Charles erle of Angulesme (to whome he promised hys good wyll, for the obteynyng of the yonge Princes) should get the vpper hande of the Damosel or of her seignories and dommions, that then damage might ensue to the whole Realme of Englande, bothe for vtterynge of their commodities in those partes, and also for the impedyment or stoppe of their course and recourse, beside new imposicions and gabels, to be set within the sayde countreys, vpon the Marchauntes, their goodes and wares. Wherfore the whole nobilitie and sage fathers made humble re- p quest, to kyng Edwarde to helpe, and ayed the yonge ladye and Prynces of Burgoyne, allegynge that as farre as they coulde perceyue, the mariage of hys doughter with the Dolphyne, was but dissimuled and fayned, for in ỹ treaty cõcluded at Pycquegnye, betwene him and kyng Lewes, it was appoynted, agreed, and openly sworne, that the Frenche kynge, within a yere folowynge, shoulde sende for the ladye Elizabeth, entituled Dolphynesse of Uyen, to be conueyed into Fraũce, which yere with foure more wer passed and gone, without any worde speking of her sendyng for, or goyng into Fraunce.

The Quene of Englande also had wryten in this season too the pp lady Margaret, Ducheſſe of Burgoyne, for the preferrente of her brother Anthony erle Ryuers, to the mariage of the yonge Damsell, but the counsayll of Flaunders, consyderinge that he was but a Erle of a meane estate, and she the greatest enherritrice of all Christendom at that tyme, gaue but deafe hearynge to soo vnmete a requeſt: the whyche desyre if the Fleminges had but geuen good eare to, or wyth gentell wordes delayed the suyte, she had bothe bene succored and defended with a good number, and not sustayned soo greate losse as she dyd. Whether kynge Edwarde were not content wyth thys refusall, or that he trusted more the Frenche kynges promyse, then all hys counsayll coulde see ppp cause, or that he was lothe to lese hys yerely tribute of fifty thousande Crounes, he woulde in no wyse consent to sende any armye into Flaunders, agaynst the Frenche kynge: But he sent Ambassadours to kynge Lewes wyth louynge and gentle letters, requyrynge hym to conclude some reasonable peace, or els at the least to take a certayne truce wyth her at hys requeſt.

The Ambassadors of England, wer highly receiued, bountefully feſted, and liberally rewarded: But answere to their desire, had they none, but ỹ shortly the Frenche kyng would sende Ambassadors, hostages, F pledges, to the kyng of England, their Master, for the concludyng and rr perfourmaunce of al thynges, dependyng betwene theim twoo: So that their souereigne lorde and thei should haue good cause, to be contented and pleased. All these faire wordes, wer onely delaies to protracte time, and in the meane season, to wynne tounes and coũtreys, from the damosell, or any aide or succor could be to her administred.

And

And beside thys, to staie kyng Edward, from takyng parte with her. He wrote to hym, that if he would ioyne with him in aide, or personally make warre, in any parte of the Ladyes territories, or dominions: that then kyng Edward, should haue and enioye, to hym and his heires, the whole Countie and Countrey of Flaunders, discharged of all homage, superiozitie, and resorte to be claimed by the French kyng, and his heyres and successors: and farther, he should haue ỹ whole duchie of Brabant, whereof the Frenche kynge offered, at his awne charge and coste, to conquere foure, the chief and strongest tounes, wythin thesaied Duchie, and theim in quiet possession, to deliuer to the kyng of Englande, grauntyng farther to paie to hym, tenne thousande Angels, toward his charges: besides munitions of warre and artilerie, whiche he promised to lende hym, with men and cariage, for the conueighaunce of thesame.

A greate offer made by the French kyng to kyng Edward the, iiij.

The kyng of Englande answered, that the tounes of Flanders, wer of no smal strengthe, nor of no litle quãtitye, verie vneasie to bee kepte, when thei wer conquered: and of no lesse force was the Duchie of Brabant, with whom, his subiectes were bothe lothe, and not verie willyng to haue warre there, considering, that thether was one of their cõmon trafficques and ventes, of all their Merchaundice: But if the Frenche kyng would make hym partener, of his conquest in Picardy, tendering to hym parte of the tounes, all ready gotten and gained, as Boleigne Mounstrell, and Abbeuile, then he would surely take his parte, and aide hym with men, at hys awne costes and charges. While this matter was in answeryng, and replyng again, the Frenche kynge spoyled the yong Princes, of tounes, and Regions, and of the best Capitaines that her father lefte, as the Lorde Cordes and other: wherfore for pure necessitie of aide and strengthe, she maried wyth Maximilian, sonne to Frederike the Emperor, whyche to hys power, fore resisted the Frenche kyng, for makyng any inuasions into Flaunders, or other hys wyfes landes and seigniories. This Princes conceiued of her husband, in the first yere of her mariage, a faire lady called Margaret, whom king Lewes so phantesied, either to haue a publique peace, wyth Maximiliã her father, by the whyche, he might staie al warre, and hostilitie betwene thẽ and so by that meane, peaceably to enioy the countryes and tounes, by hym stollen and faintly conquered, or els imagenyng by that onely damosell, in conclusion to conioyne, the whole countrey of Flaunders, and the other dominions, therunto apperteinyng, to the croune of Fraunce, (as he had no fewe times, before attempted and assaied). That he clerely forgettyng, his promes made, written, and sworne to the kyng of Englande, for the mariage of his daughter, solicited priuily the Lordes of Flanders, to haue thesaied lady Margaret, to bee conioyned in matrimonie, with the Dolphin his sonne, writynge and sendyng to the kyng of Englande, faire promises and flatterynge letters, when hys purpose was clerely vanished out of Englande, and fixed in Flanders, as you shall hereafter well vnderstande.

The.xix.yere.

YNG Edward in the .xix.yere of his reigne forgettyng aswell all exteriour inuasions, as ciuill warre, and intestine trouble: whiche before that tyme, he had abundantly tasted, and more then he was willyng, had bothe felte, and had in continuall experience, beganne firste more then he was before accustomed, to serche out the penall offences, aswell of the chief of his nobilitie, as of other gentlemen, beyng proprietaries of great possessions, or aboundantly furnished in goodes, beside merchauntes, and other inferiour persones. By the reason wherof, it was of all men adiudged, more then doubted, consideryng his newe fame of riches, & his greedy appetite of money and treasure, that he would proue hereafter, a sore and an extreme Prince, emongest his subiectes, and thys imaginacion in especial, wandred through the heddes of al men, that after his brother ỹ Duke of Clarence, was put to death, he should saie, that al men should stande, and liue in feare of him, & he to be vnbrideled, and in doubte of no man. But his newe inuented practise, & auaricious inuencion, what for other forein and outward affaires, & what for the abbreuiatyng of his daies, in this transitorie world (whiche were within two yeres after consumed) toke some, but no greate effecte. Howbeit experience teacheth, that prosperitie ofte tymes is as greate a trouble, as a greate mischief, and as vnquiet a profite, to the possessioners of riches, & such as haue the fruicion of thesame: as pouertie and aduersitie, are profitable and laudable, in other persones whiche can, with pacient stomacke, and meke harte, beare and suffre the stormes and surges, of euill fortune, end peruerse mischaunce.

The.xx.yere.

After thys, kyng Edwarde hauynge all thynges brought to that effect, whiche he had long desired, except the marriage of hys daughter, wyth Charles the dolphyn, muche studied and no lesse desired to haue this affinitie, accordyng to the appoyntment made and concluded, to be accõplished and solempnized, and therfore, not onely wrote, but sent diuerse messengers to the Frenche kyng, for the performaunce of thesame. The Frenche kyng whiche neuer intended, to haue that mariage take effecte, considery̆ng that the Dolphyn, was muche younger, then the lady Elizabeth, and for other causes, sent Ambassadors to the kyng of England with faire woordes, and friuolous delaies, makyng hys excuse, that he had not sent for the kynges daughter to be maried to his sonne the dolphin, accordyng to the league and treatie concluded, by the occasion of his great troubles, and busy warres, enterprised in high Burgoin, and the lowe countreys, so that he was disgarnished, aswell of his nobilitie, as of other menne of honor, to receiue her into his realme, accordyng to her estate and degree: promising faithfully, shortly to sende for her, and to

to conueigh her with ſuche a pompe and royal traine, that it ſhould be to bothe their honors and laudes, and to the high contentacion, of the Kyng of Englande and his Quene, whiche, no leſſe then her huſbande deſired, & ſore longed to ſe the concluſiõ, of theſaid mariage take effect.

These Ambaſſadors were wel feaſted, and like wiſe rewarded, and ſo toke their leaue: And within a conuenient ſeaſon after, he ſent other Orators, whiche, were neuer in Englande before, to the intent that if their predeceſſors beyng Ambaſſadors, had ſaied or concluded any thyng, (al though thei wer authoriſed ſo to do) yet if it might turne to the French r kinges preiudice or damage, thei might without blame, excuſe themſelfes by ignorance, of that matter: affirmyng that thei had no cõmiſſion to common, or els once to enterpriſe, to medle with that matter. Or if he perceiued that any thyng was like to be concluded, whych ſounded not to his pleaſure or profite, he would ſende for his Ambaſſador, in greate haſt, and after ſende another wyth newe inſtruccions, nothynge depen-dyng on the olde.

Thys faſhion kyng Lewes, vſed with all Princes, to whome he ſent any Ambaſſadors, by the whiche he cõpaſſed many thynges, to his purpoſe, and to their loſſe: But moſte of all, he thus dalied wyth the kynge rr of England, concernyng this mariage, onely to the intent, to kepe him ſtil in amitie, aboue all other Princes. And for a truthe the Kyng of Englande, beyng of no ſuſpicious nature, ſo muche truſted, and gaue to hym ſo much confidence, that he thought the Sunne, would ſoner haue fallen from his circle, then that kyng Lewes, either would haue diſſimuled, or broken his promiſe with hym.

But who ſoner breketh promes, then he that is moſte truſted, or who ſoner deceiueth, then he to whom moſte credence is attributed. And on the other part, who is ſo ſone begiled, as he that leaſt miſtruſteth, and who ſoner falleth, then he that caſteth no peril, but as in nothyng, mirrr ſtruſtyng, is no ſmall lightnes, ſo into muche truſtyng is to much foly: wherefore, if kyng Edward had either not to muche truſted, or miſtruſted the Frenche Kynges faire promiſes (as I would he had dooen in dede) the croune of Fraunce, had not ſo increaſed in poſſeſſions and dominions, to the great glory, and ſtrength of the realme: nor the Princes of Burgoyne, had not ſo been plucked, haryed, and ſpoyled, of her faire tounes and Caſtles as ſhe was, whiche chaunce, ſhe beyng deſtitute of frendes, and without comforte of defenders, by pacience perforce, was compelled to ſuffre and ſuſtein.

This is the profite that all nacions get, by the faire promiſes, of the rl Frẽchmen. Thus is the league made with Lewes the Frẽch kyng fraudulently gloſed and diſſimuled. Thus is the othe made, & ſworne vpon the holy Euangeliſtes violated, and contrary to the worde, and honor of a Prince, broken and falſefied: by which vntrue dealyng, and couert diſſimulyng, with his eſpeciall and truſtie frend, all men maye facilie ſe, and more apparauntly then in a myrror perceiue, that the verie natural condicion

condicion of the Frenche nacion, is pleasauntly to flatter, plentifully to reward, and gloriously to glose, til thei haue once obteined their pretensed purpose, and haue their ambicious desire accomplished & satisfied and that gain once gotten on their side, neither othe holdeth, nor frendship continueth, nor yet humanitie and kyndnes before shewed, is once regarded, or of them remembred: wherefore, myne aduise is, let all men trust them, as thei fynde them.

¶ The. xxi yere.

The xxi. yere.

IN this verie season, James the. iii. of that name, kyng of Scottes, sent into Englād a solempne Ambassade, for to haue the Lady Cicile, kyng Edwardes. ii. daughter, to be maried to his eldest sonne, James Prince of Scotlande. Duke of Rothesai, & erle of Caricke. King Edward & his counsaill, thinkyng that this affinitie, should bee aswel honorable, as profitable to the realme, did not only graunt, to his desire and demaūd but also before hande disbursed, certain sommes of money, to the onely intent, that the mariage should herafter, neither be interrupted nor broken, vpon this condicion, ỹ if thesaied Matrimony, by any accidentall meane, should in tyme to come, take no successe nor perfeccion: or that kyng Edward would notifie, to the kyng of Scottes, or his counsail, that his pleasure was determined, to haue thesaid mariage, to be infringed and dissolued: Then the Prouost and merchauntes, of the toune of Edenborough, should bee bounde for the repaiment, of thesaied some again. Al which thynges wer, wyth great deliberaciō concluded & sealed, in hope of cōtinual peace, and infrangible amitie. But this king Jaines beyng a man of a sharpe wit, more wedded to his awne opiniō thē reason would scace here, would neyther here nor geue credite to theim, that spake contrary to his awne phantesie, or this imagined opinion: And to thintēt that no man should find fault, with his doynges, or reprehēd his actes, he promoted and made counsailers, menne of base lignage, and lowe bloud, and in especiall, Cochrane and his compaignie, by whose euill aduise, and mischeuous instigacion, he so punished and greued hys nobilitie, bothe with emprisonment, exaccions, and death, that some of their voluntarie will, went into Exile, and other fainyng cause to departe, fled into other landes, and straunge countreys. For the Duke of Albanie, called Alexander, brother to kyng James, was exiled into Fraunce, but passyng through England, he taried with kyng Edward as you shall heare. Therle of Mar, a wise pollitique counsailer, was in Edenborough beehedded: And beside this, he forgettyng his othe, promise, and affinitie concluded with kyng Edward, caused armies to bee made, into England, spoylyng burnyng, and killyng, the kynges faithfull subiectes: at the whiche vnprincely dooyng, the kyng of Englande beyng, not a litle moued and chafed, determined to be reuenged on him by battaill, and dent of sworde. Yet notwithstandyng, because kyng Jaimes mes craftely excusyng himself, alleging the mischief late cõmitted, to be attempted, doen, & perpetrated, without his consent, knowlege, or counsail, this matter had been lightly pacified, and blowen ouer, if the Duke of Albanie, beyng with kyng Edward, had not incẽsed, entised, and prouoked hym, to make warre on the Scottishe kyng, his brother, bothe to reuenge the iniuries of late, to thesaid king doen contrary to all lawes of armes, and Princely demeanure, and also, to help to restore thesaied duke, to his possessiõs, and dominions again: out of the whiche, he was by the kyng his brother, dispossessed, and reiected, promisyng to kyng Edwarde, greate aide and assistence, when his armie was once entered, into the confines of Scotlande, Kyng Edward beyng thus perswaded by the Duke, and trustyng on his aide, was somwhat agreable to this, but the inward remembraunce how that kyng James, had supported against hym, with men and money, hys olde enemie kyng Henry the sixt: and also trustyng, that if Alexander duke of Albanie, by his aide should banyshe his brother, and obtain the croune of Scotland, he would be alwaies to hym, sure, faithfull, & trustie: whiche did so enflame his corage, & set his harte so on fire, that he determined with al diligence, with an army royall, to inuade the countrey of Scotlande, and make the kyng to knowe, that he had nether honorably, nor truly kept his league and promise. Wherfore, al the winter season, he mustred his souldiers, prepared his ordinance, rigged his shippes, and left nothyng apperteignyng to the warre, vnputueyed or vnloked for: so that in the beginnyng of the yere, al thynges were prepared, and nothyng was missed.

When all thynges apperteignyng, to the furniture of suche an enterprise, wer put in a readines, and ready to bee sette forward: kyng Edward appoynted, to be cheuetain of his hoost, and Lieuetenaunt generall, his brother Richarde Duke of Gloucester, and to him associated, Henry, the.iiij Erle of Northumberlande, Thomas Lord Stanley, Lorde Steward of his household, the lorde Louell, and the lorde Greystocke, and diuerse other noble men and knightes. These valiaũt capitaines, set forward in Maie, and made suche diligence, with politique cõueighaunce of their souldiers: beside the troubelous cariage, of their ordinaunce, that they came to the toune of Alnewike, in Northumberlande, aboute the beginnyng of July, where they first encamped themselfes, and Marshailed their hoste. The forward was led, by therle of Northumberland, vnder whose standerd were, the lorde Scrope of Bolton, sir Jhon Middelto, sir Jhon Dichfeld, and diuerse other Knightes, Esquiers & souldiers to the nombre of sixe thousand, and seuen. C. men. In the middell ward was the Duke of Gloucester, and wyth hym the Duke of Albanye, the lorde Louell, the lorde Greystocke, sir Edwarde Woduile and other, to the nombre of fiue thousande, and eight. C. men. The Lorde Neuell

was

was appoynted to folowe, accompaigned wyth.iii.M.men The lorde Stanley,led the wyng on the right hande, of the Dukes battaill,wyth iiii.M.men,of Lancaſhire and Cheſſhire: The lefte wyng was guyded by the lorde Fitz Hewe, ſir Willyam a Parre, ſir James Harryngton, with the nombre of.ii.M.men,and beſide al theſe,there was a thouſād men appoynted,to geue attendance on the ordinaunce. This royall armie,not intendyng to ſlepe, but to geue the Scottes knowlege,of their arriual in thoſe parties,came ſodainly by the water ſide, to the toune of Berwicke, and there,what with force, and what with feare of ſo greate an army,toke and entered the toune:but therle Bothwell, beyng Captain of the Caſtle,would in nowiſe deliuer it neither for flattering wordes,nor for manacyng bragges, wherefore, the capitaines deliberately conſultyng together, planted a ſtrong ſiege,and enuironed it rounde about. When this ſiege was thus laied,the twoo Dukes,and all the other ſouldiers,except the lord Stanley, ſir Jhon Eltyngton,threaſorer of the kynges houſe, ſir Willyam a Parre, and.iiii.M.men, that were lefte behinde, to kepe the ſiege before the Caſtle, departed from Berwicke, toward Edenborough: And in marchyng thetherward,he brent and deſtroyed,theſe tounes folowyng.

While theſe thynges were in doyng,kyng James of Scotlande,hauyng ſmall cōfidence in his cōmonaltie, and leſſe truſt in hys nobilitie,

did voluntarely incarcerate & enclose hym selfe in the strong Castell of Maydens in Edenborough, perfitly trustyng there to be out of all doubtes & daunger, except famyn or treason, caused hym violently to ope the portes or gates, wherof the duke of Glocester entered into the toun and at the especial request & desire of the duke of Albany, saued ỹ toune and thenhabitantes of thesame, from fier, bloud & spoyle, takynge onely such presētes as the merchantes gentelly offered him & his capitaines, Causing Gartier, principal kyng at armes, to make a publique Proclamacion at the hygh Crosse in the market place of Edenborroughe, in the xx whych he warned & admonished, James kyng of Scottes, to kepe, obserue & performe all such promises, cōpactes, couenantes & agrementes as he had concluded & sealed to, wyth the high and mighty Prince Edward, by the grace of God kyng of England. &c. And also to make condigne and sufficient recompence to his subiectes, for the great tirannye spoyle and crueltye, that he and his people had perpetrate & committed cōtrary to his league, within the marches and territories of his realm of Englande, before the firste daye of August nexte ensuynge.
And farther without delay to restore the high and mighty prince Alexander, duke of Albanie, his naturall brother to hys estate, & all his offixx ces, possessions and authorities, in as ample and liberall maner, as he before occupied and enioyed thesame: or the high and valiaunte prince Rychard duke of Glocester, leuetenaunt generall, and chiefetayne for ỹ kyng of England, was redy at hand to destroy him, his people and cōtrey wyth slaughter, flame & famyn.

Kyng James would make no aunswere, neither by woorde nor by writing, knowing that his powey now fayled, either to performe the request demaunded, or to defend his countrey with such a puissant army inuaded. The lordes of Scotlande, lyeng at Hadyngton with a great puyssaunce, hearyng the kynge of Englandes reasonable desyre, dexxx termyned fyrste to practyse with the Duke of Glocester for a peace, and so to haue the Castell of Berwycke to their part, and after by some meanes to allure the duke of Albanye, from the English amitie, & vpon this mocion, the.ij. daye of August they wrote to the duke of Glocester, that the mariage betwene the prince of England shoulde be accomplisshed in all poyntes, according to the couenantes agreed, and the instrumētes therof engrosed, requiring farther that a peace from thensfurth might be louyngly concluded betwene bothe the Realmes. The duke of Glocester wisely and circumspectly certefied thē agayn, that as touching the article of mariage, to take effect betwene their prince and the xl lady Cicile of England, he knew not the determinat pleasure of ỹ king his master and brother, either for the affirmaunce or deniāce of thesam but he desired full restitucyon of all suche summes of money, as for the sayd mariage before time had ben disbursed, or prested out in lone. And where the sayd lordes desyred to haue a peace, concluded from thensfurth, betwene both the sayd realmes. He first required to haue the Castell of Barwyke to him deliuered, or at the lest, if he did agree to ỹ sayd peace, that then his siege, lyeng about the sayd Castel, should be hereafter in any wise, neither troubled, vexed, nor molested nor ỹ king of Scottes, nor none of hys subiectes, nor any other by hys procurement or prouokyng, should ayde, comfort or assist with victayle, ordinaũce or otherwise the Capitayne, Constable, or souldiers of the sayd Castel, duryng the siege.

The Lordes, Prelates, Barons, and estates of the realme of Scotlande, perceyuing & wel pondering, both the answer & the demaũdes of the duke of Glocester, sent to him sufficiently enstructed wyth these conclusions, the reuerẽd father Andrew, elect of Murray, and the lord Jhon Dernele, which thus answered, that where the said duke desired repayment of ỹ summes of money, deliuered in part of payment, for the contract of mariage, to be made betwene the prince of Scotland and ỹ kynges daughter of England: the tyme of lawfull contract of mariage is not yet come, because of the minoritie of the sayd prince and princesse. And the faut hereof is, that no day was appoynted for the money, to be payed before the contract began. And yf the kyng your brother woulde demaunde farther assurance, either for ỹ contract to be made, or for ỹ payment of the money, they promised therunto, accordinge to reason to agre. Secondarely, as touching the Castel of Berwike, they sayd al we know wel ynough, that it is the olde enheritance of the croune of Scotlande, of many hundred yeres past, and that our souereigne lorde hath right thereunto. And if it be alleged, that it belonged to the realme of England by conquest, it is well knowen that it standeth in Scotland, & ouer the Scottish ground. The duke not withstandinge their saiynges, would cõdiscend to no peace, without the Castel of Barwyke were rendered to the kyng of England, and so ỹ messengers departed, and on thesame day the Archebishop of sainct Andrewes, the bishop of Dũkelle Colyn, erle of Argyle, lord Cambel and lorde Andrew, lord Auandale, & Chaunceler of Scotlande, wrote vnto the duke of Albanye a solempne and autenticall instrument, signed and sealed with their seales, binding their bodies, landes and goodes to the said duke, that if he would hereafter be obedient to the kyng of Scottes, and kepe & obserue his faith and promise to be made to the sayd lordes, that he shoulde not onely be restored to all his landes, hereditamentes, offices & possessions, whiche he enioyed at the day of his departure out of Scocland, but also should haue and enioy to him, & his seruauntes & familie a free and a generall Pardon, which restitucion and pardon, thei likewise promised to be ratefied & approued by the kyng and the .iii. estates assembled at the nexte Parliament. The duke beyng glad to be restored agayne to his olde estate & possessions, & especially in his awne natiue countrey, receyued their offer, which was truly performed, & so toke his leue of the duke of Glocester, thankyng hym (as he was no lesse bounde) for the greate labour, traueyll & peyne, that he had taken in hys awne person for his restitucion.

stitucion. And promised bothe by word & by writing of his awne hande to do & perfourme all such thinges, as he before that tyme had sworne & promised to kyng Edwarde, notwithstanding any agrement, now made or to be made with the lordes of Scotland: and for the performance of theffect of thesayde Scedule, he agayne toke a corporall othe before the duke of Glocester, and sealed the writyng the thyrd day of August in the English Cãpe at Leuingtong, besydes Hadington, anno. M.cccc.lxxxii. and departed to hys awne possessions. After he was thus restored & reconciled, the lordes of Scotland proclaymed hym great lieuetenaunt of x Scotland, & in the kynges name made Proclamaciõ, that al mẽ shoulde be redy, vpon peyne of death within.viij.dayes at Craushaues, both to rayse the siege before the Castell, and for the recouerynge agayne of the towne of Barwyke. The duke of Albanye wrote all this prepataciõ to the duke of Glocester, hũbly requiring hym to haue no mistrust in hym promising to kepe his othe & promyse, made to kyng Edward & to hym. The duke of Glocester wrote to hym agayne, that it shoulde neither be honorable nor commendable in hym, too helpe, to reise the siege, at the layeng whereof he was counsayler & partener, nor yet to reward ỹ king of England, with such a displeasure for hys kyndnes costes and expẽses xx to hym in hys extreme necessitie, louingly shewed and liberally exhibited. But he assured hym in the woord of a Prince, that if he & all the power of Scotland attempted to come to rayse the siege, planted before ỹ Castell of Barwyke, that he hym selfe with hys armye woulde defende the besegiers, or els dye in the quarell.

The counsayl of Scotlande sagely & poletiquely sawe before, that if they shoulde come to reyse the siege, that the duke of Glocester woulde with them shortly encoũter, & then yf they lost the felde, both the strength of the Realme was brought to an imbecilitie, the nobles sore mintshed, and the castell lost and taken. And on the other side, yf they obtayned xxx victorie, nothyng was gotten but the pore towne of Barwyke, and they were likely sone to be inuaded with a greater power shortly again, wherfore they sent Lyon kyng at Armes to the duke of Glocester, offering to hym as they thought, two offers very reasonable, the one was, that if he would promyse on his honor to subuerte and cast doune the toune walles of Barwyke, they would likewise race, and clerely deface the walles Towres and portes of the Castell, or els the duke of Glocester to put in a capitayn and a garrison of men of warre into the towne, and the duke of Albanye, likewyse to do with the Castel, for the Tuycion of thesame. And farther the foresayd Lyon desired an abstinẽce of warre to be. takẽ, xl tyll the two dukes might haue cõmunication of grauous matters, concernyng the welthes of bothe the Realmes. The duke of Glocester refused bothe the offers saiyng, that he had long mainteined the siege before the Castell of barwyke, to no small waste and exhaustyng of hys brothers treasure and riches, and to the great trauayle and payne of the Lordes, Gentelmen, and men of warre, that continuallye made there abode and dayly residens at the sayd seige: wherfore he sayd, that he in this poynt was fermely resolued, not to departe till the Castel were yelded by apoyntement, or taken by force, or els hys siege were by the power of Scotland reysed, or he and hys armye vanquished: wherfore he would by no meane harken to the petition of the Scottishe lordes, concernyng the abstinence of warre, tyll he were either vanquished or possessed of the Castell of Barwyke. With whiche answere the Herault departed, and thereof made relacion to the lordes and counseyll of Scotland. Whē the dukes answere was of them well digested, they euidētly perceyuing that the Castel of Barwyke was the onely maker of ỹ peace, and that the not deliuery of the same, should be the norice and continuer of warre and hostilitie: considerynge farther, that the nobilitie nor commons of Scotland, dyd not draw together by one lyne, nor were sorted in one leuell, electyng and chosyng the better parte, and reiectinge and auoydynge the worse, a greed and determined to deliuer the Castell of Barwyke to the English partie, so that there shoulde be truce or abstinence of warre taken and concluded for a determinate season. And therpō they sent to the duke of Glocester a league indēted, which was dated the.xxiiij.day of August, in the yere of our lorde a.M.cccc.lxxxij. in the which it was contracted and agreed betwene the duke of Glocester, lieuetenaūt generall for the kyng of Englande, and Alexander duke of Albanye, lieuetenaūt for James kyng of Scottes, that an especiall abstinence of warre should be kept and obserued betwixte the Realmes of England and Scotland, and the people of the same, aswell by sea as by lāde, to begyn the.viij.day of September next ensuyng, and to endure tyll the.iiii.day of Nouember next folowyng. And in the meane season, the towne and castel of Barwyke, to be occupyed, and be in the reall possession of suche as by the kyng of Englandes deputie, should be appointed and assigned with all and singuler such boundes, limites and territorres as the English nacion, last vsed and possessed, when the castell towne were in the subiection of the Englishmen. And all other marches and boundes, beyng in difference betwene the sayd Realmes, to stande and to be holden in lyke case and condicion, as they were before the last truce concluded. The duke of Glocester, whiche well percepued that the Scottes more graunted to his demaundes, for relieue of their awne necessitie, then to gratifie hym or the kyng hys brother in any poynt: lyke a wyse counseyler, toke hys aduantage when it was offered, and especially because these thynges made for hys longe desyred purpose.

Fyrst the deliuerey of the Castell of Barwyke, he voluntarely without counsayl (as a praye preuely gotten) both accepted and alowed, and for that onely cause he dyd not refuse the abstinence of warre, but too that gently agreed. As touchyng the possession, to be kept in the landes dependyng in variance betwene the Realmes (cōmenly called the bataible grounde) he woulde not, nor durst not conclude with the duke of Albanye, without hauyng farther intelligence of the kyng hys souereigne

lordes pleasure and counsaill, meanynge thereby euer to kepe theim as sueters to him, & he no farther to seke on theim, and in the meane season to let that matter be in suspence. Whā he had sealed to the first two Articles, and that they were sent agayne to the lordes of Scotlande, they them gladly receyued, and with good will embraced, and likewise truly performed the same: for the castell of Barwyke was incontinent deliue-red to the lorde Stanley, and other thereto appoynted, whiche therein put bothe Englishe men and artilerie, sufficiente for the defence of all Scotland for.vi. monethes. By thys meanes as you haue harde, the x Englishmen reposssessed agayn the towne & castell of Barwyke, whyche xxi.yeres before by kyng Hēry the.vi. was to the Scottes as you haue hard geuen vp and deliuered. And lest peraduenture the duke of Glocē-ster might thynke that the duke of Albanye dyd not in all thynges set forward, prefer, and auaūce hys fyrst requestes and demaundes, made and requyred of the lordes of Scotland, and in especial one which was for the assurance to be made for the repayment to the kyng of England, of all suche summes of money, as he had beforehand prested & disbursed to the kyng of Scottes for the mariage to be solempnised and consummate betwene their chyldern, as before is reherced: Therfore ỹ said xx duke of Albanye, caused the Prouost and Burgesses of Edenborough to make a sufficient instrument obligatorie, to kynge Edward, for the trew satisfaccion and contentaciō of the same money, whiche he also sent by the saied Prouost to the Duke of Glocester to Alnewyke: The very

„ When the duke of Glocester had thus obteyned hys purpose, and rrr receyued wzitynges sygned and sealed foz the perfozmance of thesame, he sent the instrumentes to kyng Edward hys bzother, whiche muche cōmended bothe his valyaunt manhode, and also his pzudent pollicie, in conueyng hys busines, bothe to hys awne purpose, and also to the pzofit of the Realme. Kyng Edward not a littel mused, and much moze debated wyth his counsayll whether it were moze pzofitable and honorable to hym and hys Realme, to suffer the sayde mencioned mariage, to take effect, and pzocede to a conclusion, oz els to requyze a repayment, and tedelyuery of the summes of money, appzompted and layde out foz thesame purpose. After long consultacion had and it was considered in pl what case the realme & ỹ kyng of Scottes stode in, foz it was well knowen that he and hys nobilitie were at great discozd as you befoze haue hearde: it was considered farther, that yf the nobilitie pzeuayled, and gat the souerayntie, the lyne and succession of James the thyzde, were likely to be totally extirpate, & disinherited foz euer: it was also alleged

that the prince of Scotlande, neuer condiscended nor as he hym selfe sayd, woulde agre to thys mocioned mariage. These thynges thus debated, the kyng by great aduice, refused and reuoked all thynges to be done, for the more forwardnes of thesayde mattimony, and elected and chose the repayment of all suche summes of money, as for the occasion of thesayde betrusted mariage was payed, and before hand contented & deliuered. And accordinge to the woordes of the obligacion, made by the towne of Edenborough, he sent Gartier, hys principall kyng of Armes and Northumberland Herault, to declare and intimate to the Prouost x and burgesses of Edenborough, the determinate refusall of the future mattimony and the election and choyse of the repayment of the money and ducty. And for the farther ouerture of the whole conclusion. Gartier was instructed by writyng, what he should saye and declare: and so by conuenient iorneys came to the towne of Edenborough.viii.dayes before the feast of all sayntes, where he openly sayde as followeth:

I gartier kynge of armes seruaunt, proctour and messenger vnto the most hygh and mighty prince, my most dread soueraygne lord Edward by the grace of God, kyng of Englande and of Fraunce, and lorde of xx Irelande, by vertue of certayn letters of procuracie here redy to be shewed to me, by my sayd souereygne lord made and geuen, make notyce and geue knowlege vnto you Prouost, Burgesses, marchauntes and communaltie of the towne of Edenborough in Scotlande, that where as it was sometyme commoned and agreed, betwene my sayde soueraygne lorde on the one partie, and the righte high and mighty prince James king of Scottes, on the other partie, that mariage & mattimony should haue been solempnised, and had betwene James the first begotten sonne of thesayd kyng of Scottes, and lady Cicilie, daughter to my sayd soucreigne lord the kyng of Englande. And for thesayde matiage to haue been perfourmed, certayne and diuers greate summes of money, xxx ben payed and contented by my sayde soueraigne lord, whiche summes of money, in cace of refusall of the sayde mariage, by my sayde souereygne lorde to be made and declared, ye thesayd Prouost, Burgesses, marchauntes and communaltie, and euery one of you are bounde and obliged by your letters vnder youre comon seale of your toune of Edeborough to repaye vnto his hyghnes vnder lyke forme, and at suche termes as they were fyrst payed. So that the kyng my souereigne lorde woulde make notice and knowlege of his pleasure, and election in takyng or refusynge of thesayde mariage, of the repayment of thesayde summes of money, before the feast of Alhalowes nexte to come, lyke as xl in your saide letters, bearynge date at Edenborowghe in the forthe day of August last past, it was conteyned all at large. The pleasure and election of my sayd souereygne lord, for dyuers causes and considerations hym mouynge, is to refuse the accomplishement of the sayde mariage, and to haue the repayment of all suche summes of money, as by occasion of thesayde betrusted mariage, hys hyghnes had payed, The sayd repaymente to be had of yow Prouoste, Burgesses, merchauntes and communaltie, and euery of you, youre heyres and successors, accordinge to youre bonde and obligacion afore reherſed. And therfore I geue you notice and knowlege, by this writinge, whiche I deliuer to you, within the terme in your sayde letters lymited and expressed to all ententes and effectes, which therof maye ensue.

When Gattier had thus declared all thinges, geuen to hym in charge, the Prouost or other Burgesses made aunswere, that they now knowynge the kynges determinate pleasure, woulde accordynge to theyr bonde, prepare for the repayment of the sayde summes, and gentelly entertaynyng Gattier conueyghed him to Barwyke, from whēce he departed to new Castell, to the duke of Glocester, makyng relacion to hym of all his doynges, whiche duke with all spede returned too Sheryuthton, and there a bode. Shortly after Gattiers departynge, the duke of Albanye, thinkyng to obteyne agayne the hygh fauoure of the kynge hys brother, deliuered hym out of captiuitie and prison, wheryn he had a certayne space continued (not without the dukes assente whiche besieged hym in the Castell of Edenborough a littell before) & set him at large, of whome outwardly he receiued great thankes, when inwardly nothynge but reuengyng and confusion was in the kynges stomacke incorporate, so that shortly after in the kynges presence, he was in ieopardye of hys lyfe, and all improuyded for dread of death, coacted to take a small balynger, and to sayle into Frauuce, where shortly after rydynge by the men of armes, whiche encountered at the tylt, by Lewes then duke of Orliaunce, after Frenche kyng, he was with mischarging of a speare by fortunes peuerce countenaunce pytyfullye slayne and brought to death, leauyng after hym one onely sonne, named Jhon, whiche beynge banished Scotland, enhabited and maried in Fraunce, and there dyed. How dolorous, how sorowfull is it to wryte, and muche more pencifull to remember the chaunces, and infortunites that happened within twoo yere in Englande and Scotlande, betwene naturall bretherne. For kyng Edward set on by suche as enuyed the estate of the duke of Clarence, forgettyng nature, and fraternall amytie, consented to the deathe of hys sayde brother. James kynge of Scottes, puttynge in oblyuion that Alexander hys brother was the onely Organe and instrument, by whome he obteyned libertie and fredome, seduced and led by Vyle and malicious persons, whiche maligned at the glorie and indifferent iustice of the duke of Albanye, imagined and compassed hys deathe, and exiled hym for euer. What a pernicious serpēt, what a venemous tode, what a pestiferous Scorpion is that deueliſhe whelpe called, priuye enuye? Agaynst it no fortres can defend, no caue can hyde, no wood can shadow, no foule can escape, nor no beaste can auoyde, her poyson is so stronge, that neuer man in aucthoritie coulde escape from the bytyng of her tethe, scratchyng of her pawes, blastyng of her breath, defoulynge of her tayle.

Wherfore

Wherefore,let euery indifferent persone,serche Histories, rede Chronicles,looke on aucthores,aswell holy as prophane, and they shall ap-parauntly perceyue,that neither open warre, daily famine, or accustomed mortalitie, is not so muche an enemye,nor so greate a malle to de-stroye, and suppeditate high power and nobilitie, as is roted malyce, inwarde grudge,and dissimuled hatred. Although that kyng Edwarde wer glad and ioyous,of all the prosperous successe,of all enterprises in the realme of Scotlande,yet euen now his Feuer tercian, of the whiche he had languished sore, sithe his voyage royall into Fraunce, was sox dainly turned into a vncurable quarteyn: For where he was before tossed,betwene hope and dispaire, sometyme hote,sometyme colde, that the Matrimonie of his daughter, and Charles the dolphin, should come to the solempnizacion,according to the leage, betwene hym and the Frēche kyng,concluded at Picquegneie: Now was he cast into an indissoluble Melancoly,and a continuall cold: For the lorde Hawarde whiche was returned out of Fraūce,with many fayre wordes,and painted promises but without tribute,or conclusiō of the mariage,certified the kyng of his awne knowlege:how that he being present,sawe the lady Margarete of Austrice,daughter to Duke Maximilian,sonne to the Emperor Fredexx ricke,receiued into Fraunce, with pompe more then Emperiall, by the Duke of Burbon,the lorde Dalbret,and many other lordes and magistrates of the realme,and so with greate triumphe, conueighed to Amboyse,where the Dolphin laye,and there was to hym contracted and espoused. Kyng Edwarde now beyng certain,how the Frenche kyng had with pleasaunt language, and colourable answeres,foded hym furthe, and allured hym to geue credence,to hys dissimulyng woordes, neither meanyng as he sayed,nor shewyng what he meante: Determined with hym self, no longer to suffre so apparaunt wrong,nor so intollerable an iniurie. Wherfore,he called his nobilitie together,and declared to them xxx the manifold wrong, whiche he had receiued of late at the handes of the Frenche kyng,and how he vntruly,and vnprincely,had broken the league and amitie,bothe in denyng the paiment of the tribute, as also, in refusing the accomplishmēt of the mariage of his daughter, accordyng as in the treatie was concluded. Requiryng them therfore to study, how to reuenge and punyshe,so greate a shame,and so opprobrious a taunt, offered to their natyue Countrey. The nobilitie not a litle glad of this mocion,answered: that their whole desire was,to fight with the Frenche men,whom they so oftē times had vanquished,& prosligated in battaill, and that for the dignitie,and fame of their Countrey,they would let no-xl thyng be vnatempted,offeryng him in an instant,to be ready in harnes to fulfill his mynde and desire. When the knewe the toward myndes of his subiectes, of the Temporalltie,he moued the Spiritualtie (because by the Ecclesiasticall lawes,they be prohibited to weare armure)to aide hym with money,for maintenaunce of his warres, and suppressyng of his enemyes.

The.xxiii. ye.

Eholde, while he was intentiue, and employed his whole labor, diligence, and industrie, to furnisshe and setforward this warre, whiche he newly had attempted and begonne: whether it was with the melencoly, and anger that he toke with the Frenche kyng, for his vntruthe and vnkyndnes, or were it by any superfluous surfet (to the whiche he was muche geuen) he sodaunly fell sicke, and was with a greuous maledy taken, yea, so greuously taken, that his vitall spirites, began to fayle and waxe feble, whiche debilitie when he perceiued, he called together all his nobles, whiche, that tyme wer aboute London, vpon one daye (as he did diuerse tymes commen with them) and thus in effect, to theim saied: My welbeloued, and no lesse bettrusted frendes, counsaylers, and alies, if wee mortall men would dayly and hourely, with our self reuolue, and intētiuely in our hartes engraue, or in our myndes grauously pōder, the fraile and fadyng imbecilitie, of our humayn nature, and the caduke fragilitie of thesame: wee should apparauntly percepue, that we beyng called reasonable creatures, and in that predicament, compared and ioyned with Angelles, bee more worthy to be nuncupate, and demed persones vnreasonable, and rather to be associate in that name with brute beastes, called vnreasonable (of whose life and death, no creature speaketh) rather then in that poynt, to be resembled to the Angelicall societie, and reasonable compaignie. For while health in vs florisheth, or prosperitie abundeth, or the glosyng worlde laugheth, whiche is he, so reasonable of vs all that can saye (if he will not erre from the truthe) that he once in a weke remēbreth his fatall ende, or the prescribed terme of his enduring: or once prouydeth by labor, study, or otherwyse, to set a stedfast and sure ordre for the securitie, and perfight continuaūce either of his possessions and dominions, or of his sequele and posteritie, whiche after hym shall naturally succede: suche is the blyndnes of oure frayle and fragile nature, euer geuen to carnall concupiscence, and mundain delectacion, daily obfuscate and seduced, with that lethargious, and deceuable serpent, called hope of long life, that all we put in obliuion, our duetie present, and lesse remembre the pollitique purueighaunce, for thynges to come: For blyndly we walke in this fraile life, till we fall grouelyng with our yes, sodainly vpon death. The vanities of this worlde, bee to vs so agreable, that when we begin to liue, wee esteme our life, a whole worlde, whiche once ouerpassed, it sheweth no better but dust, or ayen a way with a puffe of wynde: I speake this to you of my self, and for your selfes to you, sore lamenting, and inwardly bewailyng, that I did not perfourme and finally cōsummate, such pollitique diuises, and good and Godly ordinaunces, in my long lyfe and pacifique prosperitie, whiche, then I fully determined to haue begonne, set forward, and completly to haue finished. Whiche, now for the extreme paines, and tortures of my angrie maladie, and for the small terme of my naturall life, I can neither per-foꝛme neyther yet lyue to see, either to take effect oꝛ to soꝛt to any conclusion. Foꝛ God I call to recoꝛd, my harte was fully sette, and my mynde deliberatly dertermined:so to haue decoꝛated this realme, with wholesome Lawes, statutes, and oꝛdinauntes, so to haue educated and bꝛought bp myne enfantes and chylꝛen, in vertue, learnyng, actiuitie, and pollicie. That, what with their ꝛoyall puissaunce, and your frendly assistence, the pꝛoudest Pꝛince of Europe, durste not once attempte, to moue any hostilitie, againste them, you, oꝛ this realme: But oh Loꝛde, all thynges that I of long tyme, haue in my mynde reuolued, and immagix ned, that stelyng thief death, goeth about to subuerte, and in the momẽt of an houre clerely to suppeditate, wherfoꝛe (as men saie) I now being dꝛiuen to the verie hard wall: hauyng perfect confidence, and sure hope in the appꝛobate fidelitie, and constaunt integritie, whiche I haue euer experimented, and knowen to be radicate and planted, in the hartes of your louyng bodies, toward me and myne. So that I maie saie and ad-uowe, that neuer Pꝛince bearyng scepter and Croune, ouer realmes and regions, hath found oꝛ pꝛoued, moꝛe faithfuller counsailers, noꝛ trewer subiectes, then I haue doen of you, noꝛ neuer Potentate noꝛ gouernoꝛ, put moꝛe affiaunce and truste, in his vassals and seruauntes, then I, sith xx the adepcion of the Croune, fermely haue fixed, in your circumspect wisedomes, and sober discresions. And now of verie foꝛce compelled, lyng in a dubious hope, betwene liuyng and diyng, betwene remembꝛaunce and oblиuion, do require you and instauntly moue you, that as I haue found you, faithfull, obediẽt, and to all my requestes and desires (while I was here in healthe, conuersant with you) diligent and intentiue: So after my death, my hope is with a sure anchoꝛ grounded, and myne inwarde conceipte vndubitatly resolued, that the especiall confidence, and inwarde fidelitie, whiche so long hath continued betwene vs, beyng to gether liuyng shall not totally by my death, bee extincte and vanished xxx like smoke. Foꝛ what auayleth frendshyppe in life, when trust deceiueth after death? What pꝛofiteth amitie in apparaunt pꝛesence, when confidence is fraudulẽtly begutled in absence? What loue groweth, by con-tunction of Matrimonie, yf the offspꝛyng after dooe not agree and concoꝛde? Oꝛ what pꝛofiteh Pꝛinces, to auaunce and pꝛomote their subie-ctes, if after their death, the bountifulnes by theim shewed, be of the receiuers of thesame and their sequele neither regarded noꝛ yet remembered? The parẽtes make the mariage, foꝛ an indissoluble amitie, Pꝛinces pꝛomote sometyme foꝛ fauoure, sometyme foꝛ deserte, and sometyme foꝛ pleasure: yet (if you will consider) the verie pꝛicke, to the whiche all gif-xl tes of pꝛomocions, do finally tend, it is to haue loue, fauoꝛ, faithful coũsaill, and diligent seruice, of suche as be by them, pꝛomoted and exalted, not onely in their awne lifes, beyng but bꝛief and transitoꝛie: But also, that thei and their pꝛogeny, callyng to remembꝛaunce, the fauoꝛ, estima-ctõ, and auauncement, whiche they of so liberal and munificent a pꝛince had receiued and obteined: should with spere and shylde, tongue and wit

wit,hande & penne, continually studie to defende, counsaill and prefer not onely hym duryng his life,but also to serue,assist,and maintein hys sequele,and lineall succession,as the verie Images,and carnall protratures,of his stirpe,line,and stemme,naturally discẽded. In this case am I,whom you knowe,not without meffable trouble,and moste daungetous warr,to haue obteined the scepter,and diademe of this realme and Empire, duryng whiche reigne, I haue had either litle peace, or small tranquilitie: And now when I thought my self, sure of a quiet life,and worldly rest, death hath blowen his terrible trompet,calling and somonyng me(as I truste) to perpetuall tranquilitie,and eternall quietnes: therefore now for the perfecte,and vnmoueable confidence,that I haue euer had in you,and for the vnfained loue, that you haue euer shewed vnto me, I cõmende and deliuer into your gouernaunce,bothe this noble realme,and my naturall children,and your kynsmen. My children by your diligent ouersight, and pollitique prouision to bee taught,enformed,and instructed,not onely in the scièces liberall, vertues moral and good literature:but also to be practised in trickes of marciall actiuitie,and diligent exercise of prudent pollicie:For I haue hard clarkes saye, although I am vnlettered, that fortunate is that Realme, where Philosophiers reigne,or where kynges bee Philosophiers, and louers of wisedome. In this tendre age,you maie wythe and turne theim, into euery forme and fashiõ: If you bryng them vp in vertue,you shal haue verteous Princes:if you set them to learnyng,your gouernors shalbee men of knowlege,if you teache them actiuitie,you shall haue valiannte capitaines,if thei practice pollicie, you shall haue bothe pollitique,and prudent rulers. On ther other side,if by your negligence,thei fal to vice (as youth is toall euill,prone and ready) not onely their honor, but also your honestie,shalbe spotted and appalled: If thei bee slogardes and geuẽ to slothe,the publique wealth of this realme,must shortly decaye. If thei be vnlearned,thei maye by flattery sone bee blinded,& by adulacion often deceiued. If thei lacke actiuitie,euery creature be he neuer so base of birthe, shall foyle and ouerthrowe theim, like domme beastes and beastly dastardes. Therfore I desire you,and in Goddes name adiure you,rather to studie to make theim riche, in Godly knowlege, and verteous qualities,then to take pain to glorifie theim,with abundance of worldely treasure,and mundain superfluitie. And certainly,whẽ thei come to maturitie of age,and shal peraduenture consider,that by your omission and negligent educaciõ,thei haue not suche graces,nor are endued with suche notable qualities, as thei might haue been, if you had performed the truste to you,by me committed: Thei shall not onely deplore,and lament their vngarnished estate, and naked condiciõ,but also it maye fortune, that thei shall conceiue inwardly against you, suche a negligent vntruthe,that the sequele thereof,maye rather turne to displeasure then thanke,and soner to an vngratitude,then to a rewarde.

My kyngdom also,I leue in your gouernaunce, duryng the minoritie tie of my chyldren, chargyng you on your honors, othes, and fidelitie, made and sworne to me, so indifferently to ordre and gouerne, the subiectes of thesame, bothe with iustice and mercie, that the willes of maiefactors, haue not to large a scope, nor the hartes of the good people, by to muche extremitie, bee neither sorofully daunted, nor vnkyndly kept vnder: Oh I am so sicke, that I muste make an ende, and now before you all I commende my soule to almightie God, my sauior and redemer: my body to the wormes of the yearth, my kyngdom to the Prince my sonne, and to you my louyng frendes my harte, my trust, and my whole confi-x dence. And euen with that, he fell on slepe: After diuerse suche charitable monicions and exhortacions (as the pangues and fittes of his sickenes would permit hym) sometyme to his nobilitie, sometyme to his familier frendes, made and declared: His maladie sodainly encreased, and grewe to so painfull an extremitie, that short death was soner of him required, then longer life desired, wishyng rather departyng out of this worlde, then to abyde the paynfull smatte, of hys dolorous pangues. Wherfore Attrapos hauing compassion, of his continuall languishyng, and daily agony, dirupted and brake the threde, of his naturall lyfe, the.ix. daye of Aprill, in the yere of our Lorde. M.CCCC.lxxxiii. and in the fiftie xx yere of his bodily age, when he had reigned ouer thys Realme, more in trouble then perfecte quietnes. xxii. yeres, one monethe and eight daies: whose corps was with funerall pompe, according to the royall estate of a kyng, conueighed to the Colege of Winsore, to the which, he had been a greate benefactor and there on the right hand, of the high aulter, princely enterred and intumilate, whose death was asmuche lamented of his subiectes, as his lyfe desired. He begat of the Quene Elizabeth his wife, tenne children, whereof he left liuyng twoo soonnes Edward Prince of Wales, and Richard duke of Yorke, and a bastard sonne called Arthur, whiche, after was Vicount Lisle, and came to good proffe: beside these he xxx left fiue daughters, Elizabeth, Cicilie, Anne, Katherine, and Brigot: all these wer maried, except lady Brigot, whiche was a Nonne professed.

This kyng Edward was a manne, of a goodly personage, of stature high, and excedyng all other in countenaunce, welfauored and comly, of eye quycke and pleasaunt, brode brested, and well set, all other members doune to his fete, kept iust proporcion with the bulke of his body: of wit he was quicke and pregnant, of stomacke stoute and bold, of courage haute and high, of memorie moste perfecte, and especially of suche thynges, as he had trauailed in greate affaires and weightie causes quicke and diligent, in perelles and aduentures bolde and hardie, against his xl enemies, fierce and terrible, to his frendes and to straungers bountifull and liberall, hauyng in warres moste prosperous lucke, and happie successe: From the pleasure of the body, to the whiche he was prone, & much geuen, he did muche abstein and forbere, for whiche cause, and also for the greate humanitie and lowlines, that in hym was by nature moste abundantly engendered, he vsed himself emong meane persones, more

familier,then his degree,dignitie, or maiestie required, whiche was the cause that some suspected hym ,to haue died of poyson.And it was sayd, he that all the daies of his life,had muche vsed liberalitie, was towarde his latter ende, geuen to auarice and loue of money. And although he founde his kyngdome,greatly impouerished, and almoste emptie, bothe of men of warre and money, yet after that he had pacified,and finished the ciuill discencion, he left his realme, of all thynges riche and abundaunt. The spirituall promocions,he gaue euer to the moste famous and excellent Clerkes, and men of the best liuing: Other of meane qualities, whom he muche fauored, he did not preferre to greate dignitie and high promocions but with money rewarded theim, whiche thyng many Princes (regardyng not their honors) do not consider nor obserue: with all whiche notable vertues,he ioyned to hym so surely the hartes of his people,that after hys death,his life again was daily wished,and affecteously emong hys Subiectes desyred,but wishyng serued not, nor,yet their desyre tooke none effecte.

¶ The pitifull lyfe of Kyng Edwarde the fyft.

HE eternall God callyng to his mercye the noble prince Kynge Edward the.iiij. of that name: Edward, his eldeste sonne (prince of wales) begane his reygne the ninthe daye of Apryll, in the yere of our Lord a thousande foure hundred fourscore & thre, and in the.xxiij. yere of Lewes the leuenthe then Frenche Kynge: Whiche younge prince reigned a small space & litle season ouer this realme, either in pleasure or libertie. For his vncle Richard duke of Gloucester, within thre monethes depryued hym not onely of his croune and regalitee, but also vnnaturally bereft hym of his naturall life: and for the declaracion by what craftie engine he firste attempted his vngracioulse purpose, & by what false coulourable and vntrue allegacions he set furth openly hys pretensed enterprise, and finally by what shamefull, cruell and detestable act he perfourmed thesame: Ye muste first considre of whom he and his brother dessended, their natures, condicions and inclinacions, and then you shall easely perceiue, that there coulde not bee a more crueller tiraunt apointed to a cheue a more abhominable entrepryse.

This kinges tyme wyth some parte of Kinge Richard .iij. as shal apere by a note made at ỹ place, was written by sr Thomas More.

Their father was Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, whiche began not by warre, but by lawe to calenge the crowne of Englande putting his claime in the parliament holdē the thirty yere of kyng Henry the sixt, where either for right or for fauoure, hys cause was so set furthe and auaunced that the bloude of thesaied kynge Henry, although he had a goodly sonne, was clerely abiected, & the crowne of ỹ Realme (by auctoritie of parliamente) entayled to the duke of Yorke and his heires after the decease of thesayed Kynge Henry the syxte. But the duke not entendyng so longe to tary, but mindyng vnder the pretexte of discencion growen and arisen within the realme, and of couenauntes made in the Parliament, not kepte, but broken, to preuent the time and to take vpon hym, the gouernaunce in Kynge Henries life, was by to muche hardinesse slaine at the battaill of Wakefelde, leuinge behinde hym three sonnes, Edwarde, George and Richarde. All these three as thei were greate estates of birthe, so were they greate & stately of stomacke, gredy of promocions, and impaciente parteners of rule and autorite.

Richard plantagenet duk of Yorke.

The.iij. sonnes of Richard duke of Yorke, described.

Thys Edward reuenged hys fathers death & deposed King Henry the sixt, and attained the crowne and scepter of the realme.

George duke of Clarence was a goodly and wel feautered prince, in all thynges fortunate, yf either his owne ambicion had not set hym against his brother, or thenuy of his enemies had not set hys brother against hym: for were it by the quene or the nobles of her blud, whiche highly maligned the kynges kynred (as women comenly, not of malice but of nature, hate suche as their husbandes loue) or wer it a proud appetite of the duke hym selfe, entendynge to bee kyng, at the leaste wise, heinous treason was laied to his charge, and finally were he in faulte or were he fautlesse, attainted was he by Parliament and iudged to death, and there vpon hastely drowned in a butte of malmesey within the towre of London. Whose death kyng Edwarde (although he commaunded it) when he wiste it was dooen, piteously he bewayled and sorowfully repented it.

George duke of Clarence drowned in a but of Malmesey.

Richard duke of Gloucester the third sonne (of whych I must moste entreate) was in witte and courage egall with the other, but in beaute & liniamentes of nature far vnderneth bothe, for he was litle of stature euill featured of limmes, croke backed, the left shulder muche higher then the righte, harde fauoured of vysage, suche as in estates is called a warlike vysage, and emonge commen persones a crabbed face. He was malicious, wrothfull and enuious, and as it is reported, his mother the duches had muche adooe in her trauaill, that she coulde not bee deliuered of hym vncut, and that he came into the world the fete forwarde, as menne bee borne outwarde, and as the fame ranne, not vntothed: whether that menne of hatred reported aboue the truthe, or that nature chaunged his course in his beginnynge, whyche in hys life many thynges vnnaturally committed, thys I leue to God hys iudgemente. He was none euill capitain in warre, as to the whyche, his disposicion was more enclined too, then too peace. Sondrye victories he had and some ouerthrowes, but neuer for defaute of hys owne persone, either for lacke of hardinesse or politique order. Free he was of his dispences and somwhat aboue his power liberall, with large giftes he gatte hym vnstedfaste frendshippe: for whiche cause he was fain to borowe, pyll and extort in other places, whyche gat hym stedfaste hatred. He was close and secrete, a depe dissimuler, lowlye of countenaunce, arrogante of herte, outwardely familier where he inwardely hated, not lettynge to kisse whom he thoughte to kill, dispiteous & cruell, not alwaie for euill will, but after for ambicion and too serue his purpose, frende and fooe were all indifferent, where hys auauntage grewe, he spared no mannes deathe whose lyfe withstode hys purpose. He slewe in the towre kynge Henry the sixt, saiynge: now is there no heire male of kynge Edwarde the thirde, but wee of the house of Yorke: whyche murder was doen without kyng Edward his assente, which would haue appointed that bocherly office too some other, rather then to hys owne brother. Some wise menne also wene, that hys drifte lacked not in helpynge furth Kyng Henry the.vi. slayn in the towar by Richard the.iij.

furth his owne brother of Clarence to his death, which thyng in all apparaunce he resisted, although he inwardly mynded it. And the cause hereof was, as men notynge his doynges & procedynges dyd marke (because that he longe in kyng Edwarde his tyme thought to obtaine the crowne in case that the kynge his brother, whose life he loked that euil diet woulde sone shorten) shoulde happen to diseace, as he dyd in dede, his childrē beynge younge. And then if the duke of Clarence had liued, his pretensed purpose had been far hyndered: For yf the duke of Clarence had kepte hym selfe trewe to his nephewe the young king, or x woulde haue taken vpon hym to bee kynge, euery one of these castes had been a troumpe in the duke of Glouceſters waye: but when he was sure that his brother of Clarence was ded, thē he knewe that he might worke without that ieoperdy. But of these poinctes there is no certentie, & whosoeuer diuineth or cōiectureth, may as well shote to fer as to shorte, but this coniecture afterwarde toke place (as fewe dooe) as you shall perceiue hereafter.

But afore I declare to you howe this Richarde duke of Glouceſter began his mischeuous imagined & pretenced enterprice as apparantly shalbe opened, I muste a litle put you in remembraunce of a louyng & xx charitable acte, no lesse profitable then amicable to the whole cōminaltie, if it had been so inwardely thought as it was outwardly dissimuled which kynge Edwarde dyd, lyng on his death bedde not longe before he died. For in his life, although that the diuision emongest his frendes somewhat greued and irked hym, yet in his helthe he lesse regarded & toke hede to it, by reason that he thoughte that he was hable in al thinges to rule both parties, wer thei neuer so obstinate: But in his last sickenes (whyche continued longer then false and fantasticall tales haue vntruely and falsely surmised, as I my selfe that wrote this pamphlet truly knewe) when he perceiued his naturall strengthy was gone, & ho-xxx ped litle of recouery by the artes of all his phicisians whiche he perceiued onely to prolong his life. Then he began to consider the youthe of his childrē, howe be it, he nothynge lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet he wisely forseyng & consideryng that many harmes might ensue by the debate of his nobles while the youth of his childrē shoulde lacke discrecion and good counsayll of their frendes, for he knewe well that euery parte woulde worke for their owne commodite, and rather by plesaunte aduise to wynne theim selues fauour, then by profitable aduertisment to doe the childrē good: wherefore lynge on hys dethe bed at Westminster, he called to hym suche lordes as then were aboute xl hym, whome he knewe to bee at variaunce, in especiall the Lord Marques Dorset sonne to the Quene, and the Lorde Hastynges, agaynste whom the quene especially grudged for the fauoure that the king bare hym, & also she thoughte hym familier with the kynge in wanton compaignie: her kynne bare hym sore aswel for that the kyng made him capitain of Caleis, which office the lord Riuers brother to the quene claimed of the kyng hys former promise, as of diuerse other giftes whyche he receyued that they loked for. And when these lordes wyth diuerse other of bothe parties were come vnto the kynge his presence, he caused hym selfe to bee raised vp with pillowes, as I can gesse, saied thus or muche like in sentence to theim.

An exhortation of kyng Edward .v. iiij. in hys deathe bedde

My lordes, my dere kynsmen and alies, in what plight I now lye you se, and I perfightly fele, by the whyche I loke the lesse while to liue with you, therefore the more depely I am moued to care in what case I leaue you, for suche as I leaue you, suche are my chyldren like to finde you, whych yf they should find at variaunce (as God forbid) they theim selfes might hap to fal at warre or their discrecion woulde serue to set you at peace: you se their youthe, of whiche I reken the onely surety to reste in youre concorde. For it suffiseth not all you too loue theim, yf eche of you hate other: yf they were men your faithfulnesse might hap to suffice, but childhod muste bee maintained by mennes autoritie, and slipper youthe vnderprompted with elder counsaill, which they can neuer haue excepte you geue it, nor you geue it, excepte you agree, for where eche laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatered eche impugneth others counsaill, there muste nedes bee a longe tracte or any good conclusion canne forewarde. And farther, while eache partie laboureth too bee chiefeflatterer, adulacion shall then haue more place, then plaine and faithefull aduise, of whiche muste nedes ensue the eiuill bryngynge vp of the prince whose mynde in tender youth infecte shall redely fall to mischiefe and riote and drawe downe this noble realme to ruine: But yf grace turne hym to wisedome (whyche God send hym) then they whiche by eiuill meanes pleased hym beste, shall after fall fardest out of fauoure, so that at the lengthe eiuill driftes dryue to naught, and good plain waies prospere and florishe. Greate variaunce hath been betwene you, not alwayes for great causes: Some tyme a thynge righte well entended and miscõstured hath been turned to the worse, or a small displeasure doen to you, either by your owne affectiõ, either by instigacion of euill tongues hath been sore aggrauate. But this I wote well, you had neuer so greate cause of hatred as you haue of loue, because we bee all menne and that we bee all Christen menne. This I will leaue to preachers to tell you, and yet I wote not whether any prechers woordes ought more to moue you, then I that is goyng by and by to the place that they all preche of. But this shal I desire you to remembre, that the one parte of you beyng of my bloud, the other of my alies, and eche of you with other either of kynred or affinite whiche is the very spirituall affinitee and kinred in Christe, as all partakers of the sacramentes of Christe his churche. The weighte of which consanguinite yf we did beare as woulde to god we did, then shoulde we more bee moued to spirituall charite then to fleshelye consanguinitee. Our Lorde forbid that you loue the worse together for the selfe same cause that you ought to loue the better, and yet that often happeneth, for no where finde we so dedly debate as emongest theim whyche by nature and lawe moste ought to agree together. Suche a serpente is ambicio and desire of vainglory & souereingtie, whiche emongest estates when he is once entred he crepith furth so far, till with deuision and variaūce he turneth all to mischiefe. Firste longynge to be next to the beste, after warde egal with the beste, and at the laste chief and aboue the beste. Of which inmoderate appetite of worship and the debate and discencion that grewe there by, what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hath within these fewe yeres growē within this realme, I pray God as well to forget as we well remembre, which thyng if I coulde as well haue forsene as I haue with my more paine thē pleasure proued, by God his blessed lady (that was his cōmon othe) I would neuer haue won the curtesies of mennes knees with the losse of so manye heddes. But sith thynges passed cannot bee called agayne, muche more ought wee to be ware, by what occasion wee haue taken so greate hurte before, that we eftsones fall not into that occasion again. Now bee these greues passed and al is quiet, thanked bee God, and likely well to prospere in welthfull peace, vnder your cosins my children, yf God sende theim life, and you loue and concorde. Of whiche two thynges, the lesse losse were they by whō xx although God did his pleasure, yet shoulde this realme alwayes fynde kynges, and paraduenture as good kynges as they. But yf you emongest your selfes in a chyldes reigne fall at debate, many a good manne shall innocently perishe, and happely he and you also, or this land finde peace and quiet agayne: wherefore in these laste woordes that euer I looke to speake to you, I exhorte and require you all, for the loue that you haue borne to me, and for the loue that I haue borne to you, and for the loue that oure Lorde beareth to vs all: From thys tyme forward all greues forgotten, eche of you loue other which I verely trust you will, yf you any thynge regarde God or your kynges affinitee or xxx kynrede, this realme, your owne coūtre, or your owne surete & wealth. And there with all, the kyng for fayntenesse no longer endurynge too sitte vp, layed him downe on his righte side, his face toward them. And there was none presente that coulde forbeare wepynge, but the lordes confortyng hym with as good wordes as thei coulde, and answerynge for the tyme, as they thoughte shoulde stande with hys pleasure. And there in his presence (as by their wordes appeared) eche forgaue other and ioyned their handes together, when as it after appeared by their dedes their hartes were far a sunder. And so within a fewe daies, this noble prince diseased at Westminster the nynth daye of Apryll, in the xl yere of our Lord. M.cccc.lxxxiij. after that he had reigned. xxij. yeres one moneth and eight daies, and was with great funerall pompe conueighed to Windsore, leuynge behynde hym two sonnes, Edward the prince (of whom this story entreateth) a chylde of. xiij. yeres of age, Richard duke of Yorke two yeres younger then the prince, & fiue daughters, Elizabeth, whiche by God his grace was maried to kyng Henry the seuenthe and mother to Kynge Henry the eighte, Cicile not so fortunate as faire, firste wedded to the vicounte Welles, after to one Kyne and liued not in greate wealthe, Bridget professed her selfe a close Nonne at Sion, Anne was maried to lorde Thomas Hauwarde after erle of Surrey and duke of Northfolke, Katherine the youngest daughter was maried to lorde William Courtney, sonne to therle of Deuonshire, whyche long tyme tossed in ether fortune, somtyme in wealth, after in aduersite, till the benignite of her nephewe Kyng Henry the eighte brought her into a sure estate accordynge to her degre and progeny.

The discription of kyng Edward the iiij.

Thys Kynge Edwarde was suche a prince of gouernaunce and behaueoure in the tyme of peace (for in the tyme of warre eche muste bee others enemye) that there was neuer any Kynge in this realme attaynge the croune by warre and battayll, so hertely beloued wyth the more substaunce of hys people, nor he hym selfe so specially fauoured in any parte of hys life, as at the tyme of hys deathe: whyche fauoure and affection yet after hys deathe, by the crueltee, mischiefe and trouble of the tempestious world that folowed, highlye towardes hym more encreased. At suche tyme as he died, the displeasure of those that bare him grudge for Kynge Henry the sixte sake (whome he deposed) was well assuaged and in effecte quenched within the space of .xxii. yeres, whych is a greate parte of a mannes lyfe, and some were reconsiled & growen into hys fauoure, of the which he was neuer straung, whē it was wyth true herte demaunded. He was goodly of personage & princelye to beholde, of harte courageous, politique in counsaill, and in aduersitee nothynge abashed, in prosperite rather ioyfull then proude, in peace iuste and mercifull, in warre sharpe and fearce, in the felde bolde and hardy, and yet neuertheless no ferther, then reason & policye woulde aduenture, whose warres who soeuer circumspectelye and aduisedly considereth he shall no lesse commend hys wisedome and policie where he auoided them, then hys manhod where he vanquished them. He was of visage full faced and louely, of body mightie, strong and cleane made: wyth ouer liberall and wanton diet, he waxed somewhat corpulent & bourly, but neuertheless not vncomelye. He was in youth greately geuen to fleshely wantonnes, from the whych healthe of body in great prosperitee and fortune without an especial grace hardely refraineth. Thys fault litle greued hys people, for neither coulde any one mannes pleasure stretche or extend to the displeasure of verymany, nor a multitude bee greued by a priuate mannes fantesye or volupteousnesse, whē it was dooen wythoute violence. And in hys latter dayes he lefte all wylde daliaunce, and fell to grauitee, so that he brought hys realme into a wealthie and prosperous estate, all feare of outwarde enemies were clerly extinguished, & no warre was in hande nor none towarde, but suche as no manne looked for. The people were towarde their prince not in a constrained feare, but in a true louyng and wylful obedience emongeste theim selfe, and the commons were in good peace. The lordes whom he knewe at variaunce, he in hys deathe bedde (as he thought) brought too good concorde, loue and amitte. And a litle before hys deathe, he had left gatherynge of money of hys subiectes, whyche is the onely thynge that draweth the hartes of Englishe men from their kynges and princes: nor nothyng he either enterprised nor toke in hande, by the whiche he shoulde bee driuen there vnto. For hys tribute out of Fraunce he had a litle before recouered and obteyned. And the yere before he died, he recouered agayn the towne of Berwike x agaynst the kynge of Scottes. And albeit that all the tyme of hys reigne, he was so benigne, courteous and familier, that no parte of hys vertues was estemed more then those highe humilitees: Yet that condicion in the ende of hys laste dayes decaied not, in the whyche manye princes by a longe continued soueraingtee, decline to a proud porte and behaueour from their condicions accustomed at their begynnynge. Yet lowlinesse and gentlenesse so far furth in hym encreased that the sommer before he died, he beeynge at the hauerynge at the bower, sente for the Maire and Aldermen of London thether onely to hunte and make pastyme, where he made theim not so hertye, but so familiare xx and frendly there, and sent also to their wiues suche plenty of benison, that no one thyng in many daies before gatte hym either mo hartes or more hertie fauour emongest the common people, whyche often tymes more esteme & take for greate kyndenesse a litie courtesie, then a greate profite or benefite.

And so this noble Prince deceassed, as you haue heard in that tyme when hys lyfe was moste desired, and when hys people moste desired to kepe hym: Whyche loue of hys people and their entiere affection towarde hym, had been to hys noble chyldren (hauynge in theim selues also as many giftes of nature, as many princely vertues, xxx as much good towardenesse as their age coulde receyue) a meruellous fortresse and a sure armoure, yf the diuision and dissencion of their frendes had not vnarmed theim and left theim destitute, and the execrable desire of soueraingtie prouoked hym to their destruction, whyche yf either kynde or kyndnesse hadde holden place muste nedes haue been their chiefe defence. For Richard duke of Gloucester, by nature their vncle, by office their protectoure, to their father greatly beholden and to theim by othe and allegeaunce bounden, all the bandes broken and violated whyche bynde man and man together, wythout any respecte of God or the worlde, vnnaturally contriued to bereue them not onely xl of their dignitee and preheminence, but also of their naturall liues and worldely felicitee.

And first to shewe you, that by coniecture he pretended this thyng in his brothers life, ye shall vnderstande for a truth that the same nighte that kynge Edwarde died, one called Mistelbrooke, longe ere the daye spr̃g, came to ỹ house of one Pottier dwelling in Redcrosse strete without Creple gate of London, & when he was with hasty rappyng quickely let in, the saied Mistlebroke shewed vnto Pottier ỹ kyng Edward was that night deceased: by my truth quod Pottier, thē will my master the duke of Gloucester be kyng and that I warrant the. What cause he had so to thynke, harde it is to saye, whether he beeyng hys seruaunte knewe any such thyng pretēsed or other wise had any ynkelyng thereof but of all likelihod he spake it not of naught.

But now to returne to the trewe history, wer it that the duke of Gloucester had of old sore practised this conclusion, or was before tyme moued there vnto & putte in hope by the tender age of the young princes his nephewes, as opportunite and likely of spede putteth a manne in courage of that that he neuer entended. Certain it is, that he beeyng in the Northe parties for the good gouernaunce of the countrye, beynge aduertised of his brothers deathe contriued the destruction of his nephewes with the blurpacion of the royall dignitee and croune. And for asmuche as he well wiste, and had holpe to maintain, a longe continued grudge and harte burning betwene the quenes kynred & the Kynges bloud, either parte enuiyng others autorite, he now thought, as it was in deede, a furtherly beginnynge to the pursute of his entēte, and a sure grounde and situacion of hys vnnaturall buyldynge, yf he might vnder the pretence of reuēgyng of olde displeasures, abuse the ignorauce and anger of the one partie to the destruction of the other, and then to wyn to his purpose as many as he coulde: and suche as coulde not bee wonne, might bee loste or they loked therefore. But of one thynge he was certain, that if his entēt were once perceiued, he should haue made peace betwene bothe parties with his owne bloud: but al his entēte he kept secrete till he knewe his frendes, of the whiche Henry the duke of Buckyngham was the firste that sente to him after his brothers death a trusty seruaunte of his called Persiuall to the citie of Yorke, where the duke of Gloucester kepte the kynge hys brothers funeralles. This Persiuall came to Jhon Warde a secrete chamberer to the duke of Gloucester, desiryng that he in close and couerte maner might speake with the duke his master: where vpon in the ded of the nighte, the duke sente for Persiuall (all other beeynge auoyded) whiche shewed to the duke of Gloucester that the duke of Buckyngham hys master in thys newe worlde woulde take suche parte as he woulde, and woulde farther wayte vpon hym with a thousande good felowes yf nede were. The duke sente backe the messanger with greate thankes and diuerse priuey instructions by mouthe, whiche Persiuall dyd somuche by hys trauaill that he came to the duke of Buckyngham his master into the marches of Wales, and eftsones with newe instructions met with the duke of Gloucester at Notyngham, whiche was come out of the Northecountree with many knightes and gentlemen to the numbre of fyue hundred horse and more, in his iourney, towarde London. And after secrete metynge and communicacion had betwene hym and the duke of Glouceſter, he returned with ſuch ſpede that he brought the duke of Buckyngham his maſter to mete with the duke of Glouceſter not far from Northampton with thre hundred horſſes, and ſo they twoo came together to Northampton were thei firſt began their vnhappy enterprice, and ſo the duke of Buckyngham contynued ſtill wyth the duke of glouceſter til he was crouned king, as ye ſhal plainly perceiue herafter.

The younge kynge at the deathe of his father kepte houſhoulde at Ludlowe, for his father had ſente hym thether for Juſtice to be dooen in the Marches of Wales, to the ende that by the auctorite of hys preſente, the wilde Welſhemenne and eiuell diſpoſed perſonnes ſhould refrain from their accuſtomed murthers & outrages. The gouernaunce of this younge Prince was committed to Lord Antony Wooduile erle Ryuers and lorde Scales, brother to the quene, a wiſe, hardy and honourable perſonage, as valiaunte of handes as politique of counſayll, and with hym were aſſociate other of theſame partie, & in effect euery one as he was nerer of kynne vnto the quene, ſo was he planted nexte aboute the prince. That drift by the quene ſemed to be diuiſed, whereby her bloude mighte of righte in tender youthe bee ſo planted in the princes fauoure, that afterwarde it ſhoulde hardely bee eradicated out xx of theſame.

The duke of Glouceſter turned all this to their diſtruction, & vpon that grounde ſet the foundacion of his vnhappy buyldyng: For whom ſoeuer he perceiued to bee at variaunce with theim, or to beare toward hym ſelfe any fauoure, he brake vnto theim, ſome by mouthe, ſome by writynge and ſecrete meſſengers, that it was neither reaſon nor yet to be ſuffered that the younge kynge their maſter and kynſman ſhoulde bee in the handes and cuſtody of hys mothers kynrede, ſequeſtered in maner from their compaignie and attendaunce, of whyche euery one oughte hym as faithefull ſeruice as they, and manye of theim of farre xxx more honorable parte of kinne, thē his mothers ſide, whoſe bloud, quod the duke of Glouceſter ſauing the kyng his pleaſure, was farre vnmete to bee matched with his, which now to bee remoued from the kynge & the leaſte noble to bee lefte aboute hym, is quod he, neither honourable to his maieſtie nor too vs, and alſo too hym leſſe ſuretie, to haue the nobles and mightieſt of hys frendes from hym, & to vs all no litle ieopardie to ſuffre, and ſpecially our well proued euyll willers to growe into greate auctoritee with the kynge in youthe, namely whych is lighte of belefe and ſoone perſuaded.

Ye remēbre that kyng Edward hym ſelf, albeit he was bothe of age xl and diſcrecion, yet was he ruled in many thynges by that bende, more then ſtode either with his honour or our profite, or wyth the cōmodite of anye man els, excepte onely the immoderate auauncement of theim ſelues, which whether they thirſted ſore after their owne weale or no, it were harde I thynke to geſſe. And yf ſome folkes frendeſhip had not holden better place with the kynge then any reſpecte of kynrede, they thei might, paraduenture, easely haue trapped and brought to confusion some of vs or this: and why not as easely as thei haue dooen other or this as nere of the blud royall, but our lord hath wrought his wyll, and thanked bee his grace that perell is paste: howe beit as greate is growyng if we suffer this young kyng in his enemies handes, whyche without his wittyng might abuse the name of his commaundement to any of our vndoyng, whiche thinges god and good prouision forbid, of whiche good prouision none of vs hath any thinge the lesse nede for the late attonemẽte made, in which ỹ kyng his pleasure had more place thẽ the parties hertes or willes, nor none of vs is so vnwise or so muche x ouersene as to trust a newe frend made of an olde foo, or to thinke that any onely kindenesse so sodenly cõtracted in an houre, cõtinued scantlye yet a fourtnight, should bee deper set in our stomackes, then a longe accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

With these perswasions and writinges, the duke of Glouc ester sette a fire theim whiche were easie to kyndle, and in especiall twain, Henry duke of Buckyngham, and Willyam Lorde Hastynges, & lorde Chamberlain, bothe menne of honoure and of greate power, the one by longe succession from his aunceters, thother by hys offices and the kyng his fauoure. These two not bearyng eache to other so muchloue, as hatred xx both to the quenes bloud, accorded together with the duke of Gloucester that thei woulde remoue from the kyng all hys mothers frendes, vnder the name of their enemies.

Where vpon the duke of Gloucester beynge aduertised that the lor-des aboute the kynge entended to bryng hym to London to his coro-nacion, accompaigned wyth suche a number of their frendes that it shoulde bee harde for hym to bryng his purpose to passe without the assemblyng and gatheryng of people & in maner of open warre, wherof the ende he wyst was doubtful, and in the which the kyng beyng on the other syde his parte shoulde haue the name and face of rebellion. xxx

He secretely therefore by diuerse meanes caused the quene to be persuaded that it was neither nede & should also be ieopardeous for ỹ king to come vp so strong, for as now, euery lorde loued other & none other thyng studied for, but the triumphe of his coronation & honoure of the kyng. And the lordes about the kyng, should assemble in the kinges names muche people, thei should geue ỹ lordes betwixt whom & thẽ ther had bene some tyme debate, an occasion to feare and suspecte least they should gather this people, not for the kynges saue gard, whom no man impugned, but for their destruction hauyng more regarde to their olde variaunce then to their new attonement, for the which cause they on ỹ xl other parte might assemble mẽ also for their defence, whose powres she wyst wel farre stretched, and thus should all the realme fal in a roare, & of the mischiefe that thereof should ensue) whych was likely to be not a lytle) ỹ most harme was like to fal where she least woulde, & then all the world would put her & her kynred in ỹ blame, saiyng that they had vn-wysely

wyfely and vntruely broken the amytie and peace which the kyng her husband had so prudently made betwene her kynred and hys, whiche amyte hys kynne had alwayes obserued.

The quene beyng thus persuaded, sent worde to the kynge & to her brother, that there was noc ause nor nede to assemble any people, & also the duke of Gloucester & other lordes of his bend, wrote vnto ỹ kynge so reuerently & to the quenes frendes there so louyngly, that they nothynge yearthly mistrustyng, brought the young kyng towarde London with a sober cõpaignie in great haste (but not in good spede) till he x came to Northampton, & from thence he remoued to Stony stratford. On whiche day, the two dukes and their bende came to Northamptõ, fainyng that Stony stratford could not lodge thẽ al, where they found the erle Riuers, entendynge the nexte mornynge to haue folowed the kyng, and to be with him earely in the mornyng. So that night, the dukes made to the erle Ryuers frendly chere, but assone as they were departed very familier with greate curtesie in opẽ sight & therle Ryuers lodged: the two dukes with a fewe of their priuy frendes sel to councel, wherin they spent a great parte of the night, & in the dawnynge of the daye they sent aboute priuely to their seruaũtes in their lodgynges to xx haste to horseback for their lordes were in maner redy to ryde, wher vpõ all their seruauntes were ready or the lorde Ryuers seruauntes were awake. Nowe had the dukes taken the keyes of the ynne into their possession, so that none shoulde yssue out withoute their consent. And ouer this in the high way toward Stony stratford, they set certaine of their folkes that should cause and cõpell to retourne againe all persons that were passyng from Northamptõ to Stony stratforde, sayng that the dukes them selfs would be the fyrst that should come to the kyng from Northampton: thus they bare folkes in hand. But whẽ the earle Ryuers vnderstode the gates closed & the wayes on euery syde beset, nei-xx ther his seruauntes, neither him selfe suffered to go out, perceyuing so great a thynge without his knowlege, not begon for noughte, comparynge this present doyng with ỹ laste nightes chere, in so fewe houres so greate a chaunge, marueilously myslyked it. Howbeit, syth he coulde not get awaye, he determined not to kepe him selfe close, least he should seme to hyde him selfe for some secret feare of his owne faute, wherof he saw no such cause in him selfe, wherfore on the suretie of his owne conscience he determined to goo to them and to inquire what this matter might meane: Whom assone as they sawe, they beganne to quarel with him, affirmyng that he pretended to set distaunce betwene the kyng & xl them to bryng them to confusion, whiche should not lye in his powre, and when he beganne as he was an eloquente and wel spoken manne in goodly wyse to excuse him selfe, they woulde not heare his aunswere but toke hym by force and put him in warde. And thẽ they mounted on horsbacke & came in haste to Stony stratforde, where the kynge was

goyng to horsebacke, because he would leaue the lodgyng for them, for it was to straight for bothe the cõpaignies. And when thei came to his presence, they alighted and their compaignie aboute them, and on their knees saluted hym, and he them gentely receiued, nothing yerthly knowyng ner mistrustyng as yet. The duke of Buckyngham said aloude, on afore gentlemen, and yomen kepe your roumes, and therwith in the kinges presence they picked a quarel to the lord Richard Grey the quenes sonne, & brother to the lord Marques & halfe brother to the kyng saiyng, that he and the Marques his brother and the lord Ryuers his vncle had compassed to rule the kyng and the realme and set variaunce & betwene thestates, & to subdue & destroy the noble bloud of the realme. And towarde thaccomplishement of the same, they sayde, the Lorde Marques had entred into the towre of London, and thence had taken out treasure and sent men to the sea, which thinges these dukes knewe well were done for a good purpose & as very necessary, appointed by the whole counsaill at Londõ, but some what they muste saye: vnto the whiche wordes the kynge answered, what my brother Marques hath done I cannot saye, but in good faythe I dare well answere for mine vncle Riuers and my brother here, that they be innocente of such matters. Yee my liege quod the duke of Buckynham, they haue kept the xxi dealyng of these matters farre from the knowlege of your good grace. And furthwith they arrested the lorde Rychard and sir Thomas Vaugham & sir Richard Hawte knyghtes, in ỹ kynges presence, & brought the kyng and all back to Northampton, where they toke further counsaill in their affaires. And there they sent from the kyng whom it pleased theim, & set aboute him suche seruauntes as better pleased thẽ then him. At which dealyng he wepte and was not cõtent, but it booted not. And at dynner, the duke of Gloucester sent a dyshe from his owne table to the lord Ryuers, praiyng him to bee of good chere and all shoulde be wel, he thanked him & prayed the messenger to beare it to his nephiewe xxii the lord Richard with like wordes, whom he knewe to haue nede of cõfort, as one to whom such aduersitie was straunge, but he hym selfe had bene all his daies enured therwith, & therfore could beare it the better. But for al this message, the duke of Gloucester sent ỹ lord Ryuers, the lord Richard and sir Thomas Vaugham and sir Richarde Hawte into the Northparties into diuerse prisons, but at last, al came to Poũfret where they all foure were beheaded without iudgement.

In this maner as you haue hard, the duke of Gloucester toke on him the gouernaunce of the yonge kyng, whõ with much reuerence he conueied towardes Londõ. These tidynges came hastely to the quene before mydnighte, by a very sore reporte that the kyng her sonne was taxl ken and that her brother and her other sonne & other her frendes were arested and sent, no man wyste whether. With this heauy tidynges the quene bewayled her chyldes ruyne, her frendes mischaunce, and her owne infortune, cursyng ỹ tyme that euer she was persuaded to leaue

the gatherynge of people to bryng vp the kynge with a great powre, but that was passed, and therfore nowe she toke her younger sonne the duke of Yorke and her doughters, and went out of the palays of Westminster into the sanctuary, and there lodged in the abbotes place, and she and al her chyldren and compaigny were regestred for sanctuarye persons. The same night there came to doctor Rotheram Archebishop of Yorke, and lorde Chauncelour, a messenger from the lord Chamberlayne to Yorke place besyde Westminster: the messenger was brought to the bishoppes bedsyde, & declared to hym that the dukes were gone & backe wyth the young king to Northãpton, and declared further, that the lord Hastynges his maister sent him worde that he should feare nothyng, for al should be well. (Wel quod the Archebishop) be it as wel as it wyl, it wyl be neuer so wel as we haue sene it, and then the messenger departed. Wherupon the bishop called vp all his seruauntes and toke with hym the great seale and came before day to the quene, about whō he founde much heuinesse, rumble, haste, busyneſſe, conueyghaunce and cariage of her stuffe into sanctuary, euery man was busy to cary, beare and conueygh stuffe, chestes and fardelles, no man was vnoccupyed, and some caryed more then they were commaunded to another place.
&& The quene sat alone belowe on the rushes al desolate & dismayde, whō the Archebishoppe conforted in the best maner that he coulde, shewyng her that the matter was nothing so sore as she tooke it for, and that he was putte in good hope, and out of feare by the message sente to hym from the lorde Hastinges. A wo worth him quod the quene, for it is he that goeth about to destroy me and my bloud. Madame quod he be of good comforte and I assure you, yf they crowne any other kynge then your sonne whō they nowe haue, we shal on the morow croune his brother whom you haue here with you. And here is the great seale, which in lykewyse as your noble husband deliuered it to me, so deliuer I it to &&& you to the vse of your sonne, & therwith deliuered her the great seale, & departed home in the dawning of ỹ day. And when he opened his windowes, and loked on the Temys, he might see the riuer ful of boates, of the duke of Gloucester his seruauntes watching, that no person should go to sanctuary, ner none shoulde passe vnserched.

Then was there great rumoure, and commotion in the citie and in other places, the people diuersely diuined vpon this dealynge. And diuerse lordes, knightes and gentilmen, either for fauour of the quene or for feare of them selfes, assembled compaignies and wente flockyng together in harneies. And manye also, for that they recompted thys demeanour attempted, not so specyally agaynst other lordes as against ỹ ¶ kynge hym selfe in the dysturbaunce of hys coronatyon, therfore they assembled by and by together to common of thys matter at London. The Archebyshoppe of Yorke fearynge that it woulde be ascribed (as it was in dede) to ouermuch lyghtnes, ỹ he so sodeinly had yelded vp ỹ great seale to ỹ quene, to whō the custody therof nothing apperteigned wythout especyall commaundement of the kynge, secretely sent for the seale agayne and brought it with him after the accustomed maner to mete with the lordes.

At this metynge, the lorde Hastynges, whose trueth towarde the kyng no man doubted, nor neded not to doubte, persuaded the lordes to beleue, that the duke of Gloucester was faythful and sure towardes his prince, and that the lord Riuers, the lord Richard and other knightes apprehẽded, were for matters attẽpted by them against the dukes of Gloucester and Buckyngham put vnder arest, for their suretie, and not for the kings yeopardie, and that they were also in sauegard there to remayne, tyll the matter were (not by the dukes onely) but also by all the other lordes of the kynges councel indifferently examined, and by their discrecions ordred and either iudged or appesed. And one thinge he aduysed them to beware of, that they iudged not the matter to farre furthe or they knewe the trueth, nor turnynge their priuate grudges into the common hurte, irrytynge and prouokynge men vnto angre, and disturbyng the kynges coronacion, toward which the dukes were commynge, for that, then myghte paraduenture bryng the matter so farre out of pointe, that it shoulde neuer be broughte in frame agayne, whiche yf it should happe as it were likely to come to a felde, though al parties were in all other thynges equall, yet shoulde the authoritie be on that syde, where the kynge is himself, with these persuasions of the lorde Hastynges, whereof parte he him selfe beleued, and of parte he wyst wel the cõtrary, these cõmocions were some what appeased. But in especyal, because the dukes of Buckyngham and Gloucester were so nere and came on so shortely wyth the kynge, in none other maner, nor none other boyce or semblaunce thẽ to his coronacion, causing ỹ faine to be blowen about that such persons as were apprehended, had contriued the destruccyon of the dukes of Gloucester and of Buckynghã and other of the noble bloude of this realme, to the entent that they alone woulde rule and gouerne the kynge. And for the coloure therof, suche of the dukes seruauntes as rode wyth the cartes of their stuffe, which were taken, among the whiche stuffe no marueyll though some were harneyes which at the breakinge vp of suche an housholde muste be broughte awaye, or caste awaye, they shewed to the people, and as they went, said: lo, here be the barelles of harneies that these traitours had priuelye conueighed in their cariages to destroye the noble lordes wythal. This diuerse, (although it made the matter to wise men more vnlykely) wel perceiuing that thentendours of suche a purpose would rather hauehad their harneieson their backes, then to haue bound thẽ vp in barrelles, yet muche part of the common people were therewith ryght wel satisfyed.

Edmonde Shawmaper of London.

When the kynge approched nere the citie, Edmonde Shawe Goldesmythe then Mayre of the citie wyth the Aldermenne and shiues in skarlet, and fyue hundreth commoners in murraye receyued his his grace reuerently at Harnesay Parke, and so conueighed him to the citie, where he entred the fourth day of May, in the fyrst & laste yere of his reygne, and was lodged in the bishoppe of Londons Palaice: but ỹ duke of Glouceſter bare him in open ſyght ſo reuerẽtly, ſaying to al mẽ as he rode, behold your prince and ſouereigne lord, and made ſuch ſembleaunce of lowlynes to his prince, that from the great obloquy that he was in ſo late before he was ſodenly fallen in ſo great truſt that at the councell next aſſembled, he was made the onely chiefe ruler, & thought moſt mete to be protectoure of the king and his realme: ſo that, were it x deſteny, or were it foly, the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to kepe. At whiche councel the Archebiſhop of Yorke was ſore blamed for deliuering the great ſeale to the quene, and the ſeale takẽ from him and deliuered to doctor Jhon Ruſſell byſhop of Lyncolne, a wyſe mã & a good & of much experyence, and diuerſe lordes and knightes were appointed to diuerſe roumes, the lord Chamberlayne and ſom other kept the roumes that they were in before, but not many.

Now were it ſo that the protectour (which alwayes you muſt take for the duke of Glouceſter) ſore thriſted for the acheuing of his pretenſed enterpryſe and thought euery day a yeare tyl it were perfourmed, xx yet durſt he no further attempt as long as he had but half his pray in his hand, well witting that yf he depoſed the one brother, al the realme would fall to the other, yf he remayned eyther in ſanctuary or ſhoulde happely be ſhortly conueighed to his fathers libertie. Wherfore incontinent at the next meting of the lordes in councel, he purpoſed to them that it was a heynous thyng of the quene, and procedyng of great malice toward the kynges councelers, that ſhe ſhould kepe the kings brother in ſanctuary from hym whoſe ſpecyall pleaſure and comfort were to haue his brother with him, and that to be done by her to none other intent, but to bryng al the lordes in an obloquy and murmoure of the xxx people, as though they were not to be truſted with the kinges brother which lordes were by the whole aſſent of the nobles of the realme appointed as the kynges nere frendes to ỹ tuicyon of hys royal perſon, the proſperitie wherof (quod he) ſtandeth not alonely in kepinge from enemies and euil diate, but partely alſo in recreacion & moderat pleaſure, which he cannot take in hys tẽdre youth in the compaignie of olde and auncient perſons, but in the familiare conuerſacion of thoſe that be not farre vnder nor far aboue his age, and neuertheleſſe, of eſtate cõuenient to accompany his maieſtie, wherfore with whom rather thẽ with his owne brother: and yf any man thynke this conſideracion lighte (I xl thynke no man ſo thynketh that loueth the king) let him conſider that ſomtyme without ſmal thinges, greater cannot ſtand, and verely it redouneth greatly to the diſhonour of the kynges hyghnes and of all vs that be about hys grace to haue it come in any mans mouth, not in this reaime onely, but alſo in other landes (as euil wordes walke far) that ỹ kings brother ſhould be fayn to kepe ſanctuary. For euery man wyll

iudge that no man wil so do for nought, and such opinions fastened in mens hartes be harde to be wrested oute, and may grow to more griefe then any man here can diuine. Wherfore me thinketh it were not the worst to send to the quene som honourable & trustie personage, such as tẽdreth the kings weale and the honour of his coũcel, and is also in credite and fauour with her: for which considerations none semeth more metely to me, then the reuerend father my lord Cardinal archebishop of Cauntorbury, who may in this matter do most good of al men, yf it please hũm to take the payne, which I doubt not of his goodnes he wyl not refuse for the kynges sake and ours and wealth of the young duke r him selfe the kings most honourable brother, and for the comfort of my soueregne lord hym self my most deareste nephiewe, considering that therby shalbe ceased the slaunderous rumore and obloquy now goyng abrode, and the hurtes auoyded that therof might ensue, and thẽ must rest and quietnesse growe to all the realme. And yf she percase be so obstinate and so precisely set in her own will and opinion, that neither his wyse and faythful aduertisement can moue her, nor any mans reason satisfie her, then shal we by myne aduyce by the kinges authoritie fetch hym out of that pryson and bryng him to his noble presence, in whose contynuall compaygnie he shalbe so well cherysshed and so honourably rr intreated that all the worlde shall to our honour and her reproche perceyue, that it was onely malyce, frowardnesse and foly, that caused her to kepe him there. This is my mind for this time, except ỹ anye of you my lordes any thyng perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shal I by gods grace so wed my self vnto mine owne wil, but I shalbe ready to chaũge it vpon your better aduices.

When the Protectour had sayde, all the councell affirmed that the mocion was good and reasonable, and to the king and the duke his brother honourable, and a thyng that should ceasse great murmour in the realm, yf the mother might by good meanes be induced to deliuer him: rrr whych thing the Archebyshop of Cauntorbury, whom they all agreed also to be most conuenient therunto, toke vpon hym to moue her, and therto to do his vttermost endeuoure. Howbeit, yf she could in no wise be intreated wyth her good wyl to delyuer hym, then thought he and suche of the spiritualtie as were present, that it were not in anye wyse too bee attempted to take hym out agaynst her wyll, for it woulde be a thyng that should turne to the grudge of all men and hygh displeasure of God, yf the priuilege of that place should be broken which had so many yeres bene kept, whiche bothe Kynges and Popes had graunted rl and confirmed, whiche ground was sanctifyed by Saynt Peter hym selfe, more then fyue hundreth yeres agone. And syth that tyme was neuer so vndeuoute a kyng, that euer enterprysed ỹ sacred priuilege to violate, nor so holy a byshop that durste presume the church of thesame to consecrate: and therfore, quod the Archebishop, God forbid that any manne shoulde for any yearthely enterpryse breake the immunite and libertie of that sacred sanctuary that hath bene the safegard of so many a good mans lyfe, but I trust, quod he, we shall not nede it, but for anye maner of nede I would we shuld not do it, I trust that she with reason shalbe contented, and all thing in good maner obteyned. And yf it hap that I bryng it not to passe, yet shal I further it to my best power, so that you all shal perceyue my good wyl, dylygence, and indeuour: But the mothers dreade and womannish feare shalbe the let yf any be.

Nay womannyshe frowardnesse, quod the duke of Buckyngh̄, for I dare take it on my solle that she wel knoweth that she nedeth no such x thyng to feare, either for her sonne or for her self. For as for her, here is no man that wil be at warre with women, would God some men of her kynne were women to, and then should al be sone in rest. Howbeit ther is none of her kynne the lesse loued for that they be of her kinne, but for their owne euyll deseruynge. And put the case that we neither loued her nor her kynne, yet ther were no cause why we should hate ỹ kings noble brother to whose grace we oure selues be kynne, whose honor yf she desired as our dishonour, and as much regard toke to hys wealth as to her owne will, she could be as loth to suffre him to be absent from the kyng as any of vs, yf she had any wytte, as would God she had as xx good wyl as she hath frowarde witte. For she thinketh her self no wyser then som that are here, of whose faythful mindes she nothing doubteth, but verely beleueth and knowelegeth that they would be as sory of his harme as her owne self, and yet they would haue hym from her yf she abyde there.

And we al I thynke be content that bothe her chyldren be with her if she came from thence and abyde in such place wher they may be with their honour. Now yf she refuse in the delyueraunce of him to folowe the wysdome of them, whose wysdome she knoweth, whose approbate fidelitie she well trusteth: it is easye to perceyue that frowardnesse letxxx teth her, and not fear. But go to, suppose that she feareth (as who may let her to feare her owne shadowe) the more we ought to fear to leaue hym in her handes, for yf she cast such fond doubtes that she feare hys hurte, then wyll she feare that he shall be fet thence, for she wyll soone thynke that yf men were set (which God forbyd on so great a mischief) the sanctuary wyl lytle let them, which sanctuary good mē as me thynketh myght wythout synne, somwhat lesse regarde then they do. Now then, yf she doubt least he might he fetched from her, is it not likely that she wyll send him somwhere out of the realme: verely I loke for none other. And I doubt not but she now as sore myndeth it, as we mynde xl the let therof. And yf she myght hap to bring that purpose to passe, as it were not great maistery to do, we letting her alone, al ỹ world would say that we were a sorte of wyse coūsailers about a king to let hys brothere be cast away vnder oure noses. And therfore I ensure you faithfully, for my mynde, I wyl rather maugre her stomacke fetche hym awaye, then leaue him there til her feare or fond frowarde feare conuey him away, and yet wyll I breake no sanctuary, for verely sith the priui-Of sanctua- lege of that place and other of that sort haue so lōg continued, I would

ry. not go about to breake it, but yf they were nowe to beginne I woulde not be he that should make them: yet wyl not I say nay, but it is a dede of pitie that such men as the chaūce of the sea, or their euil debters haue brought into pouertie, should haue some place of refuge to kepe in their bodies out of the daunger of their cruel creditours. And if it fortune ỹ croune to come in question as it hath done before this tyme while eche part taketh other for traytours, I thynke it necessarye to haue a place of refuge for both. But as for theues and murtherers wherof these places be full, and which neuer falle from their crafte after they once falle therunto, it is pitie, that euer sanctuary shoulde serue them, and in especyall wylful murtherers, whom God commaundeth to be takē from the aulter & to be put to death. And wher it is otherwyse then in these cases, there is no nede of sanctuaries, appointed by God in the old law.
For yf necessitie of hys owne defence or myssortune driued hym to that dede, then a pardon serueth him, which either is graunted of course, or ỹ kyng of pitie and compassion geueth. Now loke how few sanctuary men there be whome necessitie or misfortune compelleth to go thether.
And then se on the other syde, what a sort there bee commonly therin of such, whom wylfull vnthriftynes hath brought to naught: what a rable of theues, murtherers and malicious heynous traitours be, and that in two places specially, the one at the elbow of the citie, & the other in the very bowels. I dare well a bowe it, yf you way the good ỹ they do, with the hurte that commeth of them, ye shal fynd it muche better to lese both, then to haue both. And this I say, although thei were not abused (as they now be and so longe haue bene) that I feare me euer they wyl be whyle men be afeard to set to their handes to the amēde-ment, as though God and Saynt Peter were the patrons of vngra-cious lyuing. Now vnthriftes riote and ronne in debte vpon boldnes of these places, yea, and ryche menne ronne thyther wyth poore mens goodes, there they buylde, there they spend and byd their creditours goo whystle. Mens wyues ronne thither wyth their husbands plate, and say they dare not abyde with their husbandes for beatyng, theues bring thither stollen goodes and lyue theron. There deuyse they new robberies nightely and steale out and robbe, ryue, and kyll menne and come agayn into those places, as thoughe those places gaue them not onely a sauegard for the harme that they haue done but a licence also to do more mischief: howbeit, much of this great abusyon, (yf wyse mē woulde sette their handes there vnto) myght be amended, with great thankes of God, and no breche of the priuilege. The conclusyon is, syth it is so longe a goo I wote not what pope and what Prince, more piteous then politique, hath graunted it, and other men sence of a religious feare haue not broken it, lette vs take a payne with it, and lette it stande a Goddes name in his force, as farre furthe as reason wyll, whyche

which is not so farfurth as may serue too lette vs of the fetching furth of this noble manne to his honour and wealthe out of that place in the whyche he neyther is nor can bee a sanctuarye or pryuileged man. A sanctuary euer serueth too defende the body of that manne that standeth in daunger abroad, not of great hurte onely, but of lawful hurte: for against vnlawfull hurtes and harmes no pope ner kynge entended to priuilege any one place wherein it is lawefull for one manne to doo another manne wronge. That no manne vnlawefully take hurte that libertie the kynge, the lawe and very nature forbyddeth in euery x place, and maketh to that regarde for euery manne euery place a sanctuary, but where a manne is by lawfull meanes in perell, there nedeth he the tuicion of some specyal priuilege, whiche is the onely ground of all sanctuaryes, from whych necessitie thys noble Prince is far, whose loue to hys kynge nature and kynred prioueth, whose innocencye to all the world, hys tender youth affirmeth, and so sanctuarye as for hym is not necessary, ner none he can haue. Wenne come not too sanctuary as they come to baptisme to requyre it by hys Godfathers, he muste aske it hym selfe that muste haue it, and reason, sythe no manne hathe cause too haue it, but whose conscience of hys owne faute maketh hym xx haue nede to require it. What will then hathe younder babe, whyche yf he had discrecyon to require it yf nede were, I dare say woulde be now right angry with them that kepe him there. And I would thinke wythout any scruple of conscience, without any breche of priuilege too be somwhat more homely with theim that be there sanctuary menne in dede, that yf one go to saynctuary wyth another mans goodes, why should not the king leuyng hys body at libertie satisfye the party of his goodes euen wythin the sanctuarye, for neyther king nor pope cã geue any place such a priuilege that it shal discharge a man of hys debtes beyng hable to paye.

xxx And wyth that diuerse of the clergie ỹ were there present, whether they sayed it for his pleasure or as they thought, agreed playnly by the lawe of God and of the church that the goodes of a sanctuarye manne should be deliuered in paiment of hys debtes, and stollen goodes to the owner, and onely lybertie reserued to hym to get hys lyuing with the labour of hys handes. Uerely, quod the duke, I thynke you saye very trueth: And what yf a mans wife take sãctuary because she list to ronne frõ her husbãd: I would thinke if she cã allege none other cause he may lawfully without any displeasure done to saynct Peter, take her out of saynct Peters church by the arme. And yf no body may be taken oute xl of sanctuarye because he sayth he wyll abyde there, then yf a child wyll take sanctuary, because he feareth to go to schoole, his maister must let hym alone. And as simple as that example is, yet is ther lesse reason in our cace then in it, for there, though it be a childysshe feare, yet is there at the least some feare, and herein is no feare at all. And verely I haue harde of sanctuarye menne, but I neuer hearde before of sanctuarye childzen, and therfore as for the conclusyon of my mynde, whosoeuer may deserue to haue nede of it, yf they thinke it for their suretie let thē kepe it, but he can be no sanctuary manne that hath nother discresiō to desire it, nor malyce to deserue it, whose lyfe ner libertie cā by no lauful processe stand in ieoperdy: and he that taketh one out of sanctuary to do hym good I saye plainly he breaketh no sanctuary.

When the duke hath done, the temporal menne wholy, and the moste parte of the spirituall menne also thynkynge no hurt earthlye ment toward the young baby, condiscended in effecte, that yf he were not delyuered, he shoulde be fetched oute. Howbeit, they thought it beste in aduoydyng of all maner of rumour, that the cardinall shoulde first assaye to get him with her good wyl. And therupon all the counsail came to ỹ sterre chambre at Westminster, and the cardinall leauing the protector and other lordes in the sterre chamber, departed into ỹ sanctuary to ỹ quene, accompaignied with certain lordes, were it for the respect of his honour, or that she should by the persones of so many, perceyue ỹ thys arraud was not onely one mans mynd, or were it for ỹ the protectour entended not in this matter to truste one manne alone, or els yf she fynally wer determined to kepe hym, some of the compaignie had paraduenture some secrete instruccyon incontinente maugre her wil to take him and to leaue her no respite to conueigh him.

When the quene and these lordes were come together in presence, the cardinall shewed vnto her, that it was thought to ỹ lorde protector and the whole counsayll that her keping of the kyng his brother in that place highly sounded, not onely to the grudge of the people & their obloquy, but also to the importable griefe and displeasure of the kynge hys royall maiestie, to whose grace it were a synguler comfort to haue hys natural brother in compaignie, and it was their bothes dishonoures & theirs and hers also to suffre him sanctuary, as though the one brother stode in daunger and perell of the other. And he shewed her farther that the whole counsayl had sent hym to require of her ỹ deliuerye of him, ỹ he myght be brought to the kyng his presence at his libertie out of that place which men reconed as a pryson, and there should he be demeaned accordyng to his estate and degree, & she in this doing should both do greate good to the realme, pleasure to the counsayl, profyte to her self, succour to her frendes that were in distresse, and ouer ỹ which he wyste well she specially tendered, not onely great comforte and honour to the king but also to the young duke hym self, whose both great wealth it were to be together, aswell for many greater causes as also for their both disport & recreacion, whiche thinges the lordes estemed not lyght, though it semed light, wel ponderyng that their youth without recreacion and play cannot endure, ner any estraunger for the conuenience of both their ages & estates so metely in that poinct for any of theim, as the eyther for them of thother.

My lord (quod the quene) I say not nay, but that it were by conue-

niēt that this gentleman whom you require were in the compaigny of the kyng his brother, and in good faith me thinketh it wer as great cō-moditie to theim both, as for yet a whyle too be in the custody of theyr mother the tēdre age considered of the elder of theim both, but in espe-cyal the younger, which besydes his infancie that also nedeth good lo-kyng to, hath a whyle bene so sore diseased with sickness, and is so new-lye rather a lytle amended then wel recouered, that I dare put no per-sone earthly in trust with hys kepyng, but my selfe onely, considerynge there is as phisicians saye, and as we also fynd, double the perell in the x resiluacion that was in the fyrste sycknes, wyth whyche desease nature beeynge sore laboured, foreweried & weakened, waxeth the lesse hable to bear our a new surfet. And albeit there might be founden other that woulde happely doo their best vnto hym, yet there is none that eyther knoweth better how to ordre hym then I, that so long haue kept hym, or is more tendrely lyke to cherysshe hym then hys owne mother that bare hym. No man denyeth good madame, quod the Cardinall, but ȳ your grace of all folke were most necessary aboute your chyldren, and so woulde all the counsayll not onelye be contente but also glad that it were yf it myght stand wyth your pleasure to be in such place as might xx stand wyth their honoure. But yf you appoynct your self to tary here, then thinke they it more conuenīēt the duke of Yorke wer w̄ the king honorably at hys libertie to the comfort of theim bothe, then here is a sanctuary man to their both dishonour and obloquy, syth there is not alway so great necessitie to haue the child with the mother, but ȳ occa-syon somtime may be such that it should be more expedient to kepe him els where, which in thys well appereth, that at suche tyme that youre most derest sonne then prince and now kyng should for hys honor and good ordre of the countree kepe houshold in Wales, far out of your ke-pyng, your grace was well content therwyth your self. Not very well xxx content (quod the quene) & yet the case it not like, for the one was thē in health and ȳ other is now sycke, in which case I maruayl greatly why my lorde protectour is so desirous to haue him in kepyng, where yf the child in his sycknesse miscaryed by natur, yet might he ronne into slaū-der & suspiciō of fraud. And they call it a thynge so sore against my chil-des honour & theirs also ȳ he abideth in this place, it is al their honou-res there to suffre hym abyde wher no mā doubteth he shalbe best kept & that is here whyle I am here, which as yet entēd not to come furth & ieoperde my selfe after other my frendes, which would God were ra-ther here in suretie wyth me, then I were therein ieoperdie with thē.
xl Why madame (quod the lord Hayward) know you any thing, why they should be in yeopardie? Nay verely, (quod she,) nor why they should be in prison neyther as they now be, but I trowe it is no great marueyll though I feare least those that haue not letted to put them in duraūce wythoute colour, wyl let as lytle to procure their destruccion without cause. The cardinal made a countenaunce to the lord Hayward, that he shoulde harpe no more vpon that string: and then sayed he to the quene, that he nothyng doubted but those lordes of her kinne ỹ which remained vnder a reste shoulde vpon the matter examined do wel ynough, & as towarde her noble person, neyther was, nor coulde be anye maner of ieoperdie. Wherby shoulde I truste that (quod the quene) in ỹ I am gylteſſe, as though they were gültie, in ỹ I am with their enemies better beloued then thei, when they hate theim for my sake, in that I am so nere to the king, and how farre be they of that woulde helpe as God send grace they hurt not. And therfore as yet I purpose not to depart hence: as for this gentleman my sonne, I mynde he shalbe where I am ỹ till I see further, for I se some men so gredy wythoute anye substancial cause to haue him, which maketh me much more further and scrupulous to deliuer him. Truely madame (quod the Cardinall) the further that ye be to deliuer him, the further be other menne to suffre you too kepe him, leaste your causeleſſe feare, myght cause you farther to conueyghe hym, and many thyncke he can haue here no priuilege, whyche can haue neyther wyll too aske it, nor yet malice nor offence to nede it. And therfore, they recon no priuilege broken, although they fetch him out of sanctuarye, whyche yf you fynally refuse too delyuer hym, I thynke verely the counsayll will enfraunchese him, so much dread hath my lorde his vncle, for the tender loue that he beareth him, leaste your grace should send him away. Ah, quod the quene, hathe he so tender a zeale to him, that he feareth nothing, but leaste he should escape hym? Thinketh he, that I would send him hence, which is neither in ỹ plight to send out? and in what place could I recon hym sure, yf he be not sure in this sanctuary? wherof was ther neuer tyraunt yet so deuelysh, that durst attempt to breake the priuilege, & I trust God is now as strong to withstand his aduersaries, as euer he was. But my sonne cã deserue no sanctuary, you say, and therfore he can not haue it, forsoth the lorde protectour hath sent a goodly glose, by the which that place that maye defend a thefe, maye not saue an innocent: but he is in no ieoperdye nor hath no nede therof, I would God he had not. Troweth the protector (I pray God he may proue a protectour, rather thẽ a destroyer, where vnto his painted processe draweth,) ỹ is it not honourable, ỹ the duke byde here? it were more comfortable to them both that he were w̃ hys brother, because the kyng lacketh a play feloe, yea be you sure, I praye God send him better play felowes thẽ him that maketh so hygh a matter vpon such a trifleyng pretext, as though there could none be found to play wyth the kyng, but yf his brother which had no lust to playe for sickneſſe, must come out of sanctuary, out of this sauegard to play wyth him, as though that princes so young as they be, could not play wythout their peres, or children coulde not play without their kynred, with whom for the more parte they agree much worse thẽ with straũgiers. But the chylde you say cannot require the priuilege, who told the protectour so? Aske hym and you shall hear him aske it, and so shal he yf ye

wil. Howbeit, this is a straunge matter, suppose he coulde not aske it & thynke he would not aske it, and imagene he would aske to go out, yf I say he shal not: Note yf I aske the priuilege, but for my selfe, I say, that he that agaynst my will taketh out him, breaketh sanctuarie. Serueth this libertie for my person onely or for my goodes to, you maye not frō hence take my horsse from me, yf I stale him not nor owe you nothing: then foloweth it, that you may not take my child from me, he is also my ward, for as farre as my learned counsayl sheweth me, he hath nothing by dissent holden, by knightes seruice, but by socage, then the lawe max keth me his guarden, then may no manne lawfully (I suppose) take my warde from me out of this place, wythout the breche of sanctuary, & yf my priuilege coulde not serue him, nor he aske it for him selfe, yet syth ỹ lawe committed to me the custody of hym, I maye require it for hym, excepte the lawe geue the infaunt a guarded onely for his goodes, dis-chargyng hym of the cure and sauekepyng of his body, for which one-ly, bothe goodes and landes serue: Wherfore here entende I to kepe him, syth mannes lawe serueth the guarden to kepe the infante, and the lawe of nature willeth the mother to kepe the child, and Gods law priuilegeth the sanctuary, and the sanctuary priuilegeth my sonne, sith xx I feare to put him to the protectours handes, that hath hys brother already, whiche is (yf both fayled) inheritoure to the crowne as heire male, as he saythe. The cause of my feare no manne hathe too doo to examine, and yet feare I no ferther then the lawe feareth, whyche as learned menne tell me, forbyddethe euery manne ỹ custodye of theim, by whose deathe he maye enherite lesse land then a kingdome. I cā say no more, but whosoeuer he be that breaketh this holy sanctuary, I pray God sende him shortely nede of sanctuarye, when he maye not come to it, for I woulde not that my mortall enemye shoulde bee taken oute of sanctuary.

xxx The Cardinall perceiued that ỹ quene euer the longer the farther of, and also that she began to kyndle and chafe, and spake sore bytynge woordes agaynst the protectoure, and such as he neither beleued and also was loth to here, he sayth to her, for a final cōclusion, that he would no more dispute the matter, and if she were content to deliuer the duke to him and to the other lordes there present, he durst lay his owne bo-dy and solle both in pledge, not onelye for hys suretye, but also for hys estate, and surely he knewe nor suspected no cause but he myght so do, (but he knewe not all.) And further he sayed, yf she would geue hym a resolute aunswere to the contrary he woulde therwith departe incōtixl nente, and shyfte who so woulde wyth his busynesse afterwarde, for he neuer entended further to moue her in the matter, in the whyche she thought that he and all other also, saue her selfe, lacked eyther witte or trueth. Wytte yf they wer so dull yf they nothing could perceiue what the protector entended, and yf they should procure her sonne to be deli-uered into his handes, in whom they should perceiue towardes ỹ child

any euyll wyl entended, then she myght thynke al the counsayll bothe euill aduised and of litle fidelite to their prince.

The quene with these wooꝛdes stode in a great study, & foꝛasmuche as she saw the loꝛde Cardinall moꝛe redier to departe then the remanaunte, and the protectoure himselfe redy at hande, so that she verelye thought that she could not kepe them there, but he should be incontinẽt taken thence: and to conueigh him els where, neither had she tyme to serue her, noꝛ place determined, noꝛ persons appoyncted to conueygh him, and so all thing was vnredy, when this message came so sodainlye on her, nothinge lesse looking foꝛ, then to haue him out of Sanctuarye whiche she knew now men to be sette, in all places about, that he coulde not be conueyghed out vntaken, and partely as she thoughte it myght foꝛtune her feare to be false: so wel she wiste it was either nedelesse oꝛ booteleſſe. Wherfoꝛe, yf she should nedes goo from him, she demed beste to delyuer him, and specially of the cardinalles faith she nothyng doubtyng noꝛ of some other loꝛdes whome she saw there, whiche as she feared leste, they myghte be deceyued, so well was she assured, that they woulde not be coꝛrupted: then thought she that it would make theim ỹ moꝛe warely to loke to him, and the moꝛe circumspectely to see hys surety, yf she wyth her owne handes betooke him them by truste, & at the laste she toke the young duke by the hand and said vnto the loꝛdes, my loꝛde quod she and all my loꝛdes, neither am I so vnwyse to mistruste your wittes, noꝛ so suspicious to mistruste your truethes: of the which thyng I purpose to make such a pꝛoofe, that yf eyther of both lacked in you, myght turne both me to great soꝛowe, the realme to much harme, and you to great repꝛoche. Foꝛ lo, here is quod she this gẽtleman, whõ I doubt not but I could kepe safe yf I would, whatsoeuer any manne saye, and I doubt not also but there be some abꝛoade so dedly enemies vnto my bloud, that yf they wist, where any of it lay in their own body they would let it out: we haue also experience that the desire of a kingdome knoweth no kynrede, the bꝛother hath ben the bꝛothers bane, & may the nephewes be sure of the vncle-eche of these childꝛẽ are others defence, whyle they be a sunder, and ech of their liues lieth in others body: kepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing to both moꝛe perilous then both to be in one place: foꝛ a wyse marchaunte neuer auentureth al his goodes in one ship. Al this notwithstandyng here I deliuer him and his bꝛother in him, to kepe to youre handes, of whome I shall aske them bothe befoꝛe God and the woꝛlde. Faythefull you be and that I wote well, and I knowe you be wyse and of power and strength yf you liste to kepe him, foꝛ you lacke no helpe of your selues, noꝛ nede to lacke no helpe in this case, and yf you cannot els where, then maye you leaue hym here: But onely one thyng I beseche you, foꝛ the trust that his father put you in euer, and foꝛ the truste that I putte you in nowe, that as farre as you thinke that I feare to much, ye bee well ware that you feare not to litle. And therwyth al she sayed to the chyld, fare wel mine owne awne swete sonne, God sende you good kepyng, let me once kisse you or you go, for God knoweth whē we shal kisse together agayn, & therewith she kyssed hym, blessed hym, and turned her backe & wepte, goynge her waie, leauing the poore innocēt chylde wepinge as faste as the mother.

When the Cardinall and the other lordes had receyued the younge duke, thei brought him into the starre chaumbre, where the protectour toke him into his armes and kissed hym with these wordes: now welcome my lorde with all my verie herte, & he saied in ỹ of likelihod euen as he inwardely thought, & there vpon, furth with brought him to the x kynge hys brother into the bishoppes palace at Paules, & from thence through the cytee honorably into ỹ tower, out of which after that daye they neuer came abrode. When the protectour had both the chyldrē in his possession, yea & that they were in a sure place, he thē began to thrist to se the ende of his enterprise. And to auoyde all suspiciō, he caused all the lordes whiche he knewe to bee faithfull to the kynge, to assemble at Baynardes castle to cōmen of the ordre of the coronacion, whyle he and other of his cōplices & of his affinites at Crosbies place contriued the contrary & to make the protectour kyng: to which counsaill there were adhibite very fewe, & they very secrete. Then began here & there some xx maner of mutteryng emongest the people, as though all thyng shoulde not longe be well, though they wyste not what they feared nor wherfore: were it, that before suche greate thynges, mennes hertes (of a secrete instinct of nature) misgeueth theim, as the south wynde somtyme swelleth of hym selfe before a tempeste: or were it that some one manne happely somewhat perceiuyng, fylled many men with suspiciō, though he shewed fewe men what he knewe: howbeit, the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsaill were close, for litle and litle all folke drewe from the tower where the kynge was, and drewe to Crosbies place, so that the Protectoure had all the resorte, and the xxx kynge in maner desolate. Whyle some made suyte vnto them that had the doyng, some of theim were by their frendes secretly warned, that it might happely turne them to no good to be to muche attēdaunt on the kynge without the protectoures apointemente, whyche remoued diuerse of the kyng hys olde seruauntes from hym, & sette newe in their roumes aboute hym.

Thus many thinges commyng together, partly by chaunce & partly by purpose, caused at length, not common people onely, whiche wauer with the wynde, but wyse men also & some lordes, to marke the matter and muse ther vpon: in so muche as the lorde Stanley whyche after-xl warde was erle of Derby wysely mistrusted it & saied to ỹ lord Hastynges, that he muche misliked these two seuerall counsailes, for while we quod he talke of one matter at the one place, litle wote we whereof thei talke in the other: peace my lord quod ỹ lord Hastynges, on my lyfe neuer doubte you, for while one man is there, whiche is neuer thence, neither can there be any thing once mynded that shoulde sounde amisse to-wardes me, but it should be in myne eares or it were well out of their mouthes. This ment he by Catesby which was nere of hys secrete coũ-saill, & whō he familierly vsed in his most waighty matters, puttyng no man in so speciall truste as hym reconnynge hym selfe to no man so liefe sith he wiste well there was no man to hym so much beholdyng as was this Catesby, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this lande, and by the speciall fauoure of the lorde Hastynges in good auctho^ritie and muche rule bare in the counties of Leceſter & Northamptō where the lorde Hastynges power laye. But surely great pitie was it that he had not had either more trueth or lesse wit, for hys dissimulation onely, x kept all that mischief vp, in whom if the lorde Hastynges had not put so speciall truste, the lorde Stanley and he with diuerse other lordes had departed into their countrees and broken all the daunce, for many euill signes that he sawe, whiche he nowe construed all for the beste, so surely thought he that there could be no harme towarde hym in that counsail entended where Catesbye was. And of trueth the protectoure and the duke of Bukyngham made very good semblеaunce vnto the lorde Hastynges and kept hym muche in their compaignye. And vndoubtedly, the protectour loued hym well, and lothe was to haue loste him sauyng for feare leste his lyfe should haue quayled their purpose, for the whiche xx cause he moued Catesby to proue with some wordes cast out a farre of, whether he could thinke it possible to wynne ỹ lord Hastynges to their parte. But Catesby, whether he assayed him or assayed hym not, repor-ted vnto hym that he founde hym so fast, & herde him speake so terrible wordes that he durst no farther breake: and of a truth the lord Hastyn-ges of very truste shewed vnto Catesby the mistruste that other began to haue in ỹ matter. And therefore, he fearyng leste their mociōs might with the lord Hastynges minishe his credence, where vnto onely al the matter leaned, procured the protectour hastely to ryd hym, & much the rather, for he trusted by hys death to obtayne muche of the rule whych xxx the lord Hastynges bare in hys countre, the onely desyre whereof, was the thyng that enduced him to be procurer & one of the specialleſt con-triuers of all thys horrible treason. Where vpon the lorde protectour caused a coũsaill to be set at the tower on the fridaye the thirtene daye of June, where was muche commonyng for the honourable solemnitee of the coronation, of the whiche the tyme appointed aproched so nere, that the pageauntes were a makyng daye & night at Westminster, and vitaile killed whiche afterwarde was caste awaye.

Theſe lordes thus sittyng cōmouyng of this matter, the protectour came in emong theim about nyne of ỹ cloke salutyng theim curteously, xl excusyng him selfe that he had been from theim so longe saiyng merely that he had been a sleper that daye. And after a litle talkyng with them he sayed to the bishopp of Ely, my lorde you haue verye good strawbe-ries in youre garden at Holborne, I require you let vs haue a messe of thē, Gladly (my lord quod he) I would I had some better thing as redy to your

to your pleasure as that, and with that in all hast he sente his seruaunt for a dishe of strawberies. The protectour set the lordes faste in cõmo-nyng and there vpon prayed theim to spare him a litle, and so he departed and came agayn betwene .x. and eleuen of the clocke into the chambre all chaunged with a sowre angrye countenaunce knittyng the bro-wes, frownyng and fretyng and gnawynge on his lips and so set hym doune in his place. All the lordes were dismaied and sore marueyled of this manner and sodeyne chaunge and what thyng shoulde hym ayle.
When he had sitten a whyle, thus he began: What were they worthy x to haue that cõpasse and ymagine the destruccion of me beyng so neare of bloud to the kyng & protectoure of this his royall realme? At which question, all the lordes sate sore astonyed, musyng muche by whom the question should be ment, of whiche euery man knewe hym selfe clere.

Then the lorde Hastynges as he that for the familiarite that was betwene theim, thought he might be boldest wyth him, aunswered and said that they were worthy to be punished as heynous traytours what soeuer they were, & all the other affirmed ỹ same, that is (quod he) yonder sorceres my brothers wife & other with her, mening the quene, at these woordes many of the lordes were sore abashed whiche fauoured xx her, but the lorde Hastynges was better content in hys mynde that it was moued by her then by any other that he loued better, albeit hys hart grudged that he was not afore made of counsail of this matter as well as he was of the takyng of her kynred and of their puttyng to death, whyche were by hys assent before deuysed to be beheaded at Pomfrete, this selfe same daye, in the whiche he was not ware that it was by other deuised that he hym selfe shoulde the same daye be beheaded at London: then sayed the protectour in what wyse that sorceresse and other of her counsayle, as Shores wyfe with her affinitie haue by theyr sorcery and witchecrafte this wasted my body, & therwith plucxxx ked vp his doublet sleue to his elbowe on hys lefte arme, where he shewed a wery she withered arme & smal as it was neuer other. And therupon, euery mannes mynde mysgaue theim, well perceyuyng that this matter was but a quarell, for well they wist that the quene was both to wyse to go about any such folye, & also if she would, yet would she of all folke make Shores wyfe least of her counsaile, whom of all women she most hated, as that concubine whom the kyng her husband most loued.

Also, there was no manne there but knewe that hys arme was euer such sith the day of his birth, Neuertheless, the lorde Hastynges, which from the death of kyng Edward kept Shores wife, whom he somwhat xl doted in the kynges lyfe, sauing it is sayed that he forbare her for reue-rence towarde his kyng, or els of a certayne kynde of fidelitie towarde his frend. Yet nowe his hart somewhat grudged to haue her whom he loued so highly accused, and that as he knewe well vntruely, therefore he aunswered & sayed, certaynly my lorde, yf they haue so done, they be worthy of heynous punishement, what quod ỹ protectour, thou seruest me I wene with yf and with and, I tell the they haue done it, and that wyll I make good on thy bodye traytour. And therwith (as in a great anger) he clapped hys fyste on the boȝde a great rappe, at whych token geuen, one cried treason without the chamber, & therwith a dooȝe clapped, and in came rushyng men in harneyes as manye as the chamber could hold. And anone the protectoure sayed to the loȝd Hastynges, I arrest the traytour, what me my loȝd quod he, yea ẏ traytour quod the protectour. And one let flye at the loȝd Stanley, which shroncke at the stroacke and fell vnder the table, oȝ els hys head had bene cleft to the teth, foȝ as shoȝtly as he shrancke, yet ranne the bloud aboute his eares. ẋ Then was the Archebishop of Yoȝke and doctour Moȝton bishoppe of Ely & the loȝde Stanley taken & diuers other, whiche were bestowed in dyuers chambers, saue the loȝde Hastynges (whom the protectour cõmaunded to spede & shryue him apace) foȝ by sainct Paule (quod he) I wyll not dyne tyll I se thy head of, it boted hym not to aske why, but heuily he toke a priest at auenture and made a shoȝte shrift, foȝ a lenger woulde not be suffered, the protectour made so much hast to his dyner, which might not go to it tyll this murther were done, foȝ sauyng of his vngracious othe. So was he brought furthe into the grene besyde the chapel within the towȝe, & his head layed doune on a logge of tymber ẋẋ that lay there foȝ buildyng of the chapel, & there tyrannously striken of, and after his body & head were enterred at Wyndesoȝe by hys maister kynge Edward the foȝth, whose soules Jesu pardon. Amen.

A meruelous case it is to heare, either ẏ warnynges that he should haue voyded oȝ ẏ tokens of that he could not voyde. Foȝ the next night before his death, the loȝde Stanley sent to hym a trusty messenger at midnight in all the haste, requiryng hym to ryse and ryde awaye wyth hym, foȝ he was disposed vtterlye no lenger foȝ to abyde, foȝ he had a fearfull dreame in the which he thought that a boȝe with hys tuskes so rased them bothe by the heades that the bloud ran aboute bothe their ẋẋẋ shoulders, and foȝ asmuch as the protectour gaue the boȝe foȝ his cognisaunce, he ymagined that it should be he. This dreame made suche a fearfull impression in hys harte, that he was throughly determyned no lenger to tary but had his hoȝse redy, yf the loȝde Hastynges would go with hym. So that they would ryde so farre that night, ẏ they shoulde be out of daunger by the next day. A good loȝd (quod ẏ loȝd Hastynges) to the messenger, leaneth my loȝde thy maister so much to suche tryfles, and hath suche faithe in dreames, whych either his awne feare phantasieth, oȝ do ryse in the nightes rest by reason of the dayes thought. Tell him it is playne wichcraft to beleue in such dreames, which if they were xl tokens of thinges to come, why thinketh he not that we might as likely make theim truely by oure goyng yf we were caught & brought backe, (as frendes fayle fliers) foȝ then had the boȝe a cause lykely to race vs with his tuskes, as folkes that fled foȝ some falshead, wherefoȝe either is there peryl, noȝ none there is deede, oȝ if any be, it is rather in goyng

then abidyng. And if we should nedes fall in peril one way or other, yet had I leauer ỳ men should se it were by other mens falshed, thē thynke it were either our awne faute or faynte feble hart, & therfore go to thy maister & cōmende me to him & saye that I praye him to be mery & haue no feare, for I assure hym, I am assured of the man he wotteth of, as I am sure of myne awne hand. God send grace (quod the messenger) & so departed. Certeyn it is also that in rydyng towarde ỳ towre the same mornyng in whiche he was beheaded, hys horsse that he accustomed to ryde on stombled with him twyse or thryse al most to the fallyng, which x thyng although it happeth to them dayly to whom no mischaūce is to-warde, yet hath it bene as an olde euyll token obserued as a goyng toward mischiefe. Now this that followeth was no warning but an enuious scorne, the same morning ere he were vp from his bed where Shores wife lay with him all night, there came to him sir Thomas Haward sonne to the lorde Haward (whyche lord was one of the priueyest of the lord protectours counsaill and doyng) as it were of curtesye to accompaignye hym to the counsaile, but of truthe sent by the lorde protectour to hast him thetherward.

This sir Thomas, while the lord Hastynges stayed a while commoxx nyng with a priest, whō he met in ỳ Towrestrete, brake the lordes tale, saiyng to him merely, what my lord I pray you come on, wherfore talk you so long with that priest, you haue no nede of a priest yet, & laughed vpon hym, as though he would saye, you shall haue nede of one sone: But lytle wyst the other what he mēt (but or night these wordes were well remēbred by thē that hard them) so the true lorde Hastynges litle mistrusted, & was neuer merier, ner thought his life in more suretie in al his dayes, which thyng is often a signe of chaūge: but I shall rather let any thyng passe me then the bayne surety of mans mynde so neare his death, for vpō the very towre wharffe, so neare the place where his xxx head was of so sone after, as a mā might wel cast a balle, a pursyuaūt of his awne called Hastynges mete with him, & of their metyng in ỳ place he was put in remēbraunce of another tyme, in whiche it happened thē to mete before together in the place, at which tyme the lord Hastynges had bene accused to kyng Edward by the lord Ryuers the quenes brother, in so muche that he was for a whilew, hich lasted not long highly in the kinges indignacion, as he nowe mette ỳ same pursiuaūt in the same place, the ieoperdy so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him therof, with whō he had talked in the same place of that matter, & therfore he sayed, Ah Hastynges, art thou remēbred whē I mette xl the here once with an heauy hart? Ye my lord (quod he) ỳ I remembre well, & thanked be to God they gat no good ner you no harme therby, thou wouldest saye so (quod he) if thou knewest so much as I do, whych few knowe yet, & mo shall shortlye, that meant he that therle Ryuers & the lorde Richard & sir Thomas Vaughā should that day be beheaded at Pomfrete, as thei were in dede, which act he wist wel should be done, but nothyng ware that ỹ axe hong so nere his awne head. In faith ma (quod he) I was neuer so sozy ner neuer stode in so greate daunger of my lyfe as I dyd when thou & I mette here, & lo the wozlde is turned nowe, nowe stand myne enemies in the daũger as thou mayst happe to hear moze hereafter, & I neuer in my lyfe merier noz neuer in so great surety, I pzaye God it pzoue so (quod Hastinges, pzoue quod he: doubtest thou that) nay nay I warraũt the, & so in maner displeased he entered into the Towze, where he was not long on lyue as you haue heard.

O lozde God the blyndnesse of our moztall nature, whẽ he most feared, he was in moste suretye, and when he reconed him selfe moste surest, he lost hys lyfe, & that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man a good knight & gentle, of great aucthozitie with his pzince, of liuynge somwhat dissolute, playne and open to his enemy, and sure and secrete to hys frende, easy to begyle, as he that of good harte and courage fozesawe no perilles, a louynge man and passyng welbeloued, very faythfull and trustie ynough, but trustynge to muche was hys destruction as you maye perceyue.

Nowe flewe the fame of thys lozdes death thzough the cytie & farther about, lyke a wynde in euery mans eare, but the Pzotectoure immediatly after dyner (entending to set some colour vpõ the matter) sent in all the hast foz many substancial men out of the cytie into the Towze, and at their commyng hym selfe with the duke of Buckyngham stode, harnessed in olde euil fauoured bziganders, such as no mã would wene that they would haue bouchesafed to haue put on their backes, excepte some sodeyne necessitie had cõstraigned them. Then the lozd pzotectoz shewed them, that the lozd Hastynges & other of his cõspiracy had contriued to haue sodeynly destroyed hym and the duke of Buckyngham there thesame daie in counsail, and what they entẽded farther, was yet not well knowen, of whych their treason he had neuer knowlege befoze x. of the cloke thesame fozenone, which sodeyn feare dzaue them to put on suche harnesse as came next to their handes foz their defence, and so God holpe them, that the mischiefe turned vpon them that would haue done it, & thus he required them to repozt. Euery man answered fayze as though no mã mistrusted ỹ matter, which of trueth no man beleued. Yet foz ỹ further appeasyng of ỹ peoples myndes, he sent immediatly after dynner an Heralde of armes with a pzoclamacion thzough the cytie of London which was pzoclaymed in the kynges name, that the lozd Hastinges with diuers other of his trayterous purpose had befoze conspired, the same daye to haue slayne the pzotectour and the duke of Buckyngham sittyng in counsaill, & after to haue taken vpon them the rule of the kyng and the realme at their pleasure, and therby to pill and spoyle whom they lyst vncomptrolled, & muche matter was deuised in the same pzoclamaciõ to the slaunder of the lozd Hastynges, as that he was an euyll consailoure to the kynges father, entisyng hym to manye thynges highly redoundyng to the diminishyng of hys honoure and to procuryng and vngracious example, aſwell in many other thynges as in vicious liuynge and inordinate abuſyon of his body, bothe with many other and eſpecial with Shores wyfe whych was one of his ſecrete counſaill of this heynous treaſon, with whom he laye nightly, and namely the night paſſed next before his death, ſo that it was the leſſe mar-ueill yf vngracious liuynge brought hym to an vnhappy ende, whyche he was now put to by the cõmaundement of the kynge his highnes ⁊ of his honorable and faithfull counſaile, bothe for his demerites beynge x ſo openly taken in hys falſe contriued treaſon, ⁊ alſo leaſt the delaiynge of his execucion might haue encoraged other miſcheuous perſons parteners of hys conſpiracy, to gather and aſſemble them ſelues together in makyng ſo great commocion for hys deliueraunce, whoſe hope nowe beyng by his well deſerued death pollytickely repreſſed, all the realme ſhall by Goddes grace reſte in good quyet and peace. Nowe was thys proclamacion made within twoo houres after he was beheaded, and it was ſo curiouſly endyted and ſo fayre writen in Parchement in a fayre ſette hande, and therewith of it ſelfe ſo long a proceſſe, that euery chyld might perceyue that it was prepared and ſtudyed before (and as ſome xx men thought, by Cateſby) for all the tyme betwene hys death and the proclamacion proclaimynge, coulde ſkant haue ſuffyced vnto the bare wrytyng alone, albeit that it had bene in paper and ſcribeled further in haſte at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaimynge thereof, one that was ſcolemayſter at Paules ſtandynge by and comparyng the ſhorteneſſe of the tyme wyth the length of the matter layed to theim that ſtoode aboute hym, here is a gaye goodlye caſte, foule caſte awaye for haſt. And a marchaunte that ſtoode by hym layed that it was wrytten by inſpiracyon and propheſye. Nowe then by and by, as it were for anger and not for coueteous, the Protectoure ſent ſir Thomas Haward xxx to the houſe of Shores wyfe (for her huſbande dwelt not wyth her) whiche ſpoyled her of all that euer ſhe had, aboue the valure of twoo or thre thouſande markes, and ſent her bodye to pryſon. And the Protec-toure had layde to her for the maner ſake that ſhe was a counſaill with the lorde Haſtynges to deſtroye hym. In concluſion, when no coloure could faſten vpon theſe matters, then he layed heynouſly to her charge that thyng that ſhe could not denye, for all the worlde knewe that it was true, and that notwithſtandyng euery man laughed to heare it then ſo ſodeynly, ſo highly taken, that ſhe was naught of her bodye. And for this cauſe as a godly continent prince cleane and fautleſſe of hym ſelfe, xl ſent out of heauen into thys vicious worlde, for the amendment of mens maners, he cauſed the byſhop of London to putte her to open penaunce, goynge before a croſſe one Sondaye at procеſſion with a taper in her hand. In the whiche ſhe went in countenaunce and peace ſo womanly, ⁊ albeit ſhe was out of all aray ſauyng her kyrtel only, yet went ſhe ſo fayre and louely, and namely when the wondrynge of the people caſt a comely red in her chekes, of the whiche ſhe beſore had moſt myſſe, that her great ſhame wanne her much prayſe amongeſt themthat were more amorous of her body then curious of her ſoule, and manye good folke that hated her liuyng and were glad to ſe ſynne corrected, yet pitied they more her penaunce then reioyſed it, when they cõſidered that the protector did it more of corrupt mynd then any vertuous affection.

The deſcripcion of Shores wyfe.

This woman was borne in London, well frended, honeſtly brought vp, and very well maryed, ſauyng ſomewhat to ſone, her huſbande an honeſt and a yonge citezen, godly & of good ſubſtaunce, but foraſmuche as they were coupled or ſhe were well rype, ſhe not very feruently lo- x ued for whom ſhe neuer longed, whych was ỹ thyng (by chaunce) that the more eaſely made her to enclineto the kynges appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the reſpect of hys royaltie, the hope of gaye apparell, eaſe, pleaſure, and other wanton wealth was hable ſone to perce a ſofte tender hart: but whẽ the kyng had abuſed her, anone her huſband beyng an honeſt manne and one that could his good, not preſumyng to touche a kynges concubyne left her vp to hym altogether. When the kynge dyed, the lorde Haſtynges toke her, whiche in the kynges dayes albeit that he was ſore enamoured with her yet he forbare, either for a pryncely reuerence or for a certayne frendely faithfulneſſe. Proper ſhe xx was and fayre, nothyng in her body that you could haue chaunged, but yf you would haue wiſhed her ſomewhat higher. Thys ſaye they that knewe her in her youth, ſome ſayed and iudged that ſhe had bene well fauoured, & ſome iudged the contrary, whoſe iudgement ſeameth like as men geſſe the beautye of one long before departed, by a ſcalpe taken out of a chanell houſe, & this iudgemẽt was in the tyme of kyng Henry the eyght, in the. xviij. yere of whoſe reigne ſhe dyed, when ſhe had nothyng but a reueled ſkynne and bone. Her beautye pleaſed not men ſo muche as her pleaſaunt behauoure, for ſhe had a proper wytte & coulde both reade and wryte, mery in compaigny, redy and quicke of anſwere, xxx neyther mute nor full of bable, ſomtyme tantyng without diſpleaſure, but not without diſporte. Kyng Edward would ſaye ỹ he had thre concubines, which in diuerſe properties diuerſly excelled, one, the merieſt, the other the wylieſt, the thirde the holyeſt harlot in the realme as one, whom no man coulde get out of the churche to any place lightly, but if it were to his bed, ỹ other two were ſomwhat greater perſonages thẽ maiſtres Shore, and neuertheleſſe of their humilitie were cõtent to be nameles & to forbeare the prayſe of theſe properties. But the merieſt was Shores wyfe in whom the kyng therfore toke great pleaſure, for many he had, but her he loued, whoſe fauoure to ſaye the trueth (for it xl were ſynne to lye on the deuil) ſhe neuer abuſed to any mãs hurt, but to many mens comforte & reliefe. For where the king toke diſpleaſure, ſhe would mitigate & apeacehis mynde, where men were out of fauour, ſhe would bryng thẽ into his grace, for many that had highly offended, ſhe obteyned pardon, & of great forfeatures ſhe gat remiſſion, and finally, in many weighty suites she stode many men in great steade, either for none or for very small rewarde: and those rather gaye thē riche, either for that she was content with the dede well done, or for that she delighted to be sued vnto, & to shewe what she was able to do with the kynge, or for that that wanton women and welthy be not alwaies couetous, I doubt not some man wyl thynke this woman to be to slight to be written of emong graue and weyghtie matters, whiche they shall specially thynke that happely sawe her in her age & aduersite, but me semeth the chaunce so much more worthy to be remembred, in how much after wealth she fell to pouertie, and from riches to beggerye vnfrended, out of x acquaintaunce, after great substaunce after so great fauoure wyth her prince, after as great suite & sekyng to with all those which in those dayes had busynes to spede as many other menne were in theire tymes, whiche be now famous onely by the infamye yf their euyll deedes, her doynges were not much lesse, albeit they be muche lesse remembred, because they were not euyll, for men vse to write an euyll turne in marble stone, but a good turne they wryte in ỹ dust, whych is not worst proued by her, for after her wealth she went beggynge of manye that had begged them selfes if she had not holpen them, suche was her chaunce.

xx Now was it deuised by the protectoure & his counsaile, that ỹ same day that the lord Chamberlayne was headed in the towre of Londō & about thesame houre shoulde be beheaded at Pountrete the earle Ryuers and the lorde Richarde the quenes sonne, syr Thomas Vaughan and sir Richard Haute, whiche as you heard were taken at Northampton and Stony stratfort by the consent of the lord Hastynges, whych execution was done by the ordre & in the presence of sir Richard Ratclif knight, whose seruice the protectoure specially vsed in the counsaill, & in the execution of suche lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene longe secrete with him hauing experiēce of the world & shewed wytte, xxx shorte and rude in speche, rough and boysterous of behauour, bolde in mischiefe, as farre from pytie as from all feare of God.

This knight brought these foure persons to the scaffolde at the daye apointed, & shewed to all ỹ people that they were traitours, not suffery̆ng ỹ lordes to speake, & to declare their innocēcy, least their wordes might haue enclined men to pytie them & to hate the protectour & hys part & so without iudgemēt & processe of the lawe caused them to be beheaded without other yearthly gylt, but onely ỹ they were good men & true to the kyng & to nye to the quene: insomuch as sir Thomas Vaughan goyng to his death sayed, A wo worthe thē ỹ toke the prophecie xl that G. should destroy kyng Edwardes childrē, meaning ỹ by the duke of Clarēce lord George which for ỹ suspicion is now dead, but now remaineth Richard G. duke of Gloucester, which now I se is he ỹ shall & will accōplishe the prophecie & destroye kyng Edwardes children & all their alyes & frēdes, as it appereth by vs this day, whō I appele to the high tribunal of God for his wrongful murther & our true innocencye.

And then Ratclyffe sayed, you haue well apeled, lay doune youre head, ye quod sir Thomas, I dye in right, beware you dye not in wrong, & so that good knight was beheaded and the other three, & buryed naked in the monastery at Pounfret.

When the lorde Hastynges and these other lordes & knightes were thus beheaded and ryd out of the waye, thē the protectour caused it to be proclaymed that the coronacion for diuers great and vrgent causes should be deferred till the seconde daye of Nouember, for then thought he, that whyle men mused what the matter meant, & while the lordes of the realme were about him, out of their awne strengthes, and whyle no man wyste what to thynke nor whom to truste, or euer they shoulde haue tyme and space to digest the matter, and make partes, it were best hastely to pursue his purpose & put hym self in possession of the croune, or menne could haue tyme to deuyse anye wyse to resyste. But nowe was all the study, this matter beyng of it selfe so heynous might be first broken to the people in suche wyse as it might well be taken. To thys counsaile they toke diuerse suche as they thought mete to be trusted & likely to be enduced to that parte and hable to stand theim in steade, eyther by powre or by polycye. Emong whom, they made a counsaile Edmond Shaa then Mayre of London, whiche vpon trust of hys awne auauncemēt, where he was of a proude harte highly desirous, toke on him to frame the cytie to their appetite. Of spirituall men they toke suche as had wytte, & were in aucthoritie emongest the people for opinion of their learnyng, and had no scrupulous conscience. Emongest these had, they toke Raffe Shaa clearke brother to ỹ Maior, & Freer, Pynkie prouinciall of the Augustine Freers, bothe doctours in diuinitie, bothe great preachers, bothe of more learnyng then vertue, of more fame then learnyng, & yet of more learnyng then trueth. For they were before greatly esteemed emong the people, but after that, neuer none of these two were regarded. Shaa made a sermōde in prayse of the Protectour before the coronacion, and Pynkye made one after the coronacion, bothe so full of tedious flattery, that no good mans eares coulde abyde thē, Pynkye in his sermonde so loste his voyce that he was fayne to leaue of and come doune in the myddest, Doctoure Shaa by hys sermonde loste his honesty, and sone after his lyfe, for very shame of the worlde, into the whyche he durst neuer after muche come abroade, but the Freer forced for no shame, and so it harmed hym the lesse. Howbeit, some doubt and many thynke that Pynkey was not of counsaill before the coronacion, but after the cōmon maner fell to flattery after, namely, because his sermond was not incontinent vpon it, but at sainct Mary Spittle the Easter after. But certayne it is that doctour Shaa was of coūsaill in the begynnyng, in so much that they determyned that he should fyrst breake ỹ matter in a sermond at Poules crosse, in whych he shoulde by the aucthoritie of hys preachynge induce the people to encline to ỹ protectours ghostly purpose. But now was al the labour

& study in the deuise of some conuenient pretexte, for wlych the people should be content to depose the prince & accept the protectour for kyng.
In which diuerse thinges they deuised, but ỹ chief thyng, & the weight of all that inuencion rested in this, that they shoulde allege bastardy in kyng Edwarde hym selfe, or in his chyldren, or bothe, so that he shoulde seme disabled to enherite the croune by the duke of Yorke & the Prince by him. To lay bastardy in kyng Edward sounded openly to the rebuke of the protectours awne mother, which was mother to them bothe.
For in that poinct could be none other coloure, but to pretende that his x awne mother was an auoutresse, but neuertheless he woulde ỹ poinct should be lesse and more fynely, & closely handled, not euen fully playne and directly, but touched a slope craftely, as though men spared in that poinct to speake all the trueth for feare of hys displeasure. But that other poinct concernyng the basterdy they deuised to surmyse in kyng Edward his chyldren, that would he should be openly declared and enforced to the vttermost. The coloure & pretexte wherof cannot be well perceyued excepte we repete some thinges longe before dooen aboute kynge Edward hys mariages.

After kyng Edwarde the fourthe had deposed kyng Henry the sixte xx and was in peaceable possession of the realme, determinyng him selfe to mary (as was requisite) bothe for hym selfe and for the realme, he sente therle of Warwike & diuerse other noble men in ambassade to the fren-che kyng to entreate a mariage betwene the kyng & Bona sister to the frenche quene, thē beyng in Fraunce. In which thyng therle of War-wike founde the parties so towarde and wyllyng, that he spedely without any difficultie accordyng to his instruccions brought the matter to a good conclusion. Nowe happeneth it in the meane season, there came to make a sute to the kynge by peticion dame Elizabeth Grey (whyche after was his quene) then a widdowe, borne of noble bloude, specially xxi by her mother, which was Duchesse of Bedforde, and she was maried to sir Richarde Wooduile lorde Riuers, her father.

Howbeit, this Elizabeth beyng in seruice with quene Margaret wife to kyng Henry the sixte, was maried to one Jhon Grey Esquire whom kyng Henry made knight at the laste batteill of sainct Albones, but litle while he enioyed his knighthod, for at the same felde he was slain.

After, whē that kyng Edward was kyng and the Erle of Warwike beyng on his ambassad, this poore lady made sute to the kyng to be restored to suche small lādes as her husbande had geuen her in ioyntoure whom when the kyng beheldе and harde her speake, as she was bothe xxii faire and of good fauoure, moderate of stature, well made and verye wyse, he not alonely pitied her, but also wexed enamored on her, and ta-kyng her secretely a syde began to enter into talkyng more familierly, whose appetite whē she perceyued, she verteously denied hym, but that she dyd so wysely and that with so good manner & woordes so well set, that she rather kyndled his desyre then quenched it. And finally, after many a metyng and much wowyng and many great promises she well espied the kyng his affeccio towarde her so greately encreased that she durste somewhat ỹ more boldely saye her mynde, as to him whose hert she perceyued more feruently set then to fall of for a worde. And in conclusion she shewed him plain, that as she wist her self to simple to be hys wife, so thought she her selfe to good to be his cõcubine. The kyng much marueilyng of her constancy, as he that had not been wonte els where so stiefly sayed nay, so muche estemed her continency and chastite, that he sette her vertue in steade of possession and richesse: And thys takyng counsail of his owne desyre determined in haste to mary her. And after & that he was thus appointed & had betwene them twayn ensured her, then asked he counsaill of his secrete frendes, & that in such maner that they myght easly perceyue that it boted not to saye nay. Notwythstãdynge, the duches of Yorke his mother, was so sore moued therewyth that she disswaded ỹ mariage as muche as she possible might: allegyng that it was hys honor, profyte & surety, to mary in some noble progeny out of hys realme, where vpon depended great strengthe to hys estate by that affinite, and greate possibylite of encrease of hys dominions. And that he coulde not well otherwise doe, cõsideryng the erle of Warwike had so farfurthe entered into the matter all ready, which was not lyke to take it well if all hys voyage were in suche wyse frustrate & hys appointement deluded. And she sayed ferther, that it was not princely to mary his owne subiect, no greater occasiõ ledyng there vnto, no possessions ner other commodite dependyng therupõ, but onely as a riche manne would mary hys mayden onely for a litle wanton dotage vpon her person. In whiche mariage many men cõmend more the maydens fortune thẽ the mannes wisedome, & yet she saied that there was more honesty, thẽ honour in this mariage, forasmuch as ther is not betwene a marchaunt & his mayde so greate a difference as betwene a kynge & his subiecte, a greate prince and a poore widowe. In whose persone, all though there were nothyng to be misliked, yet was there saied she, nothing so excellent but that it might be found in diuerse other that were more metely (quod she) for your estate: yea & maydẽs also, the onely widowhed of dame Elizabeth Grey (although she were in all other poinctes and thynges conuenient for you) should suffice as me thynketh to refrain you from her mariage, sith it is an vnsittyng thynge & a greate blemishe to the sacred maiestie of a prince, that ought as nere to approche priesthode in clennesse, as he doeth in dignitie, to be defiled with bygamy in his first mariage. The kyng made his mother an answere part in earnest & parte in playe merely, as he that wyste hym selfe out of her rule: & albeit he would gladly that she should take it well, yet was he at apoinct in his owne minde, toke she it wel or otherwise. Howbeit, somewhat to satisfy her he saied, that albeit mariage being a spiritual thyng ought rather to be made for the respecte of God, where his grace encli-neth, the parties ought to encline to loue together (as he trusted it was in his

in his case) rather then for the regard of any temporall auauntage: yet neuertheles him semed this mariage wel consydered not to be vnpro-fitable, for he reconed the amite of no earthly nacion to bee so necessary for him as the frendshyp of hys owne, which he thoughte likely to bear hym so much the more hartye fauour, in that he disdaygned not to ma-ry wyth one of his owne land: & yet yf outward aliaunce wer thought so requisite, he would find ỹ meanes to entre thereunto muche better by other of his kynne where all the parties coulde be contented, thẽ to mary himselfe wherein he should neuer happely loue, and for the pos-x sibilitie of possessyons lese the fruite and pleasure of this that he had al-ready. For final pleasure taketh a manne of al that euer he hath beside, yf he be wiued agaynste his appetite, and I doubte not (quod he,) but there be as you say other that be in euery poinct comparable with her, and therfore I let not theim that lyke theim to mary theim, no more is it reason that it mislike any man that I mary where it lyketh me. And I am sure, that my cousin of Warwike, neyther loueth me so lytle, to grudge at that that I loue, ner is so vnreasonable to loke that I should in choyse of a wyfe rather bee ruled by hys yie then by myne owne, as though I wer a ward that were boundẽ to mary by the apoinctmẽt of xx a guardon, I would not be a king wyth that condicion to forbear mine owne libertie in choyse of mine own mariage. As for possibilite of more inheritaunce by newe affinitie in straunge landes, is oft the occasion of more trouble thẽ profite. And we haue alredy title by that meanes, as suffiseth to so much as suffiseth to gett & kepe wel in one mans dayes. That she is a wyddow and hath alredy chyldrẽ: By God his blessed la-dy, I am a bacheler and haue some to, & so eche of vs hath a proofe, that neyther of vs is lyke to be barrein. And therfore madame I pray you be content, I trust to God she shal bryng furth a young prynce that shal please you. And as for the bigamy, let the byshop hardely lay it to my xxx charge when I come to take ordres, for I vnderstand it is forbidden a prieste, but I neuer wyste that it was forbidden a prince. The duchesse with these wordes nothinge apeased, and seyng the kynge so sette on that she could not plucke him backe, so highly she disdaigned it, that vn-der pretexte of her duty to Godward, she deuysed to disturbe this ma-riage, & rather to helpe that he should mary one dame Elizabeth Lucy whom the kyng not long before had gotten wyth chyld, wherfore the kyng hys mother obiected openly agaynst thys mariage, as it were in discharge of her conscięce) that the kynge was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucy and her husband before God, by reason of whiche wordes suche xl obstacle was made in that matter, that eyther the bishoppe durste not or the kyng woulde not procede to the solemnisacion of the mariage, til hys fame wer crerely purged, & the trueth wel & opẽly testified. Wher-vpon dame Elizabeth Lucye was sente for, and albeit she was by the kyng hys mother and many other put in good comfort to affirme ỹ she was assured to the kynge, yet when she was solempny sworne to say ỹ truth, ſhe confeſſed ſhe was neuer enſured. Howbeit ſhe ſayd, his grace ſpake ſuche louing wordes to her, that ſhe verely hoped that he would haue maried her, and that yf ſuch kynde wooydes had not bene, ſhe woulde neuer haue ſhewed ſuch kindneſſe to him, to lette hym ſo kyndely gette her wyth chylde. This examinacion ſolemply taken, it was clerely proued that there was no impediment to let the king to mary, wherfore, he ſhortely after at Grafton beſyde Stonyſtratforde maryed the lady Elizabeth Grey very priuely, which was his enemies wife and had prayed hartely for his loſſe, in the which God loued her better then to graunte her her bone, for then had ſhe not bene his wyfe: And after that ſhe was crouned quene, and her father was created erle Riuers, and her ſonne created Marques Dorſet. But when the erle of Warwike vnderſtode of this mariage, he toke it ſo highly, that thereof enſued much trouble and great bloudſhed, as is declared before in the ſtory of Edward the. iiij.

I haue reherſed this mariage somewhat the more at length, becauſe it might thereby the better apere vpon how ſlipper a ground ỹ protector builded his colour, by which he pretended king Edward hys chyldren to be baſtardes, but the inuencion, as ſimple as it was lyke theim to whom it ſuffiſe to haue ſomewhat to ſay, while they were ſure to be not compelled to no larger proſe then theim ſelues liſte to make.

Now to returne where I left, as I beganne to ſhew you, it was by the protector and his counſail concluded that this doctor Shaa ſhould in a ſermõ at Paules croſſe ſignifie to the people that neither king Edwarde him ſelfe nor the duke of Clarence were lawfully begotten, nor were the very childrẽ of the duke of Yorke, but begottẽ vnlawfully by other perſons by aduoutry of the duches their mother. And that dame Elizabeth Lucy was the very wife of king Edward, and ſo prince Edward and al the childzen begottẽ on the quene wer baſtardes. And accordyng to this deuiſe, doctor Sha ỹ ſonday after at Paules croſſe in a great audiẽce (as alway a great nomber aſſembled to his preaching) came into the pulpyt takyng for hys Theme: Spuria uitulamina non dabunt radices altos. Sapien. iiij. that is to ſaye, baſtarde ſlippes ſhall neuer take deepe rootes: wherevpon when he had ſhewed the great grace that God geueth & ſecretely infoundeth in right generacion after ỹ lawes of matrimony, then declared he that thoſe childzen commenly lacked ỹ grace (& for the puniſhment of their parentes) were for ỹ moſt part vnhappy which were gotten in baſt, and ſpecyally in aduoutry, of which (though ſome by the ignorauncie of the worlde and the trueth hid from knowledge) haue enherited for a ſeaſon other mennes landes, yet God alwaye ſo prouydeth that it contynueth not in their bloud long, but the truethe commynge to lyghte, the ryghtefull enheritours be reſtored, and the baſtard ſlippes plucked vp or it can be rooted depe. And when he had laied for the proſe and confirmacion of this ſentence, examples taken oute of the olde teſtamente and other auncient hyſtoryes, then began

began he to discend to the praise of the lord Richard duke of Yorke, cal-lyng him father to the protectour & declared his title to the croune by inheritaunce and also by entaile authorysed by parliamēt after ỹ death of kyng Henry the fyrt. Then shewed he that the lorde protector, was onely the ryght heire, of his body lawfully begotten. Then declared he that king Edward was neuer lawfully maried to ỹ quene, but his wife before God was dame Elizabeth Lucy, & so hys children were bastardes. And besydes that, that neyther kyng Edward hymself nor ỹ duke of Clarence (emōgest thē that were secrete in the duke of Yorkes hou-x sholde) were neuer reconed surely to be the children of the noble duke as those that by their fauoures more resembled other knowen menne then him, from whose verteous condicions he sayd also, that king Edwarde was far of. But the lord protectour (quod he) that veray noble prince, the speciall patrone of knightly prowes, aswel in all princely be-haueour, as in the liniamentes and fauour of his visage, representh the very face of ỹ noble duke his father. This is, quod he, the fathers own figure, this is his owne countenaunce, the verie print of his visage, the sure vndoubted ymage, the playne expresse lykenesse of ỹ noble duke.
Now was it before deuysed that in the speakyng of these wordes, the xx protector should haue come in emongest the people to ỹ sermond ward to thende that these wordes so metyng wyth his presence, might haue bene taken emongest the herers, as though the holy ghost had put thē in the preachers mouth, and should haue moued the people euen there to haue cryed, kyng Richard, that it might haue bene after sayed that he was specyally chosen by God, and in maner by miracle: but thys de-uise quayled, eyther by the protectours neglygence or the preachers ouer hasty diligence. For while the protectour, founde by the waye tarynge, leaste he should haue preuented these wordes, the doctour fea-xxx ryng that he shoulde come or hys sermon could come to those wordes, hastyng his matter therto, he was come to theim and paste theim, and entred into other matters or the protector came, whom whē he beheld commynge, he sodainly left the matter which he had in hand, and without any deduccyon thereunto out of all ordre, & out of al frame began to repete those wordes agayn. This is the very noble prince the especiall patrone of knightly prowes, whiche aswell in all pryncely behaueoure as in the liniamentes and fauour of hys visage representeth the veraye face of the noble duke of Yorke his father. This is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenaūce, the very print of his visage the sure vndoubted image, the plain expresse likenesse of that noble du-xl ke, whose remēbraunce can neuer die while he liueth. While these wor-des were in speakyng, the protectour accompaigned with the duke of Buckinghā, went through the people vp into the place where the doctors stand, where they hard out the sermond: but the people wer so far from cryinge kyng Richard, that they stoode as they had bene turned into stoones for wonder of this shameful sermonde: after whiche once ended ỹ preacher gat hym home & neuer after durst loke out for shame but kept him out of sighte as an owle, and when he asked any of his old frẽdes, what the people talked of him, although that his own cõscience well shewed hym ỹ they talked no good, yet when the other answered hym, that there was in euery mannes mouth of hym much shame spoken, it so strake him too the harte that in fewe dayes after he withered awaye.

Thẽ on the tuesday after next folowing this sermond, being ỹ. xvii. day of June, there came to the Guyld Hall of Londõ the duke of Buckyngham and diuerse lordes and knightes mo then happely knew the p message that they brought. And at the east ende of the hal wher ỹ hoystynges be kepte, the duke and the maire & the other lordes sat doune, and the aldermen also, al the commons of the citie beinge, assembled & standynge before theim. After scilence commaunded vpon a great pain in the protectours name: The duke stode vp, and as he was well learned and of nature meruellously well spokẽ, he sayed to the people with a cleare and loude voyce: Frendes, for the zeale and hertie fauoure that we beare you, we be come too breke of a matter ryght greate and weyghty, and no lesse weyghty then pleasynge to God and profytable to all the realme, nor to no parte of the realm, more profytable, then to pp you the citizens of thys noble cytie. For why, the thyng that you haue long lacked, and as we wel know sore longed for, that you would haue geuen great good for, that you would haue gone farre to fetche: that thyng we be come hyther to bryng you, wythout your labour, pain, cost auenture or ieopardie. What thyng is that? Certes the surety of your own bodies, the quiet of your wiues and doughters, and the sauegard of your goodes: Of all whych thynges in tymes passed you stoode in doubt. For who was he of you all that could recon hym selfe Lord of hys own good emongst so many gynnes and trappes wer set therfore emong so much pyllyng and pollyng, emonge so manye taxes and tal- ppp liages, of which there was neuer ende, and oftymes no nede, or yf any were, it grew rather of riote or of vnreasonable wast, then any necessary honourable charge, so that there was dayly plucked and pylled from good and honeste menne great substaunce of goodes, to be lashed out emong vnthryftes, so farre furth that fyftenes sufficed not, nor any vsuall termes of knowen taxes, but vnder an easy name of benevolẽce and good wyll, the Commyssyoners so much of euery manne toke, as no manne woulde wyth hys good wyll haue geuen. As thoughe the name of benevolence had signified, that euery manne shoulde paye, not what he of hym selfe of hys good wyll luste to graunte, but what the pl king of his good will lust to take, who neuer asked litle, but euery thing was haunsed aboue the measure, amerciamentes turned into fines, fynes into raunsomes, smalle trespaces into mesprysion, mesprysion into treason, where of I thynke that no manne loketh that we shall remẽbre you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgottẽ which was

The oracion of the duke of Buckyngha made to the citezens of London.

Benevolence

was for a worde spoken, in hast cruelly behedded. This Burdet was a marchaũt dwellyng in Chepesyde at ỹ signe of ỹ croune, which now is ỹ signe of ỹ floure de luse ouer agaynst soper lane: This man merely in rufflyng time of king Edward ỹ. iiiij. his rage, sayd to his owne sonne that he would make him inheritor of ỹ croune, meaning his own house but these wordes king Edward made to be miscõstrued & interpreted that Burdet meant the croune of ỹ realme: wherfore within lesse place then. iiij. houres, he was apprehended, iudged, drawen and quartered in Chepesyde, by the misconstruynge of the lawes of the realme for the x princes pleasure, wyth no lesse honour to Merkam chiefe Justice then which lost his office rather then he would assent to that iudgemẽt: then to the dishonesty of those that either for feare or flattery gaue that iudgement. What nede I to speake of syr Thomas Cooke, Alderman and Mayre of this noble citie, who is of you eyther for negligẽce that wotteth not, or so forgetful that he remembreth not, or so hard harted that he pitieth not that worshipful mannes losse: what speake I of losse, hys wonderful spoyle and vndeserued destruction, onely because it happened him to fauour them whom the prynce fauoured not. We nede not reherse of these any mo by name, sith I doubt not ỹ here be many present that eyther in theimselues or their nigh frendes, aswell their goo-xx des as their persones were greatly endaũgered either by fained querels or smal matters aggrauated wt heynous names, & also there was no crime so great, of which there could lacke a pretexte. For sith ỹ king preuentyng ỹ time of his enheritaunce attayned the croune by battail, it suffised in a rych man for a pretext of treason, to haue bene of kynrede or aliaunce, nere of familiaritie, or longer of acquaintaunce wyth anye of those that were at any tyme the kynges enemies, which was at one xxx time or another more then halfe the realme. Thus were neither your goodes, neither landes in surety, and yet they brought your bodies in ieopardy, besyde the comen auenture of open warre, which albeit, that it is euer the wel and occasyõ of much mischief, yet is it neuer so mischeuous, as wher any people fal in deuision, and at distaunce emõg theimselues: and in no realm earthly so dedly and so pestilẽt, as when it happeneth emongest vs. And emong vs neuer contynued so long discensiõ nor so many battailles in any season, nor so cruell nor so dedly foughtẽ, as were in the kyng his daies that dedde is, God forgeue it hys solle. In whose tyme, and by whose occasion, what about the gettyng of the garlande, keppyng it, lesyng and winnyng agayn, it hath coste more Englysh bloud then hath the twise winning of Fraunce. In which inward xl warre emongest our selues hath bene so great effusyon of the auncient noble bloud of this realme, that scarcely the half remayneth, to ỹ great enfeblyng of this noble lande, besyde many a good towne ransaked & spoyled by them, that haue been goyng to the felde, or returnyng from thence, and peace after, not much surer then warre. So that no tyme was ther in the which riche men for their money, and great menne for their landes, or some other for some feare or for some displeasure were out of perel. For whom mistrusted he that mistrusted his own brother: Whom spared he that kylled hys owne brother: Could not suche maner of folke that he moste fauoured do somwhat (we shal for hys honor spare to speake) howbeit, thys ye wote well all, that whoso was beste bare euer the lest rule, and more suite in his daies was to Shores wife a vile and abhominable strompet then to al the lordes in England, except vnto those that made her their proctour, which simple womā was yet well named and honest, tyll the kyng for hys wanton luste and synful affectyon bereft her from her husbande, a ryght honeste manne and r substancyall emongest you. And in that poynct, which in good faythe I am sory to speake of, sauynge that it is bayne to kepe in counsayll that thyng that all men knoweth, ỹ king his gredy appetite was insaciable and euery where ouer all the realme intollerable. For no women was there any where young or olde, poore or ryche, whom he set his yie vpō whom he any thing liked either for persone or beautie, speche, pace or countenaunce, but without any feare of God, or respecte of his honour, murmure or grudgyng of the world, he woulde importunately pursue his appetite and haue her, to the great distruccion of many a good woman, and great dolour to their husbandes and frendes, whiche beyng rr honest people of thē selues, so muche regarded the clēnesse of their houses, the chastitie of their wyues and childrē, that them wer leuer to lose all that they haue beside, then to haue such a vilanie done to theim. And albeit that wyth this and other importable dealyng, the realme was in euery place anoyed, yet specially you the cytezens of this nobilitie, as for that emongest you is most plentie of such thynges as minister matter to such iniuries, as for that you were nerest hande, sythe that nere here about was his moste common abydyng. And yet be ye people whō he had as synguler a cause wel and truely to entreat, as any part of his realme: not onely for that the prynce by this noble citie, as of his specy- rrr all chambre and renoumed citie of this realme, much honourable fame receyueth emongest all other nacyōs, but also for that you not without your greate cost and sondry fauoures and yeoperdyes in all his war-res bare euer your especyall fauour to hys part: whyche youre kynde myndes borne to the house of Yorke, sithe he hath nothynge worthely requyted you, there is of the house now, which by God hys grace shal make you full recompence, which thyng to shew you, is the whole some and effect out of errande. It shall not, I wote well nede, that I reherse vnto you agayn that you al ready haue heard of hym that that can better tell it, and of whome I am sure ye wyl better beleue it (and reason rl it is that it so be) I am not so proud to looke therfore that you shoulde receyue my wordes of so great aucthoritie as the preachers of ỹ word of God, namely amā so connynge and so wyse, that no manne wotteth better what he shuld do and say, and therto so good and verteous that he would not say the thing, which he wist he should not say in the pulpit namelye, into the whiche no honeste man cometh to lie: which honourable preacher ye wel remẽbre, substãcially declared to you at Paules crosse on Sondaye last paste, the right and title of the moste excellente Prince Richard duke of Gloucester nowe protectour of thys realme, which he hath vnto the croune of the kyngdome of the same. For that worshipfulman made it perfectely and groundely open vnto you. The children of kyng Edward the fourth were neuer lawfully begottẽ, for as much as the kyng (liuyng his very wife dame Elizabeth Lucy) was neuer lawfully maried to the quene their mother whose bloud sauynge x he set his volupteous pleasure before hys honor, was full vnmetely to be matched wyth hys (the mynglyng of which two bloudes together hath bene the effusyõ of a great part of the noble bloud of thys realme) wherby it may well be sene, that maryage was not well made of which there is so much mischiefe growen. For lacke of whyche lawful copulacyon, and also of other thynges whych the sayed worshypfull doctor, rather sygnyfyed then fully explaned, and whyche thyng shal not be spoken for me, as the thynge that euery manne forbeareth to saye that he knoweth, in auoyding the displeasure that my noble Lorde Protector bearyng as nature requireth a filiall reuerence to the duches hys mo-xx ther. For these causes before remembred I saye, that for lake of yssue lawfully commynge of the late noble prince Richard duke of Yorke, to whose Royal bloud the crounes of England and of Fraunce, are by the high aucthoritie of Parliament entailed, the right and title of ỹ same is by iust course of enherytaunce accordyng to the common lawe of thys land, deuoluted and come vnto the moste excellent prince the lorde protectoure, as to the very lawfull begotten sonne, of the fore remembred noble duke of Yorke. Whych thyng well consydered and the knightely prowesse wyth many vertues whych in hys noble persone syngulerlye dooe habound: The nobles and commons of this realme, and specyally xxx of the North partes, not willing any bastard bloud to haue the rule of the land, nor the abusyons in the same before vsed and exercysed anye longer too continue, haue fully condiscended and vtterly determyned to make humble petycyon vnto the puysant Prince the Lorde protectour, that it may like hys grace at our humble requeste, too take vpon hym the guydyng and gouernaunce of thys realme, to the wealth and increace of the same, accordyng to hys very ryght and iust title, whych thynge I wot wel he wylbe loth to take vpon hym as he whose wysedome wel perceyueth, the labour and study bothe of mynde and bodye that shal come therwyth to hym, whosoeuer shall occupy that rome. I xl dare say he wyl yf he take it (for I warrant you that that that rome is no childes office) and that the great wyse man wel perceyued when he sayed (Væ regno cuius Rex puer est, wo to that realme whose kyng is a chylde, wherfore, so much more cause haue we to thanke God, that this noble personage, which is so ryghtoully entitled therto is of a sad age, & ther to of so great wysedome, ioyned wyth so great experience, which albeit he wylbe lothe as I haue sayd to take vpon him, yet shall he too our petition in that behalf the moze graciously encline, yf ye the woꝛshypfull citezens of this citie being the chiefe citie of the realme ioyne wyth vs ỹ nobles in our sayed request, which foꝛ your owne weale we doubte not but that ye wyll. And yet neuertheleſſe, we pꝛay you so to do, whereby ye shall do great pꝛofyt to all this his realme: Beſyde that, in choſynge them so good a kinge, it shalbe to your self a speciall commoditie to whō his maiestie shal euer after, beare so much the moze tēdze fauour, in how much he shall perceyue you the moze pꝛone and beneuolentely mynded towarde hys eleccion: wherein dere frendes, what mynd you haue we ꝓ require you plainely to shew vs. When the duke had sayed and loked that the people whome he hoped that the Maire hadde framed befoze, shoulde after this flatteryng pꝛeposicion made, haue cryed kynge Richard, kyng Richard, al was styl and mute and not one woozde answered to: wher wyth the duke was meruelously abaſshed, and takyng the Mayze nere to him, wyth other that wer about him pꝛiuy to ỹ matter, sayed vnto theim softely. What meaneth this, that the people be so stil.

Sir, quod the Maire, percase they perceyue you not well, that shall we amend quod he, if that wyl helpe, and ther with somwhat louder reher-sed thesame matter again, in other oꝛdze and other woꝛdes so well and ꝓ oꝛnately, and neuertheleſſe so euydently and playn, wyth voyce, gestur and countenaũce so comely ⁊ so conuenient, that euery man much marueyled that harde him and thought that they neuer hard in their liues so euyll a tale so well told. Bnt wer it foꝛ wonder oꝛ feare, oꝛ that eche loked that other should speake fyꝛst, not one woꝛd was ther answered of all the people that stode befoze, but al were as styll as the midnyght, not so much as rounyng emong them, by which they myght seme once to common what was best to do. When the Mayze sawe this, he wyth other parteners of the counsayll, dꝛew about the duke and sayd that ỹ people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken to, but by the Re-coꝛder, which is the mouthe of the citie, and happely to him they wyll ꝓ answere. Wyth that the Recoꝛder called Thomas Filz Willyā, a sadde manne and an honest, which was but newlye come to the office, and neuer had spoken to the people befoze, and loth was wyth that matter to begyn, notwithstanding, there vnto commaunded by the Maire, made reherſall to the commons of that whych the duke had twyse purposed hym self, but ỹ recoꝛder so tẽpered hys tale, that he shewed euery thing as the duke hys woozdes were, and no part of hys owne, but all thys no chaunge made in ỹ people, whych alway after one stode as they had bene amased. Where vpon, the duke rouned wyth the Maire and said, this is a merueylous obstinate scilence, and therewyth turned too the ꝓ people agayne with these woꝛdes. Dear frendes, we come to moue you to that thing whiche paraduenture we so greately neded not, but that the loꝛdes of this realme and commons of other partes might haue ſufſiſed, sauynge suche loue we beare you, and so muche set by you, that we

woulde not gladly do wythout you, that thyng in whiche to be parteners is your weale and honoure, whych as to vs semeth you se not or waye not: Wherfore we requyre you to geue vs an answere, one or other, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the realme be, too haue this noble prince now protector to be your kyng. And at these wordes the people began to whisper emōg them selfes secretely, that the voyce was neyther loude nor baise, but like a swarme of bees, tyl at the last, at the neither ende of the hal a bushement of the dukes seruauntes & one Nashfeelde and other belongyng to the protectour with some prentices and laddes, that thrusted into the hal emongest the preace, begā sodainly at mennes backes to crye out as lowde as they could, kyng Richard, king Richard, and there threw vp their cappes in token of ioye, and they that stode before cast backe their heddes marueyling therat, but nothing they sayed. And when the duke and the Mayre saw thys maner, they wysely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly crye & a ioyful to heare euery man wyth one voyce and no man saiyng nay. Wherfore frendes (quod the duke,) sith we perceyue that it is all your whole myndes to haue thys noble man for your king, wherof we shall make his grace so effectuall reporte that we doubt not, but that it shall redounde to your great wealth and commoditie. We therfore requyre you that to morow ye go wyth vs and we wyth you to his noble grace to make our humble peticion and request to him in maner before remembred. And therwith the lordes came doune and the compaignie dissolued & departed the more part al sad, some with glad sembleaunce that were not very mery, and some of them that came wyth the duke, not hable to dissemble their sorow, were fain euen at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolour of their hartes brast out of their yies.

Then on the morow the Maire and aldremē and chief commoners of the citie in their best maner appareled, assemblyng them together at Paules, resorted to Baynardes castle, where the Protectour laye, to which place also accordynge to the appointment repaired the duke of Buckyngham and dyuerse nobles wyth hym, besydes many knightes and gentlemen. And therupon the duke sent woorde to the Lord protectour of the beyng there of a great honourable compaygny, to moue a greate matter to his grace. Wherupon the protectour made greate difficulte to come doune to theim, except he knewe some parte of their errande, as though he doubted and partely mystrusted the commynge of such a nombre to hym so sodainly, wythout any warnynge or knowledge, whether they came for good or harme. Then when the duke had shewed this to the Maire and other, that they might thereby se howe lytle the protectour loked for this matter, they sent agayn by the messenger such louing message, and therwyth so humbly besought hym to vouchsafe that they might resort to hys presence to purpose their entent of which they would to none other persone any part disclose. At ỹ last he last he came out of his chambre, and yet not doune to theim, but in a galary ouer them with a byshop on euery hand of him, where they beneth might se him and speake to him, as though he would not yet come nere theim tyl he wist what they meant. And therevpō the duke of Buckingham first made humble peticion to him on the behalfe of theim al, that hys grace would pardon theim and licence them to purpose vnto hys grace the entent of their commyng wythout his displeasure, wythout which pardon obteyned, they durst not be so bold to moue him of that matter. In which, albeit they meant as muche honour to hys grace as wealth to all the realm beside, yet were they not sure how hys grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. Then the protector as he was very gentle of hym self and also longed sore apparantly to know what thei meant, gaue him leaue to purpose what him lyked, be-rely trustyng for the good mynd that he bare them al, none of thē any thyng woulde entende to him ward, wherwyth he thought to be gre-ued. When the duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then wered he bold to shew hym their entent and purpose, wyth all the causes mo-uyng theim therto, as ye before haue heard. And finally, to beseche his grace that it would like him of his accustomed goodnesse and zeale vnto the realm now wyth his yie of pitie to behold the long contynued di-stresse and decaie of the same, and to set his gracious hand to ỹ redresse and amendement therof by takynge vpon hym the croune and gouernaunce of the realme accordyng to hys right and title lawfully discen-ded vnto him, and to the laud of God, profite & surety of the land & vnto his grace so muche the more honor and lesse pain, in that that neuer prince reygned vpon anye people that were so glad to lyue vnder hys obeysaunce as the people of thys realme vnder his.

When the protector had heard the proposicion, he loked very strangely therat, and made answer, that albeit he knew partely the thyngs by theim alleged to be true, yet such entiere loue he bare to kyng Edward and hys chyldren, & so much more regarded hys honour in other realmes about, then the croune of any one, of which he was neuer desyrous, so that he could not fynd in hys hert in this poinct to encline to their desyre, for in al other nacios where the truth wer not wel knowē, it shoulde paraduenture be thought that it were hys owne ambicious mynd and deuyse to depose the prince and to take hym selfe the croune, wyth which infamy he would in no wise haue his honor steined for any croune, in which he had euer perchaunce perceiued much more labour and peyn, then pleasure to him that so would vse it as he ỹ woulde not and wer not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding, he not onely pardoned them of the mocion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and harty fauour they bare hym, prayyng them for his sake to beare the same to the prince vnder whom he was and would be cōtent to lyue, and wyth his labour & counsayll as far as it should like the king to vse it, he woulde doo hys vttermoste deuoier to sette the realme in good

good estate which was al redy in the lytle tyme of his protectourshyp, (lauded be God) wel begon, in that the malice of such as were before ỹ occasion of the contrary and of new entended to be, were now partely by good policy, partely more by God his speciall prouidence, then mannes prouision, repressed and put vnder.

Upon thys answere geuẽ, the duke of Buckynghã by the protector his lycence a litle rounded, as wel wyth other noble men about him as with the Maire and recorder of London. And after ỹ (vpon like perdõ desired and obteyned) he shewed aloude vnto ỹ protectour, for a fynall x conclusion that the realme was apoynted that kyng Edward his lyne should no longer reigne vpon them, both that they had so far gone that it was now no suretie to retreate (as for that thei thought it for ỹ weal vniuersal to take ỹ way, although thei had not yet begon it.) Wherfore if it would like his grace to take the croune vpon him, they would hũbly beseche him thereunto, & yf he woulde geue thẽ a resolute answere to the contrary (which they would be loth to here) then must they seke and shoulde not fayle to fynd some other nobleman that would. These wordes much moued the protector, which as euery man of small intelligence may wit, woulde neuer haue enclyned therto: but whẽ he sawe xx there was none other way but that he must take it, or els he and hys both to go from it, he sayed to the lordes and commons, sythe it is wee perceyue wel that all the realme is so set (wherof we be very sory) that they wyl not suffre in any wyse kyng Edward his line to gouerne thẽ, whom no man earthely can gouerne against their wylles: And we also perceiue that no manne is there to whome the crowne can by so iust title appertayne as to our selfe as very right heire lawfully begottẽ of the body of our most dread and dere father Richard late duke of Yorke to which tytle is now ioyned your election, the nobles and commõs of the realme, which we of al tytles possible take for moste effectuall, wee xxx be content and agre fauourably to encline to your peticion and request and accordynge to the same, here we take vpon vs the royall estate of preheminence and kyngedome of the twoo noble realmes, England & Fraunce, the one from this day forwarde by vs and our heires to rule gouerne and defende, the other by God his grace and your good helpe to get again, subdue and establysh for euer in dewe obedience vnto this realme of Englande, the auauncemente wherof we neuer aske of God longer to lyue then we entende to procure and sette furth. Wyth this there was a greate cry and shoute, cryng kyng Richard, and so ỹ lordes went vp to the kyng, and so he was after that daye called. But the xl people departed talkynge dyuersely of the matter, euery man as hys fantasye gaue him, but much they marueyled of this maner of dealing, that the matter was on both partes made so straunge, as thoughe neuer the one part hath communed wyth the other parte thereof before, when they wyste that there was no manne so dul that heard theim, but he perceyued well ynough that all the matter was made betwene thẽ.

Howebeit

Howbeit, som excused that again, saiyng: al thing must be done in good ordre, and menne must somtyme for the maner sake not bee aknowen, what they knowe. For at the consecracyon of a byshoppe, euery manne perceyueth by payment of hys bulles that he entendeth to be one, yet when he is twyse asked whether he wyl be a byshop, he must twyse say nay, and at the third tyme take it vpon him as compelled therto by his owne wyll. And in a stage playe, the people knowe ryght well that he that playeth in sowdayne, is percase a souter, yet if one of acquaintaūce perchaunce of litle nurture should call him by his name whyle he standeth in his maiestie one of his tormentours might fortune breake hys r head for marryng the play. And so they sayd, these matters be kynges games, as it were stayge playes, and for the most part playd vpō scaffoldes, in whyche poore menne bee but lokers on, and they that wyse be, wyll medle no ferther, for they that steppe vp wyth them whē they cannot play theyr partes, they dysorder the playe and do theim selues no good.

FINIS.

¶ The tragicall doynges of Kynge Richard the thirde.

x TO the I am to remembre, but more I abhore to write, the miserable tragedy of thys infortunate Prince, which by fraude entered, by tyrannye proceded, and by sodayn deathe ended his infortunate life: But yf I shoulde not declare the flagicious factes of the euyll Princes, alwell as I haue done the notable actes of verteous kinges, I shoulde neither animate, nor incourage rulers of royalmes, Countreyes & Seigniories to folowe the steppes of their profitable progenitors, for to attayne to the type of honour and worldly fame: neither yet aduertise Princes beinge proane to vice and wickednes, to aduoyde and expell all synne and mischiefe, for dread of obloquy and worldly shame: for contrary set to contrary is more apparaunt, as whyte ioyned with black, maketh the fayrer shewe: Wherefore, I wyll procede in his actes after my accustomed vsage.

Richard the third of that name, vsurped the croune of Englande & xx openly toke vpon him to bee kyng, the nyntene daie of June, in the yere of our lord, a thousand foure hundred. lxxxiij. & in the. xv. yere of Lewes the leuenth then beeyng French kyng: & the morow after, he was proclaymed kyng and with great solempnite rode to Westminster, and there sate in the seate roiall, & called before him the iudges of ỹ realme straightely commaundyng theim to execute the lawe without fauonre or delaie, with many good exhortaciõs (of ỹ which he folowed not one) and then he departed towarde the Abbaye, and at the churche dore he was mett with procession, and by the abbot to hym was deliuered the scepter of saincte Edwarde, & so went and offered to saincte Edwarde xxx his shrine, while the Monkes sange Te Deum with a faint courage, and from the churche he returned to the palaice, where he lodged till the coronacion. And to be sure of all enemies (as he thoughte) he sent for fiue thousand men of the North against his coronaciõ, which came vp in euill appareled and worse harneissed, in rusty harneys, neither defensable nor skoured to the sale, which mustered in Finesbury felde, to the great disdain of all the lookers on.

The fourth daie of July he came to ỹ towre by water with his wife, and the fifth daie he created Edward his onely begotten sonne, a childe of. x. yere olde, prince of wales, & Jhon hawarde, a man of great knowxl lege and vertue (alwell in counsaill as in battaill) he created duke of Norffolke, and sir Thomas Hawarde hys sonne he created erle of Surrey, and Willyam Lorde Barkeley was then created erle of Notingham, and Fraunces lorde Louell was then made Vicount Louel, and the kynge his chamberlain, and the lorde Stanley was deliuered oute of warde for feare of hys sonne the lorde Straunge, whiche was then in Lancasshire gatherynge menne (as menne sayed) and the saied lorde was made Stuarde of the kynge hys houshoulde, likewyse the Archebishop of Yorke was deliuered: but Morton bishop of Eley, was deliuered to the duke of Buckyngham, to kepe inwarde, whiche sente hym to hys manoure of Brecknoke in Wales, from whence he escaped to kynge Richarde his confusion. The same night the kynge made seuentene knightes of the Bath. The nexte daye he roade through London with greate pompe, and in especiall the duke of Buckyngham was richely appareled and hys horse trapped in blewe beluet enbroudered wyth the naues of cartes burnyng of gold: whyche trapper was borne by fotemen from the grounde, with suche solemne fassion that all men muche regarded it.

On the morowe beeyng the sixt day of July, the kyng came toward hys coronacion into Westminster hall, where hys chapell and all the prelates mitered receiued hym. And so they in ordre of processiō passed forwarde: After the procession folowed therle of Northumberlande wyth a poincteless sword naked, and the lord Stanley bare the Mace of the constableshippe. Therle of Kent bare the seconde swordе on the righte hande of the kynge naked. The Lorde Louell bare an other swordе on the lefte hand. Then folowed the duke of Suffolke with the scepter, and the erle of Lyncolne with the ball and crosse. After theim folowed the newe erle of Surrey with the swordе of estate in a riche skabard. On the right side of him wente the duke of Norfolke bearyng the crowne: then folowed Kyng Richarde in a Circot & robe of purple beluet vnder a canabie borne by the Barones of the fyue portes, goyng betwene the Bishoppes of Bathe and Duresme. The duke of Buckingham wyth the rode of the high stuarde of Englande bare the kyng hys train. After hym folowed therle of Huntyngdon, berynge the quenes scepter, and the Vicount lisle, bearyng the rode wyth the doue, And the erle of Wilshire bare the quenes croune. Then folowed quene Anne daughter to Richard erle of Warwike in robes like to the kyng, betwene two Byshoppes, and a canabie ouer her head, borne by the Barones of the portes. On her head a riche coronall sette with stones and pearle. After her folowed the countesse of Richemond heire to the duke of Somerset, whiche bare vp the quenes trayne. After folowed the duchesse of Suffolke and Norfolke with countesses', baronesses, ladies, & many faire gentle women: in this ordre they passed throughe the palayce, and entred the Abbaye at the Weste ende, and so came to their seates of estate. And after diuerse songes solemply songe, they bothe discended to the highe altare and were shifted from their robes,

and had diuerse places open from the middle vpward, in whych places they were anointed. Then bothe the kynge and the Quene chaunged theim into clothe of golde and ascended to their seates, where the cardinall of Cauntorburye and other Bishoppes theim crowned accordynge to the olde custome of the realme, geuynge hym the scepter in the lefte hande and the balle wyth the crosse in the right hande, and the quene had the scepter in her right hande, and the rode wyth the doue in the lefte hande: On euery side of the kynge stoode a duke, and before hym stoode the erle of Surrey wyth the swearde in hys handes. And x on euery side of the quene standynge a bishoppe and a ladye knelynge. The Cardinall song the masse, and after paxe, the kynge and the quene discended, & before the high altare they were bothe houseled with one hoste deuided betwene theim. After masse finished, they bothe offered at saincte Edwarde hys shrine and there the kynge lefte the crowne of saincte Edward, & putte on hys owne crowne. And so in ordre as they came they departed to Westminster hall, and so to their chambres for a ceason, duryng whyche tyme the duke of Norffolke came into the hall hys horse trapped to the grounde in clothe of golde as high marshall, & voyded the hall.

xx Aboute foure of the clocke the kyng and quene entred the hall, & the kyng satte in the midle, and the quene on the lefte hande of the table, & on euery side of her stoode a countesse holdynge a clothe of pleasaunce, when she liste to drynke. And of the right hande of the kynge satte the bishop of Cauntorbury, the ladies satte all on one side in the middle of the hall, and at the table against them satte the Chauncelloure and all the lordes. At the table next the cupborde satte the Maire of London. And at the table behinde the lordes, satte the Barones of the portes. And at the other bordes satte noble and worshipful personages. When all persones were sette, the duke of Norfolke erle Marshall, the erle of xxx Surrey constable for that daie, the lord Stanley lorde Stewarde, sir William Hopton treasourer and sir Thomas Percy comptroller came in and serued the kyng solemply with one dishe of gold and another of siluer. And the quene all in gylte vessell, and the Bishop all in siluer. At the secõde course came into the hall, sir Robert Democke the kyng his champion, makynge a proclamacion, that whosoeuer woulde saye that kynge Richard was not laufully kynge, he woulde fighte with hym at the vtteraunce, and threwe downe his gauntlet: & then al the hal cried kyng Richard. And so he did in three partes of the hall, and then one brought hym a cup with wine couered, & whẽ he had dronke he cast out xl the drynke, and departed with the cup. After that, the herauldes cried Largesse thrise in the hall, and so went vp to their staige. At the ende of diner, the maire of London serued the kyng & quene with swete wyne, and had of eche of theim a cuppe of golde with a couer of golde. And by that tyme that all was doen, it was darke night: And so the king returned to his chambre, and euery manne to his lodgyng. When this feaste was thus finesshed, the kynge sente home all the Lordes into their countrees that woulde departe, excepte the lorde Stanley, whom he reteyned tyll he harde what his sonne the lorde straunge went aboute. And to suche as wente home, he gaue straighte charge and commaundemente to see their countrees well ordred, and that no wrong nor extorcion shoulde bee doen to hys subiectes. And thus he taughte other to execute iustice and equitee, the contrarye wherof he dayly exercised: he also with greate rewardes geuen to the Northrenmen whyche he sent for to hys coronacion, sente theim home to their countree wyth greate thākes. Whereof diuerse of theim, (as they all be of nature very gredy of autoritee, and speciallye when they thynke to haue anye comforte of fauoure,) tooke on theim so hyghly & wroughte suche mastries, that the kynge was fayne to ride thether in his firste yere, and to putte some in execucion, and staye the countree, or els no small mischiefe had ensued. x

Incontinente after thys, he sente a solempne Ambassade to Lewes the Frenche kynge, to conclude a league and amitie wyth hym, trustynge also to obtayne the tribute whiche kynge Edwarde hys brother had before out of Fraunce, but the Frenche kynge so abhorred hym and hys crueltie, that he would neither se nor heare hys Ambassadors, & so in bayne they returned. xx

Nowe after this triumphante coronacion, there fell mischifes thicke and thicke, and as the thynge euill gotten is neuer well kept, so throughe all the tyme of his vsurped reigne, neuer ceased there cruell murther, death and slaughter, till his awne destruction ended it. But as he finished with the best deathe and moste rightewyse, that is to saye his awne, so beganne he with the mooste piteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocente nephewes, the younge kynge and hys tendre brother, whose death and finall fortune hath neuertheless so far come in question that some remained longe in doubte whether they were in his dayes destroied or no. Nor for that that Parkin warbek by many folkes malice, and mo folkes folly so longe space abusynge the worlde, was aswell with princes as with poore people reputed and taken for the younger of these twoo: But for that also that all thynges were so couertely demeaned, one thynge pretented & another mente, that there was nothyng so plaine and openlye proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couerte dealyng, menne had it euer inwardly suspecte, as many well counterfet iewelles make ỹ true mistrusted. Howbeit, concernynge that opinion, men maye se the conueighaunce thereof in the lyfe of the noble prince kyng Henrye the.vij. in the processe of Parkyn. But in the meane season, for thys presente matter I shall reherse to you the dolorous ende of these two babes, not after euery way that I haue harde, but after that waye that I haue so hard by suche men and suche meanes as me thinketh it to be hard but it shoulde be true. xxx xl

Kyng

The destruc tion of kyng Edwardes children.

Kyng Richard after his coronacion, takyng his waye to Glouceſter, to viſite in his newe honour ỹ towne, of whiche he bare the name of old, deuiſed as he roade to fulfill that thyng which he before had intended. And for aſmuch as his mynd gaue him that his nephewes liuyng, men woulde not recon that he coulde haue right to the realme: he thoughte therefore without delaie to rid them, as though the killyng of his kynſmen mighte ende his cauſe, and make hym kyndely kyng. Where vpon he ſent Jhon Grene, whō he ſpecially truſted, vnto ſir Robert Brakenbury conſtable of the tower, with a letter & credence alſo, that the ſame x ſir Robert in any wyſe ſhould put the two childrē to death. This John Grene dyd his errand to Brakenbury, knelyng before oure lady in the Towre, who plainly anſwered that he woulde neuer put thē to deathe to dye therefore. With the which anſwere Grene returned, recōptyng the ſame to kyng Richard at Warwyke yet on his iourney, wherewith he toke ſuche diſpleaſure and thoughte, that the ſame night he ſayde to a ſecrete page of hys: Ah, whom ſhall a man truſte? they that I haue brought vp my ſelfe, they that I went woulde haue mooſt ſurely ſerued me, euen thoſe fayle me, and at my commaundemente wyll do nothyng for me. Syr quod the page, there lieth one in ỹ paletchambre wyth out xx that I dare well ſay, to do your grace pleaſure ỹ thing were right hard that he would refuſe, meanyng this by James Tirel, which was a man of goodly perſonage, & for the giftes of nature worthye to haue ſerued a muche better prince, yf he had well ſerued God, & by grace obteyned to haue as muche trueth and good wyll, as he had ſtrength and wytt. The man had an high harte and ſore longed vpwarde, not riſyng yet ſo faſt as he had hoped, beynge hindered and kepte vnder by Richarde Ratcliffe and ſir Willyam Cateſbye, which longyng for no more partners of the Princes fauour, namely not for him, whoſe pride thei knewe woulde beare no pere, kept him by ſecrete driftes out of al ſecrete truſt:
xxx which thynge this page had well marked and knowen: wherefore, this occaſion offered of very ſpeciall frendſhip ſpied his tyme to ſet him forwarde, & in ſuche wyſe to do him good, that all the enemies that he had (except the deuil) could neuer haue done him ſo much hurte and ſhame, for vpon the pages woordes, kyng Richard aroſe (for this communication had he ſittyng on a drafte, a conuenient carpet for ſuche a counſail) and came out into the palet chambre, where he dyd fynde in bed the ſaid James Tyrell and ſir Thomas Tyrell of perſone lyke and brethren of bloud, but nothyng of kynne in condicions. Then ſayd the kyng merely to them, what lyes, be you in bed ſo ſone? & called vp James Tyrel, and xl brake to him ſecretely his mynd in this miſcheuous matter, in ỹ whiche he found him nothing ſtraung. Wherfore on the morowe he ſent him to Brakynbury with a letter by the which he was cōmaunded to delyuer to the ſayd James all the keyes of the Towre for a night, to thend that he might there accompliſhe the kynges pleaſure in ſuche thynges as he there had geuen him in cōmaundement. After which lettre deliuered & the keyes receyued, James appoincted the next night ensuynge to de-stroye them, deuisyng before and preparyng the meanes.

The prince assone as the Protectour toke vpon hym to be kynge, & left the name of protectoure, was thereof aduertised & shewed that he shoulde not reigne, but his vncle shoulde haue ỹ croune. At which word the prince sore abashed begaune to sighe and sayd: Alas I would myne vncle wold let me haue my life although I lese my kyngedome. Then he that tolde hym the tale bled him with good wordes and put hym in the beste confort that he coulde, but furthe with he & his brother were bothe shut vp, and all other remoued from them, one called blacke Wyl, or Wylliam Slaughter onely except, whiche were set to serue them, & iiij. other to see them sure. After whych tyme, the prince neuer tyed his pointes, nor any thyng roughte of hym selfe, but with that young babe his brother lyngered in thoughte & heuines, tyll this trayterous dede deliuered them of that wretchednes.

For James Tirrell deuised that they shoulde be murthered in their beddes, and no bloud shed: to the execution wherof, he appoincted Myles Forest one of the foure that before kepte them, a felowe flesche bred in murther before tyme: & to him he ioyned one John Dighton his awne horsekeper, a bygge broade square & strong knaue. Then all the other beyng remoued from them, this Miles Forest and John Dighton about mydnight, the sely children lyng in their beddes, came into ỹ chaũbre and sodenly lapped them vp amongest the clothes & so bewrapped them and entangled them, kepyng doune by force the fetherbed & pillowes harde vnto their mouthes, that within a while they smored & stykled them, & their breathes failyng, they gaue vp to God their innocent solles into the ioyes of heauen, leauyng to ỹ tourmẽtours their bodies dead in the bed, which after the wretches perceyued, firste by the strugglyng, with the panges of death, & after long lyng styl to be throughly dead, they layd the bodies out vpon the bed, and fetched James Tirrell to see them, which when he sawe thẽ perfightly dead, he caused the murtherers to burye them at the stayre fote, metely deepe in the groũd vnder a great heape of stones.

Kynge Edwardes chil dre murthered.

Then rode James Tirrell in great hast to kyng Richard, & shewed him all the maner of the murther, who gaue him great thankes, and as men saye, there made hym knighte, but he allowed not their buriall in so vile a corner, saiyng that he would haue them buried in a better place because they were a kynges sonnes: Lo ỹ honorable courage of a king, for he would recõpence a detestable murther with a solempne obsequy. Wherupon a priest of sir Robert Brakenburies toke them vp & buried them in suche a place secretely as by the occasiõ of his death (which was very shortely after) which onely knewe it, the very trueth could neuer yet be very wel and perfightly knowen. For some saye that kynge Richard caused the priest to take them vp and close them in leade & to put them in a coffyne ful of holes hoked at the endes with .ij. hokes of yron,

and so to cast them into a place called the Blacke depes at the Themes mouth, so that they should neuer rise vp nor be sene agayn. This was ỹ very trueth vnknowē by reason that ỹ sayd preist died so shortly & disclosed it neuer to any person that would vtter it. And for a trueth, whē sir James Tirrell was in the Towre for treason committed to kynge Henrye the seuenthe: bothe he & Dighton were examined together of this pouncte, and both they confessed the murther to be done in the same maner as you haue hard, but whether the bodies were remoued, they bothe affirmed they neuer knewe. And thus as I haue learned of them x that muche knewe & litle cause had to lye, were these two noble princes these innocente tendre children, borne of the mooste royall bloude and brought vp in great wealthe, likelye longe to liue, to reigne and rule in the realme, by trayterous tirannye taken and depriued of their estate, shortely shut vp in prison and priuely slaine and murthered by the cruell ambicion of their vnnaturall vncle and his dispiteous tourmentours: whiche thynges on euery parte well pondered, God gaue this worlde neuer a more notable example, either in what vnsurety standeth this worldes weale, or what mischiefe worketh the proude enterprise of an highe harte, or finallye, what wretched ende ensueth suche dispiteous xx crueltie. For fyrst to begynne with ỹ ministers, Myles Forest, at sainct Martyns le graunde by pece meale miserably rotted awaye, John Dighton lyued at Caleys long after, no lesse disdayned and hated then pointed at, & there dyed in great misery: But sir James Tyrrel was beheaded at the Towre hyll for treason: And kynge Richarde him selfe was slaine in felde hacked and hewen of his enemies handes, haried on a horsbacke naked beyng dead, his heere in dispite torne & tugged lyke a curre dogge. And the mischiefe that he toke with in lesse then thre yeres, of the mischiefe that he dyd in thre monethes be not comparable, & yet all the meane tyme spente in muche trouble & payne outwarde, and xxx muche feare, dread and anguishe within. For I haue harde by credible reporte of suche as were secrete with his chamberers that after thys abhominable deed done, he neuer was quiet in hys mynde, he neuer thought hym selfe sure where he wente abroade, hys body priuely feinted, hys eyen wherled aboute, hys hande euer on hys dagger, his countenaunce & maner lyke alwaies to strike againe, he toke euill reste on nightes, laye longe wakyng & musyng, forwearied with care & watche, rather slombred then slept, troubled wyth fearefull dreames, sodeynly somtyme stert vp, leapte out of his bed and loked about the chambre, so was hys restlesse harte continually tossed & tombled with the tedious xl impression and stormy remembraunce of his abhominable murther and execrable tyrannye.

The end of ỹ murtherers of kyng Edwards chyldren.

From the beginnyng of kynge Edward ỹ fifte: hereto, is of sir Thomas Mores penning.

Kynge Richard by this abominable mischyefe & scelerous act, thinkyng hym selfe well releuyd bothe of feare & thought, would not haue it kept counsail, but with in a few daies caused it to ronne in a common rumor that ỹ. ij. chyldren were sodanlie dead, & to this entent as it is to be demyd that now, none heyre male beyng a liue of kynge Edwardes body lawfully begotten, ỹ people would be cõtent with the more paciẽt hart, & quiet mynd, to obey him & suffer his rule and gouernaunce: but when ỹ fame of this detestable facte was reueled, & debulged through the hole realme, ther fell generally, such a dolor & inward sorow in to ỹ hartes of all the people, that all feare of hys crueltie set a syde, they in euery towne, streate, & place openlie wept, & piteously sobbyd. And whẽ their sorowe was sumwhat mitigate, ther inwarde grudge coulde not refrayne but crye out in places publike, & also priuate furiously saieng, what creature of all creatures is so malicious and so obstinate an ene- x mye either to God, or to christian religion, or to humayn nature, whych woulde not haue abhorred, or at the least absteyned from so miserable a murther of so execrable a tirannye. To murther a man is much odious, to kyll a woman, is in manner vnnaturall, but to slaie & destroye inno- cent babes, & young enfantes, the whole world abhorreth, & the bloude from the earth crieth, for vengaunce to all mightie God. If the commõ people cried out, I assure you the frendes of the quene, and her childrẽ made no lesse exclamacion and complainte wyth loude voyce lamenta- ble crienge & sayenge. alas what will he do to other that thus shame- fully murdereth hys awne bloud with out cause or desert: whom, wyll x he saue when he slaith the poore lambes cõmitted to hym in trust: now we se & behold that the most cruell tyrannye hath inuadyd the common wealth, now we se that in him is neither hope of iustice nor trust of mer- cie but abundance of crueltie and thyrst of innocente bloude. But when these newes wer first brought to the infortunate mother of ỹ dead chil- dren yet being in sanctuary, no doubte but it strake to her harte, like the sharpe darte of death: for whẽ she was first enformed of the murther of her. ij. sonnes, she was so sodainly amasyd with the greatnes of ỹ cruel- tie that for feare she sounded and fell doune to the ground, & there laye in a great agonye like to a deade corps. And after that she came to her xxx memory and was reuyued agayne, she wept and sobbyd and with pite- full scriches she repleneshyd the hole mancion, her breste she pũcted, her fayre here she tare and pulled in peces & being ouercome with sorowe & pensiuenes rather desyred death thẽ life, calling by name diuers times her swete babes, accomptyng her self more thẽ madde that she deluded by wyle and fraudulente promises delyuered her younger sonne out of the sanctuarie to his enemye to be put to deah, thinkynge that next the othe made to God brokẽ, & the dewtie of allegiaũce toward her childrẽ violated, she of all creatures in that poyncte mas most seduced and dis- ceaued. After longe lamentacion, when she sawe no hope of reuengyng xl otherwyse, she knelyd downe and cried on God to take vengeaunce for the diceaptfull periurie, as who saide that she nothyng mystrusted, but once he would remember it. What is he liuynge that if he remember & beholde these. ij. noble enfantes without deseruing, so shamefully mur- thered, that wil not abhorre ỹ fact, ye & be moued & tormẽted with pitie

and mercie. And yet the woꝛlde is so fraile and oure nature so blynde that fewe be sturred with such examples, obliuiouslie foꝛgettynge, and littel cõsyderyng, that oftentimes foꝛ the offences by the parentes perpetrate and committed, that synne is punished in their lyne & posterite. This chaunce might so happen to this innocent childꝛen, because kinge Edward ther father and parent offended in staynyng his conscience: he made his solempne othe befoꝛe ỹ gate of the citie of Yoꝛke (as you haue harde befoꝛe) & promised and sware one thing by his woꝛde thinkynge cleane cõtrarie in his harte as after dyd appere. And afterward by the x deathe of the duke of Clarence his bꝛother, he incurred (of likelyhod) the great displeasure toward God. After this murther this perpetrated & ỹ he had visited his towne of Glouceste whych he foꝛ his olde dignitye bothe loued and with ample liberties and pꝛiuileges endewed & decorated, he toke his ioꝛney towarde ỹ countie of Yoꝛke, where the people abusyng his lawful fauoure (as he bothe fauoured and trusted them in his hart) had of late pꝛesumed to attempte diuers routes & riottes contrarie to his lawes and enfryngyng of his peace, and vpon hope of hys mayntenaũce, were so elated that no loꝛd were he neuer of so great power could either pacifie oꝛ rule them tyll the kyng him selfe came personally thether to set a concoꝛde and an vnitie in that countre and to bꝛidell and rule the rude rusticall and blusterynge bolde people of that re-xx gion, and so he by long iourneying came to the citie of Yoꝛke where the citezens receyued hym with great pompe and triumphe, accoꝛdyng to the qualities of their education & quantitie of there substaunce & habilitie, and made diuers daies playes and pageantes in token of ioy & solace. Wherefoꝛe kyng Richard magnified & applauded of the noꝛthren nacion, & also to shewe hym self apparantlie beforе them in habyte royal with scepter in hande and diademe on his hed, made pꝛoclamacion that all personnes should resoꝛte to Yoꝛke on the daie of the assencion of oure xxx loꝛde where all men shoulde bothe beholde and se hym hys quene and pꝛince in there high estates and degrees and also foꝛ their good wylles should receyue many thankes, large benefites and munificente rewardes. At the daye appointed the hole clergie assembled in copes richelye reuested and so with a reuerent ceremonie went aboute the citie in pꝛocession, after whome folowed the kinge with his croune & scepter appareilled in his circot robe royall accompaignied with no small nomber of ỹ nobilitie of his realme: after whom marched in oꝛder quene Anne his wife likewyse croumed ledinge on her lefte hande Pꝛynce Edward her sonne hauing on his hed a demy crowne appoyncted foꝛ the degree of a xl pꝛince. The kyng was had in that triumphe in suche honouꝛ & the common people of the noꝛthe so reioysed that they extolled and pꝛaysed hym far aboue the starres. After thys solempne feaste and gloꝛious pompe he kepte greate counsailles there, as well foꝛ the oꝛderynge of the countree in tyme to come, as foꝛ the bꝛydellynge and punyshinge of suche as there hadde mysgouerned them selfes: and farther of the gentilmen

gentilmen of that contrie, he augmented the nomber of hys domestical ministers & seruauntes, in the whych persones he put his whole trust & affiaunce. When all thinges were thus discretely ordered, he returned by Nothyngham, & after came to London: whome more for dread then for loue, the Cytezens receaued in greate compaygnies. Thus kynge Richard by a new inuented crueltie and late practised tyrannye obteyned and grewe to high prayse and honoure, and then by the admiracion and iudgemente of the common multitude, he was moste estemed to be exalted in to heauē, when he couertly had intelligēce, that he was like to lose his estate and could by no meanes haue long contynuaunce p in his vsurped power: for assuredly after the death of kyng Edwards chyldren when any blusteringe wynde perelous thunder or terrible tempest, chansed or were apparantly like to happen: So dainly the people hauinge in there freshe memorie the facinorous acte of these kynge and prince, woulde openly crye and make vocyferacion that God dyd take vengaunce and punishe the pore Englishemen, for the cryme and offence of there vngracyous kynge, whome they blamed, accursed and wysshed to haue extreme tortures. Although kyng Richard harde oftē of this slaunderous wordes and malicious saiynges and knewe wel by what persons they were spokē, yet he dirst not with strong hande be on pp the fyrste inuentours reuenged, knowing that some tyme it is no wise-dome to refuse or disdaigne them that tell a ruler his deutie or declare to hym his mysbehauoure toward the cōmon wealthe, or counsaill him to amende and chaung his yll life. After this great felicitie, he fell again in to a great feare and penciuenes of mynde, and because he coulde by no meanes either correct or amēd thinges that were passed, he determined by doyng his deutie in all thynges to hys cōmons, to obliterate & put oute of memorie that note of infamie with ẏ whiche his fame was iustely spotted and stayned, and to cause the people to conceyue so good an opinion in him, that from thēce forth no calampyte nor trouble should ppp be adiudged to happen to the cōmon wealth, either by his negligence or by his misgouernaunce (although it is difficile and strange shortelye to tourne and plucke out suche qualities and vsages as haue of longe tyme ben encorporate in a mans mynde and rooted in hys maners and condicions.) Therfore whether it was for the performaunce of his former entent of amendement, or (as the common fame shewe a brode) ẏ he toke repentaunce of hys myscheuous actes and scelerate doynges, he tourned ouer the leffe, and began an order of a new life, and pretended to haue the name of a good & vertuous man, by the reason that he shewed hym selfe more iuste, more meker, more familiar, more liberal (espe- pl cially amongest the poore people) then before he had accustomed to do, and so by this meanes he firmely trusted fyrst to obteyne of god forge-uenes of his offences and crymes, and after to leuie and take away the enemye & inwarde grudge that the common people bare in their myndes towarde hym, and in conclusion, to obteigne their frendelye loue

and assured fauour. He farthermore began & enterprised diuers thinges aswel publike as priuate, the which he beyng prevented by sodayne deathe dyd neither accomplishe nor bryng to conclusion, for he begon to founde a college of a hundreth prestes, which foundacion with the founder shortely toke an ende. To please the common people also, he in hys high courte of parliamente enacted dyuers and sondrie good lawes & profitable estatutes and in especiall one againste strangers and forein wrought wares, not to be transported in to this realme, which commodius acte for the common wealthe yf he had lyued he fully purposed to x haue auaunsed & set forwarde & put in execucion. But afterwarde euidently to all persones it appeared, that onely feare (which is not a maister long in office and in continuall aucthoritye) and not iustice, caused kynge Richarde at that verye tyme to waxe better & amende his synnefull life, for shortelie the goodnes of the man which was but paynted and fraudulent, sodainlye wexed coulde and banished awaie. And from thence forth not onely all his counsailles, doynges and procedynges, sodainlye decayed and sorted to none effecte: But also fortune beganne to froune and turne her wheele doune ward from hym, in so muche that he lost his onely begotten sonne called Edward, in the.iij. moneth, after xx he had created hym prince of Wales.

AND shortelye after, The.ij. yere he was vnquieted by a conspiracye, or rather a confederacye betwene the duke of Buckyngham and manye other gentlemen agaynste hym as ye shall heare: But the occasion why the duke & the kyng fell out, is of diuerse folke diuerslye pretended. This duke as you haue harde before, assoue as the duke of Gloucester after the death of Kynge Edwarde was come to Yorke, and there had solempne funerall seruice done for kynge Edward, sent to him a secret seruaunte of his called Persall, with such xxx messages as you haue harde before. And after the duke of Buckyngh̃ came with. CCC. horse to Northampton and styll cõtinued wyth him, as partener and chiefe organe of his deuices tyll after hys coronacion, they departed to all semyng very frendes at Gloucester. From whence assone as the Duke came home, he so highlye turned from hym and so highly conspired againste hym, that a man woulde marueyll wherof the chaunge grewe in so shorte space. Some saye thys occasyon was, that a litle before the coronacion, the duke required the kyng amongest other thynges to be restored to the erle of Herfordes landes: And forasmuche as the lytle whyche he claymed by inheritaunce, was some-xl what interlaced, wyth the tytle of Lancaster, whyche house made a title to the croune, & enioyed the same thre discentes, as all men knewe, tyl the house of Yorke deprived the third kyng, whiche was Henry the sixte, Kynge Richarde some what mistrusted and conceiued suche an indignacion, that he reiected the dukes requeſt, with many ſpitefull, & minotary wordes, whyche ſo wounded the dukes harte with hatred & miſtruſt, ỹ he coulde neuer after endure to loke right on kyng Richard but euer feared his awne lyfe, ſo farre forth, that when the Protectour ſhould ryde to his coronaciõ, he feigned him ſelfe ſicke, becauſe he would do him no honoure. And the other taking it in euill part, ſent him word to ryſe and ryde or he woulde make hym to be caried. Wherupon, gorgeouſly apparelled, and ſumpteouſly trapped with burnyng carte naues of golde embrodered he roade before ỹ kyng through Londõ with an euill will and wooꝛſe harte. And that notwithſtandinge, he roaſe the daye of the coronacion from the feaſt, feignynge hym ſelfe ſicke, whyche kynge Richard ſayd was done in hate & ſpighte of hym. And therefore men ſayd that eche of them euer after lyued continually in ſuch hatred and diſtruſt of other, that the duke loked verely to haue bene murthered at Glouceſter, from whiche he in fayre maner departed: but ſurely ſuche as were righte ſecrete with bothe, affirme all this to be vntrue & other wyſe men thynke it vnlykelye, the deepe diſſymulynge nature of bothe theſe menne wel conſidered. And what nede in that grene woꝛld the protectoure had of the duke, and in what perell the duke ſtode yf he fell once in ſuſpicion of that tyraunt, that either the protectour woulde geue the duke occaſyon of diſpleaſure, or the duke the protectour occaſion of myſtruſte. And ſurely men thynke, that if kyng Richard had any ſuche opininon conceyued in him, he woulde neuer haue ſuffered him to auoyd his handes or eſcape his power: but very true it is, that the duke of Buckyngham was an highe mynded man, & euyll coulde beare the glory of another, ſo that I haue heard of ſome that ſaw it, that he at ſuch tyme as the croune was ſet vpon the protectours hed, his eye could neuer abyde the ſight therof, but wryed his hed another way: but mẽ ſaid he was not well at eaſe, & that was bothe to kyng Richard well knowẽ and well taken, nor any demaunde of the dukes requeſt vncurteouſlye reiected, but gently deferred, but bothe he with great giftes & high behestes in moſte louynge and truſtye maner departed from the kynge to Glouceſter. Thus euery man iudged as he thought, but ſone after his commyng home to Brekenocke, hauyng there by kyng Richardes cõmaundement doctor Morton biſhoppe of Ely, who before as you haue harde was taken at the coũſaill at the towre, waxed with hym very familier, whoſe onely wyſedom abuſed his pride, to his owne deliueraũce and the dukes diſtruction. The byſhop was a man of greate naturall witte, very wel learned and of honourable behaueour, lackyng no wiſe wayes to wynne fauoure. He was fyrſt vpon the parte of kyng Henry, whyle that parte was in wealthe, and neither lefte it nor forſoke it in no woo, but fled the realme with the quene & the prynce. And whyle kinge Edward had kyng Henry in priſon, he neuer returned but to the felde at Barnet: After which felde loſt and vtterly ſubdued and all parte takynges extynguiſhed, kyng Edward for his faſt fayth and wyſedome, as not

was not onely contente to receyue hym, but also wooed him to come, and had hym from thens forthe bothe in secrete truste and speciall fauoure, whom he nothynge deceyued. For he beynge after kynge Edwardes death fyrst taken by the tyraunte for his truethe to the kynge, founde the meane to set the duke in his toppe, & ioyned gentlemen together in ayde of the earle of Richemonde, whych after was named kyng Henry the seuenth: Fyrste deuisynge the mariage betwene the lady Elizabeth daughter to kynge Edwarde the fourth, by the whyche hys faythfull & true seruice declared to bothe his maisters at once, was an infinite be-x nefite to the realme, by the coniunctiō of the bloudes of Lancaster and Yorke, whose funeral titles had long iniquieted the realme. This man afterwarde escaped from the duke and fled the realme, & neuer returned, and went to Rome, neuer myndyng to medle with the worlde, tyll kynge Henry the seuenth sent for him, and after made him Archebishop of Cauntorbury and Chauncelloure of Englande, and after was made Cardinall, and liued well to all mens iudgementes and died well. But to retourne to the former purpose, he by the longe and often alternate proofe, as well of prosperite as aduerse fortune, had gotten by greate experience the very mother and mastres of wisedom, and depe inslighte xx in pollitike & worldly drifte, wherby perceiuyng now the duke to common with hym, fed hym with fayre wordes and many pleasaunte prayses, and perceiuynge by the grefe of their communicacions the dukes pryde nowe & then to balke out a litle brayde of enuy toward the glory of the kynge, and thereby felynge hym easye to fall out yf the matter were well handeled, he craftely sought ỹ wayes to prycke him forward takynge alwayes the occasyon of his commyng, and also keppynge hym selfe close within his bandes that he rather semed to folowe hym then to leade hym. For when the duke beganne fyrste prayse and boaste the kynge and shewe howe muche profite the realme shoulde take by hys xxx reigne: Bysshop Morton answered, surely my lord, folye it were for me to lye, for I am sure yf I woulde swere the contrarie ye would not once beleue me, but if the worlde woulde haue begone as I would haue wyshed, that kynge Henries sonne had had the crowne and not kynge Edwarde, then would I haue bene his true and faithful subiecte, but after that God had ordeyned hym to lose it, and kyng Edwarde to reigne, I was neuer so madde with a dead man to striue against the quik, so was I euer to kyng Edward a faithfull and true chapeleyn and glad would haue bene that his children should haue succeded him, howbeit yf the secret iudgemēt of God haue otherwise prouided, I purpose not to spur-xl ne againste ỹ pricke, nor laboure to set vp that God pulleth doune. And as for the late protector and nowe kynge: & with that worde he lefte, sauynge that he said that he had already medled to much with the world and would from that day medle with his boke and beades, and no further. Thē longed the duke sore to heare, what he would haue sayd, because he ended with the kyng, and there so sodaynly stopped, and exhorted hym familierly, betwene them bothe to be bolde and to saye whatso euer he thoughte, whereof he faithefully promised there shoulde neuer come hurte, and paraduenture moze good then he woulde wene. And that he hym selfe entended to vse his faithefull secrete aduice and counsayle, whiche he sayd was the onely cause foz the whiche he procured of the kynge to haue him in his custodye, where he might recon him self at home, oz els he had bene put in the handes of thē with whom he shoulde not haue founde like fauour. The byshoppe right humblie thanked him and sayd, in good faythe my lozde, I loue not muche to talke of princes as of a thyng not all out of perell, although the wozd be without faute, & but yet it must be as it pleaseth ỹ prince to cōstrue it. And euer I thinke on Isopes tale, ỹ when the Lyon had proclaymed that on pain of death there should no hozned beastes come into the woode, one beast that had a bonche of flesche growyng out of his heade, fled a greate pace: the foxe that sawe him flye with all the hast, asked him whether he fled: In faith quod he, I neither wote ne recke, so I were once hence, because of ỹ proclamacion made agaynst hozned beastes. What foole quod the foxe, the Lyon neuer ment it by the, foz that whiche thou haste is no hozne in thy heade. No mary quod he, I wote that well ynough, but yf he say it is a hozne, where am I then: The duke laughed merely at the tale & sayde, & my lozde I warraunte you, neither the Lyon noz the boze shall pycke any matter af any thyng here spoken, foz it shall neuer come nere their eares. In good faith, syz said the byshop, if it dyd, the thyng that I was aboute to say taken aswell as befoze God I mente, it could deserue but thanke, and yet taken as I wene it woulde, might happen to turne me to lytle good and you to lesse.

Then longed the duke muche moze to wete what it was, whereupō the bishop sayd. In good faith my lozde, as foz the late protectoure, sith he is nowe kyng in possession I purpose not to dispute his title, but foz ỹ wealthe of this realme, whereof his grace hath nowe the gouernaunce & and whereof I my selfe am a pooze membze, I was aboute to wishe that to those good abilities wherof he hath alredy right many, litle neading my praise, yet might it haue pleased God foz the better stoze to haue geuen hym some of suche other excellente vertues mete foz the rule of the realme, as our lozd hath planted in the person of youre grace, and there lefte of agayne. The duke some what maruelyng at his sodaine pauses as though they were but parentheses, wyth a high coūtenaunce saied: my lozde I euidentelye perceyue & no lesse note your often bzeathynge and sodayne stoppyng in your cōmunicacion, so that to my intelligence your wozdes neither come to any dyzect oz perfect sentēce in conclusiō, & wherby either I myght perceyue & haue knowlege what your inward entent is now toward the kyng, oz what affectiō you beare toward me. Foz the comparyson of good qualities ascribed to vs bothe (foz the which I my selfe knowlege and recognise to haue none, noz loke foz no prayse of anye creature foz the same) maketh me not a lyttell to muse

thynkynge that you haue some other preuie Imagynacion, by loue or by grudge engraued and emprinted in your harte, whiche for feare you dare not or for childesshe shamefastnes you be abashed to disclose and reuele, and especially to me beynge your frende, whyche on my honoure do assure you to be as secrete in this case as the deffe and dumme person is to the singer, or the tree to the hunter. The bysshoppe beynge somewhat boulder, consyderynge the dukes promyse, but moste of all animated and encouraged because he knewe the duke desyerous to be exalted and magnified, and also he perceyued the inwarde hatred and x pryuie rancor which he bare towarde kyng Richarde, was now boldened to open his stomacke euē to the bery bottome, entending therby to compasse howe to destroye and vtterly confounde kyng Richarde, and to depryue hym of hys dignitee royall, or els to sett the Duke so a fyer with the desyer of ambicion, that he hym selfe might bee safe and escape out of all daunger and perell, which thinge he brought shortely to conclusion bothe to the kynges destruction and the dukes confusion and to his awne sauegarde, and fynally, to his high promocion. And so (as I sayed before) vpon truste and confidence of the dukes promyse, the bishoppe saied: my synguler good Lorde sithe the tyme of my captyxx uitee, whych beyng in your graces custodie I maye rather call it a liberall libertie more then a straight emprysonmente, in a boydynge ydelnes mother and norissher of all vices, in redynge bookes and aunciente pamphletes I haue found this sentence wrytten, that no man is borne free and in libertie of him selfe onelye, for one parte of duetie he oweth or shoulde awe to his parentes for his procreacion by a verye naturall instincte and filiall curtesie: another parte, to his frendes and kynsfolke, for proximitie of bloude and naturall amitie dothe of verie dewtye chalenge and demaunde: But the natiue coūtrye in the which he tasted fyrste the swete ayers of this pleasaunte and flatterynge worlde after xxx his natiuitie, demaūdeth as a debt by a natural bonde neither to be forgotten nor yet to be put in obliuion, whyche saiynge causeth me to consider in what case this realme my natiue countrye now staūdeth, and in what estate and assueraunce before this tyme it hathe contynued: what gouernour we now haue, & what ruler we myght haue, for I plainelye perceyue the realme beynge in thys case muste nedes decaye and be broughte to vtter confusion and fynall exterminion: But one hope I haue encorporate in my breaste, that is, when I consider and in my mynde do diligently remember, and dayly beholde youre noble personage, your iustice, and indifference, your feruente zele and ardente loue xl towarde your naturall contrey, and in lyke maner ỹ loue of your cōtrie towarde you, the great learnynge, pregnaunte witte and goodly eloquence, whyche so muche dothe abounde in the persone of youre grace, I muste nedes thynke this realme fortunate, ye twyse more then fortunate, whyche hath suche a prynce in store, mete and apte, to be a go-uernoure in whose persone beynge endued with so many princely qualities consisteth and resteth the very vndoubted similitude and image of trew honoure. But on the other syde when I call to memorye the good qualites of the late protectour & nowe called kynge, so violated & subuerted by tyrannie, so chaunged & altered by vsurped aucthorite, so clouded and shadowed by blynde and insaciable ambicion, ye and so sodainlye (in maner by a metamorphosis) transformed from politike ciuilitie, to detestable tyrannie: I must nedes saie and iustly affirme, that he is neither mete to be a kynge of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme mete to be gouerned by such a tyraunte: Was not his firste interprise to obtaine the crowne begonne and incepted by the murther of dyuers noble valiaunt trewe and vertuous personages: O a holy begynnyng to come to a myscheuous endynge, dyd he not secondarelye procede contrarie to all lawes of honestie, shamefully agaynst his awne naturall mother, beyng a woman of much honour, & more vertew, declaryng her openlie to be a woman geuen to carnall affectiō, & dissolute liuinge (which thynge yf it had bene trewe as it was not in dede, euery good and naturall child would haue rather mummed at, then to haue blasted a broade and especially she beyng a lyue.) Declarynge farthermore his .ij. brethren and his .ij. nephewes to be bastardes & to be borne in auoutrey, yet not with all this contente. After that he had obteyned the garlande for the which he so longe thirsted, he caused the two poore innocens his nephewes committed to hym, for especiall truste, to be murthered and shamefully to be kylled. The bloude of whych sely and lyttell babes dayly crye to God, from the earthe for vengaunce. Alas my harte sobbith, to remember thys bloudy boutcher & cruell monster, what suretie shall be in this realme to any person, other for lyfe or goodes vnder suche a cruell prynce, whyche regardeth not the destruction of his awne bloude, and then lesse the losse of other. And most especially as oftentymes it chaunceth, where a couetous or a cruell prince taketh suspicion, the smalest, swaruynge that is possible (yf the thynge be mysconstered) maye be the cause of the destruction of manye gyltles persones: and in especiall of noble and wealthy personages hauynge greate possessions and riches: Suche a Lorde is Lucifer when he is entred into the harte of a proude prynce, geuen to couetousnes and crueltye. But nowe my Lorde to conclude what I meane towarde your noble persone, I saye, and affirme, yf you loue God, your lynage, or youre natyue contrye, you muste yower selfe take vpon you the Crowne and Diademe of thys noble empyre, bothe for the mayntenaunce of the honoure of the same (whych so longe hath florished in fame and renowne) as also for the delyueraunce of youre naturall countreymen, from the bondage and thraldome (worse thē the captiuitie of Egypte) of so cruell a tiraunt and arrogante oppressor. For thus I dare saye, yf anye foren prynce or potentate, ye the Turcke hymselfe woulde take vpon hym

the regiment here and the crowne, the commons woulde rather admit and obey hym, then to lyue vnder suche a bloude supper & chyld kyller: but how muche moze ioyfull & glad would they be to lyue vnder youre grace, whome they all knowe to be a ruler mete & conuenient foz them, and they to be louinge and obedient subiectes mete to lyue vnder suche a gouernour: dispise not, noz forsake not so manifeste occasiō so louingly offered. And yf you youre selfe knowynge the payne and trauaill that apperteynyth to the office of a kynge, oz foz anye other consideracion, wyll refuse to take vpon you the Crowne and scepter of thys realme:

x Then I adiure you by the faithe that you owe to God, by your honour and by your othe made to Saincte George patron of the noble ordze of the gartier (whereof you be a compaignīō) and by the loue and affection that you beare to your natiue coutrey and the people of the same, to deuise some waie how this realme now being in miserie may by your high discrecion and pzyncelye policie, be brought and reduced to some suertie and conueniente regiment vnder some good gouernoūr by you to be excogitate: foz you are the verye patron, the only helpe, refuge, & confozte foz the poore amased and desolate commons of this realme. Foz yf you could either deuise to set vp again the limage of Lancaster oz xx auaunce the eldest doughter of kynge Edwarde to some highe & puyssaunte pzince, not onely the newe crowned kyng shall small tyme enioy the glozie of his dignitie, but also all ciuile war shoulde cease, all domesticall discozde should slepe, and peace, pzofite and quietnies shoulde be set fozth and embzased. When the bishoppe had thus ended his saiyng, the duke sighed and spake not of a great while, whiche soze abashed the byshop, & made him chaunge couler: which thing when the duke perceiued, he sayde, be not afrayde my Lozde, all pzomyses shalbe kept, to mozow we wyl cōmon moze: let vs go to supper so that night they commoned no moze, not a litle to the iniquietacion of the byshoppe, whyche xxx nowe was euen as desirous to knowe the dukes mynde and entent, as the duke longed the daye befoze to knowe his opinion and meanynge. So the nexte daye, the duke sente foz the byshop & rehersed to hym in maner (foz he was both e wyttie and eloquente) all the communicacion had betwene them befoze, and so pausled a whūe, and after a lytle ceason puttyng of hys boneth he sayde: O Lozde God creatoz of all thynges howe muche is this realme of Englande & the people of the same bounden to thy goodnes, foz where we now be in vexacion and trouble with great stozmes oppzessed sayling and tossyng in a desperate shippe without good maister oz gouernour: but by thy healp good lozde I truste oz xl long tyme passe that we shall pzouyde foz such a ruler as shalbe both to thy pleasure, and also to the securite & sauegarde of this noble realme. And then he put on hys bonett saiynge to the Byshoppe, my Lozde of Ely whose trewe parte & syncere affeccion towarde me at all tymes, I haue euidentlye percepued and knowen, & nowe moste of all in our laste pzeuie communicacion & secrete deuisyng, I must nedes in hart thinke and with mouthe confesse and saye, that you be a sure frende, a trustye counsailour, a vigilante forefear, a very louer of youre cõtrey, a naturall countreyman: for whiche kyndnes for my parte, I moste louinglye render to you my hartye thankes nowe wyth wordes: hereafter trustyng to recompence and remunerate you with dedes, yf life and power shall serue. And sithe at oure laste communicacion, you haue disclosed, and opened, the very secretes and priuities of your stomacke, touching the duke of Gloucester nowe vsurper of the crowne, and also haue a littel touched the auauncement of the.ij. noble famelyes of Yorke & Lancaster: I shall likewyse not onely declare and manifeste vnto you, al my open actes, attemptes and doenges, but also my preuie ententes, and secrete cogitacions. To the entent that as you haue vnbuckeled youre bogett of youre preuie meanynges, and secrete purposes to me: so shall all my clowdy worckyng, close deuises, and secrete imaginacions, be (as clere as the some) reueled, opened, and made lightesome to you. And to beginne, I declare: that when kyng Edwarde was disseaced, to whom I thought my selfe littell or nothynge beholden, (al thoughe we.ij. had maried two systers) because, he neither promoted nor preferred me, as I thoughte I was worthy & had deserued, nether fauored nor regarded me, accordynge to my degre and byrthe: For surelye I had by hym lytle aucthoritee, and lesse rule, and in effecte nothynge at all: whyche caused me lesse to fauore hys chyldren, because I founde small humanitie, or none in there parente. I then beganne to studye, and wyth mature deliberacion, to ponder and consyder, howe & in what maner this realme shoulde be ruled & gouerned. And fyrste I remembred an olde prouerbe worthy of memorye, that often ruithe the realme, where chyldren rule, and women gouerne. Thys olde adage so sanke, and settelled in my heade, that I thought it a great errour, & extreme mischyefe to the hole realme, either to suffer the younge kynge to rule, or the quene his mother to be a gouernour ouer hym, consyderynge that her brethren, and her fyrst children (all thoughe they were not extracte of highe and noble lynage) toke more vpon them, and more exalted themselues by reason of the quene, then dyd the kynges brethrene, or any duke in his realme: Which in conclusion turned to there confusion. Thẽ I beingperswaded whith my self in this poyncte, thought it necessarie bothe for the publique & profitable welth of this realme, and also for myne awne commoditye and emolumente, to take parte wyth the duke of Gloucester: whome I assure you I thoughte to be as cleane without dissimulacion, as tractable without iniurie, as mercifull wyth oute crueltie, as nowe I know hym perfectely to be a dissembler wythoute veritie, a tyraunte withoute petie, yea, & worse then the tyraunte phaleres, destitute of all truthe and clemencie: And so by my meanes, at the fyrste counsaill holden at London, when he was moste suspected of that thinge that after happened (as you my lorde knowe well ynough) he was made Protectoure and defender, bothe of the kynge and of the realme, realme,whyche aucthozite once gotten, & the two chyldzen partely by policie bzought vnder his gouernaunce, he beynge moued wyth that gnawyng and couetous serpent, desyered to reigne & neuer ceased pziuelie to exhozte & require (yea & some tymes wyth minatozie termes) to persuade me and other lozdes alwell spirituall as tempozall, that he myghte take vpon hym the crowne, tyll the pzynce came to the age of foure and twenty yeres,and were able to gouerne the realme,as a mature and sufficient kynge: Whiche thynge when he sawe me some what stycke at, both foz the straungenes of the example (because no such pzex sidente had bene sene) and also because we remembzed that men once ascended to the highest type of honour & auctozite wyll not gladlye discende agayn, he then bzought in instrumētes,autentike doctours,pzoc-toures,and notaries of the lawe, with depositions of diuers wytnesses testifieng kyng Edwards chyldzen to be bastardes, whych depositions then I thought to be as a trewe,as now I knowe them to be fayned,& testifyed by persones wyth rewardes vntruelye suboznate. When the saide depositions were befoze vs redde and diligently harde, he stoode vp bare hedded saiyng: Wel my lozdes,euen as I & you sage & discrete counsailers woulde that my nephewe shoulde haue no wzonge: So I xx pzaie you do me nothynge but right. Foz these witnesses and saiynges of famous doctozs being trew, I am onely the vndubitate heire to lozd Richard plantagenet duke of Yozke, adiudged to be the very heire to the crowne of thys realme by aucthozitee of parliamente,whiche thyn-ges,so by learned men to vs foz a verite declared, caused me and other to take him foz our lawfull and vndoubted pzince and souereigne lozd. Foz well we knew ỹ the duke of Clarence sonne, by reason of ỹ attaynder of his father was disabled to inherite,and also ỹ duke hym self was named to be a bastarde,as I my selfe haue harde spoken, and that vpon greate pzesumpcions moze tymes then one: so agayn by my ayde & fa-xxx uour,he of a pzotectour was made a kyng,and of a subiecte made a go-uernour,at which tyme he pzomysed me on his fidelite,laiyng his hand in myne at Baynarde Castel,that the.ij. young pzinces should lyue,and that he would so pzouide foz them,and so mayntaine them in honozable estate,that I & all the realme ought & shoulde be content. But when he was once crouned king,and in full possession of the hole realme,he cast a way his olde cōdicions as ỹ adder doth her skynne, berefienge the olde pzouerbe,honoures chaunge maners, as the pariche pzest remembzeth that he was neuer pariche clerck. Foz when I my selfe sued to him foz my part of the Earle of Hartfozdes landes whiche hys bzother kynge xl Edward wzongefully deteyne and with helde from me,and also required to haue the office of the highe constable shyppe of Englande, as di-uers of my noble anunceters befoze this tyme haue had, and in longe discente continued. In thys my fyzste suyte shewynge his good mynde towarde me, he dyd not onelye fyzste delaye me, and afterwarde de-nay me,but gaue me suche vnkynde woozdes, wyth suche tauntes and retaun-

retauntes ye in maner checke & checke mate to the vttermooste proffe of my paciẽce. As though I had neuer furthered him but hyndered him as though I had put him downe and not set hym vp: yet all these vngratitudes and vndeserued vnkyndnes I bare closlye & suffered paciẽtelie and couertly remembred, outwardely dissimulyng that I inwardelie thoughte, and so with a payncted countenaunce I passed the laste summer in his last compaignie, not withoute many faier promyses, but withoute any good dedes. But when I was crediblye enformed of the death of the.ij. younge innocentes, his awne naturall nephewes cõtrarie to hys fayth & promyse, to the whyche God be my iudge I neuer agreed nor condiscended. O lord, how my beynes panted, how my body trembled, & my harte inwardely grudged, in so muche that I so abhorred the sighte and much more the compaignie of hym, that I coulde no lenger abyde in his courte, excepte I shoulde be openly reuenged. The ende wherof was doutfull, and so I fayned a cause to departe, and with a mery countenaunce and a dispiteful harte I toke my leaue humbly of hym (he thinkyng nothyng lesse then that I was displeased) and so returned to Brecknock to you. But in ẏ iourney as I returned whether it were by the inspiracio of ẏ holy ghost, or by Melancolous disposicion, I had diuers and sundrie imaginacions howe to depriue this vnnaturall vncle, & bloudy bütcher, from hys royall seate, and princely dignitie. Fyrst I fantesyed that yf I list to take vpon me the croune, and imperiall scepter of the realme, now was the tyme propice and conueniẽt. For nowe was the waie made plaine, and the gate opened, and occasion geuen, whych now neglected, should paraduenture neuer take such effecte and conclusion. For I sawe he was disdaigned of the lordes temporall, execrate and accursed of the lordes spiritual, detested of all gentilmen, and despised of all the cõmunaltie: So that I saw my chaunce as perfectely as I sawe my awne Image in a glasse, that there was no person (yf I had ben gredy to attempte the enterprise) could nor should haue wone the ryng or got the gole before me. And on thys poynete I rested in imaginacion secretely w̃ my self. ij. daies at Tewkesberie. And from thence so iorneyng I mused & thought ẏ it was not best nor cõueniẽt to take vpõ me as a cõquerour, for then I knewe that all mẽ & especially the nobilite, would with all their power withstande me, both for rescuyng of possessions & tenours, as also for subuertyng of ẏ hole estat lawes and customes of the realme: Suche a power hath a conquerour as you knowe wellynough my lord. But at the laste, in all this doutfull case ther sprang a new braunche out of my hed, which suerly I thought should haue brought forthe fayer flowers, but the sonne was so hotte yl that they turned to dyye wedes, for I sodainly remẽbred that lord Edmond duke of Somersett my grandfather was with kyng Henrye the sixte in the.ij. and.iij. degrees from Jhon duke of Lancaster lawefully begottẽ: So that I thought sure my mother being eldest doughter to duke Edmond, that I was nexte heyre to kynge Henry the syxte of the houſe

houſe of Lancaſter. Thys title pleaſed well ſuche as I made pryuye of my counſaill, but muche more it encoraged my foliſhe deſyer, and eleuated my ambicious entente, in ſo much that I clerelye iudged, & in myne awne mynd was determynatly reſolued, that I was indubitate heyre, of the houſe of Lancaſter, and there vpon concluded, to make my fyrſte foundacion, and erecte my newe buyldinge. But whether God ſo ordeyned, or by fortune it ſo chaunced, while I was in a maſe, other to conclude ſodaynlye on thys title, and to ſette it open amongeſte the common people, or to kepe it ſecrete a while, ſe the chaunce: as I rode x betwene worceter and brigenorthe, I encountered wyth the ladye Margarete, counteſſe of Richemonde, nowe wyfe to the lorde Stanley, whyche is the very daughter and ſole heyre, to Lorde Jhon duke of Somerſett my graundfathers elder brother: Whych was as cleane out of my mynde as though I had neuer ſene her, ſo that ſhe and her ſonne the Earle of Richemonde be bothe bulwarcke and portecolice betweene me, & the gate, to entre into the maieſtie royall and gettynge of the crowne. And when we had commoned a litle concernynge her ſonne, as I ſhall ſhewe you after, and were departed, ſhe to oure ladye of worceter, & I towarde Shrewſberie: I thē newe chaunged & in maxx ner amaſed, began o diſpute wyth my ſelfe, litle conſideryng that thus my earneſt tytle was turned euen to a tittyll not ſo good as, eſtamen. Eftſones I imagened whyther I were beſte to take vpon me, by the election of the nobilite and commonaltie, whyche me thoughte eaſy to be done, the vſurpor kynge thus beynge in hatred and abhorred of this hole realme, or to take it by power, which ſtandeth in fortunes chaunce and difficile to be acheued and brought to paſſe. Thus romblynge and toſſynge, in the waues of ambiguitie, betwene the ſtone & ſacrafice, I conſidered fyrſte the office, deutie and payne of a kynge, whiche ſurely thinke that no mortall man can iuſtely, and truely obſerue, excepte he xxx be called elected and ſpeciallye appoyncted by God as kynge Dauid and diuers other haue been. But farther I remembred that yf I onte toke on me the ſcepter, and the gouernaunce of the realme: That of two extreme enemies I was dayly ſure, but of one truſty frend (which nowe a daies begone a pilgrymage) I was nether aſſuered nor credible aſſerteyned (ſuche is the worldes mutacion) for I manifeſtely perceyued that the daughters of kynge Edwarde and there alies, and frendes, whiche be no ſmall nomber, beynge bothe, for hys ſake muche beloued, and alſo for the great iniurie and manifeſte tyrannye done to them, by the newe vſurper, muche lamented, and pitied, woulde neuer xl ceaſe to barcke yf they cannot byte at the one ſyde of me. Semblable my coulyne the erle of Rychemonde, hys aydes and kynſfolke, whiche be not of lyttell power, wyll ſurelye attempte lyke a fierce grādhound, other to byte or to perce me on the other ſyde. So that my lyfe and rule, ſhoulde euer hange by a heare, neuer in quiete, but euer in doubte of deathe or depoſicion. And yf the ſayd .ij. linages of Yorke and Lantaster, whyche so long haue stryued for the imperiall Diademe shoulde ioyne in one against me, then were I suerly mated and the game gotte.

Wherfore I haue clerely determined, & wyth my selfe cõcluded, vtterly to relinquishe all suche fantasticall imaginacians concerning the obtey-nynge of the croune. But all suche plagues, calamities and troubles (whyche I feared and suspected) myght haue chanced on me yf I had taken the rule and regimẽte of this realme, I shall with a rereden mayne so make them rebounde to our commen enemye that calleth hym selfe kynge, that the beste stopper that he hath at tenyre shal not well stoppe without a faulte: for as I tolde you before, the countesse of Richemond in my returne from the newe named Kynge metynge me in the highe waye, prayed me fyrste for kinred sake, secondarilye for the loue that I bare to my grandfather duke Humfrey, whych was swoyne brother to her father, to moue the Kynge to be good to her sonne Henrye erle of Richemond, and to licence hym with hys fauor to returne again into England: and yf it were his pleasure so to do, she promised that the erle her sonne should mary one of kynge Edwardes daughters at the appoinctement of the kynge, without any thing to be takẽ or demaunded for the saide espousals, but onely the kynges fauour, whyche request I sone ouer passed and gaue her fayre wordes & so departed. But after in my lodgynge, when I called to memorie with a deliberate studie & dyd circumspectely ponder them. I fully adiudged that the holy ghost caused her to moue a thynge (the ende wherof she coulde not cõsider) bothe for the securitie of the realme as also for the preferemente of her childe & the destruction & finall confusion of the cõmon enemye kyng Richarde.
Whyche thing, she neither then thought I am sure as I by her wordes coulde make coniecture, nor I my selfe cast not her deuyer to be so profitable to the realme as I now do perceiue, but suche a Lorde is God, that with a litle sparcle he kyndelith a great fyer, & so fynally to declare to you the very conclusion to the whyche I am both bent and sette, my mynde is and my power & purse shall helpe, that the erle of Richemond very heyre of the house of Lancaster (in the querell of the which linage, both my father and grand father lost there lyues in battayle) shall take to wyfe lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to kyng Edward, by the whych mariage bothe the houses of Yorke and Lancaster maye be obteyned and vnite in one, to the clere stablyshement of the title to the crowne of thys noble realme. To whyche conclusion yf the mothers of bothe parties, and especially the erle hym selfe, and the ladye wyll agre, I doubte not but the braggynge bore, which with his tuskes raiseth euery mans skyn, shall not onelye be brought to confusion as he hath deserued but yet that this empire shall euer be certaine of an vndubitate heyre, and then shall all ciuile and intestyne warre cease, whych so longe hath continued to the paringe of many mens crownes, and this realme shalbe reduced agayne to quietnes renoune and glorye. Thys inuencion of the duke many men thought after, that it was more imagened for y inward hatred

tred that he bare to kynge Richard, then for any fauor that he bare to the erle of Richemond. But of suche doubtfull matter, it is not beste to iudge for errynge to farre from the mynd and entent of the auctor: But whatsoeuer he entẽded, this deuice once opened to king Richard was the very occasion, ẏ he was roũded shorter by the whole head, without attaynder or iudgemẽt. When the duke had sayd, the bishop which fauored euer the house of Lancaster, was wonderous ioyful, and muche reioysed to here this deuyce, for now came the wynd about euen as he would haue it, for all his imagynaciõ tended to this effect to haue king x Richard subdued, & to haue ẏ lines of king Edward, & king Hẽry ẏ. bi. agayn rayſed and auaunsed. But lord howe he reioysed to thinke how ẏ by this mariage the linages of Yorke & Lãcaster should be cõioined in one, to the very stedfastnes of the publique wealthe of this realme. And lest the dukes courage should swage, or hys mynd should agayne alter, as it dyd oftẽ before, as you may easely perceiue by his own tale. He thought to set vp all the sayles that he had, to the entent ẏ the shyp of hys pretensed purpose myght come shortly to some suer port: And sayd to the duke, my lord, sygh by Gods hygh prouision and your incõparable wysedome and policie, this noble conjunction is fyrst moued, xx now is it conuenient, yea and necessary to consyder, what personages and what frendes we shall firste make preuie of this hyghe deuice and politicke conclusyon. By my truethe quod the duke we wyll begyn wyth my lady of Richemonde therles mother, whyche knoweth wher he is, eyther in captiuitie or at large in Britain. For I harde saye ẏ the duke of Britayne restored him to liberty immediatly after the death of kyng Edward, by whose meanes he was restrayned. Syth yow wyll begyn ẏ way (sayd ẏ bishop) I haue an old frẽd wyth the coũtesse, a mã sobre, secret & well witted, called Reignold Bray whose prudẽt pollicie I haue knowẽ to haue cõpassed things of great importaũce, for whom xxx I shall secretely send, yf it be your pleasure, & I doubt not he wil gladly come, & ẏ with a good wyll. So wyth a littel diligence, the bishop wrot a letter to Reignold Bray requiringe him so to come to Brecknocke ẅ spede for great and vrgent causes touching hys maistresse: & no other thyng was declared in ẏ letter. So the messenger rode into Lãcashire where Bray was ẅ the coũtesse & lord Thomas Stanley her husband & deliuered ẏ letter, which whẽ he had red, he toke it as a signe or presage of some good fortune to come, & so ẅ the messenger he came to the Castel of Brecknock, where ẏ duke & the bishop declared what thynge was deuised both for to set ẏ realm in a quiet stedfastnes, as also for the xl high prefermẽt of ẏ earle of Richemond sonne to his lady & maystresse: Wylling her first to cõpasse how to obteyne the good will of quene Elizabeth, & also of her eldest doughter bearing ẏ same name: & after secretely to sẽd to her son into Britain to declare what high honor was prepared for hym, if he would swear to mary ẏ lady Elizabeth assone as he was king & in royall possession of the realme. Reignold Bray ẅ a glad hart for getting nothing geuen to him in charge in great hast and with good sped retourned to the countesse his lady & maistresse. Whē Bray was departed & this great doubtfull vessel once sette a broche, ỹ bishop thrustyng for nothing more then for libertie: whē he saw the duke pleasaunt and wel mynded, toward hym, he told the duke that yf he wer in hys yle of Ely he could make many frendes to ferther their enterprise, and if he wer there and had but .iiij. dayes warning, he lytle regarded the malice of kyng Richard, his coūtrey was so strong. The duke knew wel al this to be true, but yet loth he was that the bishop should depart for he knew wel that as long as the bishop was wyth him, he was sure ỹ of politique aduise, sage counsayll, and circumspect procedynge. And so he gaue the bishoppe fayre woordes, saiyng that he should shortely depart and that wel accompaygned for feare of enemies. The byshop beyng as wittie as the duke was wilie dyd not tarye tyll the dukes compaignie were assembled, but secretly disguysed, in a nyght departed (to the dukes great displeasur) and came to his see of Ely, where he found mony and frendes, and so sailed into Flandres, where he dyd the earle of Richemond good seruyce and neuer retourned agayn, tyll the earle of Richemonde after beyng kinge, sent for hym, and shortely promoted him to the sea of Cauntorbury. Thus the bishop wound him selfe from ỹ the duke, whē he had most nede of his ayde, for if he had tarryed styl, the duke had not made so many blabbes of his counsail, nor put so much cōfidence in the Welshmen, nor yet so temerariously set forward without knowledge of his frendes as he did, which thinges were his sodanie ouerthrowe as they that knew it, dyd reporte.

When Reignold Bray had declared his message, and preuy instruction to the countesse of Richemond his maistres, no meruel though she wer ioyous and glad, both of the good newes and also for ỹ obteining of such a high frend in her sonnes cause as the duke was, wherfore she willyng not to slepe this matter, but to farther it to ỹ vttermost of her ỹ power & abilitie, deuysed a meanes how to breke this matter to quene Elizabeth then beyng in sanctuary at Westminster. And therupon she hauing in her familie, at that tyme for the preseruacyon of her healthe a certaine Welshman called Lewes learned in phisicke, whiche for hys grauitie and experience, was well knowen and much estemed amōgest great estates of the realme: wyth whome she vsed somtime liberally & familyarly to talke, now hauynge opportunitie and occasion to breake her mind, vnto him of this weighty matter, declared that the time was come that her sonne should be ioyned in mariage with lady Elizabeth doughter & heire to king Edward, and that king Richard being takē & rl reputed of all men for the cōmon enemie of the realme, shuld oute of al honour and estate be deiected, and of his rule and kyngdom be clerely spoyled and expulsed: and required him to go to quene Elizabeth (with home in his facultie he was of counsayll) not as a messenger, but as one that came frendely to vysyte and consolate her, and as tyme and place

shoulde require to make her preuie of this deuyse, not as a thing concluded, but as a purpose by him imagened. This phisician did not long linger to accomplish her desyre, but w̄ good diligence repaired to ỹ quene beynge stil in the sanctuary at Westmynster. And whēhe saw tyme propice & conueniēt for his purpose, he said vnto her: Madame, although my imaginacion be very simple and my deuyce more foolishe, yet for the entier affeccyon that I beare toward you & your childrē, I am so bolde to vttre vnto you a secret & preuy conceit that I haue cast & compassed in my fantasticall brayne. When I well remembre and no lesse considre x the great losse and dammage that you haue susteyned by the death of your noble and louyng husband and the great doloure and sorowe that you haue suffred and tollerated by the cruell murther of your innocent children: I can no lesse do both of bounden deutie and christian charitie then daily to study and hourely ymagen not onely how to brynge your hart to comfort and gladnes, but also deuyse howe to reuenge ỹ rygh-teous quarel of you and your children on that bloudy bloudsupper and cruell tyraunt kyng Richarde. And fyrste considre, what battaill, what manslaughter, what mischief hath rysen in this realme by the dissenciō betwene the.ij. noble houses of Yorke and Lancaster, which.ij. famili-xx es (as I haue contriued) if they may be ioyned in one, I thynke, yea & doubt not but your line shalbe again restored to ỹ pristinate estate & degree, to your great ioye and comfort, and to the vttre confusion of your mortal enemie the vsurper kyng. You know very well madame, that of the house of Lancaster, the erle of Richemond is next of blud, which is lyuyng and a lusty young batcheler, and to the house of Yorke your doughters now are heires: yf you could agree and inuent ỹ mean how to couple your eldest doughter with the yōg erle of Richemōd in matrimony, no doubt but the vsurper of the realme should be shortly depo-posed, and your heire againe to her right restored.

xxx When the quene had heard this frendely motion (which was as far from her thought as the mā that the rude people say is in the moone) lorde how her spirites reuiued, and how her hert lept in her bodye for ioye and gladnes, And fyrst geuynge lawde to almightye God as the chief aucthor of her comfort, secondarely to maister Lewes as the deuyser of the good newes and tydyngs, instantely besought him that as he had bene the fyrst inuenter of so good an enterprise, ỹ now he would not relinquishe nor desiste to folowe the same: requiringe him farther (because he was apperteyning to the countesse of Richemond mother to the erle Henry) that he would with al diligēte celeritie resort to her xl then lodgyng in her husbandes place, within the citie of london, and to declare on the Quenes behalf to the countesse, that al the frendes and fautoures of king Edward her husband, should assyste and take parte wyth the erle of Richemond her sonne, so that he would take a Corpo-porall othe after the kingdome obteyned, to espouse and take to wyfe the lady Elizabeth her doughter, or els lady Cecyle, yf theldest daughter were not then lyuinge.

Maister Lewes wyth al dexteritie so sped hys busines that he made and concluded a finall ende and determinacyon of this enterpryse betwene the.ij.mothers,and because he was a phisician and out of al suspicion and misdemyng ,he was the common currer and daylye messenger betwene theim,ayding and setting forth the inuented conspiracye agaynst kyng Richard.So the ladye Margarete countesse of Richemond brought into a good hope of the preferment of her sonne made Reygnolde Bray her mooste faythefull seruaunte chiefe solicyter and preuye procurer of thys conspiracye,geuynge him in a charge secretely to enuegle and attracte suche persones of nobilite to ioyne with her and take her parte as he knew to be ingenious,faythefull,diligent and of actyuytye. Thys Reygnold Bray wythin fewe dayes broughte vnto hys lure,(fyrst of all taking of euerye person a solempne othe to be true & secret) syr Gyles Daubeney,sir Jhon Cheiney knyght,Richard Guylford and Thomas Rame esquyers and dyuerse other. The coũtesse of Richemond was not so diligent for her parte,but Quene Elizabeth was as vigilaunt on the other syde and made frẽdes and appoynted councelers to set forwarde and auaunce her busynes. In the meancesson the countesse of Richemond tooke into her seruyce Christopher Urswyke an honest and a wyse priest,and after an othe of hym for too be secrete taken and sworne,she bttred to him all her mynde and councell,adhibityng to him the more confydence and truth that he al his life had fauoured and taken part with kyng Henry the.vj.and as a special iuel put to her seruice by sir Lewes her Phisician. So the mother studious for ỳ prosperitie of her son appointed this Christopher Urswike to sayle into Britayne to the erle of Richemond and to declare & to demonster to him all pactes & agremẽtes betwene her & ỳ quene agreed & concluded:But sodainly she remẽbryng that ỳ duke of Buckyngham was one of the fyrst inuenters & a secrete founder of this enterprise,determined to sende some personage of more estimacion thẽ her chapelain and so elected for a messenger Hugh Cõwey esquier and sent hym into Britayne wyth a great some of her money to her sonne, geuing him in charge to declare to ỳ erle ỳ great loue & especiall fauor ỳ the most part of the nobilite of the realm bare toward him,the louing hartes & benenolent myndes which the whole comminaltie of their own frewyl frãkely offered and liberally exhibited to him, willing & aduising hym not to neglect so good an occasion apparantly offred,but wt all spede & diligence to addicte & setle hys mynd and full entencion howe to retourne home againe into England wher he was both wyshed & looked for,geuyng him farther monicion & councel to take land & arriual in ỳ principalitie of Wales,where he should not doubt to fynde both ayde, comfort & frendes.Richard Guylford least Hugh Conwey myght fortune to be takẽ or stopped at plimmoth,where he entended to take his nauigaciõ,sent out of kent Thomas Rame with the same instrucciõs:& both made

made ſuch diligence and had ſuch wynd and wether, ỹ one by land frō Caleis, and the other by water from plimmoth, that within leſſe thē an houre both arryued in the duke of Bꝛitaynes court and ſpake with the erle of Richemond, which from the death of kyng Edward went at his pleaſure and libertie, and to him counted and manifeſted the cauſe and effecte of their meſſage and ambaſſade. When the Earle had receyued thys ioyfull meſſage, whyche was the moꝛe pleaſaunte becauſe it was vnloked foꝛ, he rendꝛed to Jeſu hys ſauyoure hys mooſte humble and harty thankes, beyng in ferme credence and beleue that ſuch thynges x as he wyth buſy mynde and laboꝛyous entente had wyſhed and deſyred, coulde neuer haue taken any effect wythout the helpe and pꝛeferment of almighty God. And now beyng putte in comfoꝛt of hys longe longynge he dyd communicate and bꝛeake to the duke of Bꝛitayne all his ſecretes and pꝛeuy meſſages whych were to hym declared, aduertiſynge hym that he was entered into a ſure and ſtedfaſte hope to obteyne and get the crowne and kyngdom of the realme of England, deſyꝛynge him bothe of his good wyl and frendely help toward the acheuyng of hys offred enterpꝛyſe, pꝛomiſing him when he came to hys entended purpoſe, to rendꝛe hym agayne equall kyndnes and condygne xx gratulacyon.

Although the duke befoꝛe that daye by Thomas Hutton Ambaſſadoꝛ frō king Richard had both by money & pꝛayers ben ſolicit & moued to put agayne into ſafe cuſtody the erle of Richemonde, he neuertheleſs pꝛomyſed faythfully to ayde him, and his pꝛomes he truely perfoꝛmed.

The .iij. pere.

WHerupon the erle with al diligence ſent into England, again Hugh Conwey and Thomas Rame, which ſhoulde declare his commyng ſhoꝛtly into Englande, to thentente that all thinges whiche by councel myght be foꝛ his purpoſe pꝛouyded, ſhoulde be accelerate and haſted: and that all thynges doubtefull ſhoulde of his frendes be pꝛudently foꝛſene, in auoydynge all engyns and ſnares whych kyng Richard had oꝛ myght haue ſet in diſturbaūce of hys purpoſe, and he in the meane ceaſon would make hys abode ſtill in Bꝛitayne, tyll al thinges neceſſary foꝛ his ioꝛney were pꝛepared and xxx bꝛought in aredynes.

In the meane ceaſon the cheuetaynes of the conīuracyon in Englande began together manye enterpꝛiſes: Some in conueniente foꝛtreſſes put ſtrong garriſons. Some kept armed men pꝛeuely, to thentent when they ſhould haue knowledge of the erles landing, they wold begynne to ſturre vp the warre: Other dyd ſecretely moue and ſollicit the people to ryſe and make an inſurreccion: Other (emongeſt whome Jhon Moꝛton biſhop of Ely then beynge in Flaundꝛes was chiefe) by pꝛeuy letters and cloked meſſengers, did ſtur and inuite to this newe conīuracyon, al ſuch which they certeynly knew to haue a roted hatred

Although this great enterpryse were neuer so preuely handeled & so secretely emongest so circumspecte persones treated, compassed and conueyghed, yet knowledge thereof came to the eares of king Richard whyche wyth the sodayne chaunce was not a lytle moued and astonned. Fyrste because he had no host ready prepared and conscribed. Secondarely yf he should reyse an army so sodainly, he knewe not where to occurre and mete his enemies, or whether too go or where to tary. Wherfore he determined to dissimule the matter, as though he knewe nothinge tyll he had assembled hys host, and in the meane ceason either by the rumour of the common people or by the diligence of his explora- xx tours and espialles to inuestigate and search out all the councelles, determinacions, ententes and compasses of his close aduersaries, or elles by craftie pollecie to intercepte and take some person of thesame cõiuracion, considerynge that there is no more secrete nor hyd especyal then that whiche lurketh in dissimulacion of knoweledge and intelligence, or is hydden in the name and shadowe of countrefeicte humanite and feined kyndnes. And because he knewe the duke of Buckyngham too be the chiefe head and aid of the coniuracyon, he thought it mooste necessarye to plucke hym from that parte eyther by fayre promyses or open xx warre. Wherupon he addressed hys louyng letters to the duke, as full of mellifluous woordes, humanitie and familiarite as the interior cogitacyon and preuy meanyng was full of malice, rancor and poyson: geuyng farther in charge to the messenger that caryed the letter to promes to the duke on his behalfe golden hilles and syluer ryuers, and w all gentle and pleasaunt meanes to persuade and exhorte the duke to come to the courte. But the duke as wylie as the kynge, mystrustynge the fayre flatterynge woordes and the gaye promyses to him so sodainly wythout any cause offered, knowyng the crafty castes of kynge Richardes bowe, whych in diuerse affaires before tyme he had seue prac- xxx tised, requyred the king to perdon him, excusynge him selfe that he was so deseased in hys stomacke, that skante he coulde take either refeccio or rest. Kyng Richarde not beynge contente wyth thys excuse woulde in no wyse admitte the same, but incontinent directed to the duke other letters of a more rougher and hawter sort, not without minatorie termes, and checkyng woordes, commaundyng hym all excuses set apart to repaire wythout any delay to his royal presence. The duke made to ỹ messenger a determynat answer, that he would not come to his mortall enemy, whome he neyther loued nor fauoured: and immedyatlye prepared open warre agaynst hym, and perswaded all hys complyces xl and partakers that euery man shoulde in his quarter wyth all diligẽce reyse vp the people and make a commocion. And by thys meanes almooste in one momente Thomas Marques Dorcet came out of sanctuarye where he syth the begynninge of Richardes dayes had contynued, whose lyfe by the onely helpe of sir Thomas louell esquyer was

preserued from all daunger and perell in this tronbleous worlde, gathered together a great bande of menne in Yorkeshire. Sir Edward Courtney, & Peter his brother bishop of Excetter, reysed another army in denoushire and cornewal. In kente, Richarde Guylforde and other gentlemen, collected a great company of Souldioures and openly beganne warre. But king Richard which in the meane tyme hadde gotten together a great strength and puissance, thinking it not mooste for hys part benefycyall to dysparse and deuyde hys greate armye into small braunches, and partyculerely to persecute any one of the con-x iuracion by him selfe, determined all other beynge set a syde, wyth hys whole puyssance to set on the chiefe hed whyche was the duke of Buckyngham. And so remouinge from London, he tooke hys iourney towarde Salsbury, to the entente that in thys iourney he myght set on the dukes army, yf he myght knowe hym in any place encamped, or in ordre of battayl arayed. The king was skace .ij. dayes iourney from Salsbury, when the duke of Buckingham accompanied wyth a great power of wyld Welesshmen, whome he beynge a man of that courage and sharpe speche in maner against their willes had rather therto enforced and compelled by lordely and streite commaundemente then by xx liberall wages and gentle reteynour, whyche thinge was the very occasion why they lefte him desolate and cowardly forsooke hym. The duke wyth all hys power mersshed through the forest of deane entending to haue passed ỹ riuer of Seuerne at Gloucester, and therto haue ioyned in army with the courtneys and other Westernmen of his cõederacy & affinite, which yf he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great ieoperdie either of priuacion of his realme or losse of hys life or both. But se the chaũce, before he could attayne to Seuerne side by force of continuall rayne and moysture, the ryuer rose so high that it xxx ouerflowed all the countrey adioyning, in somuch that mẽ wer drowned in their beddes, houses with the extreme violẽce were ouerturned childzen were caried aboute the feldes, swimming in cradelles, beastes were drouned on hylles, whiche rage of water lasted contynuallye ten dayes, in somuch that in ỹ countrey adioyning they call it to this day, the great water, or the duke of Buckynghams great water. By thys inundacion the passages were so closed ỹ neyther the duke could come ouer Seuerne to his complices, nor they to hym, duryng the whyche tyme, the Welshmen lyngeryng ydele and wythout money, vitayle or xl wages, sodenly scaled and departed, and for all the dukes fayre promises, manaces and enforcementes, they wouldе in no wyse neyther goo farther nor abide. The duke thus abãdonned and left almost post alone was of necessitie cõpelled to flie, and in his flight was with this sodeyne fortune meruelously dismayed: and beyng vnpurueyed, what councel he should take and what waie he shoulde folowe, like a may in dyspeyre not knowyng what to do, of very truste and confydence conueyghed him selfe into the house of ~~Humfrey~~ Banaster his seruaunt beside shrewsburye, whome he had tendrely broughte vp, & whome he aboute all men loued, fauoured and trusted, now not doubting but that in hys extreme necessitie, he should fynde hym faythfull, secrete and trusty, entendyng there couertely to lurke tyll eyther he mighte reyse agayne a newe armye, or elles shortely to sayle into Britayne to the Earle of Richemond.

But when it was knowen to hys adherentes whyche were readye to geue battayle, that hys hoste was scaled, and had lefte him almooste alone, and was fled and could not be founde, they were sodaynly amased and stryken wyth a soden feare, that euery manne lyke personnes x desperate shyfted for hym selfe and fled, some went to sanctuarye and to solitarie places, some fled by sea, whereof the mooste parte within a fewe dayes after arryued sauelye in the duchye of Britayne. Emonge whiche nombre were these persones, Peter Courtney bishoppe of Excettre and sir Edmonde Courtney hys brother, by kynge Henrye the vij. after created Earle of Denoushire, Thomas Marques Dorcet, Jhon Lorde Welles, Sir Jhon Burchier, Sir Edmonde Wooduyle a valyaunte man in armes brother to quene Elizabeth, Sir Roberte Willoughby, Sir Giles Dabeney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Syr Jhon Cheyney and hys twoo brethren, Sir Wyllyam Barkeley, Sir xx Wylliam Brandon, and Thomas hys brother, Sir Rychard Edgcombe, all these for the mooste part beyng knightes, and Jhon Halwell, Edward Pownynges a pollytyke Capitayne. At thys very ceason Jhon Morton Bishop of Ely, and Cristopher Urswike Priest, and another company of noble men soiourned in Flaunders, and by letters and messengers procured manye ennemies agaynste kynge Richard, whyche bynge a bygylaunt yie, and a quycke remembraunce beinge newelye come to Salsburye, hauynge perfyght notyce and knowlege howe the Duke was fled, and howe hys complyces entended to passe oute of the realme. Fyrste he sent menne of warre to all the next portes and passages to kepe, streyghtly the sea coast, so that no person shoulde xxx passe outwarde nor take lande in the realme wythout their assent and knoweledge. Secondarely, he made proclamacion, that what person coulde shewe and reuele where the duke of Buckyngham was shoulde be highly rewarded, yf he were a bondman he should be enfraunchised and set at libertie, yf he were of fre bloude, he shoulde haue a generall perdon and be remunerate wyth a thousand poundes. Farthermore, because he vnderstode by Thomas Hutton, whiche as you haue heard was newely retourned oute of Britayne, that Fraunces duke of Brytayne not onely refused to kepe therle of Richemonde, as a prisonner at his contemplacion and for hys sake, but also was ready to aide and sucxl coure thesayd Earle wyth menne, money and al thinges necessarye for his transportyng into England. Wherfore he rigged and sent out shippes of war and furnyshed and decked wyth men and artillery, to skour and kepe that part of the sea that lieth against Britain, to thentent that yf the yf the erle of Richemond would auenture to saile toward England either he shoulde be taken captyue or be profligate and dryuen from the coast of Englande. And moreouer to thentent that euery coaste, waye, passage, and corner should be dylygently watched and kepte, he sette at euery dubious and suspected place men of warre, to seke, searche, and enquyre yf any creature coulde tell tydynges of the duke of Buckyngham or of anye of hys confederacyon, adherentes, fautoures or partakers.

While this Busy searche was diligently applied and put in execucio Rauf x ~~Homfrey~~ Banaster (were it more for fear of losse of lyfe and goodes, or attracted and prouoked by the auaricious desire of the thousand pou-1 des) he bewrayed hys geste and mayster to Jhon Witton then shryefe of shropshire, whych sodaynely wyth a stronge power of men in harnes apprehended the duke in a litle groue adioyning to the mansyon of ~~Ho-~~ Rauf ~~frey~~ Banaster, and in great hast and euyl spede conueighed hym appareled in a pilled blacke clocke to the citie of Salsburie, where kyng Richard then kept hys housholde.

Whether thys Banaster bewrayed the duke more for fear thē couetous, many men do doubt: but sure it is, that shortly after he had betraxx yed ỹ duke his maister, his sonne and heyre waxed mad and so died in a boxes stye, hys eldest doughter of excellent beautie was sodaynely striken wyth a foule leperye, his seconde sonne very meruelously deformed of his limmes and made decrepite, hys younger sonne in a small puddel was strāgled & drowned, & he being of extreme age arraigned & foūd gylty of a murther & by his clergy saued. And as for his thousand pound kyng Richard gaue him not one farthing, saiyng that he which would be vntrue to so good a maister wold be false to al other, howbeit some say ỹ he had a smal office or a ferme to stoppe his mouth withall.

The duke being by certayne of the kynges councel diligently vpon inxxx terrogatories examined what thynges he knew preiudicial to ỹ kings person, opened and declared frankely and frely all the coniuracio with out dissimulyng or glosyng, trustyng because he had truely & playnely reueled and confessed all thinges that were of him required, that he shoulde haue licence to speake to ỹ kyng which (whether it were to sue for perdon & grace, or whether he being brought to his presence would haue sticked him with a dagger as men then iudged) he sore desyred and required. But when he had confessed the whole facte and conspyracye vpon Alsoulen day wythout arreignemente or iudgemente he xl was at Salsoury in the open merket place on a newe Scaffold behedded and put to death. This death (as a reward) the duke of Buckyngham receyued at the handes of kyng Richard, whom he before in his affaires, purposes and enterprises had holdē, susteyned & set forwarde aboue all Godes forbode.

By thys all menne maye easelye perceyue that he not onely leseth bothe hys labour, traueyle and industrye, and ferther steyneth and spot-

ſpotteth his ligne with a perpetuall ignomynye and repꝛoche, whyche in euyl and miſchiefe aſſiſteth and aydeth an euyl diſpoſed perſon, conſyderynge foꝛ the mooſte part that he foꝛ hys frendelye fauoure ſhoulde receyue ſome greate diſpleaſure oꝛ infoꝛtunate chaunce. Beſyde that God of hys iuſtice in concluſion appoyncteth to him a condygne peyne and affliccion foꝛ his merytes and deſertes. Whyle theſe thyngs were thus handeled and oꝛdꝛed in England, Henry Earle of Richemonde pꝛepared an army of fyue thouſande manlye Bꝛytons, and foꝛtie well furnyſhed ſhyppes. When al thynges were pꝛepared in aredynes and the day of departinge and ſettynge foꝛwarde was appoynted, whiche was the. xij. daye of the moneth of October, in the yere of the incarnacyon of oure redemer. M. CCCC. LXXXV. and in the ſeconde yere of kyng Richardes reigne, the whole armye went on ſhypboꝛde and halſed vp their ſailes, and wyth a pꝛoſperous wynd tooke the ſea: but towarde night the wynd chaunged and the wether tourned, and ſo houge and terrible a tempeſte ſodaynly roaſe, that with the very power and ſtrength of ꝑ ſtoꝛme, the ſhippes were diſparcled, ſeuered and ſeparate aſondꝛe: ſome by foꝛce were dꝛyuen into Noꝛmandye, ſome were compelled to retourne agayne into Bꝛitayne. The ſhyppe wherin the Earle of Richemonde was, aſſocyate onelye wyth oue other barcke was all nyght toſſed and turmoyled. In the moꝛnynge after when the rage of the furyous tempeſt was aſſuaged, and the Ire of the bluſterynge wynd was ſome deale appeaſed, aboute the houre of none the ſame daye, the Earle appꝛoched to the ſouthe parte of the realme of England euen at the mouthe of the hauen of pole in the countie of doꝛcet, where he myght plainely perceyue all the ſe bankes and ſhoꝛes garniſhed and furniſhed wyth men of warre and ſouldyoures appointed and deputed there to defende hys arryuall and landynge as befoꝛe is mencyoned. Wherefoꝛe he gaue ſtreyght charge and foꝛe commaundemente, that no perſone ſhould once pꝛeſume to take land and goo too the ſhoꝛe, vntyll ſuche tyme as the whole nauye were aſſembled and congregate. And whyle he exſpected and lyngered taryeng foꝛ that purpoſe, he ſente oute a ſhyppe boate towarde the lande ſyde too knowe, whyther they whych ſtoode there in ſuche a nombꝛe, and ſo well furnyſhed in apparell defenſyue were hys capitall foes and ennemyes oꝛ elles hys frendes fautoures and comfoꝛters. They that were ſent in explocacyon and meſſage, were inſtantely deſired of the men of warre kepyng the coaſt (whyche thereof were befoꝛe inſtructed and admoniſhed) to diſſende and take lande, affirmyng that they were appoyncted by the duke of Buckyngham there to awayt and tary foꝛ the arriual and landyng of the erle of Richemond, and to conduicte ſafely to the campe where the duke not far of lay encãped wyth a populous army and an hoſt of great ſtrength and vigoꝛ, to thentent that the duke and the erle ioyning in puyſſauuces and foꝛces together, myghte pꝛoſecute and chace kyng Richard being deſtitut of men, and in maner deſperate

desperat and fugityue, and so by that meanes and their own laboures and industrie to obteyne the ende of their enterpryse which they had before begonne.

The erle of Richemond suspectyng their flatteryng requeste too be but a fraud (as it was in dede) after that he perceyued none of his shippes to apere in syght, he weyed vp his ancors and halsed vp hys sayles hauinge a prosperous and strenable wynd and a fresche gale sente euen by God to delyuer him from that perell and ieopardie, arriued safe and in securitie in the duchy of Normandy, where he to refreshe and solace x hys souldyoures and people, tooke hys recreacyon by the space of. iij. dayes, and clerely determined wyth parte of his companye to passe all by lande agayn into Britayne. And in the meane season he sente oratoures to the Frenche kynge called Charles the. viij. whyche newelye succeded hys father kyng Lewes the. xi. not longe before departed to God, requirynge hym of a safe conduycte and lycence to passe through hys countrey of Normandye into Brytayne. The younge kynge hauynge compassion of the myssortune and vnfortunate chaunce of the Earle of Richemonde, not onely gentlye graunted and assigned to him a passporte, but also liberally dysbursed and departed to hym a coueni-xx ent somme of moneye for hys conduicte and expenses necessarye in hys long iourney and passage. But the erle trusting on the Frenche kynges humanite aduentured to send his shippes home into Britayn, and to set forwarde hym selfe by lande on hys iourneye makinge no greate hast till hys messengers were retourned, whych beyng with ȳ benefite so comforted, and with hope of prosperous successe so encouraged, mersshed toward Britayne wyth all diligēt celeritie entendyng ther to cōsulte farther wit h his louers and frendes of his affaires and enterprises. Whē he was retorned agayn into Britayn he was certified by credible informaciō that ȳ duke of Buckingham had lost his heade & that xxx the Marques dorcet and a great nombre of noble men of England had a lytle before enquyred and serched for hym there, & were now retourned to Vānes. Whē he had hard these news thus reported, he fyrst sorowed & dolorously lamented the fyrst attempt and settyng forwarde of his frendes, & in especial of the nobylite not to haue more fortunatly succeded. Secondarely, he reioysed on the other part ȳ God had sent hym so many valiaunt and prudent captaynes to be his compaignions in hys merciall enterprises, trustyng surely, and nothing doubtinge in hys owne opinion, but that all his busynes should be wysely compassed and brought to a good conclusiō. Wherfore he determining wyth al di-xl ligēce to accelerate & set forward hys new begonne busynes departed to Renes, & sent certayne of his preuy seruytours to conduct & bring ȳ Marques and the other noble men to his presence. When they knewe that he was sauely re torned into Britayn, lord how they reioysed and applauded, for before that time they mysted him and knew not in what parte of the world to make inuestigacyon or searche for hym.

For

For they doubted, and no lesse feared least he had taken land in Englād, and fallen in the handes of kyng Richard, in whose person they knewe well was neyther mercy nor compassion. Wherfore in all spedy maner they galloped towarde hym, and him reuerently saluted, which meting after great ioye and solace and no small thankes and gratificacions geuen and tendred on bothe partes, they consulted and aduysedly debated and commoned of their great busynes and weighty enterprise, in ỹ whiche season the solempne feaste of the natiuite of our sauiour Christ happened, on which daye al thenglyshe lordes went with greate solēpnitie to the chiefe churche of the citie, and there eache gaue faythe and r promyse to other. The erle hym selfe fyrste tooke a corporall othe, and on hys honour promisyng that incontinente after he shoulde be possessed of the crouue and dignitie of the realme of Englande, he woulde be conioyned in matrymony wyth the lady Elizabeth doughter to kynge Edward the fourthe. Then all the companie sware to hym fealtie, and dyd to hym homage, as thoughe he hadde bene that tyme the crowned kynge and anoynted Prince, promisynge faythfully, and fermelye assurynge, that they woulde not onelye lese their worldely substaunce, but also be pryuated of their liues and worldly felycytie, rather then to suffre kynge Rychарde that tyraunt lenger to rule and reygne ouer thē. rr Whyche solempne othes made and taken, the Earle of Rychemonde declared and communycated all these doynges to Fraunces duke of Bretayne, desyrynge and mooste hartelye requyrynge hym to ayde hym wyth a greater army to conduycte hym into hys countrey, which so sore longed and looked for hys retourne, and to the whych he was by the more parte of he nobylytie and commynaltie called and desyred whiche (wyth Goddes ayde and the Dukes comfort) he doubted not in shorte tyme to obteyne, requiringe hym farther to prest to hym a cōuenyēt some of money, affirmyng that al such sommes of money which he had receyued of hys especyall frendes, were spent and exhausted in the preparacyon of the laste iourney made towarde Englande, whiche rrr sommes of money after his enterpryse once acheued, he in the word of a prynce faythfullye promysed to repaye and restore agayne. The duke promised him ayde and helpe vpon confydence wherof he rigged his shippes, and set forth his nauy well decked wyth ordinaunce, and warlykely furnyshed wyth al things necessary, to thentent to saile forward shortely, and to se no conuenient tyme slackely ouerpassed nor be pretermitted.

In the meane season, kyng Richarde apprehended in dyuerse partes of the realme certayne gentlemē of the earle of Rychemondes faction and confederacyon, which either entended to saile into Britayne pl towarde hym, or els at hys landynge to assiste and ayde hym. Emongeste whom, sir George Browne, syr Roger Clyfforde, and. iiij. other were put to execution at London, and syr Thomas Sentygler which had maried the duches of Exceter the kings owne suster, and Thomas

Rame

Rame & diuerse other were executed at exceter. Besyde these persons diuerse of his houshold seruauntes whom eyther he suspected or doubted, wer with great cruelty put to shamefull death. After this he called a parliament, in the which he attaynted ỹ erle of Richemõd & all other persones, which were fled out of the realme for feat or any other cause as enemies to him and to their natural countrey, and all their landes, goodes and possessions were confiscate and seased to ỹ kinges vse. And yet not content with this pray, which no doubt was of no small valour and moment, he layed on the peoples neckes a great taxe and tallage, & and surely necessite to that acte in maner hym compelled. For what with purgyng and declarynge his innocencie concerning the murther of his nephewes toward the world, & what with cost to obtayne ỹ loue and fauoure of the comminaltie (which outwardely glosed and openly dissimuled with him) he gaue prodigally so many & so great rewardes that now both he lacked and skace wist honestelye how to borowe. In this troubleous season, nothinge was more merueled at then that the lord Stanley had not bene taken and reputed as an enemy to the king consyderinge the workyng of the lady Margarete hys wife mother to the earle of Richemonde, but forasmuch as the enterpryse of a woman && was of hym reputed of no regarde or estymacyon, & that the lord Thomas her husbande had purged hym selfe sufficiently to be innocent of all doynges and attemptes by her perpetrated and committed, it was geuen him in charge to kepe her in some secrete place at home, without hauynge any seruaunte or companye, so that from thencefoorthe she shoulde neuer sende letter nor messenger to her sonne nor anye of hys frendes or confederates, by the whyche the kynge myght be molested or troubled, or any hurte or preiudice might be attempted agaynst hys realme and comminaltie. Whyche commaundemente was a while put in execucion and accomplished accordyng to his dreadfull commaundeɛɛɛ ment. Yet the wyld worme of vengeaunce wauerynge in hys hed could not be contẽted with the death of diuerse gẽtlemen suspected of treason, but also he muste extende hys bloudy furye agaynst a poore gentleman called Collyngborne for making a small ryme of thre of his vnfortunate counselers, which were the lorde Louell, sir Richard Radclyffe hys mischeuous mynion, and sir Wylliam Catesbey his secrete seducer whiche metre was.

The Rat, the Catte and Louell our dogge Rule al England vnder the hogge.

Meanynge by the hogge, the dreadfull wylde bore which was the kinR ges cognisaunce, but because the fyrste lyne ended in dogge, the metrician coulde not obseruinge the regymentes of metre ende the second verse in Bore, but called the Bore an hogge. Thys poetycall schoole mayster Corrector of breues and longes, called Collyngborne to bee abbreuyate shorter by the heade, and to bee deuyded into foure quarters.

Kyng Richarde beyng thus turmented and tossed in hys owne cō-repte and imagination, called to his remembraunce that consideraciōs amities, and other honeste bondes and pactes made, cōcluded and appointed betwene princes and politique gouernours are ỹ cause efficiēt and especiall introductyon that their realmes and countries are fortified and munited wyth a double power, that is to say, with their owne strength and the ayde of their frendes, deuised with him self to practise a league and amitie wyth the kynge of Scottes, which not long before had made diuerse incursyons and roades into the realme of England, where although he gatte lytle, yet surely he lost not much, and therupō pr sued to haue a truce or peace concluded, whyche came euen as kyng Richard had wished it. Wherfore commissioners were assigned for bothe partes to mete at Nothyngham the.vij.daye next ensuyng, at whyche tyme came thyther for the kyng of England Jhon bishop of Lyncolne chaunceller of Englande, Richard bishop of saynte Asse, Jhon duke of Norfolke, Henry erle of Northumberlande, Thomas lorde Stanley, George Stanley lord straūge, Jhon Gray lord Powes, Richard lord Fytzhughe, Jhon Gunthorpe keper of the kynges preuy seale, Thomas Barow maister of the rolles, Sir Thomas Briane chiefe iustice of the common place, Sir Richard Ratclyffe knyght, Wylliā Catesbey pr and Richard Salkeld esquyers. And for the kyng of Scottes wer deputed Colyn erle of Ergyle lord Camplell & lord Chaunceler of Scot-lande, Wyllyam bishop of Aberdene, Robert lord Lile, Laurence lorde Olyphant, Jhon Drummond of Stobhal, Archibald Qwhitelator archedeacon of Lawdene and secretory to kyng James, Lyon kynge of Armes and Duncane dundas. These councellers dyuerse times mete, and after longe debatinge, demaundynge and denyenge, in the ende of September they fully concluded, and made a determinacion, the effect whereof foloweth in artycles.

i. Firste it was appoynted and concluded that a perfight amitie and pr an inuiolable peace should be had & kepte betwene the realmes of En-glande and Scotlande for the space of.iij.yeres, to begyn at the sonne tysing the.xxix.day of Septēber in the yere of our lord. M.cccc.lxxiiij and to endure to the settyng of the sonne the.xxix.day of september in the yere of christes incarnacion. M.cccc.lxxxvij.

ij. Item that duryng the sayd yeres, none of both the princes, nor their ministers shall make warre or inuade ỹ realme or dominiō of theother by sea or by land, or vexe, perturbe, or molest the subiectes or vassals of either of theim, nor shall geue councel, excite or moue any other person to make warre or inuasion on the territories of any of thesaid princes. pl iij. Item that the toune and castel of Berwike with al such boundes as therto were belongynge, which were in the Englishe mennes handes at the deliueraunce of thesame toune by king Henry the. vi. to the king of Scottes, shall so peaceably remayn in the possessyon of the kynge of England during the sayd truce.

Item

Item that all other castelles, holdes and fortresses, shall peaceably iiij. remain in the hãds of the possessor and owner without chalenge or demaunde durynge thesayd truce, the castel of dumbarre onelye excepte, (whyche was deliuered into thenglishe mens handes by the apoinctment of the duke of Albany when he fled into Fraunce.)

Item yf the kinge of Scottes do intimate and declare to the kyng v. of England, within the space of.xl.dayes next ensuyng ẏ day hereof, ẏ he wyl not suffre thesayd castel of Dumbarre to be possessed of the Englishe nacyõ aboue the terme of six monethes, that then during thesaid x vi.monethes, neyther thenglishmen in the garyson of Dumbarre, nor the Scottes dwellyng and inhabityng about the limittes of thesame, shall do any hurte, preiudice or dainmage to any of thesayd parties the sayd terme cotynuyng.

Item yf after thesayde .vj.monethes any variaunce of warre shal vj. aryse betwene thesayd twoo princes, either for the recoueringe or de-fendyng thesayd castel of Dumbarre, yet thesayd truce, league & amite for al other rightes and possessions, shal stande in force and bee effectuall, and that it shalbe lefull to eache of thesayd prynces to do what they shall thynke necessary, both for the obteyning and defending of thesaid xx castell of Dumbarre, any thinge conteyned in the treaty of Peace not-withstandinge.

Item it is concluded and apoynted betwene the parties aforsayd, ẏ vij. duringe thesayd truce, none of both the princes aforsayd, shall receyue into hys realme, territories or dominions, any treytour or rebel of the other pryncc, nor shall maintayne, fauour, ayde or comfort any rebell or treytour, which is already fled, or hereafter shall flye into eyther of the sayd princes dominions, nor there suffre him or theim to tary, or make theyr abode.

Item yf any such rebel or treytour shal fortune hereafter to arryue viij. xxx in the realme or territorie of any of thesayd princes, that then thesayde pryncc, in whose dominiõ thesayd traytour or rebel is so arryued, at ẏ instance & request of the other prince to whom the offence & crime was committed, shalbe bound incontynently to deliuer thesaid rebel or treitour to thesayd demaunder wythout fraude or male engyne.

Item that al Scottishmẽ now inhabytyng in Englande, & sworne ix. to the kyng of Englande, shall & may there inhabyte and tarye, so that their names wythin.xl.dayes after the date of thys league be certified to the kyng of Scottes, or to hys Chauncelour, by the kyng of Englãd or the warden of the marches.

xl Item yf duryng thesayde amitie and peace, it shal fortune any of the x. wardeyns of thesayd princes without cõmaundement, assent or knowledge of hys souereygne lord & mayster, to inuade & reyse an armye in the dominiõ of the other pryncc, and there to sley, burne or spoyle, ẏ thẽ thesayd pryncc, to whome thesayde wardeyn is or shalbe subiect & vassal, shal within.vj.dayes next after the facte done & perpetrate, declare thesayde wardein a treytour and rebell, and therof shal make certificat to the other prince to whom the iniurie was cõmitted within.xij.daies after thesayd declaracion made and denounced.

xi. Item that in euery saueconduict to be graunted by either of thesaid princes, thys clause to be added: Prouided alwaies that ỹ obteyner of thys saueconduyt be no treytour nor rebel to his prynce.

xij. Item yf during this amitie and truce, any of the subiectes of either prince do presume or attempt to aide, help, mainteine or serue any other prynce againste any of the sayde contractoures: Then it shalbe lefull to ỹ prynce and his subiectes against whom he shewed him selfe enemy & aduersary to apprehende and attache thesaid subiecte, goyng, cõmyng or tariynge any acte, article or clause in thys league to the contrary cõprehended notwythstanding.

xiij. Item it is agreed, apointed and accorded that in this treatie & amitie shalbe comprehende the frendes obliged and confederates of bothe the princes if they list to entre and accepte the league, and therupon to declare their pleasurs within.vj.monethes next ensuing, and specially for ỹ kynge of Englands parte wer named for confederates. The king of Castell and Lyon, The kyng of Arragon, The kyng of Portyngall The Archeduke of Austryche and Burgoyne and the duke of Britain. On ỹ part of the king of Scottes were named for confederates, Charles the French kyng, Jhon kyng of Denmarcke and Norwey & ỹ duke of Geldres and Britayne.

xiiij. Item it is agreed and cõcluded betwene the parties aforesayd that the lordship of Lorne in the realme of Scotlãd, nor the Iland of Londay liynge in the ryuer of Seuerne in the realme of Englande, shal not be taken nor comprysed within this league, but to stãd at large as they dyd before.

xv. Item that this concorde, peace and amitie shalbe published, proclaimed and deuulged the fyrst day of October next ensuyng in the moost notable & famous cities & tounes of both the realmes & regyons. And conseruatours were apoynted for the sure obseruation of thys league and amitie on both partes, whose names folowe.

For the

not remẽbryng the tyranny that he had executed agaynst his brothers sonnes, the wrong & manifest iniury that he had done to his brothers daughters, both in taking from them their dygnyte, possessyons and lyuynge, thoughte it shoulde redounde greatelye to hys honoure and fame, yf he promoted hys susters chylde (to whome he was nothynge bounde in conscience to make restitucyon) to the dygnytye of a Quene rather then to preferre hys brothers doughter, whome he hadde vntruely and by force disheneryted, and of all their ryght depryued, to the maryage of a meane esquyer: suche was hys fraternall kyndenes to-xx warde hys brother, and such was hys large conscyence towarde hys brothers chyldren.

After this league and mariage thus concluded and agreed, the king of Scottes disdeynyng that the stronge castell of Dombarre shoulde remayne in thenglyshe mennes handes and possessyon, wrote a gentle letter to kyng Richard, declaryng to hym that where in the league cõ-cluded betwene theim, it was agreed and appoyncted that he shoulde wythin.xl.dayes next ensuyng, expresse and declare hys opinion and meanyng concerninge the castell of Dumbarre, whether the sayd castel should be occupyed and stand still in the handes of thenglyshmenne du-xx rynge the whole tyme of the truce, or elles for the terme of syxe mone-thes onely. He nowe certefyed kyng Rychарde by hys letters that he was contente that he and his should enioye the possession of the sayde castel quyetelye and peaceablye durynge the sayde truce and amytye.
Neuertheless he required him for the loue and famylyaryte that nowe bothe by treaty and alyaunce was spronge and knyt betwene theun, that he woulde redelyuer the sayde castell into hys handes, whyche was vntruely possessed of thenglysh nacyon by the deliuery of rebelles and traitours, contrary to al ryght, equitie and conscience. Kynge Ri-charde dalyed wyth pleasaunte letters and fayre woordes, and so fo-xxx ded forthe the kynge of Scottes, that he neuer had Dumbarre delyuered whyle kyng Richard liued, after whose deathe, whether it were by treason or appoyntmente, the castell was rendred to the kynge of Scottes to hys great contentaciõ & reioysyng. Albeit by this league & amitie thus couenaunted and concluded, it myght manifestly seme to all persons, that all coniuracyons and confederates agaynst kyng Richard were extynct & put to scilence, and in especial consideryng that ȳ duke of Buckyngham and hys alyes were made out of hys way, some by death and some by banyshment and exylyng into farre countries & regyons. Yet kyng Richard more doubtyng then trusting to his own xl people and frendes was continually vexed, tossed and vnquieted with feare of the retourne of the erle of Richemond and his complices & fautoures, whyche dayly dread and hourely agony, caused him to lyue in doleful misery, euer vnquiet, & in maner in cõtinual calamite. Wherfore he entending to be releued and to haue all his dolorous imaginacyon alleuyated, determyned clerely to extirpate and plucke al the mater & grounde of his feare and doubtes. Wherfore after longer and deliberate consultacio had, nothing was for his purpose and entente thought eyther more necessary or expedient then once agayn wyth pryce, prayer and rewardes, to attempt the duke of Britayne in whose territory the erle of Richemod then abode, to deliuer thesayd erle into his hades, by whiche onely meanes he shoulde be discharged of all feare of perel, and broughte to rest and quietnes bothe of body and mind. Wherfore inco-tinent he sent certeyn ambassadoures to ỹ duke of Britayn, which toke vpon theim (besyde the great and ample rewardes, ỹ they brought w theim into Britayne) that king Richard should yerely paie & aunswere the duke of all the reuenues, rentes and profytes, of the seignories, landes and possessions aswell belonging and apperteignynge to the erle of Richemond, as to any other nobel or gentleman, which then wer in the erles company, yf he after that tyme would kepe them in continual prison and restreyne theim from libertie.

The Oratours furnished with these and other instruccios, arriued in Britayne and came to the dukes house, where with him they coulde haue no maner of communicacion concerninge their weighty affaires, by reason that he being fatigate and weakened by a long and dayly infirmite, beganne a litle to waxe ydle and weake in his wyt and remembraunce. For which cause Peter Landoyse his chiefe treasourer, a ma both of pregnaunt wit & great auctorite, ruled and adiudged al thin-ges at his pleasure and comaundement, for the which cause (as men set into high auctoritie be not best beloued) he excited & prouoked against him the malice and euil will of ỹ nobilite of Brytayne, which afterward for diuerse great offences by him durynge his auctorite perpetrate & committed, by their meanes was brought to death & confusyon. Theglishe ambassadoures moued their message and request to Peter Landoyse, and to him declared their maisters commaundemente, instantly requiringe, and humblye desyryng him (in whose power it lay to do al thing in Britayne) that he would frendely assent to the request of kyng Richard offering to him thesame rewardes and lades, that they should haue offered to the duke.

Thys Peter which was no lesse disdayned then hated almost of all the people of Britayne, thought that yf he dyd assent and satisfye kyng Richardes petition and desyre, he should be of powre and habilite sufficient to wythstande and refell the malicious attemptes and dysdein-full inuencions of hys enuious aduersaries. Wherefore he faythefully promysed to accomplish kyng Richardes request and desire, so that he kepte promyse with him, that he myght be hable to wythstand ỹ cacard malice of hys secrete enemies. Thys actey he promysed to do, was not for any grudge or malice that he bare to the earle of Richmond, for as you haue heard before, he delyuered hym from perell of death at sainct Malos when he was in greate doubte of lyfe & ieoperdy, but as cause riseth we euer offende, and that cursted, hungre of golde and execrable

When this league and amitie was thus concluded, finished and sealed wyth al dewe circumstaunces therunto required. Although kynge Richard iudged and demed hym selfe somwhat the more stronger and quieter by force of thys newe amitie and concluded confederacye, yet to augmente more the familyaryte begon betwene the king of Scottes & him, and to haue a double stryng for hys bow (he entreated a new x alliaunce and maryage to be concluded betwene the prince of Rothsaye eldest sonne to the kyng of Scottes, and lady Anne de la poole doughter to Jhon duke of Suffolke and lady Anne suster to kyng Richarde, whiche suster he so muche fauoured, that he studyeng all the wayes by the which he myght auaunce her offspryng and lynage, dyd not onelye procure and seke meanes, how to make her doughter a princesse and consequently a quene, but also after the death of hys sonne, he proclaymed Jhon Earle of Lyncolne hys nephewe and her sonne, heyre apparaunt to ỹ croune of England, dischencriting Kinge Edwardes doughters, whose brethren before you haue heard he shamefully killed & murxx thered.

The kynge of Scottes hauyng nede of frendes, but not so muche nede as kyng Rychard, whych was of necessitie cõpelled to seke aiders and to entreteyne fautoures, the one for fauourynge of flatterers and base borne persones, and the other not onely for tyranny and vnnaturall homicide, but also for the vsurpacyon of the croune beynge of al the realme detested and disdayned, gladly excepted and ioyously consented to kyng Richardes deuyce and coniunction of amitie, perfyghtelye remembrynge that emongest all bondes and oblygacyons of loue and amytye, that there is neyther a surer nor a more perfyghter locke, thẽ xxx the knote of coniuncyon in the Sacrament of Matrimony, whych was in the very begynnyng of the first age of man, ordeyned and instituted in the holye place of paradyse terrestiall by God hym selfe: by reason whereof, the propagacion and succession of the humane nature, stablyshed vpon the sure seate of lawfull matrimony betwene princes, maye norysh peace, concorde and vnitie, aswage, and breake the furious rage of truculente Mars and furyouse battaylle, and encreace loue, fauour and familiaryte. Wherfore thesayd princes sent theyr ambassadoures and councelours agayn to the toune of Nottyngham, where thesayde mariage was by wrytynges and instrumentes couenaũted cõdiscẽded xl and agreed, and affiances made and taken by procters and deputies on both partes, and she immediatly called princesse of Rothsay, whiche name she shortely lost by the shorte lyfe of kyng Richard her louynge vncle. Here may well be noted the vnmaturall loue and dysordered affeccyon whiche thys kynde kynseman shewed to hys blood: For he

thirst of lucre, and inward feare of losse of aucthoritie, driueth the blind myndes of couetous men and ambicious persones to euylles and mischiefes innumerable, not remembring losse of name, obloquy of the people, nor in conclusyon the punishment of God for their merites and desertes. But fortune was so fauourable to the publick wealth of the realme of England that thys deadly and dolorous compact tooke none effect or place. For whiles postes ranne, and letters were sent to & fro for ỳ finishing of thys great enterprise betwene king Richard & Peter Landoyse, Jhon Morton bishop of Ely soiourninge then in Flandres, x was of al thys crafty cõueyghaũce certified by his secret & sure frẽdes: wherfore he sent Christopher Urswike (which at that very season was come out of Britayne into Flaunders) to declare the earle of Richemõd how al the decepte & crafty working was conueighed and compassed, geuyng him in charge to councell and aduyse ỳ erle in al hast possible wt al hys cõpany to retire out of Britayn into Fraunce. Whẽ these newes were brought to the erle, he then kept house in Uannes, and incontinẽt dispatched agayne Christopher Urswyke to Charles the French king requyring that he and hys myght safely passe into Fraunche, whych desyre impetrated and obteyned, the messenger shortly retourned to xx hys lorde and prince. The erle wel perceyuyng that it was expedyent and necessary wyth al spede and dylygẽce, to loke to this weighty matter, calling very few to councel, he made exploracyon and searche of all secrete and by weyes, and sent before all his noble men, as thoughe for a certayne familiaryte and kyndnes they should visit and comforte the duke, which then for recreacyon & chaunge of ayre, laye on the borders and confynes of Fraunce. And secretly he gaue charge to the Earle of Penbroke which was the leader and conducter of hys compaigny that when they approched the marches and limittes of Brytayn, they shuld dyuert and take the next way into Fraunce. The noble men somwhat xxi suspycyous of thynges newely imagened, wythout any tariyng or by ỳ iourney gasing, scouring ỳ weyes as fast as their horse would runne, or as they cõueniently myght beare and susteyn, came out of the duchy of Britayne into ỳ duchy of Angeou in the dominion of Fraunce, wher they exspected the erles commynge, whyche .ij. dayes after departed oute of Uannes onely accompaignied with .v. seruytoures, as though he had gone secretely to visit a famylyer frende of hys in a smal vyllage adioynyng. No man suspected that he woulde departe, consyderynge that a greate multitude of Englyshemen were lefte and contynued in the cyty, but after that he had passed directly fyue miles forward, he xxi daynly turned into a solitary wood next adioyning, where clothynge hym selfe in the symple cote of hys poore seruaunt, made and apointed hys sayde mynyster leader and Master hys smal compaigny, and he as an humble page dilygẽtly folowed and serued hys countrefecte gouernour neuer restyng nor theimselues refreshynge, excepte the baytyng of their horses, tyll they by wayes vnknowen, now this way, now

turnyng that way, came to their company abidyng theim in angyers.

The fourth day after the earle of Richemonde was thus departed, that crafty marchaunt Peter Landoyse, truſtinge ſtill after his praye promyſed by king Richard, was ready to ſet forwarde his crew of ſouldyours, whyche he preuely had conſigned wyth certayne truſty capyteynes for that onely purpoſe appoynted and elected, to performe and acheue his pretenſed enterpryſe, diſſimulyng and feigning theim to bee conducted and hyred by hym to ſerue the Earle of Richemond, & hym to conduyte in hys retourne towarde his new coũtrey, meaning none other thyng but to apprehende him, and the other noble men in his retynue, whiche no ſuch fraude ſuſpectynge, nor yet any treaſon ymagenynge, vnware and vnprouyded and deſtitute of all ayde, and theim to caſt and detrude ſodaynly into continual captiuite and bondage to thẽtente that by thys facinorous and naughte acte, he myghte ſatiſfye the charitable requeſt and louynge deſyre of good kyng Richard, more for hys owne profyte then kyng Richardes gayne. But when this crafty diſſymuler Peter Landoyſe, whych was no wylyer then an old Fore, perceyued that the earle was departed (thynkyng that to be true that he ymagened) lord how curriоures ranne into euery coaſt, howe lyght horſemen galloped to euery ſtreyt to folowe and deteine him, yf by any poſſibilite he coulde be ſubſecuted and ouertaken, and hym to incarcerate and bryng captyue into the citee of Vannes. The horſmen made ſuche diligence, and with ſuch celerite ſet forward their iourneye, that nothing was more lykely then thei to haue obteined, yea & ſeazed their pray. For ỹ erle of Richemond was not entred into ỹ realme of Fraũce ſkace one hour, but ỹ folowers came to the limittes & confines of Britayne, and durſt auenture no farther but veinely wythout their deſyre ſorofully retourned. At which ceaſon were left at Vannes aboute the nõbre of. iij. Engliſhmen, whych not beyng called to councell & vnware of this enterpryſe, but knowyng of the erles ſodeyne departure wer ſo incontinently aſtonned, ỹ in maner they were all diſpayre bothe of him and theyr owne ſecuritie and ſauegard. But fortune turned her ſaile & otherwyſe it happened then there feare thẽ encombred. For the duke of Britayne now beyng ſomwhat recouered, was ſore diſpleaſed, and nothyng contented that the erle of Richemonde was in his dominõ ſo vncurteouſly tracted and intreated, that he ſhould be by fraud and vntruthe compelled to leaue and flye out of his duchy and countrey contrary to hys honoure. Wherfore he toke great diſpleaſure with Petet Landoyſe hys treaſourer, to whõ (although he knew not & was ignoraunt that all the dryfte was dryuen and deuyſed by hym) he laied the fault and imputed the cryme. Wherfore he ſent for Edward Wooduile and Edward Downinges valiaunt eſquyers of England, and delyuered vnto them money ſufficient for their conduyte, wyllynge theim to conuey the reſt of thenglyſhmen beynge in Britayne, to the earle of Richemondes preſence. When the Earle was thus furnyſhed & apointed

with his trusty company, and was escaped all ỹ daũgerous labirinthes and snares that were set for hym, no meruel though he were iocunde & glad of ỹ prosperous succesſe that happened in his affaires. Wherfore, lest he should seme to be blotted with the note of ingratitude, he sent diuerse of his gentlemen to the duke of Britayne, the which shuld publish & declare to him on the behalfe of the erle, that he and his, were onlye by his benefite and fauour conserued and delyuered from the imminẽt daunger ỹ they wer like to be trapped in. Wherfore at that tyme he rẽdred to him hys most harty thankes in wordes, trustyng & not doubtyng but in tyme to come liberally to recõpence hym w̃ actes & dedes.

After this, the erle tooke his iourney to Charles the French kinge lieng then at Langes vpon the ryuer of Loyre, to whom after greate thankes geuẽ for manifold gratuites by hym to the erle shewed, he disclosed & manifested ỹ cause & occasion of his exceſſe and repaire to hys person. After ỹ he required of him helpe and succour, to thentente ỹ by his immortall benefite to him at that tyme shewed, he myght sauely retourne to the nobilitie of hys realme, of whom he was generally called to take vpon him the croune and scepter of the realm they so much hated and abhorred the tyranny of King Richard. King Charles promised him aide and comfort, & bad him to be of good courage & make good chere, for he assured him that he woulde gladly shewe to him his benevolent mynd and bounteful liberalite. Which kinge from thence remoued to Mountargis, leading with him the erle of Richemond, and all ỹ noble parsonages of hys retinue and faccyon.

While the erle was thus attendaunt in the French court, Jhõ Vere erle of Oxford (which as you haue heard before was by king Edward kepte in prison wythin the castel of hãmes) so persuaded James blount capitayne of the same fortresſe, and sir Jhon Fortescewe porter of the towne of Caleys, that he him selfe was not onely dismissed and sette at libertie, but they also abandonynge and leauing their frutefull offices, condiscended to go wyth hym into Fraunce to the Earle of Rychemõd and to take his parte. But James Blount lyke a wyse Capyteyne, because he left hys wyfe remaynynge in the castell before hys departure, he fortified the same both wyth newe inuencions and new souldiours. When the Earle of Richemonde sawe the Earle of Oxforde, he was rauyshed wyth an incredyble gladnes, that he beyng a man of so hygh nobylyte, of such knoweledge and practyse in feates of warre, and so constant, trusty and assured (whyche alwaye had studyed for the maintenaunce and preferment of the house of Lancaster) was now by gods prouision deliuered out of captiuite & imprisonmẽt, & in time so necessary & cõuenient come to his aide, succour and auauncement, in whõ more surer then any other he myght put his truste & cõfidence, and take lesse peyne and trauaile in hys owne person. For it was not hid frõ him that such as had euer takẽ part w̃ king Edward before this time, came to do him seruice either for malice ỹ they bare to king Richard, or els for fear to tyme vnder his truculent rule and tempestious gouernaunce. But this man which so often tymes had personally fought in mortal battail in the querell of kynge Henry the .vi. he iudged by deuine powre and heauenly inspiracion to be deliuered out of captiuitie & emprisonment for this onely purpose, that he should haue a man of hys owne faccion and schole, to whome he might surely and faythfully communicate and credite al thinges as to his owne propre person, and therfore being enflamed with an immortall ioye for the earles commynge, he beganne to haue a good hope of the happy successe of all his pretensed enterprises.

Not long after, the Frenche kyng retorned agayn to Paris, whom ꝑ ꝺ erle of Richemond folowed, entẽding there to solicit hys matter to ꝺ conclusion. Wherupon he besought king Charles to take vpon him the whole tuicion and defence of him and his cause, so that he and his compaignye beyng by his meanes ayded and comforted, shoulde confesse & say, their wealth, vyctory and auauncemente to haue flowed and budded foorthe of hys bountyfulnes and lyberalytie, whyche they woulde God willing shortly reacquite. In the mean ceason diuerse Englishmẽ which eyther fled out of England for feare, or were at Paris to learne and studie good litterature and verteous doctrine, came voluntarely and submytted theimselues to the Earle of Richemonde, and vowed xx and sware to take his parte. Emongest whome was Richarde Fox a priest, a man of great wyt and no lesse learnynge, whome the erle incõtinent receyued into secrete familiaritie & in brief time erected & auaũced him to high dignitees and promocions, and in conclusyon he made hym byshop of Wynchester.

In the meane ceason kyng Richard was credibly aduertysed what promyses and othes the erle and his cõfederates had made and sworne together at Renes, and how by the erles meanes al thinglishmen were passed out of Britayne into Fraunce. Wherfore beinge sore dismayed and in maner desperate, because hys craftye cheuesaunce toke none effect in Britayne, ymagened and deuysed how to infringe and disturbe xxx the erles purpose by another meane, so that by ꝺ mariage of lady Elizabeth his nece he should pretende no clayne nor tytle to ꝺ croune. For he thought yf that mariage fayled, the erles chief combe had ben clerly cut. And because that he beyng blinded wyth the ambicious desyre of rule before this tyme, in obteyning the kyngdome, had perpetrate and done many flagicious actes and detestable tyrannies, yet accordyng to the old prouerbe, let him take ꝺ bul that stale away the calf, he thought all factes by him committed in tymes passed, to be but of small moment and not to be regarded in comparyson of that myscheuous ymaginaciõ whiche ne nowe newely beganne and attempted. There came into his xl vngracyous mynde a thyng not onely detestable to be spoken of in the remembraunce of man, but much more cruell and abhominable to bee put in execucion. For whẽ he reuolued in his wauerynge mynde how greate a fountayne of mischiefe towarde hym shoulde sprynge, yf the

erle of Richmond ſhould be auaunced to the mariage of hys nece, which thinge he harde ſaye by the rumour of the people, that no ſmall nõber of wyſe & wittye perſonages entrepriſed to compaſſe & bryng to concluſion. He clerely determined to reconcile to his fauoure his brothers wife quene Elizabeth either by fayre wordes or liberall promiſes, fynely beleuynge her fauoure once obteined that ſhe would not ſticke to commite and louingly credite to him the rule and gouernaunce both of her and her daughters, & ſo by that meanes the erle of Richemonde of the affinite of his nece ſhould be vtterly defrauded and beguyled. And x yf no ingenyous remedye coulde be otherwiſe inuented to ſaue the innumerable miſchiefes whiche were euen at hande and like to falle, yf it ſhoulde happen quene Anne his wife to departe oute of thys preſente worlde, then he him ſelfe woulde rather take to wife his couſyn & nece the lady Elizabeth, thẽ for lack of that affinite the whole realme ſhould runne to ruyne, as who ſayde, that yf he once fell from hys eſtate & dignite, the ruyne of the realme muſt nedes ſhortely enſue & folowe. Wherfore he ſent to the quene beynge in ſanctuarie diuerſe and often meſſengers, whiche firſte ſhoulde excuſe and purge hym of all thinges before agaynſt her attempted or procured, and after ſhould ſo largely promes xx promocions innumerable and benefites, not onely to her but alſo to her ſonne lord Thomas Marques Dorcet, that they ſhould bryng her yf it were poſſible into ſome wanhope, or as men ſaye into a fooles paradiſe. The meſſengers beynge men bothe of wit and grauitie ſo perſuaded the quene with great & pregnaunte reaſons, & with fayre & large promiſes, that ſhe began ſome what to relent & to geue to thẽ no deffeare, in ſomuche that ſhe faithfully promyſed to ſubmyt & yelde her ſelfe fully and frankely to the kynges wyll and pleaſure. And ſo ſhe putting in obliuiõ the murther of her innocente children, the infamy and diſhonoure ſpoken by the kynge her huſband, the lyuynge in auoutrie leyed xxx to her charge, the baſtardyng of her daughters, forgettyng alſo ỹ feithfull promes & open othe made to the coũteſſe of Richmond mother to ỹ erle Henry, blynded by auaricious affeccion and ſeduced by flatteryng wordes, firſt deliuered into king Richards hãdes her.v. daughters, as Lambes once agayn committed to the cuſtody of the rauenous wolfe. After ſhe ſente letters to the Marques her ſonne beynge thẽ at Parys with the earle of Richmonde, willyng him in any wiſe to leaue the earle and without delaye to repaire into England, where for him were prouided greate honoures and honorable promocions, aſſerteignyng him ferther, that all offences on bothe parties were forgotten and forgeuẽ, xl and bothe he and ſhe highely incorporate in the kynges hearte. Surely the inconſtancie of this woman were muche to be merueled at, yf all women had bene founde conſtante, but let men ſpeake, yet wemen of the verie bonde of nature wyll folowe their awne kynde. After that kynge Rycharde hadde thus with glorious promyſes and flatterynge wordes pleaſed and appeaſed the mutable mynde of quene Elizabeth which knewe nothing lesse then that he most entended, he caused all his brothers daughters to be conueighed into his paleys with solempne receauyng, as though with his newe familier & louyng entreteinemēt they should forget, and in their myndes obliterate the olde committed iniurie and late perpetrate tyrannye. Nowe nothyng was contrariāt and obstacle to his pernicious purpose, but that hys mancion was not voide of his wife, which thynge he in any wyse adiuged necessary to be done. But there was one thyng that so muche feared and dragged him from commyttynge thys abhominable murther, because as you haue heard before he beganne to countrefaycte the ymage of a good & well disposed person, & therfore he was afeared least the sodeine and imma-tured eath of his wife once openly knowen, he should lese the good and credible opinion which the people had of him, without deserte concea-ued and reported. But in conclusion, euyll councell preuailed in a witt lately mynded to mischiefe, and tourned from al goodnes. So that his vngracious desyre ouercame his honest feare. And firste to entre into ꝑ gates of his ymagened entrepryse, he absteined bothe from the bed and companye of his wife. After, he compleyned to dyuerse noble men of & realme, of the infortunate sterilite and barennes of his wife, because she brought forth no fruyte and generacion of her bodye. And in especiall he accompted to Thomas Rotheram archebishoppe of Yorke (whome lately he had delyuered out of warde & captiuite) these impedimentes of his quene and dyuerse other, thinkynge that he woulde enucleate ꝑ open to her all these thinges, trustynge the sequele hereof to take his effecte, that she heryng this grudge of her husband, & takynge therfore an inwarde thought, woulde not longe lyue in this world. Of this the bishoppe gathered (which well knewe the complexion and vsage of the kyng) that the quenes dayes were short, & that he declared to certeine of his secrete frendes. After this he procured a cōmon rumour (but he woulde not haue the auctho knowē) to be published and spred abroade emong the common people that the quene was ded, to thentēt that she takyng some cōceipte of this straung fame, should fal into some sodayne sickness or greuous maladye, & to proue yf afterwarde she shoulde fortune by ꝑ or any other waies to lefe her life, whyther ꝑ people woulde impute her death to ꝑ thought or sickness, or therof would laye ꝑ blame to him. Whē ꝑ quene heard tell ꝑ so horrible a rumour of her death was sprong emongest the comminaltie, she sore suspected & iudged ꝑ worlde to be almost at an ende with her, and in that sorofull agonye, she wyth lamentable countenaunce & sorofull chere, repaired to the presence of ꝑ kyng her husband, demaundynge of hym, what it should meane that he had iuged her worthy to dye. The kyng aunswered her with fare wor-des, and with dissimulyng blandimentes and flatteryng lesynges comforted her, biddynge her to be of good comforte, for to his knowlege she shoulde houe none other cause. But howsoeuer ꝑ it fortuned, either by inward thought and pensyuenes of hearte, or by intoxicacio of poyson (which

whych is affirmed to be moſt likely) within a few daies after, the quene departed oute of this tranſitorie lyfe, and was with dewe ſolempnite buried in the churche of ſeint Peter at Weſtminſter. This is theſame Anne one of the daughters of the erle of Warwyk, whych as you haue heard before at the requeſt of lewes the French kynge, was maried to prince Edward ſonne to kynge Henry the.vi.

The kyng thus (accordyng to his long deſire) loſed out of the bōdes of matrimony, beganne to caſt a foolyſche phantaſie to Lady Elizabeth his nece, making much ſuite to haue her ioyned with him in lawfull max trimony: But becauſe all men, and the mayden her ſelfe mooſt of all, deteſted and abhorred this vnlawfull and in maner vnnaturall copulaciō, he determined to prolonge & deferre the matter tyll he were in a more quietnes. For all ỹ verie ceaſon he was oppreſſed wyth great, weightie & vrgent cauſes and buſyneſſes on euery ſide, conſiderynge that dailye parte of the nobilite ſailed into Fraunce to therle of Richmond: Other preuely fauoured & aided certeine of the coniuraciō, ſo that of his worte ende, fewe or none were in doubte. And the cōmon people for the mooſt part were brought to ſuch deſperacion, that many of theim had rather be reputed & taken of hym in the nombre of his enemies, then to abide xx the chaunce and hazard to haue their goodes taken as a ſpoile of victorie by his enemies. Emongeſt the noble men whome he moſte myſtruded, theſe were the principall, Thomas lorde Stanley, Sir William Stanley his brother, Gylbert Talbot and.vi.hundred other, of whoſe purpoſes although kyng Richard were ignorant, yet he gaue neyther confidence nor credence to any one of theim, and leaſt of all to the Lord Stanley, becauſe he was ioyned in matrimony wyth the lady Margarete mother to ỹ erle of Richmond, as afterward apparauntly ye maie perceaue. For whē theſayde lord Stanley woulde haue departed into his countrey to viſite his famulie, & to recreate and refreſhe his ſpirites xxx (as he openly ſayde) but the truth was to thentent to be in a perfyght readines to receaue the erle of Richemōd at his firſt arriuall in Englād the kyng in no wiſe wolde ſuffre hym to departe before that he had left as an hoſtage in the courte George Stanley lorde ſtraung his firſt begotten ſonne and heire. While kynge Richard was thus troubled and vexed with ymaginacions of the tumulteous time that was lyke to come: Loo, euen ſodeinly he herde newes that fyer was ſpronge out of the ſmoke, and the ware, recently begonne, and that the caſtell of hammes was deliuered into the handes of the earle of Rychmonde by the meanes of the earle of Oxenforde, & that not onely he but alſo James xl Blount capiteine of the caſtel, were fled into Fraunce to aide the Earle Henry. Wherfore he thynkynge it great pollicie to withſtande the fyrſt brunt ſent the mooſt part of the garriſon of Caleis, to recouer agayn by force the caſtell of Hammes. They which were in the caſtell perceauing their aduerſaries to approche, prepared municions & engins for their defence, and ſent alſo to the Earle of Richemonde, to aduertiſe hym of their sodeine obsession, requirynge hym of hasty ayde & spedy succoure.

The erle slepinge not this first begonne assaute, sent the earle of Oxenforde with an elected company of souldioures to reise ỹ siege & reskewe the castell: Which at their first arryuinge pitched their campe not farre from their enemies. And while kyng Rychardes men gaue vigilaunt ire, waytynge least the Earle of Oxforde shoulde take any aduauntage of theim that laye on that side of the Castell. Thomas Brandon wyth xxx. approued men of warre by a marishe whiche laye on the other syde entred into the castell. The souldioures within greatelye animated & muche comforted by thys newe succour and aide, greued the enemies x by shotyng, frō the walles more then they were accustomed to do. And they of the Castell vexed their enemies on ỹ forepart: thearle of Oxēforde no lesse molested and vnquieted theim on the other parte, whych was the occasion that kyng Richardes men offred of their awne mere mocion licence to all beinge within the castell to departe in sauetie with bagge and baggage nothynge excepted: whyche condicion the earle of Oxenforde commynge onlye for that purpose to delyuer hys louynge frendes oute of all perell and daunger, & chiefely of all, his olde hostesse Jane Blount wife to James Blount the capteine, would in no wise repudiate or refuse. And so leauynge the Castell bare and vngarnysshed xx bothe of vitaile and artillary, came safe to the erle of Richmond soiournyng in Parys. Duryng this tyme, kyng Richard was credebly informed of his explorators & espialles that ỹ erle of Richmonde was wyth longe suyte in the courte of Fraunce sore fatigate & weried, & desyrynge greate aide, coulde obteine small releue. In so much ỹ all thyng went so farre backward, ỹ such thinges as were with great diligence & no lesse deliberation purposed & determined to be set forward, were nowe dash-shed and ouerthrowen to the grounde. Kynge Richarde eyther beyng to light of credence, or seduced and deluded by hys craftie taletellers, greatly reioysed as though he had obteyned the ouerhand of hys ene- xxx myes with triumphe & victorie, and thought hym selfe neuer so surelye delyuered of all feare and dreadfull ymaginacions, so that he neded nowe no more once for that cause eyther to wake or breake hys golden slepe. Wherefore he called home again his shippes of warre whiche he had appoynted to kepe ỹ narowe sees, & dispatched al such souldioures as he had deputed to kepe certeine garrisons & to stoppe certeine passages as you haue heard before. Yet least he might for lacke of prouisyon be sodeinly trapped he streightly charged and gaue in commaundemēt to all noble men and in especiall suche as inhabited nere to the see coaste and on the frontiers of wales, that accordyng to the vsage of the coun- xl trey, they should kepe diligēt watche & stronge warde, to ỹ entent ỹ his aduersaries in no wise should haue any place apte or opportune easely to take lande without defence or rebuttynge back. For the custome of the countreyes adioyning nere to ỹ see is (especially in the tyme of war) on euery hill or high place to erect a bekon w̄ a greate lāterne in the toppe, which maie be sene and discerned a great space of. And when the noyes is once bruted that the enemies approche nere ỹ land, they sodeinly put fyer in the lanthornes & make showtes & outrages frō toune to toune & from village to village. Some ronne in post frō place to place admonisshyng the people to be ready to resist the ieopardy, and defende the perell. And by this pollecy ỹ fame is sone blowen to euery citie & toune, in somuch that aswell the cytezens as the rural people be in short space assembled and armed to refell and put back the newe arryued enemies.

Nowe to retourne to our purpose, kyng Richarde thus alleuiate of x his accustoned pēsiuenes, beganne to be some what more merier & toke lesse thought and care for outwarde enemies then he was woont to do, as who saie, that he with polletique prouision shoulde withstand the desteny which honge ouer his hed, & was ordeined in briefe tyme sodeinly to fall. Suche is the force and puissaunce of deuyne iustice, that euerye man shall lesse regarde, lesse prouide, lesse be in doubte of all thynges, when he is moste nerest punishment, and next to hys mishaunce for hys offences and crymes.

Aboute this reason, while the earle of Richmond was desiryng ayde of the Frenche kyng, certeyne noble men were there apointed to rule ỹ xi realme of Fraunce duringe the minorite of kyng Charles which emongest theim selfes were not of one opinion. Of which dissencion, Lewes duke of Orlyaunce was ỹ chiefe sturrer, whiche because he had maryed lady Johanne suster to the Frenche kynge, toke vpon hym aboue other the rule and administracion of the whole realme. By reason of whyche controuersie, no one manne only was suffred to rule all, wherfore ỹ erle of Rychemond was compelled to make suyte to euery one of ỹ councell seuerally one after another, requiring and desirynge theim of aide and releue in his weightie busynes, and so his cause was prolonged and deferred. Durynge which tyme, Thomas Marques Dorset which was xxx as you haue heard entised by his mother to retorne againe into Englād partely despayring in the good successe of thearle of Richmōd, & partely onerate & banquesshed with the faire glosynge promyses of kynge Richard: secretly in ỹ night ceason stale oute of Parys, & with all diligent expedicion toke hys iourney toward Flaunders. When relacion of his departure was made to the erle of Richmond & theother noble men, no maruell though thei were astōnyed & greately amased. Yet ỹ notwithstādyng they requyred of the French kyng that it might be lefull to thē in his name & by his commaundement to take & steye their cōpaignion, confederate, and partaker of all their councell, in what place within his xi realme and territorye so euer they coulde fynde hym. Whiche peticion once obteined, thei sent out curriers into euery parte, emongest whom Homfrey Cheiny pleiyng the parte of a good blood hunde, folowed the tract of ỹ flyer so euen by the sent, that he ouer toke & apprehended him not farre from Cōpeigne & so what ẅ reason & what ẅ faire promises beyng persuaded, he retourned againe to his cōpaignions. Thearle of

Richmond vnburdened of this misauenture, least by procrastinacion of daies & prolongyng of time, he might lese ỹ great oportunite of thyngs to him offred and ministred: also least he should ferther wounde or moleste the myndes of his feithfull and assured frendes which daily did aspect & tarie for his cõmyng, determined no lenger to protract & deferre ỹ time, but with all diligence & scelerite to attempte his begonne entrepryse & so obteinyng of kyng Charles a small crewe of men, & borowyng certeyn sommes of money of him & of diuerse other his pryuate frẽdes (For the which he left as debter or more likelyer as a pledge or hostage lorde Thomas Marques Dorsett whome he halfe mistrusted & Sir Jhon Burchier) he departed from ỹ French court & came to the citee of Roan. While he taryed there makyng prouisiõ at harflete in the mouth of the ryuer of Seyne for all thynges necessary for hys nauy and nauigacion, tydynges were brought to hym that kyng Richard beynge wout childzen and now wydower, entended shortely to mary with Lady Elizabeth his brothers daughter, and to preferre the ladye Cicile her suster to a man founde in a cloude and of an vnknowen lignage and familie. He toke these newes as a matter of no small momente, and so all thynges considered, it was of no lesse importaunce then he toke it for. For this thynge onlye tooke aweye from all hys compaignions their hope and courage that they had to obteine an happie enterprice. And therfore no maruell though it nypped hym at the verie stomacke when he thought that by no possibilite he might attayne the mariage of anye of kynge Edwardes daughters, which was the strongest foundaciõ of his buyldyng, by reason whereof he iudged that all his frendes in England woulde abandon and shrynke from hym. Wherefore, makynge not many of his councell, after dyuerse consultacions he determined not yet to set forwarde, but to tarye & attempte howe to get more ayde more frendes and more stronger succoures. And emongest all other, it was thought mooste expedient to allure by affinite in hys ayde as a compaignyon in armes Sir Walter Herbert a man of an aunciente stocke and greate powre emongest the Welshemen, whyche had wyth hym a fayre Ladye to hys suster, of age mature and ripe to be coupled in matrimonie. And for the acheuing of this purpose, messengers were secretely sent to Henry Earle of Northumbrelande (whiche had before maried another suster of Sir Walter Herbertes) to thentent that he shoulde set forward all this deuyce and purpose, but the waies were so narowly watched and so many spies laide that the messenger proceded not in his iourney and busynes. But in the meane ceason, ther came to the Earle a more ioyfuller message from Morgan Kydwelly learned in the tempozall lawe, whiche declared that Ryce ap Thomas, a man of no lesse valyauntnes then actyuitee, and Jhon Sauage an approued Capteyne, woulde wyth all their powre be partakers of hys quarell. And that Reignolde Breye had collected and gotten together no smal some of money for the payment of the wages to the souldioures and men of warre: admonishynge him also to make quicke expedicion and to take his course directely into Wales. The Earle of Richmonde because he woulde no lenger lynger and weerye hys frendes lyuynge continually betwene hope and feare, determyned in all conuenient hast to sett forwarde, and caried to hys shippes armoure, weapons, bitayle and all other ordinaunces expedient for warre. And shortely to speake, all thynges he prepared whiche are wont to be necessarye and profitable to the variable chaunces and incerteine accidentes and ieopardies of warre, whiche requyreth preparacion of many instrumentes & thinx ges chargeable.

After that the erle had made his humble peticion and deuoute praier to allmightie God, beseechynge him not only to sende him moost prosperous wynde and sure passage in hys iourney, but also effecteously deliryng hys goodnes of ayde & comforte in hys necessite & victorye & supremitie ouer hys enemies, only accompaignied with.ij.thousand men and a small nombre of shippes, weyed vp his ancres and halsed vp hys sailes and in the calendes of August he sailed from harflet with so prosperous a wynde that the.vij. daye after his departure he arryued in Wales in the euenyng at a porte called Mylford Hauen, & in continent xx tooke lande and came to a place called Dalle, where he heard saye that a certeine company of his aduersaries were leyed in garrison to defend his arryuall all the last wynter. And ỹ earle at the sonne rysyng remoued to harfford west, beyng distant from dalle not fully ten myle, where he was applauded and receaued of the people with greate ioye, and he arryued there so sodeinly that he was come & entred the toune at the same tyme when the cytezens had but knowlege of hys commynge. Here he heard newes which were as vntrue as they truly were reported to hym in Normandie, that Rice ap Thomas & Jhon sauage wyth body and goodes were determined to aide kynge Richard. While he & xxx his compaignie were somewhat appalled of these newe tydynges, ther came such message from thinhabitaũtes of the toune of Penbroke that refresshed and reuyued their frosen heartes & daunted courages. For Arnold Buttler a valiaunt capitain, which first askynge perdon for his offences before tyme committed against the earle of Richmond, & that obteyned, declared to hym that the pẽbrochians were ready to serue & geue their attendaunce on their naturall & immediat lord Jasper erle of Penbroke. The erle of Richmond hauing his armie thus encreased, departed from Herforde west to the toune of Cardygan being.v.myle distant from thence. While the souldioures were refreshynge & trimxl mynge theim selues in their campe, straunge tydynges sprong emonge them wt̃out any certeine authour, ỹ sir Walter Herberd whiche laye wt̃ a greate crewe of men at Carmarden, was nowe wyth a great armye ready to approche and byd theim battail. With which newes the armie was sore troubled, and euery man assaied his armure and proued hys weapon and were prest to defende their enemies. And as they were in this timerous doubte, certeine horlemen which ỹ erle had sent to make exploracion and searche, retourned and reported all the countrey to be quiete and no let nor impedimente to be laied or caste in thier iourney.

And euen at that same tyme the whole armye was greately recõforted by reason that the commynge of Rycharde Gryffyth, a man of greate nobilite, the which notwithstandynge that he was conferate with Sir Walter Harbert and Richarde app Thomas, yet at that verie instante he came to the Earle of Richemond with all hys compaignye, whyche were of no greate nomber. After hym, thesame daye came Jhon Morgan wyth his men. Then the Earle auaunced forwarde in good haste, ꝛ makynge no repose or abode in any one place. And to thentent to passe forwarde with sure & shorte expedicion, he assauted euery place where his ennemies had set anye men of warre, whyche with small force and lesse difficultie he briefely dyd expugne and vanquisshe. And sodeynlye he was by his espialles asserteyned that Sir Walter Harbert & Rice app Thomas were in harnes before hym ready to encountre wyth his armye and to stoppe their passage. Wherefore lyke a valyaunt capteyn he firste determyned to sett on theim and eyther to destroye or to take theim into his fauoure, and after with all hys powre and puyssaunce to geue battaile to hys mortall enemye kynge Richarde. But to then- ꝛꝛ tent hys frendes shoulde knowe wyth what dexterite his attempted entrepryce proceded forwarde, he sente of his moste secrete and feithfull seruauntes with letters and instruccions to the ladye Margarete his mother, to the Lorde Stanley and hys brother, to Talbote & to other his trustie frendes, declarynge to theim, that he succoured and holpen wyth the ayde and relcue of his frendes entended to passe ouer the ryuer of Seuerne at Shrewsburie, and so to passe directely to the citie of London, requirynge theim as his especiall truste and confidence was perplanted in the hope of their fidelite, that they would occurre & mete hym by the waye with all diligent preparaciõ to thentent that he & thei ꝛꝛꝛ at tyme propice and place conueniẽt might communicate together the profundyte and depnes of all his dubious & weightye busynes. When the messengers were disparcled with these cõmaundementes & admo-nicions, he marched forward toward Shrefburye, and in his passynge there met & saluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodly bãd of Welsh-men, which makyng an othe and promyse to the erle, submitted himself whole to his ordre & commaundement. For the earle of Richemond. iij. daies before made to him promes ỹ if he would sweare to take his part and be obedient to hym, he woulde make hym chiefe gouernour of Wales, whyche parte as he feithfully promised and graunted, so after that ꝛl he had obteyned & possessed the realme and diademe, he liberallye performed & accomplieshed the same. In the meane tyme, the messengers that were sent, diligently executed the thinges geuen to thẽ in charge, & laden with rewardes of theim to whom thei were sent, retourned to hym thesame daye that he entred into Shrewsbury, and made relaciõ to hym

to hym that hys frendes were ready in all poyntes to do al thynges for him which either they ought or might do. The earle Henry brought in good hope with his pleasaunt message continued forth hys entended iourney and came to a litle towne called Newporte and pitchynge hys campe on a lytle hyll adioynynge, reposed hym selfe there that nyghte. In the euenynge, thesame daye came to hym sir George Talbott with the whole powre of the younge Earle of Shrewsburye then beynge in warde, whyche were accompted to the nombre of twoo thousande men. And thus hys powre encreasynge he arryued at the towne of x Staffordе and there pawsed. To whome came Sir Wyllyam Stanley accompaignied with a fewe persones, and after that the Earle and he had communed no longe tyme together, he reuerted to hys souldiours which he had congregate together to serue the Earle, which frō thence departed to Lichefelde and laye without the walles in campe all the nyght. The nexte morenynge he entred into the towne, & was wyth all honour lyke a prynce receaued. A daie or twoo before the lord Stanley hauynge in hys bande almoste fyue thousande men, lodged in thesame towne, but herynge that the Earle of Richemonde was marchynge thetherward, gaue to hym place, dislodgynge hym and hys, and xx repaired to a towne called Adrestone, there abydynge the commynge of the Earle, and thys wilye fore dyd thys acte to aduoyde all suspicion, beynge afrayed least yf he shoulde be sene openly to bee a fautoure or ayder to the Earle hys sonne in lawe before the daye of the battayl, that kynge Richarde whyche yet dyd not vtterlye put in hym diffidence and mystruste woulde putt to some cruell deathe hys sonne and heire apparaunt George Lorde Straunge whome kynge Rycharde as you haue heard before kept with hym as a pledge or hostage to thentent that the lorde Stanley his father shoulde attempte nothinge preiudiciall to hym.

xxx Kynge Rycharde at this ceason kepynge his howse in the Castell of Notyngham was infourmed that the Earle of Richemond with suche bannyshed men as fled oute of Englande to hym were nowe arryued in Wales, and that all thynges necessarie to hys entrepryce were vnprouided, vnpurueyed and verie weake, nothynge mete to withstande the powre of suche as the kyng had apoynted to resist him. This rumour so enflated his minde, ꝑ in maner disdeignynge to here speake of so poore a compaignye, determine at the firste to take lytle or no regarde to this so small a sparcle, declarynge the Earle to be innocente and vnwyse because that he temerariously attempted suche a greate xl entrepryce with so small and thynne a nombre of Warlyke persones, & therefore he gaue a definityue sentence, that when he came to that poynte that he shoulde be compelled to fight agaynst his will, he eyther shoulde be apprehended alyue, or elles by all likelyhode he shoulde of necessite come to a shamefull confusion, and that he trusted to be shortely done by Sir Walter Harbert and Rice ap Thomas, whyche then ruled ruled Wales wyth egall powre and lyke aucthoritee. But yet he re-uoluynge and castynge in hys mynde that a small warre begonne and wynked at and not regarded, maye tourne to a greate broyle and tu-multeous trouble, and that it was prudente pollecie not to asperne and disdeyne the lytle small powre and weakenes of the ennemye, be yt neuer so small, thought it necessarye to prouyde for after clappes that myght happen and chaunce. Wherefore he sent to Jhon duke of Norfolke, Henry Earle of Northumberlande, Thomas Earle of Surrey and to other of hys especiall and trusty frendes of the nobilite, whyche he iudged muche more to preferre & esteme hys wealthe and honoure r then their awne riches and priuate commodite, willynge theim to mu-stre and viewe all their seruauntes and tenentes, and to elect and chose the mooste courageous and actiue persones of the whole nomber, and wyth theim to repaire to hys presence wyth all spede and dilygence.

Also he wrote to Robert Brakenbury Lieutenaunt of the towre, com-maundynge hym with his powre to come to his armye and to brynge with hym as felowes in armes Sir Thomas Burchier and sir Walter Hungerforde and diuerse other knightes & esquiers in whome he had cast no small suspicion. While he was thus ordrynge hys affaires, tydynges came that the Earle of Richemonde was passed Seuerne and rr come to Shrewsbury without any detrymente or encombreaunce. At which message he was sore moued and broyled wyth Melancolye and doloure, and cried out, askynge vengeaunce of theim that contrarye to their othe and promes had fraudulently deceaued hym. For whyche cause he beganne to haue diffidence in other, in so muche that he determined hym selfe out of hande thesame daye to occurre and resyste hys aduersaries. And in all haste sente oute explorators to viewe and espie what waye his enemies kept & passed. They dilygentely doynge their dewtie, shortely after retourned, declarynge to the kyng that the Earle was encamped at the toune of Lichfelde. When he had perfight rrr knowlege where the Earle with hys armye was soiournynge, he hauynge continuall repaire of hys subiectes to hym, beganne in contynently withoute delaye to marshall and collocate in order his battayles (lyke a valyaunt capteine and polletique leader) and firste he made hys battayles to set forward four and foure in a ranke, marchynge to-warde that waye where his enemyes as was to him reported entēded to passe. In the myddle parte of the armye he appoynted the traf-ficke and cariage apperteignynge to the armye. Then he (enuironed with his satellytes and yomen of the crowne) with a frownynge countenaunce and truculente aspect mounted on a greate white courser, fo- rl lowed with his footmen, the wynges of horsemen coastynge and rangynge on euery syde: And keppynge thys araye, he wyth greate pompe entred the toune of Lecester after the sonne set. The Earle of Rychmonde reised his campe and departed from Lychefelde to the towne of Tomwoorth therto nere adioynynge, and in the myd waye passynge, there

chere saluted hym Sir Walter Hungerforde and Sir Thomas Burchier knightes and dyuerse other whych yelded and submytted theim selfes to hys pleasure. For they beynge aduertised that kyng Rychard had theim in suspicion and gealosye, a lytle beyonde stonye stratforde left and forsooke preuely their Capteyne Robert Brakenbury, and by nocturnall wandrying, and in maner by vnknowen pathes and vncerteine waies searchyng, at the last came to ỹ earle Henry. Diuerse other noble personages whych inwardely hated kynge Richard worsse then a toade or a serpent, lykewyse resorted to him wyth all their powre and x strength. There happened in thys progression to the Earle of Richemond a straunge chaunce worthy to be noted: for albeit that he was a man of haute and valyaunte courage, and that his army encreased, and dayly more & more he waxed puysaunt and stronger, yet he was not a lytle afeared because he in no wyse could be assured of his father inlawe Thomas Lorde Stanley, whyche for feare of the destruction of the Lorde straunge his sonne (as you haue heard) as yet enclyned to neyther partie. For yf he had gone to the Earle, and that notefied to kynge Rychard, hys sonne had shortelye been executed. Wherefore syth the Earles feare sprange not of nothynge, he accõpaignyed wyth twentye xi lyght horsemen lyngered in his iourney as a man disconsolate, musyng and ymagenynge what was beste to be done. And the more to aggrauate his melancolye pensyuenes, yt was shewed hym that kynge Rycharde was at hande wyth a stronge powre and a populous armye. Whyle he thus pensyue dragged behynde hys hoost, the whole armye came before the toune of Tomwoorth, and when he for the depe darcknes coulde not perceaue the steppes of theim that passed on before and had wandred hether and thether, sekynge after hys compaygnie and yet not once herynge any noyse or whysperyng of theim, he dyuerted to a very lytle village beynge aboute. iij. myles from hys armye.
xxx takynge greate thought and muche fearynge least he should be espied, and so trapped by kynge Rychardes skoute watche. There he taried all nyght, not once auenturyng to aske or demaunde a question of anye creature, he beynge no more amased wyth the ieopardye & perell that was passed, then wyth this presente chaunce, sore feared that it shoulde bee a pronostication or prodygall sygne of some infortunate plague afterward to succede. As he was not mery beynge absent from his compaignie, lykewyse hys armie muche marueled and no lesse mourned for hys sodeyne and intempestious absence.

The next morenynge earlye in the dawnynge of the daye he retourxi ned, and by the conduyte of good fortune espied and came to hys armie, excusynge hym selfe, not to haue gone oute of hys waye by ignoraunce, but for a pollecie deuysed for the nones he went from his campe to receaue some glad message from certeyne of hys preuy frendes and secret alies. This excuse made, he preuely departed agayn frõ his hoost to the toune of Aderstone, where the lord Stanley and sir William his brother with their bandes were abidynge. There the Earle came first to his father inlawe in a lytle close, where he saluted hym and Sir William his brother, and after diuerse congratulacions and many frendely embracynges, eache reioysed of the state of other, & sodeinly were surprised with great ioye, comfort and hope of fortunate successe in al their affaires & doynges. Afterward they consulted together howe to geue battaile to kyng Richarde yf he woulde abide, whome they knewe not to be farre of with an houge army. In the euenyng of thesame daye sir Jhon Sauage, Sir Bryan Sanforde, Sir Symon Digby and many other, leuyng kyng Richarde, turned and came to the parte of the erle of Richmond with an elect company of men. Whiche refusall of kynge Richardes parte by men of suche experience, dyd grealy augment and encreace bothe the good hope & the puissaunce of the erle of Richmond.

In the mean ceason kyng Richard (which was appoynted nowe to finysshe his laste labour by the verye deuyne iustice and prouidence of God, which called him to condigne punyshemente for his scelerate merites and myscheueous desertes) marshed to a place mete for twoo battayles to encountre by a village called Bosworth, not farre from Leycester, and there he pitched hys felde, refreshed his souldioures & toke his rest. The fame went that he had thesame night a dreadfull & a terrible dreame, for it semed to hym beynge a slepe ỹ he sawe diuerse ymages lyke terrible deuelles whyche pulled and haled hym, not sufferyng hym to take any quyet or reste. The whyche straunge vision not so sodeinly strake his heart with a sodeyne feare but it stuffed his hed and troubled hys mynde wyth many dreadfull and busye Jmaginacions. For incontynent after, hys heart beynge almost damped, he pronosticated before the doubtfull chaunce of the battaile to come, not vsynge the alacrite and myrth of mynde and of countenaunce as he was accustomed to do before he came toward ỹ battaile. And leaste that it might be suspected that he was abasshed for feare of his enemyes, and for that cause looked so piteously, he recyted & declared to hys famylyer frēdes in ỹ morynynge hys wonderfull vysion & terrible dreame. But I thinke thys was no dreame, but a punccion and pricke of his synfull conscience, for the conscience is so muche more charged & aggrauate as the offence is great and more heynous in degre, whyche prycke of conscience all though it strike not all waye, yet at the laste daye of extreme lyfe it is wonte to shewe and represent to vs oure faultes and offences and the paynes and punishementes which hange ouer our heddes for the committynge of thesame, to thentent that at that instāt we for our desertes beinge penitent & repentaunt may be compelled, lamentyng and bewaylyng our sinnes like forsakers of this worlde, iocund to departe oute of this miserable life. Now to retorne agayn to oure purpose, the next daye after, kyng Richard beynge furnished with men & all abilimentes of war, bringyng all his mē out of there camp into ỹ plaine, ordered his forward in a marueylous lēgth, in which he appointed both horsemē & footmen footmē to thentēt to empȝinte in ẏ hartes of thē ẏ loked a karre of, a sodeine terroȝ & deadly fear, foȝ ẏ great multitude of ẏ armed soldiours: and in ẏ foȝe Frount he placed the archers like a strōg foȝtified trēch oȝ bulwarke: ouer this battail was captain Jhon Duke of Noȝfolke with whom was Thomas erle of Surrey his sonne. After this lōg bātgard folowed king Richard him self, ẅ a strōg cōpaigny of chosen & appȝoued mē of war, hauing hoȝsmē foȝ winges on both the sydes of his battayl.

After that therle of Richemond was departed from the cōmunicaciō of his frends as you haue hard beforȝe, he begā to be of a better stomack x & of a moȝe valiant courage, & ẅ all diligēce pitchid his feld iuste by the cāp of his enemies, & ther he lodged ẏ night. In the moȝning betime he caused his mē to put on there armure, & appareil thē selfes redy to fight & geue battail, & sent to ẏ loȝd Stāley (which was now come ẅ his bād in a place differētly betwene both ẏ armies) requiring hym ẅ his men to appȝoch nere to his army & to help to set ẏ soldiours in array, he answered ẏ therle should set his owne mē in a good oȝder of battail while he would array his cōpaigny, and come to him in time cōueniēt. Which answere made otherwise then therle thought oȝ wold haue iudged, cōsidering ẏ opoȝtunite of the time & the wayte of ẏ busynes, & although xx he was there ẅall, a litle vexed, began somwhat to hange ẏ head, yet he ẅout any tyme delaiyng compelled of necessitie, after thys maner instructed & oȝdered his men. He made his foȝward somwhat single and slender, according to the smal nōber of his people. In ẏ Froūt he placed the archers, of whom he made captain Jhō erle of Oxfoȝd: to the right wyng of ẏ battail he appoynted, sir Gilbert Talbot to be the leder: to ẏ left wing, he assigned sir Jhō Sauage, & he ẅ the aide of ẏ loȝd Stāley accompaignied with therle of Penbȝoke hauinge a good companye of hoȝsmen and a small nomber of footmen: Foȝ al his hole nōber exceded not. v. thousand men besyde the powȝ of the Stāleys, wherof. iij. thouxxx sande were in the feld vnder the Standard of sir Williā Stanley: The kynges nomber was double so muche & moȝe. When bothe these armies wer thus oȝdȝed and al mē redy to set foȝward king Richard called his cheuetains together and to thē said. Most faithfull and assured felowes, most trusty & wel beloued frends & elected captains by whose wisdom and policy, I haue obteined ẏ croune and tipe of thys famous realm and noble regiō: by whose puissaūce & valiaūtnes I haue enioyed & possessed thestat roial & dignite of ẏ same, maugre ẏ yl wil & sedicious attemptes of all my cācard enemies & insidious aduersaries, by whose pȝudēt & politike coūsail I haue so gouerned my realm, people and subxxi iectes, ẏ I haue omitted nothing appertaining to ẏ office of a iust pȝince noȝ you haue pȝetermitted nothing belōging to ẏ duty of wise and sage counsailers. and diabolical temptaciō did commyt a facynorous and detestable acte. Yet I haue with strayte penaunce and salt teries (as I trust) expiated and clerely purged ỹ same offence, which abhominable crime I require you of frendship as clerely to forget, as I dayly remember to deplore and lament the same. If ye wyl now dylygently call to remembraunce in what case and perplexitie we now stand, and in what doubtful perell we be now intricked: I doubt not but you in hart will thinke and with mouth confesse, that yf euer amitie and fayth preuailed betwene prince and subiectes or betwene subiecte and subiecte: or yf euer bonde of allegyans oblyged the vassall to loue and serue hys naturall souereigne & lorde, or yf any obligacion of dewtie bound any prynce to ayde and defende his subiectes: Al these loues, bondes and deuties of necessitie are this daye to be experimented, shewed and put in experience. For if wise men say trew, there is some pollicy in getting, but much more in keping The one beynge but fortunes chaunce, and the other hyghe wyt and pollicie, for whych cause, I wyth you: and you with me, must nedes this daye take labour and payne to kepe and defend with force, that prehemynence & possessyon whych by your prudēt deuyses I haue gottē and obteyned. I doubt not but you know, how the deuyl continuall enemy to humane nature, disturber of concorde and sower of sedicion, hath entred into the harte of an vnknowen Welshman (whose father I neuer knew, nor hym personally sawe) excitinge him to aspyre and conet oure realme, crowne and dignitie, and thereof clerely to depryue and spoyle vs and our posteritie: ye se farther how a cōpaygny of traytors, theues, outlawes and ronneagates of our owne nacyon be aiders & partakers of hys feate and enterpryse, redy at hand to ouercome and oppresse vs: You se also, what a nōber of beggerly Britons & faynt harted Frenchmen be wyth hym arryued to distroy vs our wyues and childrē. Which immynent myschiefes & apparaūt inconuenyēces, yf we wyl wythstōd & refel, we must lyue together lyke brethren, fyght together lyke liōs & fear not to dye together like men. And obseruing and keping this rule & precept, beleue me, the fearful hare neuer fled faster before the gredy greyhoūd, nor ỹ sylie larke before ỹ sparowhauke, nor the symple shepe before the rauenous wolfe, thē your proud braggyng aduersaries astōned & amased wyth ỹ only syght of your māly vysages will fle, ronne & skyr out of the felde. For yf you consider and wisely ponder althings in your mynde, you shall perceyue that we haue manyfest causes, and apparant tokens of tryumph and victory. And to begyn with the erle of Richmond Captain of thys rebellyon, he is a Welsh mylcksoppe, a man of small courage and of lesse experience in marcyall actes and feates of war, brought vp by my brothers meanes and myne lyke a captyue in a close cage in the court of Fraunces duke of Britaine, and neuer saw army, nor was exercised in marcial affayres, by reason wherof he neither can nor is able on hys owne wit or experience to guyde or rule an host. For in the wit and pollecy of the captayne, consisteth the chefe adeption of the victory and ouerture of the enemies. Secondarely fear not and put away al doubtes, for when ỹ traytors & runagates of oure realme shal see vs ẅ banner displayed come agaynst them, remẽbring their oth promise & fidelitie made vnto vs, as to their souereigne lord & anointed king, they shalbe so pricked & stimulate in ỹ botome of there scrupulous cõsciẽces, ỹ they for very remorse & dread of ỹ diuine plage wil either shamefully flie, or humbly submitte them selfes to our grace and mercye. And as for the Frenchmen & Brytõs, there valiaũtnes is such, ỹ our noble progenitors & your valyaunt parẽtes, haue them oftener bãquished & ouercome in one moneth, then they in the beginning imagened possible to cõpasse & finish in a hole yere. What wil you make of thẽ, braggers ẅout audacite, dronkards ẅout discrescion, ribaudes ẅout reason, towardes ẅout resistyng & in conclusion ỹ most effeminate & lasciuious people, ỹ euer shewed them selfes in Fruint of battaile, ten tymes more corragious to flye & escape, thẽ once to assaut ỹ byest of our strong & populous army. Wherfore, considering all these auaũtages, expell oute of your thoughtes all doutes & auoid out of your myndes al fear, & like valiant chãpions auaũce furth your standards, & assaye whyther your enemies can decide & trie ỹ title of batail by dent of swerd. Auaunce (I xx say agayn) forward my captayns, in whom lacketh neither policie, wisdom nor puyssaunce. Euery one geue but one sure stripe, & surely ỹ iorney is oures. What preuayleth a hãdfull to a hole realme? desiring you for ỹ loue ỹ you beare to me, & ỹ affection ỹ you haue to your natiue and natural coũtrey, & to ỹ sauegard of your prynce & your self, ỹ you wyll this day take to you your accustomed corage & couragyous spyrytes for ỹ defence & sauegard of vs all. And as for me, I assure you, this day I wil triumphe by glorious victorie, or suffer death for immortal fame. For thei be maihmed & out of ỹ palice of fame disgraded, dieg ẅout renoune, which do not as much preferre & exalte the perpetuall honor of xxx their natiue countrey, as there owne mortall & transitory lyfe. Nowe sent George to borowe, let vs set forward, & remẽber wel that I am he which shall wyth high auauncementes, reward & preferre the valiant and hardy champions, and punische and turment the shamefull cowardes and dreadful dastardes. This exhortacion encouraged all such as fauoured him, but such as were present more for dread then loue, kissed them openly, whome they inwardely hated, other sware outwardelye to take part wyth suche, whose death they secretly compassed and inwardly imageued, other promysed to inuade ỹ kynges enemies, which fled and fought wyth fyrce courage agaynst the kyng: other stode styll xl and loked on, entending to take part wyth the victors & ouercõmers. So was hys people to him vnsure and vnfaythful at hys ende, as he was to hys nephewes vntrew and vnnaturall in hys begynnynge.

When therle of Richmond knew by his forriders that ỹ king was so nere embatlayled, he rode aboute hys armye, from ranke to ranke, from wyng to wyng, geuyng comfortable wordes to all men, and that finished (beyng armed at all peces sauing hys helmet) moũted on a litel hyll, so that all hys people myght se and beholde hym perfytly to there great reioysyng: For he was a man of no great stature, but so formed and decorated wyth al giftes and liniamentes of nature that he semed more an angelical creature then a terrestial personage, hys coũtenaũce and aspecte was cherefull and coragious, hys heare yelow lyke ỹ burnyshed golde, his eyes gray shininge and quycke, prompte and ready in answerynge, but of suche sobrietie that it coulde neuer be iudged whyther he ware more dul then quycke in speakyng (such was hys temperaunce.) And when he had ouerloked hys army ouer euerye syde, he pawsed a while, and after wyth a lowde voyce and bolde spirite spake to hys compaignions these or lyke woordes folowynge.

The oraciõ of kyng Henry the vii.

Yf euer GOD gaue victorye to men fyghtinge in a iuste quarell: or yf he euer ayded such as made warre for the wealthe and tuicion of their owne natural and nutritiue countrey: or yf he euer succoured thẽ whyche auentured there lyues for the relefe of innocentes, suppressynge of malefactores and apparaunt offenders: No doubt my felows and frendes, but he of hys bountefull goodnes wyl thys daye sende vs tryumphaunt victorye and a luckey iourney ouer our prowde enemyes, and arrogant aduersaryers: for yf you remember and consyder the very cause of our iuste quarel, you shall apparantely perceyue the same to be trewe, Godly, and vertuous. In the whyche I doubte not but GOD wyll rather ayde vs (yea and fyght for vs) then see vs banquyshed and prosligate by suche as neyther feare hym nor hys lawes, nor yet regarde iustice or honestie. Oure cause is so iuste that no enterprice can be of more vertue, bothe by the lawes dyuyne and cyuyle, for what canne be a more honest, goodlye or Godlye quarel then to fyght agaynst a Captayne, beynge an homicyde and murderer of hys owne bloude or progenye: An extreme destroyer of hys nobylytye, and to hys and oure countrey and the poore subiectes of thesame, a deadly malle a fyrye brande, and a burden vntollerable: besyde hym consyder, who be of hys bande and compaygnye, suche as by murther aud vntruethe commytted agaynste their owne kynne and lynage yea agaynste theyr Prynce and souereygne Lord haue dischery ted me and you and wrongefully deteyne and vsurpe oure lawfull patrymonye and lyneal inherytaunce. For he that calleth hym selfe kynge, kepethe from me the Crowne and regymente of thys noble Realme and countrey contrary to all iustice and equytye. Lykewyse, hys mates and frendes occupie your landes, cut downe your woddes and destroy your maners, letting your wifes and childzen range abroad for their liuing: which persones for ther penaunce and punishment I dout not but GOD of his goodnes wyll eyther deliuer into our handes as a greate gayne and booty, or cause them beynge greued and cõpũcted

with the pricke of ther corrupt consciẽces cowardely to flye and not a-byde the battaylle: besyde this I assure you that there be yonder in ỹ great battayll, men brought thither for feare and not for loue, souldyours by force cõpelled and not with good will assembled, persons which desyer rather the destruccion then saluacion of ther maister & captayn: And finally a multitude, whereof the most part wyl be our frendes and the lest part our enemies. For truely I doubt which is greater the malice of the souldyours toward there captayn, or the feare of hym cõceyued of his people: for surely this rule is infallible, that as yl men daylye x counte to destroy the good, so God appointeth the good to confounde the yll, and of al worldly goodes the greatest is, to suppresse tyrauntes, and releue innocences, wherof the one is as muche hated as the other is beloued. If this be true (as clerkes preache) who wyll spare yoũder tiraunt Richard duke of Gloucester vntrewely callyng him self kynge considering that he hath violated, and broken both the lawe of God & man, what vertue is in him which was the confusion of hys brother & murtherer of his nephewes: what mercy is him that sleythe hys trustie frendes aswell as his extreme enemies: Who can haue confydence in him which putteth diffidence in all mẽ: If you haue no redde, I haue xx hard of clerckes saie, ỹ Tarquine ỹ proude for the vice of the body loste the kyngdome of Rome, and the name of Tarquine, banniched the Ci-tie for euer: yet was not his fault so detestable as the facte of cruel Nero, which slew his owne mother and opened her entrayles to be holde the place of hys conceptyon. Beholde youre Richard whyche is bothe Tarquine and Nero: Yea a tiraunt more then Nero, for he hathe not onely murdered his nephewe being his king & souereigne lord, bastarded his noble brethrẽ & defamed the wombe of his verteous and womanly mother, but also compased al the meanes and wayes ỹ he coulde inuent how to stupryate and carnally know hys owne nece vnder ỹ pre-xxx tence of a cloked matrimony, whych lady I haue swore and promised to take to my make and wyfe as you all know and beleue. If this cause be not iuste, and this quarel Godly, let God the geuer victorye iudge and determine. We haue (thankes be geuen to Christ) escaped ỹ secrete treasons in Britayne, and auoyded the subtyl snares of our fraudulẽt enemies there, passed the troublous sees in good and quiet sauegard, & without resistence haue penetrate the ample regyon and large coũtrey of Wales, and are nowe come to the place, which we so muche desyred, for long we haue sought the furious boze, and now we haue found him.
Wherfore let vs not feare to enter into the toyle where we may suerly xl sley him, for God knoweth ỹ we haue liued in the wales of misery, tos-syng our shippes in daungerous stormes: let vs not now dreade to set vp our sayles in feyre whether hauing with vs both him and good fortune. If we had come to conquet Wales and had acheued it, our prayse had bene great, and our gayne more: but yf we wyn this battayl, ỹ hole ryche realme of England with the lordes and rulers of thesame shalbe oures,the profyt shalbe oures and the honour shall be oures. Therfore labour for your gayne and swet for your ryght: while we were in Bry-tayne,we had smal lyuinges and litle plentie of wealth or welfare,now is the time come to get aboundaunce of riches and copy of profit which is the rewarde of your seruice and meryte of your payne. And this re-mẽber wᵗ your selues,that before vs be our ennemies,and on ether side of vs be such as I neither surely trust,nor greatly beleue, backarde we cannot fly: So that here we staude lyke shepe in a folde circumcepted and compassed betwene our enemies and our doubtfull frendes. There-fore let all feare be set a syde,and like sworne brethren let vs ioyne in one,for this day shalbe thende of our trauayle and the gayne of our la-bour,either by honorable death or famous victory: And as I trust,the battayl shal not be so sore as the profyt shalbe swete . Remẽber ẏ vy-ctorye is not gotten wyth the multitude of men,but with the courages of hertes and valiauntnes of myndes . The smaller that our nõbre is ẏ more glorie is to vs yf we banquishe,if we be ouercome,yet no laud is to be attributed,to the victors,consydering that ten mẽ fought against one:and yf we so dye so glorious a death in so good a querel,neither fre-tyng tynne,nor cancarding obliuiõ shalbe able to obfuscate or race oute of the boke of fame either our names,or our Godly attempt . And this one thyng I assure you, that in so iust and good a cause, and so notable a quarel,you shal fynde me thys day, rather a dead caryon vppon the could grounde,then a fre prysoner on a carpet in a laides chamber. Let vs therfore fight like inuincible giantes, & set on our enemies like vnto timerous Tigers & banysh al feare like rãping lions. And now auaũce forward true men agaynst traitors,pitifully persones against murthe-rers,trew inheritors agaynst vsurpers, ẏ skorges of God againste ty-raũtes,display my baner with a good courage , marche furth like strõg & robustious champions,& begin the battail like hardy conquerers,the battail is at hande,& ẏ victory approcheth,& yf we shamefully recule or cowardely flie,we and al our sequel be destroied & dishonored for euer. This is ẏ day of gayne,& this is the time of losse,get this day victory & be cõquerers,& lese this daies battail & be villains & therfore in ẏ name of God & s. George let euery mã coragyously auaũce forth his stãdard.

These cherefull wordes he set foorth with such gestur of hys body and smiling countenaunce,as though al ready he had vanquyshed hys enemyes and gotten the spoyle.

The battayle betweue king Richard and kyng Henry the.vij.

He had scantly finished his sayenge,but the one army espyed the o-ther,lord how hastely ẏ souldyoures buckled their healmes,how quik-ly the archers bent their bowes and frushed their feathers,how redely ẏ bilmen shoke their billes and proued their staues, redy to approche & ioyne,when the terrible trompet should sownd the bluddy blast to vic-tory or death. Betwene both armies there was a great marrisse which therle of Richemond left on his ryght hand,for thys entẽt that it shuld be on that syde a defence for his part,and in so doyng he had the some

at his

at his backe and in the faces of his enemies. When King Richard saw the earles compaignie was passed ỹ marresse, he commaunded with al haste to set vpon them, then the trompettes blew, & the souldiers showted, and the kings archers coragiously let flie there arrowes, the erles bowmẽ stode not still but payed them home agayn. The terrible shote ones passed, the armies ioined, & came to hande strokes, where neither sword nor bil was spared, at which encounter the lord Stanley ioyned with therle. The erle of Oxforde in the meane season fering lest while his compaignie was fighting, they should be cõpassed & circũuented wt x ỹ multitude of his enemies, gaue cõmaũdemẽt in euery ranke ỹ no mã should be so hardy as go aboue. x. fote frõ ỹ standard, which cõmaundemẽt ones knowẽ, they knit thẽselfes together, & ceased a littel frõ fyghting: the aduersaries sodenly abashed at ỹ matter, & mistrustinge some fraude or deceyte, began also to pause and left strikyng, and not against the willes of many which had leuer haue had the kyng destroyed then saued, & therfore they fought very fayntly or stode still. Therle of Oxforde bringing all his bend together on the one part, set on hys ennemies freshly, agayne, the aduersaries perceyuing that, placed ther mẽ xx slender and thyne before and thycke and brode behinde, beginnyng agaiue hardely the battayl. Whyle the two forwardes thus mortallye fought, eche entending to vanquish and conuince ỹ other, king Richard was admonished by his explorators and espialles, ỹ therle of Richmõd accompaigned with a small nombre of men of armes was not farre of, & as he approched and marched toward him, he perfitly knew his personage by certayn demonstraciõs & tokens, which he had learned and knowen of other. And being inflamed with ire & vexed wt outragious malice, he put his spurres to his horse & rode out of ỹ syde of the range of his battaile, leuyng the auantgardes fyghting, & like a hungery lion ran with spere in rest toward him. Therle of Richemõd perceiued wel xxx the king furiously comming toward hym, and because the hole hope of his welth and purpose was to be determined by battail, he gladly proferred to encountre with him body to body and man to man. King Richard set on so sharpely at the first Broũt ỹ he ouerthrew therles standarde, and slew Sir William Brandon hys standarde bearer (whiche was father to Sir Charles Brandon by kinge Henry the.viij. created duke of Suffolke) and matched hand to hand wt Sir Jhon Cheynie, a man of great force & strength which would haue resisted him, & thesayd Jhon was by him manfully ouerthrowen, and so he making open passage by dent of sworde as he went forward therle of Richemõd wtstode his violence & kept him at the swordes poinct without auantage lõger then his compaignions other thought or iudged, which being almost in dispaire of victorie, were sodainly recomforted by Sir William Stanley, whiche came to succours with.iij. thousand tall men, at whiche very instant kynge Richardes men were driuen backe and fledde, and he him selfe manfully fightinge in the middel of hys enemyes was slayne and brought to his death as he worthely had deserued.

In the meane season therle of Oxforde wyth the ayde of the Lord Stanley, after no long fyght discomfited the forward of king Richard, whereof a greate nomber were slayne in the chace and flyght, but the greatest nomber whych (compelled by fear of the kyng and not of their mere voluntarie mocio) came to the felde, gaue neuer a stroke, and hauing no harme nor domage sauely departed, which came not thether in hope to se the kyng prosper and preuayle, but to here that he shoulde be shamefully confounded and brought to ruyne.

In this battail died fewe aboue the nomber of a thousande persones: And of the nobilitie were slayne Jhon Duke of Norfolke, whyche was warned dy dyuers to refrayne from the felde, in so much that the nyght before he shoulde set forward towarde the kynge, one wrote on his gate. f

Jack of Norffolke be not to bolde For Dyken thy mayster is bought and solde.

Yet al this notwithstandinge he regarded more hys othe, his honour and promyse made to king Richard, lyke a gentleman and a faythfull subiecte to his prince absented not him selfe from hys mayster, but as he faythefully lyued vnder him, so he manfully dyed wyth hym to hys ff greate fame and lawde. There were slayne beside him Water Lorde Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Radcliffe, and Robert Brakēburie Leutenaunt of the Tower and not many gentlemen mo. Sir Wyllyā Catesbey learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe coūsailers to the late king, wᵗʰ diuerse other were. ij. dayes after behedded at Leycester. Amongest them that ran away were Sir Fraunces Uicount Louell and Humfrey Stafford & Thomas Stafford hys brother which toke sanctuary in saynct Jhons at Gloucester. Of captiues and prysoners there was a greate nomber, for after the death of kyng Rychard was knowen and publysshed, euery manne in manner vnarfff mynge him selfe and castynge away hys abilumentes of warre, mekely submitted them selfes to the obeysaunce and rule of the earle of Richemonde: of the whiche the more parte had gladly so done in the begynnynge, yf they myght haue conueniently escaped from kyng Richards espialles, whyche hauynge as clere eyes as lynx, and open eares as Mydas ranged and serched in euery quarter. Amōgest these was Hēry the. iiij. erle of Northumberlande, which whether it was by the cōmaundement of kyng Richard puttyng diffidence in him, or he dyd it for the loue & fauor that he bare vnto the earle, stode still wyth a greate compaignye & intermitted not in the battayll, whych was incontinētly fl receyued into fauour and made of the coūsayll. But Thomas Hawarde erle of Surrey whiche submitted him self ther, was not taken to grace because his father was chefe coūsailer & he greatly familiar with kyng Richard, but cōmitted to the Tower of Londō, where he lōg remained & in conclusiō deliuered, & for his trueth and fidelity after promoted to

highe honors offices and dignities. On therle of Richemondes parte were slayne scace one hundred persones, amongest whome the principall was Sir William Brandon hys standard bearer.

This battail was fought at Bosworth in Leycester shire the. xxij. day of August in the yere of our redemption a. M. CCCC. lxxxvi. the hole conflicte endured littel aboue two houres. Kyng Richard as the fame wente might haue escaped and gotten sauegarde by flyenge. For when they which were next about his person saw and perceyued at the first enioyning of the battayll the souldioures faintly and nothing coux ragiously to set on their enemies, & not onely that, but also that som wt drewe them selfes pryuely out of the preasse and departed. They began to suspect fraude and to smel treason, and not onelye exhorted but determynatly aduysed hym to saue hym selfe by flyght: and when yͤ losse of the battaill was immynent and apparante, they broughte to hym a swyfte and alight horse to conuey hym away. He which was not ignorant of the grudge & yl wil that the cõmon people bare toward him, casting away al hope of fortunate successe & happy chaunce to come, answered (as men say) that on that daye he wouldе make an end of al battailes or els there finish his life. Such a great audacitie & such a stowte xy stomake reigned in his body, for suerlye he knew yͤ to be the daye in the which it should be decided & determined whither he should peaseably obtein & enioy his kingdom during his life, or els vtterly forgo & be depriued of the same, with which to much hardines he beynge ouercome hastely closed his helmet, and entered fiercely into the hard battaill, to thentent to obteyne that day a quiet reigne & regiment, or els to finish there his vnquiet life & vnfortunate gouernaũce. And so this miser at yͤ same very poynct had like chaunce & fortune, as happeneth to suche which in place of right iustice & honesty, folowing their sensual appetite loue, vse & embrace, mischief, tyranny and vnthriftynes. Suerly these xy be examples of more vehemencie then mans tong can expresse, to fear and astonne such euyl persones as wyl not leue one houre vacant from doyng and exercysing crueltie mischiefe or outragious lyuyng.

When therle had thus obteigned victorie and slain his mortal enemie, he kneled doune and rendred to almighty god his harty thãkes w deuout & Godly orisons, besechyng hys goodnes to sende him grace to auaunce & defende the catholycke fayth & to maintayn iustice & cõcord amõgest his subiectes & people, by God now to hys gouernaũce cõmitted & assigned: Which prayer fynished, he replenished with incõparable gladnes, ascended vp to the top of a littel mountaine, where he not on-xl ly praised & lawded his valiaunt souldioures, but also gaue vnto them his harty thankes, w promise of condigne recõpence for their fidelite & valiaũt factes, willing & commaunding al the hurt & wounded persons to be cured, and the dead carcases to be deliuered to yͤ sepulture. Thẽ yͤ people reioysed & clapped handes crying vp to heuen, king Hẽry, king Henry. When the lord Stanley sawe the good wyll and gratute of yͤ people he toke the crowne of kyng Richard which was founde amongeſt the ſpoyle in the fielde, and ſet it on therles head, as though he had bene elected king by the voyce of the people as in auncyent times paſt in diuers realmes it hath bene accuſtomed, and thys was the firſt ſigne and token of his good lucke and felicite. I muſt put you here in remēbraunce how that kyng Richard puttynge ſome diffidence in the lord Stanley, whych had w hym as an hoſtage, the lorde ſtraung his eldeſt ſonne, whych lord Stanley as you haue hearde before ioyned not at ꝑ fyrſt wyth hys ſonne in lawes armye, for feare that kyng Richarde woulde haue ſlayne the Lorde Straunge his heyre. When kyng Ry- ꝑ chard was come to Boſwoorth, he ſent a purſeuaunt to the lord Stā-ley, commaundyng him to auaunce forward wyth hys companye and to come to his preſence, whiche thinge yf he refuſed to do, he ſware by Chriſtes paſſiō that he would ſtryke of his ſonnes hedde before he dy-ned. The lorde Stanley aunſwered the purſiuaunt that yf the kynge dyd ſo, he had more ſonnes alyue, and as to come to hym he was not then ſo determyned: when kyng Richard harde this anſwere he commaunded the lorde Straunge incontinent to behedded, whyche was at that very ſame ſeaſon when both the armyes had ſight ech of other.

The counſayllers of king Richard pondering the time and the cauſe, ꝑ knowyng alſo the Lorde Straunge to be iunocente of his fathers offence, perſwaded the kynge that it was now time to fight and not time to execucyon, aduiſinge him to kepe the Lorde Straunge as a pryſo-ner till the battayll were ended, and then at Leyſer hys pleaſur might be accompliſhed. So as God woulde king Richarde enfrynged hys holy othe, and the lorde was deliuered to the kepers of the kynges tē-tes to be kept as a priſoner, whiche when the felde was done and their maiſter ſlayne and proclamacion made to knowe where the childe was they ſubmitted them ſelfes as pryſoners to the Lorde Straunge, and he gently receiued them, and brought them to the new proclamed king ꝑ where of him and of his father he was receyued wyth greate ioye and gladnes. After this the hole campe remoued with bagge and baggage and the ſame nyght in the eueninge kynge Henry wyth great Pompe came to the toune and Leyceſter. Where aſwel for the refreſhinge of hys people and ſouldioures as for preparyng all thinges neceſſary for hys iourneye towarde London, he reſted and repoſed hym ſelfe twoo dayes. In the meane ſeaſon the deade Corpes of kynge Richarde was as ſhamefnllye caryed to the towne of Leyceſter, as he gorgiouslye the daye before wych Pompe and pryde departed oute of the ſame towne. For his bodye was naked and deſpoyled to the ſkyne, and no-thynge lefte aboue hym not ſo muche as a clowte to couer hys pryue ꝑ members, and was truſſed behynde a purſyuaunt of armes called blaunche ſenglyer, or whyte boze, lyke a hogge or a calfe, the heade and armes hangynge on the one ſyde of the horſe, and the legges ane the other ſyde, and all by ſprynckled wyth myre and bloude, was brought brought to the gray fryers church wythin the toune and there lay like a myserable spectacle: but surely conſideryng his mischeuous actes & facynorous doynges, men may worthely wonder at such a caytyne, & in the sayde churche he was not wyth lesse funerall pompe, and solempnitie enterred, then he woulde to be done at the bearyng of hys innocent nephewes whome he caused cruelly to be murthered and vnnaturally to be quelled.

When his death was knowen, few lamented, and many reioised, the proude braggynge white bore (whiche was his badge) was vyolently x raled and plucked doune from euery signe and plate where it might be espyed, so yl was his lyfe, that men wished the memory of hym to be buryed wyth his carren corps: He reygned two yeres, two monethes & one daye.

As he was small and litle of stature, so was he of body greately deformed, the one shoulder higher then the other, his face smal, but his cõtenauuce was cruel, and such, that a man at the first aspect would iudge it to sauor and smel of malice, fraude and deceite: when he stode musing he would byte and chaw besely his nether lyppe, as who saith that his fyerce nature in hys cruel body alwayes chafed, sturred and was euer xx vnquiet: beside that, the dagger that he ware he would whẽ he studied with hys hande plucke vp and doune in the sheth to the myddes, neuer drawyng it fully out, hys wyt was pregnaunt, quicke & ready, wyly to fayne and apte to dissimule, he had a proud mynd and an arrogant stomacke, the which accompaignied hym to his deth, whiche he rather desyryng to suffer by dent of swerde, then beyng forsaken and destitute of hys vntrewe compaignions, woulde by coward flyght, preserue and saue his vncertayne lyfe: Whyche by malyce, sickness or condigne punishment myght chaunce shortly after to come to confusyon.

The discription of kyng Richarde the third.

Thus ended thys prince his mortal life with infamy and dishonor, xx whiche neuer preferred fame or honestie before ambicion, tyranny and mischiefe. And yf he had continued still Protectoure, and suffered hys nephewes to haue lyued and reigned, no doubt but the realme had prospered, and he muche praysed and beloued as he is nowe abhorred and vilipended, but to God which knew his interior cogitacyons at the houre of his deathe. I remitte the punishment of hys offences commmytted in his lyfe.

FINIS.

The politique gouernaunce of Kyng Henry. vii.

Onsidering now that I haue sufficiently declared what mischief kyng Richard the third wroughtwith in this realme after ỹ death of his noble brother kyng Edward the fourth: and how the nobilite of his kyngdom maligned and conspired against him, and abandoned and left him in maner desolate at the day of his most nede & tribulaciõ: Also how miserably he ended his lyfe at ỹ toune of Boswoorth, and how vnreuerẽtly he was enterred at ỹ toune of Leicestre, which I doubt not but is sufficiently declared vnto you. And now only resteth to shewe you what happened after his fall and confusion to hym, that both vanquished and depriued him from his princely powre and royall dignitie.

When kyng Henry had not onely obtained this triumphant battaile at the plain of Boswoorth against his malicious enemy kyng Rychard, but also by glorious victory gatt the diademe and possession of the state royall and princely prehemynence of this famous Empire and renowmed kyngdome. He hauing both the ingenious forecast of the subtyll serpent, & also fearyng the burning fire like an infant that is a litle synged with a small flame: and farther vigilantly forseeing and prudently prouidyng for doubtes that might accidentally ensue: deuysed, studied and compassed to extirpate and eradicate all interior seditions & apparant presumpcions whiche might moue any tumultuous route or seditious coniuracion against him within his realme in tyme to come. And to obsist the first likely mischiefe, he sent before his departure from Leycestre Sir Robert wylloghby knight to the maner of Sheryhoutton in the county of Yorke, for Edward plantagenet Erle of Warwike sonne and heire to George duke of Clarẽce then beyng of the age of .xv. yeres, whom kyng Rychard had kept there as a prisoner duryng the tyme of his vsurped reigne. And surely ỹ kyng was not afeard without a cause, for he muche mistrusted least by this young man, some euil disposed and enuious persons of his glory and aduauncemẽt might inuent some new occasion of renuyng of battaill against hym: which beyng euen from his infancy with many encombrances and troubles vexed & endaungered, desired nothyng more hartely then now to lyue in quyetnes, peace and tranquilitie. Sir Robert willoghby accordyng to hys commission receaued of the conestable of the castle the Erle Edward, and hym conuey-ghed to London, where the youngelyng borne to perpetuall calamitie was incontynent in the towre of London put vnder safe and sure custody. There was beside hym in thesame Castell of Sheryhutton the lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to kyng Edward, whome kyng Rychard lyghly fantasiyng and deuelyshly dotyng, dyd entende to marry as you before haue heard, but the damosell dyd not alonly disagre and repudiate that matrimony, but abhorred and detested greatly his abhominable desyre. At which most importunate and detestable concupiscence, the cõmon people of the realme so muche grudged and maligned that they did not only attribute ỹ faute & cryme to the kyng, but much more culpate & blame his preuy councellers which did not dissent, but consent to so pernicious a counsail and so shameful a conclusion: But God of his only goodnes preserued the chrysten minde of ỹ vertuous & immaculate virgin, & from that flagicious & facinerous acte, dyd graciously protect and defende: The whiche lady not long after, accompanied with a great nombre aswel of noblemen as honorable matrones, was with good spede conueighed to London and brought to her mother.

In the meane season the kyng remoued forward by iorneyes toward London, and euen as he passed, the rusticall people on euery syde of the wayes assembled in great nombres & with great ioye clapped their handes & showted, cryng, kyng Henry, kyng Henry. But whẽ he approched nere the citie, the Mayre, the Senate and the magistrates of thesame beyng all clothed in violet, met him at Shordiche, and not onely saluted & welcomed him with one voyce in generall, but euery person perticulerly preased and aduaũced him selfe, gladly to touche and kysse that victorious handes whiche had ouercome so monstruous and cruel a tiraunt, geuing laudes and praisynges to almighty God, and rendring immortall thankes to hym, by whose meane & industry the cõmen wealth of the realme was preserued from finall destruccion & perpetual calamite, and the authores of the mischief sublated & plucked away. And with great pompe & triumphe he roade through the citie to the cathedral church of S. Paule wher he offred his .iii. standardes. In the one was the ymage of S. George, in the second was a red firy dragon beaten vpon white & grene sarcenet, ỹ third was of yelowe tarterne, in thewhich was peinted a donne kowe. After his prayers said & Te deum song, he departed to the byshoppes palais and there soiourned a season, during which time, plaies, pastimes and pleasures were shewed in euery parte of the citie. And to thentent that their good mind toward God should not be put in oblicion, they caused general processions solemply to be celebrate to rendre and yelde to God their creator & redemer their hartie and humble thankes whiche had deliuered them frõ miserable captiuite & restored them to libertie and fredome. Beside this, they that fauoured and loued the kyng were inwardly ioyous to se & perceaue that their aduersaries and back frendes were all ready or lyke to be suppeditate and ouerthrowen.

When these solempnities & gratifications were done & passed: accordyng dyng as other kynges had bene accustomed, he cõgregated together the sage councelers of his realme, in which cõsiail like a prince of iust faith and true of promes, detesting all intestine & cyuell hostilite, appointed a daye to ioyne in matrimony ỹ lady Elyzabeth heire of the house of yorke, with his noble personage heyre to ỹ lyne of Lancastre: whiche thyng not onely reioysed and comforted the hartes of the nobles and gẽtlemen of the realme, but also gained the fauour & good mindes of all the cõmen people, muche extollyng and praisyng the kynges constant fidelite and his polletique deuyce, thynkyng surely that the day was now come & that the sede of tumulteous factions and the fountaine of ciuyle dissencion shoulbe stopped euacuate and clerely extinguished.

After this, he with great pompe was cõueighed to Westmynster, and there the thirty daye of October was with all ceremonies accustomed, enoynted & crouned kyng by the whole assent aswel of the cõmons as of the nobilite, & was named kyng Henry the. vii. of that name, which was in the yere of our redemption. M.cccc.lxxxvi. Frederyke the. iii. then beyng Emperour of Almayne, Maximilian his sonne then beyng newely elected kyng of Romanes, Charles the. viii. reigning ouer the Frenche nacion & Iames the. iii. rulyng the realme of Scotland. Whiche kyngdome he obtayned & enioyed as a thyng by God elected & prouided, and by his especiall fauoure & gracious aspecte compassed and acheued. In so muche that men cõmonly repoxt that. vii. C. xcvii. yeres passed, it was by a heauenly voyce reueled to Cadwaladet last kyng of Brytons that his stocke and progeny should reigne in this land and beare dompnion agayn: & herupõ most men were persuaded in their awne opinion that by this heauẽly voice he was prouided and ordeined long before to enioye and obteine this kyngdome, whiche thing kyng Henry the. vi. did also shewe before as you haue heard declared. Wherefore he beyng by right and iust tytle of temporall inheritaunce, & by prouision of deuyne puruetaunce thus crouned and proclaimed kyng: First of all vsyng the antique example of the Athenienses, whiche is to perdon and put out of memory all crymes and offences before tyme agaynst hym or his lawes perpetrated or cõmitted, he called his high court of parliamẽt at Westmynster the. vii. daye of Nouembre for thestablishyng of all thinges aswell cõcernyng the preseruacion and maintenaunce of his royall person, as the adminystracion of iustice and preferment of the cõmon wealth of this realme and dominion, in the which he caused to be proclaimed that all men were perdoned, acquyted and clercly discharged of all offences, peynes of death and executions, and should be restored to their landes and mouable goodes whiche would submit them selfes to his clemency and by othe be obliged truly to serue and obeye hym as their souereigne lorde, & who woulde be obstinate & refuse to retorne to his parte, should be accepted and taken as a publike enemy to hym and his countrey. By reason of whiche proclamacion, a great nombre that came out of diuerse sanctuaries and priuileged places obteyned grace, forgetting clerely the diuersite of factions & voice of partakyng. After this, he began to remember his espetall frendes and fautours, of whome, some he auaunced to honour and dignite, and some he enriched with possessions & goodes, euery man according to his desert & merite. And to beginne, Jaspar his vncle Erle of Penbroke, he created duke of Bedforde, Thomas lorde Stanley he promoted to be Erle of Darby, and the lorde Chandew of Bryteine his especial frend he made erle of Bathe, sir Gyles Dawbeney was made lorde Dawbeney, sir Robert Willoughby was made lorde Broke which be in their degre barons and peres of the realme. And Edward stafford eldest son to Henry late duke of Buckingham, he restored to his name, dignitie and possessions, which kyng Rychard did confiscate and attainted. Besyde this, in this parliament was this notable acte assented to and concluded as foloweth.

And beside this acte, al attainders of this kyng, enacted by kyng Edward & kyng Rychard were adnichilated, and the record of thesame adiudged to be defaced & put out of memory, and al persons attainted for his cause & occasion, were restored to their goodes, landes & possessions. And in cōclusion, diuerse of the actes made in the tyme of kyng Edward and kyng Richard were adnulled & reuoked, & other more expedient for the vtilitie of the cōmen wealth were subrogated and concluded. When all thynges necessary were discretely ordred and the parliament for the tyme dyssolued, the kyng thought it not necessary to put in obliuion his frendes and hostages beyng beyond the sea, wherfore with all diligent celeritie he redemed the Marques Dorcet & sir Jhon Bourchier whom he had lefte as pledges at Parys for money there before borowed. And sent also into Flaunders for Jhon Morton bishop of Ely.

These actes perfourmed, he stablished in his house a graue counsaill of wyse and politique men, by whose iudgement, ordre and determinacō the people might be gouerned accordyng to iustice and equitie, and that all causes might be finyshed and ended there, without great bearyng or expence in long sute. And for hearyng and decydyng these causes iustly and spedely, he sware of his counsaill dyuerse noble and discrete persones, whiche for their polecy, wit and synguler grauitie, were highly esteemed and renowned, whose names folowe, Jaspar duke of Bedforde,

Jhon

Jhon erle of Oxford, Thomas Stanley erle of Darby, Jhon bishop of Ely, sir Willia stanley lord Chāberlein of his houshold, sir Robert Willoughby, lord Broke, lord Stuard of his houshold, Gyles lord Dawbeney, Jhō lord Dynhā after made treasorer of Englād, sir Reignold Brey, sir Jhon Cheiney, sir Richard Guyldford, sir Richard Tunstall, sir Rychard Egecombe sir Thomas Louel, sir Edward Pownynges, sir Jhō Risley, with diuerse othet wyse men, whiche as the tyme required he called to his counsaill and seruice nowe one and nowe another.

Although by this election of wyse and graue councellers all thynges ℞ seined to be brought to a good ⁊ perfight conclusion, yet there lacked a wrest to the harpe to set al the strynges in a monacorde and tune, which was the matrimony to be finished betwene the kyng and the lady Elizabeth daughter to kyng Edward, whiche lyke a good prynce accordyng to his othe and promes, he did both solempnise and consummate in briefe tyme after, that is to saye on the. xviii. date of January. By reason of whiche mariage peace was thought to discende out of heauen into England, consyderyng that the lynes of Lancastre ⁊ Yorke, being both noble families equiualent in ryches, fame and honour, were now brought into one knot ⁊ conneyed together, of whose two bodies one heire might ℞ succede, whiche after their tyme should peaceably rule and enioye the whole monarchy and realme of England. Bar. 16 B.

These thynges thus passed, albeit that apparauntly all thynges semed to be reduced to a good pointe and set in a sure steye: Kyng Henry beyng made wyse and expert with troubles and mischiefes before past, remembred that it was wisdome to feare ⁊ prouide for the craftie wyles and lurkyng trappes of his secrete enemies, remembring all men for the moost part embrued and exercised in plantyng of diuision and sowyng dissencion, can not lightely leaue their pestiferous appetite and seditious occupacion. Wherfore, for thesauegarde and preseruacion of his awne ℞ body, he cōstituted ⁊ ordeyned a certayn nomber aswell of good archers as of diuerse other persons being hardy, strong and of agylitie to geue dayly attendaunce on his person, whom he named Yomen of his garde, which president men thought that he learned of the Frenche kyng when he was in Fraunce: For men remembre not any kyng of England before that tyme whiche vsed suche a furniture of dayly souldyours. Yet forasmuche as to auoyde and eschewe all doubtfull daungers and perelles vnloked for, lytle auayleth outward warre, except there be a sure staye, and a stedfast backstande at home, aswel for the sauegarde ⁊ securite, as for the good gouernaūce of such as be left behinde: He therfore commo- ℞ ned agayne his great courte of parliament, wherto he would that there should be elected the most prudent ⁊ grauous persons of euery countie, cytie, porte and borough, and in especiall such as he in all his daungers, calamities, miseries and tumultuous affayres, vsed, trusted and fauoured, as partakers, councelers, and compaignions both of his woo and aduersitie, and also of his triumphe and glorious victory, whose mindes Bar. 10 L. and studyes he perfightly knewe to be fixed and set in the polytique regiment and prudent gouernaunce of the publique wealth of his realme and dominion. Not forgettyng, but hauyng in fresh memory that he for that cause principally was so sore delyred, & instantly called of the Englishe nacion his naturall countrey men: Estemyng it as a chiefe & principal part of his duetie to se his realme both adourned and decored with good and proffitable lawes & statutes, and also to florysshe in vertteous operacions and good and cyuile maners, whiche should be an occasion to cause all men to hope that all thyng would contynually amend, from euyll to good, from good to bettre, and from bettre to the best. This sure foundacion kyng Henry laide at the beginning of hys reigne, entending theron continually to builde.

In this same yere a newe kynde of sickues came sodenly through the whole regiõ euen after the first entring of the kyng into this yle, which was so sore, so peinful & sharp ỹ the like was neuer harde of, to any mans remẽbraunce before that tyme: For sodenly a deadly & burning sweate inuaded their bodies & vexed their bloud w̃ a most ardent heat, & infested ỹ stomack & the head greuously: by ỹ tormenting & veraciõ of which sickenes, men were so sore handled & so pamfully pangued that if they were laied in their bed, being not hable to suffre the importunat heat, they cast away the shetes & all the clothes lyng on the bed. If they were in their apparell & vestures, they would put of all their garmentes euen to their shirtes. Other were so dzie ỹ they dzanke ỹ colde water to quenche their importune heate & insaciable thirst. Other ỹ coulde or at the least would abide the heate & stynche (for in dede the sweate had a great & a strõg sauoure) caused clothes to be laied vpõ theim asmuch as they could beare, to dziue out the sweate if it might be. All in maner assone as the sweate toke them, or within a short space after, yelded vp their ghost. So that of all them that sickened there was not one emongest an hundreth that escaped: In somuch, that beside the great nombre whiche deceased within the cytie of London, two Mayres successiuely dyed of thesame desease within. viii. dayes & vi. Aldermẽ. And when any person had fully & completely sweat. xxiiii. houres (for so long did the strength of this plague hold them) he should be then clerely deliuered of his desease: yet not so cleane ryd of it, but that he might shortly relaps & fall again into thesame cuil pit, yea again & twise againe as many one in dede did, which after the third tyme died of thesame. At the length by study of the Phisicians & experience of the people, dziuen therunto by dzeadfull necessitie, there was a remedy inuented: For they that survived, considering therstremitie of the peyne in them that deseased, deuised by thinges mere cõtrariaunt, to resist & withstãd the furious rage of that burning furnesse, by luke warme dzinke, temperat heate, & measurable clothes. For suche persons as relapsed again into the flame after the first deliueraunce, obserued

serued diligently & marked suche thinges as did theim ease & confort at their first vexacio, & vsing thesame for a remedy & medicine of their peine, addyng euer somwhat therto that was sanatyue & wholsome. So that if any person euer after fell sycke again, he obseruing the regiment that emongest the people was deuysed could shortly helpe him selfe, & ealely tempre and auoyde the strength and malyce of the sweate. So that after the great losse of many men, they learned a present & a spedy remedy for thesame desease and malady, thewhiche is this: If a man on the daye tyme were plagued with the sweate, then he shoulde straycht lye downe x with all his clothes and garmentes and lye stil the whole. xxiiii. houres. If in the night he were taken, then he should not ryse out of his bed for the space of. xxiiii. houres, & so calle the clothes that he myght in no wyse prouoke the sweate, but so lye temperately that the water myght distille oute softely of the awne accorde, & to absteyne from all meate if he might so long sustayne and suffre hungre and to take no more drynke neyther hote nor colde, then wyll moderately quenche and delaye his thrustye appetyde. And in this his amendyng, one poynte dylygently aboue all other is to be obserued and attended, that he neuer put his hand or fote out of the bed to refresh or cole him selfe, thewhich to do is no lesse peine xx then short death. So you may plainly see what remedy was by the daily experience excogitated and inuented for this straunge and vnknowē desease, thewhich at that tyme vexed and greued only the realme of England in euery toune and village as it did diuerse tymes after. But. lv. yere after, it sailed into Flaunders and after into Germany, where it destroyed people innumerable for lacke of knowlege of the English experience. This cōtagious & euell plague chaunced in the first yere of kyng Henryes reigne as a token and a playn signe (if to the vaine iudgement of the people whiche cōmonly cōmen more fantastically then wysely, any faith or credite is to be had, geuē or attributed) that kyng Henry should xx haue a harde and sore beginning, but more truly if vayne superstition can set furth any truthe, it pretended & signified that kyng Henry to the extreme pointe and ende of his naturall life should neuer haue his spyrite and mynde quiet, consyderyng that nowe in the very beginnyng of his newe obtayned reigne, he was (as you shall shortly heare) with sedicion and cōmocion of his people, troubled, vexed and vnquieted, and it was in maner a manifest proue that hereafter he should liue in smal rest and great mistrust of suche rebellious and seditious cōspiracies. These were the phantasticall iudgementes of the vnlettred persones whiche I ouerpasse, and returne to my purpose.

xl When all thinges by ỹ kyng were appeased at London & that he had set & appoynted all his affaires in good ordre and sure state, as he with him selfe cōiectured, he thought it best to make a peregrinacio & take his progresse into ỹ other quarters of his realme, ỹ he might wede, extirpate and purge the myndes of mē spotted & cōtaminate with the contagious smoke of dissencion & preuy faccions, and especially the coūtie of Yorke which were pzeuy fautoures and cõfozters of the contraty part, and not without a cause. Foz kyng Richard moze loued, moze esteined & tegarded the nothern men then any subiectes within his whole realme, which thyng to kyng Henry was not vnknowē. Wherfoze he the moze studied to kepe thē in dew obeisaunce & faithfull obsequy, whō he knew of long custome to haue bozne their hartes & fauourable myndes to his aduersaries: therfoze in the pzime time of the yere he toke his iozney towardes Yozke, & because the feast of Easter appzoched, he diuerted to the citie of Lyncoln, where he taried during the solempnite of that high feast: & makyng there his abode, he was certified ỹ the lozd Louel & Homfrey Stafford were departed out of sanctuary in Colchestre: but to what place oz whether, no man as yet could tell. Foz which cause the kyng lytle tegardyng the tale went fozthe his appointed iozney to Yozke. And assone as he was there receaued & settled, it was bzuted, and openly shewed to the kyng hym selfe that Fraunces lozde Louell was at hande with a strong and mighty powze of men, and would with all diligence inuade the cytie: also that the foznamed Homfrey Staffozd and Thomas his bzother were in wozcettre shyze and there had rayled a great bande of rude and rusticall people, & had cast lottes what parte should assaute the gates, what men should scale the walles of the cytie of Wozcestre, & who pp should kepe the passages foz letyng of reskewes and aiders.

At the firste heryng of this, the kyng estemed it foz vayne & vncertain, and therfoze was with it but litle moued: but after that he was ceztified by the letters of credence sent frō his frendes, that all was true that was by the cōmen voice spoken and published, he was afflicted with no small feare. And surely not without a cause, foz he wysely cōsidzed that he had neither a competent army ready pzepared, noz harneis noz weapons foz them that were pzesent. And also he was now in such a doubtfull place, where he nether might noz could cōueniently gather an hoost together, cōsideryng that in thesame cytie, the memozy of kyng Richard his moz- pp tall enemy was yet recent and lyuely & not all fozgotten of his frendes, but because the matter requyzed dylygent celerytie, least that by long tariyng the powze of his aduersaries by daily aides might be encreased and multiplied, he commaunded the duke of Bedfozd with .iii. thousand men not strongely armed to do a great entrepzyce (foz their bzest plates foz the most part were made of tanned lether) to encountre and set vpon them with all hast and diligence, and made him pzeuy what he him selfe entended to doo. After this, the kyng congregated together an hoost in euery place where he myght retayne theim. The duke settyng fozwarde after the fassion of an eger & fierce captaine came nygh to the tentes and rl campe of his enemies where he consulted and communicated his minde with certayn captaines and sage souldiours of his compaigny, by what waye he might treyne & allure theim to peace, without battaill oz bloodshedding. After whiche deliberacion and aduisement had, yt was decreed that the Heraulde should pzoclayme openly, that all such should

haue grace and pardon that would caſt doune their weapons and harneys, and as faithfull ſubiectes ſubmyt them ſelfes to their naturall ſoueraigne lord. The which proclamacion auayled & muche proffited: For the lord Louel, either for ſome feare or diffidence that he had in his people and ſouldiours, or fearyng hym ſelfe on his awne behalfe, fled preuily in a nyght from his compaignie and left them without ahead, as a flocke of ſhepe without a ſhephard, which departure when it was to his armye diſcloſed, they put of their armure and came directly to the duke, euery man humbly ſubmittyng hym ſelfe and deſiryng pardon for their offences, wholy truſting in the kynges mercy and fauourable goodnes.

So by this politique wiſdome & ingenious meanes of the good duke, this great rage and fierce route of ſturdy and valyaũt traitours whiche was prepared againſt the kyng, and were lyke to haue bene the ſlaughter of many a man, were pacifyed & repreſſed and brought to good conformitie and obedient ſubiection. And the lorde Louell cheuteyne and chiefe leader of this tumult and rebellion, fearing more peril and daungier, then deſiryng renoume or fame of chiualry, neuer tariyng ỹ doubtfull chaunce of battayle, fled in all poſt haſte into Lancaſhire, and there for a certayne ſpace loytred and lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton knyght, whiche in thoſe quarters bare great ſwynge, and was there in great aucthoritie. Homfrey Stafford alſo hearyng of this myſchaunce happened to the lord Louell, in a great dolor and agony, and for feare, in lyke maner fled and tooke ſanctuary in a village called Culnaham, two myles from Abyndon. But becauſe the ſanctuary was not a ſufficient defence (as it was proued before the iuſtices of the kynges benche) for traytoures, he was taken by force frõ that place, and brought to the towre, and from thence conueighed to Tyborne and there put to execution: But his yoũger brother Thomas, that was with hym, was pardoned & remitted becauſe he was thought not to haue done it of his awne wyll and malicious mynde, but thorowe the euell counſaill and miſchieuous perſuaſion of his Elder brother.

After that the kyng had thus by pollecy of his cõſaill appeaſed and repreſſed this tumulteous ſedicion which greatly vexed and vnquyeted his ſpirites, and had reduced to reaſon and cõformitie the rude and baſe blyng people of the north parties, and in eſpeciall thinhabitaũtes of the countye of Yorke, he returned to London, & ſhortly after that to Wyncheſtre, where quene Elizabeth his wyfe was deliuered of a fayre prynce named Arthur at his baptyme. Of whiche name Engliſhmen nomore reioyſed then outwarde nacions & foreyne prynces trymbled and quaked, ſo muche was that name to all nacions terrible & formidable: And from Wynchеſtre he returned back agayn to London.

The birth of prince Arthur

In this meane tyme, of a ſmal matter, and theſame altogether beyng falſe & feyned, ther was an open pathe & apparaunt high weie made for a greater inconuenience to enſue. The which matter for the ſubtyll iuggelyng & craftie cõueighaunce of theſame, no leſſe deceptfull then ligier de meyne

de mayne in the hand of a tuggeler, was to be estemed emongest al wyse men at the first a very bold & ouer presumpteous an acte to be attepted: but the tyme wel weied & considred it was not so monstrous that it were worthy great wondering & admiracion, considring that many persons of late, either borne in the wõbe of continual discencion, or norished with the mylke, or suckyng the pappes of ciuyle seditiõ, could not liue well in rest, & lesse forbeare their vsual custome of mouing strife & daily debate. But they somtime sytting at home cõpassing & ymagining hurte & dãmage toward suche as they in their hattes disdeyned, somtyme remembryng that by the libertie & priuilege of warre, al is fishe that cõmeth to þ the net, euer delityng in spoylyng, robbyng & reuinge, vehemently thristyng for the distruccion & losse of such as thei would be reuẽged of, willyng to liue without lawe in tyme of peace & warre, wisshyng the world neuer to be at a bettre staye. And as persons only dedicate & geuẽ to mischief & scelerous inuencions, either for hatred, euill wil or malice of thẽ that they fauoured not, or for some emolumẽt, proffite and cõmoditie of such þ they thought to set vp & auaunce, were by fraude, couyn & crafty collusion prone & ready to disquiet euery day the kyng & his whole realme, thinking þ heauẽ had to much peace & quietnes, & hel to litle trouble and vexacion. And there was furtherers & setters on, none lackyng, in so þ much that .xx. persons would soner pricke them forward with a sharpe spurre, then one plucke thẽ back wt a dullsnaffle. Emong the which mõstres & lymbes of the deuell, there was one sir Richard Symond priest, a man of a base & obscure familie, which from his birth delited in fraude and craftie conueighyng, & yet was he well learned, but not so well learned as wilye, nor so wilye as vngracious. Which sir Richard Symond had elected a scoler, called Lambert Symenell, one of a gentle nature & pregnaunt wyt to be the organe and conduytie by whom he would conuey his false feigned enterprice and attempt. The deuell chiefe master of mischiefe put in the wicked mynde and venemouse brayne of this moost þ pernicious disloyall and trayterous person, to commente, feigne & deuise how he might make his childe and scolar Lambert to be the right inheritour to the croune of England, & so therof to make hym kyng & to promote him self to the chiefe Archebyshopryke or some high potestate wtin the realme. The chiefe foundacion of his occasion was (by the whiche he was the more bolde) that the fame went and many men surely supposed kyng Edwards children not to be dead, but to be fled secretely into some straunge place & there to be liuing, & that Edward erle of Warwike son and heire to the duke of Clarence, either was or should be put to death shortly. These rumoures although they were friuolous & vayne & with þ out all likelyhode of veritie or truthe, animated & encouraged this priest much, to thinke and iudge the tyme to be come that this Lambert might assume & take vpon hym the person & name of one of kyng Edward the fourthes chyldren, and to clayme and make title both to the realme and kyngdome, hauyng sure knowlege that neyther frendshyp should want nor aide

noz aide should lacke: and consydering that cancard hatred roted and foũded vpon facinozous faccions & seditious deuisions be so perdura-ble and in maner euerlasting that they can neuer be clerely extirpate oz digged out of their rotté hartes, but that they wille with hande and fote toothe and nayle further if they can their pretensed entreprice. And this pooze priest brought into this foolysche paradice through his awne fan-tasticall ymagination, informed and taught the child diligently at Oxforde where he went to scoole, both instructyng him with princely behaueour, cuyple maner and fruitefull literature, declaryng to him of what x high parentage and of what noble progeny he was lyneally descended, thus persuadyng, and teachyng him his lesson clerckly and crattely, foz his purpose, that the people hearing the chyld thus rehersing his lesson so tagely, might the rather geue credite to his deceitfull pretence & talse coloured inuencion: Sone after the rumour was blowen abzoade that Ban. 22. E Edward the young erle of Warwike was brokẽ out of prison. And whẽ sir Symõd heard of this, he now intending therby to bring his inuented purpose to a cõclusion, chaũged ỹ chyldes name of baptime & called him Edward after ỹ name of the poũg erle of Warwike, ỹ which were both of one yeres & of one stature, & then he wt his pupille sailed into Irelãd, xi there openyng his mynd, & declaryng his matter to certayn of the Irishe nobilitie, whõ he knew by true fame and repozt to beare but litle fauour to kyng Henry noz his partakers & hauing othe and promes of aide to him swozne & made he shewed them that he had saued and preserued the duke of Clarence son from death, & had foz very good will brought him into that countrey & region where he knew that both kyng Edward and all his stock were fauoured & loued aboue all other. This matter was beleued straight of the nobilitie whiche so shewed & published this feigned fable and ymagined iuggeling from one to an other til at the last it xx was accompted to be as true as the Gospell without any controuersye, ambiguitie oz question. In so muche that the lozd Thomas Geraldine 23 chauncelour of all ỹ country defrauded by his illusion vnder the colour Bacon Deputy of playn truthe receaued him into his castell and with honoure & reue- Ireland & Erle rence him entreteyned as one that descended frõ the high progeny of the of Kildare sangue royal, and began much to aide and helpe him. First calling together all his frendes & louers & suche other as were of bande oz affinitie, declaring first to them the cõmyng of this chyld, & after affirmyng that the croune and sceptre of the realme of rycht appertayned to this young prynce as sole heyze male lefte of the ligne of Rychard duke of Yozke: Exhoztyng and desyzyng them both foz the chyldes sake and his awne, xl as he was true inheritoure to the croune, to helpe and assyst hym to obteine the garland and possession of thesame by his graundfather to hym lyneally descended. And so after communicatyng thesame matter with other of the nobilitie, euery man promysed accozdyng to hys powze, aide of monye, menne and municions. By thys meanes thesame was shortely bruted throughout all Irelande, and euery man was wyllyng to take to take his part and submyt them selfes to him, callyng hym of all han-des kyng. So that nowe they of this secte thus compassed and sorty-thought to haue in other places their compaignions and furtheters of their malicious purpose and most pestiferous factiō, and straight forth they sent into Englād certayne preuy messengers to despye theim, whom they knewe to haue bene true faythfull and frendes to kyng Rychard, now to cōtinue in their accustomed loue and faithfull frendship toward his nephewe and to helpe the childe with treasure & substaunce as farre as they conueniently might. And that his powre might be the stronger to ouercome his enemies & to obteyne his pretensed purpose, he and his confederates sent messengers into Flaunders to the lady Margaret suster to kyng Edward and late wyfe to Charles the duke of Bourgoyne to further his purpose with al her powre and helpe. This duke Charles hauing no childzen by this lady Margret, left one sole daughter named Mary behynd hym, begotten of his first wyfe daughter to the duke of Burbone, whiche was maried to Maximilian sonne to Frederick the Emperour, on whiche wife he had engendred two childzen, the one Philip, and the other Margaret. The whiche two chyldzen after the death of the lady Mary their mother, this lady Margaret late wyfe to duke Charles so entierely beloued, so tenderly brought vp, and so motherly norysshed, besyde the dayly peyne that she toke in ordryng their affaires and busynes for the mayntenaunce of their honoure and preferment of their profite, that she both for her motherly loue toward the young children, & also for the good administracion of iustice in their countries was highly reputed and esteemed & bare great aucthoritie & swynge through all Flaunders and the lowe countries thertō adiacēt. This lady Margaret, although she knewe the family and stocke of the house of Yorke to be in maner destroied & vtterly defaced by her brother kyng Richard, yet not being satiate nor content with the long hatred and cōtinual malice of her parentes which subuerted and ouerthrew almost the progeny and lignage of kyng Henry the. vi. and the house of Lancaster, nor yet remembryng the new affinitie and strong alliaunce that was lately concluded, by the whiche the heires of bothe the houses and progenies were vnited & coniopned together in lawfull matrimony, lyke one forgettyng both God & charite, inflamed with malice & diabolicall instinctiō, inuen-ted & practised all mischiefes, displeasures and dāmages that she could deuyse against the kyng of England. And farther in her fury and frantyke moode (accordyng to the saiyng of the wise man, there is no malice equiuolent nor aboue the malice of a woman) she wrought all the waies possible how to sucke his bloud and cōpasse his destruccion as the principall head of her aduerse parte & contrary faccion, as though he should be a dewe sacrifice or an host immolated for the mutuall murder & shamefull homicide cōmitted and perpetrated by her brother and progeny.

So behement, so full of poyson and so strong is the powre of ciuile dis-sencion and preuy hatred, that some tyme it will auerte and withdrawe the wisest

the wisest and moost sapient men from goodnesse, honestie & their bounden allegeaunce. Therfore this lady knowyng of this tumulteous secte and conspiracy, prepared and sodenly deupsed against kyng Henry (although she knewe it to be but a feigned & peinted mattre and not woorth two strawes) yet (hauyng suche an occasion to worke her malyce vpon) she promised gladly to the messengers not only to mainteyne, ayde, further and succoure their purposed entent with money and substaunce, but wyth all the labour & peyne that she might, to encourage, stomacke and entyce many other to be aiders, assisters, & partakers of thesame conspiracy, and shortly to ioyne with the chyeueteines of thesaide enterprice.

When king Henry was certified of these doynges by messengers sent into Englande, no meruel although he was none other wise then he had occasion, sore vexed & moued, cõsideryng that by the disceate and fraude of suche a dongehyll knaue and vyle borne villeyne, so great a sedicion should be excited and sturred against hym: Neuertheles, he lyke a circũspect, ingentous and prudent prynce, well consideryng and pollitiquely forseynge, ymagined that if this entreprice came to passe, that the finall ende would be the bluddy darte of mortall warre, & yf they should ioyne and combate in open battaile, in the which for the mooste parte, the large campe of all mischiefe is commonly opened and shewed, many innocent menne on both partes should perishe and come to ruyne and confusyon without desert or offence. For which reason, before all thynges he determyned to attempt and proue yf that he might without anye battayle or stroke stryken (thende whereof is euer ambiguous and doubtfull) pacefye and reduce these rebels to rule, reason, & dewe subiection, before that this euell newly planted wede should straye and wander ouer the good herbes of his whole realme. Therfore he called his whole coũsaill together at the Charterhouse beside hys royall manner called Richemonde, and there consulted how to pacefye thys sodeyne rage secretly begonne, wythout any more disturbaunce or open trouble whyche mocion of all menne was thought mete, necessary and proffitable to be assayed & prosecuted wyth celerite and effecte. And that before any other thynge were attempted and begonne, that a generall pardon should be published to al offenders that were content to receaue thesame & after would be true, louyng & obedient to the kyng their souereigne lorde accordyng to their bounden dutie and allegiaunce: Thinkyng that yf that pardõ were any lenger space procrastened or prolonged, that in the meane ceason (as the prouerbe sayth, taryenge draweth and leopardeth perell) Sir Thomas Broughton knyght whiche had hyd and kept the lorde Louell from the kyng a great ceason, and was at hand with diuerse of his frendes, in so troublous & perelous a tyme vtterly dispeityng of pardon and remission, and as men wythout hope of all grace, settynge all on.vi.and.vii. should sodeynly moue a newe insurreccion against hym & vnquyet him in some place where he had left least resistaũce. For although they were thought to haue been conferetes and Jurates of this newe conspiracy, yet,because there was no sure proofe nor apparaunt argument therof,yt was supposed to be mooste profitable for that tyme present, to extende no maner of extremytie nor crueltie agaynste theym by anye coloure or pretence,partely that by suche lenytie and gentle sufferaunce, the rebellyous powre should not augment and increace,and partely that if hereafter they shoulde be founde to drawebacke,and be negligent in doynge their due ductye and allegiaunce,that then by this pollitique prouision they shoulde be rewarded with punyshmēt accordyngly as they had deserued,and accordyng to the cōmen saiyng, suche breade as they bake, suche muste they eate: Whereupon the kynge gaue a generall pardon throughoute all Englande (without excepcion of any offence) yea euen to them that had commytted high treason agaynst hys maiestie and royall person.Furthermore, after longe consultacion had and all thynges maturely decyded, it was thought by the whole senate for the tyme then present mooste necessarye and conuenyent to auoyde that erronyous rumoure, rumblynge and blastynge abroade, that the sonne of the duke of Clarence was in Englande, and that he personally shoulde be shewed abroade in the cytie and other publique places whereby the vntrue opinyon falsly affyrminge that he was in Irelande might be emongest the cōmynaltye repressed, put downe,and accompted as a comment and vayne ymagyned fable.
